He was a regular old soaker was Smithson, and could stand as much as here and there one.

But by the time he got to the bottom of the cellar steps he found his brains quite in confusion, and he wondered what in the world he had been sent for.

He ascended the steps slowly.

His legs almost failed him once or twice.

"That is strong ale," he said—"regular knock-me-down! I must not have any more of it."

He reached the bar window.

"What do you want?" said the girl.

Smithson was puzzled, and only looked at her vacantly.

"Mr. Lickfold," he gasped out at length.

"Well, what?"

"He sent me up here for—for——"

"For what?"

"Six—six——"

"Six what?"

"Six musical honours, of course! Didn't I tell you?"

The girl looked at him in surprise.

"Smithson!" howled a voice—"what the devil are you doing? Why don't you make haste—we are all waiting!"

It was another of the officers, who had walked as far as the hole in the flooring of the parlour.

"What do you want?" asked the girl again.

"Six tankards, and make haste!"

"Oh yes—six tankards," said Smithson, thickly. "Why don't you make haste, young woman?"

"Here they are, and mind how you carry them."

"All right."

With a great deal of difficulty, Smithson managed to pick up the six tankards, carrying three in each hand.

He found going down the cellar steps was much more difficult than going up had been.

All at once his knees gave way beneath him, and down he went to the bottom, tankards and all, with a grand crash.

Old Matthew came to see what was the matter.

There was not one of the others capable of going, for every moment that elapsed only served to increase their stupefaction.

The effects of the ale did not make themselves felt all at once, but the feeling increased by degrees.

Smithson gathered himself up by Matthew's assistance, and not without much trouble.

The pewter tankards were in a very bruised and battered condition, but still they would answer the purpose.

Leaning heavily upon Matthew's arm, Smithson returned to the cellar.

Then old Matthew, finding the officers were headstrong, and would have their own way, filled the six tankards one after another, and gave them to the men.

They stood there waiting for Lickfold to give the signal.

It was astonishing what oblivion that old ale produced.

In the short time that had elapsed, Jim Lickfold had almost forgotten what he had said about drinking Matthew's health with musical honours.

He was reminded, and then, like one starting up when just falling into a sleep, he said:

"Oh, yes! Here's to his jolly good health! Now, then, my lads, pipe up well, and do him honour!"

The usual drinking chorus was then sang with great gusto, and was followed by the usual three times three.

At the end of that time, the officers' lungs were quite exhausted, so they put the tankards to their lips, and drank away as if for their lives.

They did not stop until they had each seen the bottom of the tankard.

Some additional effect was already produced, even during the short time that had been occupied by imbibition.

Jim Lickfold was quite elate.

"Now then," he cried, "join hands, and round we go! Hurrah—hurrah! Keep the pot boiling!"

Any ridiculous proposition was certain to be assented to by the officers while in their present condition.

At Jim Lickfold's command, therefore, they all joined hands, and commenced going round in a circle, leaving old Matthew in the centre.

"Bravo for old Matthew!" cried Jim Lickfold. "Now, my lads, shout it out! Bravo—bravo—bravo for old Matthew!"

Such a din and racket had surely never been heard in those cellars before.

All at once, however, Smithson's unfortunate legs gave way again.

Down he went as suddenly as if he had been shot, and in his fall he dragged two of his companions with him, who, when down, found themselves quite incapable of getting up.

The others, continuing their mad gyration, fell over them, and in another moment the whole party of police officers were lying on the floor of the cellar in one indistinguishable and almost insensible heap.

CHAPTER DCCXII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK DISCOVERS THAT HE IS BY NO MEANS OUT OF PERIL.

"Well, upon my word, this is a nice state of things!" said old Matthew at length—"a very nice state of things indeed! So that is your way of doing business, is it, Mr. Lickfold? I wonder what you'll think of yourself when you wake up!"

"Matthew!" said a voice.

"Well now, what is it?"

"Let me out!"

"Oh! it's you, is it?"

"Yes, it is!"

"All right, Jack! One moment—only one moment! It was rather injudicious for you to speak just then as you did."

Old Matthew picked up the lantern off the floor, where it had fallen, and by the aid of its light examined the countenances of the prostrate police-officers.

The scrutiny satisfied him.

"Oh, you are all done for, sure enough! Well, this is a nice night's work, and won't there be a jolly row about it, too!"

"Matthew!"

"Yes!"

"Will you let me out?"

"Of course I will! Just have patience for a moment, can't you!"

"I am."

Old Matthew got upon the sill, listened a moment, and then by a peculiar knack he knew of, lifted the lid of the cask.

Jack popped his head up immediately.

"You've been playing a nice little game, Matthew!"

"Hush!"

"What's amiss?"

"Be cautious!"

"All right."

"Step out now, at once. Don't make a noise on any account!"

There was really no need for this caution to be given.

Scarcely anything less than an earthquake would have disturbed the officers just then.

Sixteen-String Jack got carefully out of the cask.

He was exceedingly glad to do so.

"What is the meaning of all this, Matthew?"

"You have heard all, haven't you?"

"Yes."

"Very well, then."

"But I don't understand."

"What?"

"Why, the magical means by which you were enabled to draw ale out of the cask in which I was hidden. How did you manage that?"

"And how was it the ale took effect so quickly?"

"Yes; clear those points up at once."

"I will. But don't make a noise."

"I'm quiet."

"Just hold the lantern, then. I have two or three things to do—slight preparations to make in readiness for the officers when they awake, and while I am so engaged I will tell you all about it."

"Do."

"Hold the light up, then."

Jack obeyed.

Matthew was very busy leaning over the top of the cask.

"Now," he said, "I must tell you, in the first place, that the barrel in which you have been hiding has a false bottom—about a couple of feet off the real one."

"I understand."

"And here the false bottom is," the landlord continued, producing a round piece of wood while he spoke.

"And there is ale underneath."

"Yes."

"Then I quite understand."

"And the ale is just drugged with the strongest stuff I could get at the chemist's. No one could stand against it—it's quite impossible! In fact, I am rather alarmed about the quantity Jim Lickfold has drunk!"

"Is it so very powerful?"

"It is indeed. And look—there he lies just like a log."

"But won't there be a row about this, Matthew?"

"No doubt there will."

"And sha'n't you get in for it?"

"No. I shall say they would drink the ale, whether I would let them or not. But come, I have made the cask all right, so that if by-and-by they should take it into their heads to examine it they will find nothing suspicious."

"You are a wonderful fellow, Matthew!"

"I have been told so several times to-night. But come on!"

"What's that?" said a voice.

Old Matthew started.

"What's that?" said the voice again.

It was one of the police-officers who had spoken.

He was sitting up, rubbing his head, with a lugubrious aspect.

The drugged ale had not taken so much effect upon him as his comrades.

"What's that?" he said again.

"Nothing," replied old Matthew.

As he spoke, he gave the officer a rap on the head with the lantern, which had the effect of rendering him insensible at once.

"Now," said old Matthew, seizing Jack by the skirt of his coat—"now!"

He leaned forward, Jack following.

In a few moments they reached the parlour.

"Wait here a little while," said Matthew. "I will shut up the shop for to-night, and then we shall at least be secure from further interruption.

He was gone before Jack could speak.

He soon returned.

"There are other officers lurking about in the lane, I fancy," he said; "but as they said nothing to me, I said nothing to them."

"I must be going."

"You must indeed, for it will soon be daylight."

"This has lost us a great deal of time."

"True, but don't grumble. Things might have been worse."

"I believe you! I almost gave myself up for lost once."

"But really, you see, you were in no danger. So, you see, this will be a lesson to you always to put trust in me for the future."

"Well, now, Matthew, tell me what I came here purposely to know—the situation of the public-house."

"You will be pleased with that, I can promise you, and you may look forward to a little quiet."

"We shall be glad of it."

"I can't make out why Tom Davis should have left in the way you mention. You must get the explanation of that from his own lips."

"But the inn—where is that?"

"I will tell you. You know Ealing Common?"

"Yes, well."

"On the south side of the common you will see a little narrow lane, with a singular-looking sign-post at the top of it."

"Yes, I think I know the very lane you mention."

"Very well. Go down that for about a mile, and then you will come to another narrow turning. Go down that, and about a quarter of a mile further on you will come to the inn."

"What an out-of-the-way place!"

"Very."

"What on earth could have induced anyone to build an inn in such a spot?"

"I will tell you. It is a very ancient building, and I find that a great many years ago the main road to Ealing ran past its very door. But some great changes have been made. The old road was stopped up, and a new one made. It was a wonder the inn was not pulled down. It would have been but for the fact that the owner lived in it. He was a perverse, obstinate man, and would not budge an inch. He had been born in the inn, he said, and he declared he would die in it. And so he did. Of course the trade dropped off; but he did not mind that, for he had made his fortune and had got enough to live upon. But after his death no one could be found who would take the house, so it was shut up, and soon gained the reputation of being haunted."

"It is quite a little romance."

"Yes. Tom Davis will tell you about it—he knows all the particulars."

"And what is the sign of the inn?"

"A very strange one."

"What is it?"

"The Three Spiders."

"How odd!"

"Very. Do you think you could find it?"

"I have no doubt upon the subject."

"That's a good thing."

"And will Tom Davis be there?"

"Yes. I saw him a day or two ago, and he told me he was going to move at once; but as I said before, you will get all the particulars from him."

"Yes; and now I will be off. Good-bye, Matthew! I am much obliged to you for what you have done to-night."

[SIXTEEN-STRING JACK MAKES A DARING ESCAPE.]

"Pho!—don't mention it!"

"But I shall. I want to be off now, though; but I hope I shall soon see you again. It's really quite a treat! I hope and trust, however, that you won't get into any trouble over those officers."

"Oh, don't be afraid! I will take care of myself, never fear!"

"I hope you will."

"And now, where are you going?"

"Back to the forest."

"Take care of yourself."

"I shall, depend upon it."

"Remember me to the captain and all of them."

"I will—I shall have a rare budget to tell them; and now, as time is precious, and as I have to go as far as St. Giles's for my horse, just tell me how I am to leave your house safely."

"You can't go back by the way you came."

"No—certainly not."

"Well, then, I fancy you can't do better than slip quietly out of the front door, and make the best of your way along the lane."

"I will. At the worst I have only a short distance to go to get my horse. Good-bye, and once more, many thanks!"

"Good-bye!"

As he spoke, old Matthew opened the front door of the White Horse quietly, and Jack glided out.

Matthew closed the door again instantly.

Jack looked right and left, but seeing no one, hastened onwards.

Scarcely had he gone ten steps, however, before he heard the sound of rapid footsteps behind him, and then a voice cried:

"That's him—that's him!"

CHAPTER DCCXIII.

GIVES SOME ACCOUNT OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF WRIGGLES AND HIS OFFICERS.

In order that what follows may be properly understood, it will be necessary to leave Sixteen-String Jack for awhile and return to the proceedings of an individual of whom we have for a long time lost sight.

We allude to that enterprising and energetic police officer Mr. Wriggles.

It may, perhaps, be as well to remind the reader under what circumstances it was that we saw him last.

It was on that eventful night when Maud was rescued from Newgate by the four highwaymen.

On that occasion Mr. Wriggles was never more certain of anything in the whole course of his life than that Dick Turpin had come to his end.

He would have wagered any amount, however great, that the notorious highwayman had perished after taking that frightful leap off the wooden bridge.

What Davis told Tom King about his after proceedings was to a certain extent correct.

He waited, searching up and down the stream in the hope of finding Dick Turpin's body, until it was nearly daylight.

Thus it happened that he was out of the way at the very time when he ought to have been near Newgate.

At last, finding all attempts to recover the body unavailing, he reluctantly turned his horse's head towards London, being nevertheless brimful of the intelligence that Dick Turpin was no more.

His horror and astonishment may perhaps be guessed when he learned that all four of the highwaymen had been busy at work in Newgate, and that they had escaped, taking Maud with them.

At first he firmly refused to believe a word of it.

But by degrees he found that the facts were just as they had been represented, and that they could not possibly be gainsaid.

The first feeling that crept over him was one of despair.

"I will give up," he said—"I will give up! I'll try this no more. They are too clever for me! I made sure this time, and yet I have failed. I'll give up!"

This state of despair did not last very long.

Probably what contributed more than anything else to rouse him out of it was the manner in which he was jeered by everybody for having failed so lamentably.

"I will make one more attempt," he said, at length, "and if I fail this time I will really resign, and some one else shall take my post. I will begin at once."

Accordingly he did begin, and for a length of time was engaged in galloping about the country without, however, achieving any result.

About this time he was much chagrined in consequence of an order that was given to withdraw those soldiers who had been set to patrol the roads.

On more than one occasion we have shown pretty well what was the feeling among the military upon this subject.

Both officers and men alike hated the duty that had been imposed upon them, and, in order to check the spirit of disaffection that was rapidly growing, the order we have mentioned was given out.

Mr. Wriggles, then, had the place all to himself.

It was just about this time, however, that he heard of the occurrences that had taken place at the admiral's mansion.

The police officers who caused Tom King so much trouble on that occasion were not headed by Mr. Wriggles, but nevertheless they made a full report of their proceedings.

That Tom had escaped was quite certain, but as a matter of course Mr. Wriggles immediately surmised that those he sought were hiding themselves somewhere beneath the trees in Epping Forest.

If he had been sure of this it would have been only a vague direction in consequence of the immense extent of it.

Yet he hovered pretty closely all round about Epping Forest.

But he was baffled in consequence of the careful manner in which the highwaymen kept themselves concealed.

To follow the chief police officer in all his manifold attempts to obtain some clue to the highwaymen's hiding-place would be tedious.

Let it suffice to say that he at length learned they must be in a portion of the forest not far from the King's Oak public-house.

Accordingly, on the very night when Sixteen-String Jack set out upon his journey to Tom Davis's house, Mr. Wriggles, accompanied by an unusually large troop of police officers, started from London.

His destination was Epping Forest, and he determined to commence making an examination of one portion of it without delay.

It will be remembered that Sixteen-String Jack, when riding along by the side of the coachman, had heard the sound of horses' feet in considerable numbers on the road before him.

Believing them to be police officers, he had taken to the meadows, and at length pausing on an elevated spot, he saw the tops of their hats as they rode swiftly along the highway.

This was Mr. Wriggles and his party.

Without meeting with any accident or interruption, they arrived in due time at Epping Forest, reaching it, indeed, at about the same hour that Sixteen-String Jack paused before Tom Davis's house.

He did not stop until he reached that point in the road at which Earl's Path diverges at almost a right angle.

The masses of trees were everywhere around them, and there was nothing to be seen in any direction that would lead them to the belief that there was any of the inhabitants near.

But with great vigour and resolution, considering the numerous defeats he had had, Mr. Wriggles and his men commenced a rigid search among the under wood

After the departure of Sixteen-String Jack, it had fallen to Tom King's turn to keep watch round about the cave.

They had agreed from the first, for their own safety's sake, to adopt this precaution, taking the duty upon themselves by turns.

While so occupied, Tom King did not confine himself to any particular spot, nor did he keep all the time in the vicinity of the cavern.

On the contrary, he pushed his way through the bushes, peeping and prying about so as to be certain in his own mind that there was no prospect of immediate danger.

Ever since his adventure at the admiral's mansion he had been most particular in doing this, for he feared that the result of his doings there would be to direct the attention of the police officers to the forest.

On this night he had strayed in the direction of Earl's Path, and therefore he became aware of the presence of Mr. Wriggles and his officers very soon after their arrival.

He waited for some time watching their movements, and yet taking good care to keep out of their way.

He stood, in fact, until he judged it unsafe to remain any longer.

So, turning round, he made his way back with all speed to the cave.

The very manner in which he broke through the bushes and presented himself to his companions showed them that something unusual had taken place.

"What is it, Tom?" they inquired, anxiously—"what have you discovered?"

"The worst! Mr. Wriggles and his officers are now within a quarter of a mile of this spot."

Dick Turpin and Claude Duval started up in alarm, and a faint shriek came from Maud's lips.

"Hush!" said Tom—"hush! Pray be silent! I don't think my warning has come too late, although our foes are so close upon us. But do not utter a cry or speak in a loud tone of voice, for, in the silence that there always is here, who can say how far such sounds will travel?"

"Are you sure of what you say?" asked Dick Turpin, scarcely able to credit what he had just heard.

"I am perfectly sure of it, and, if I might give you my opinion, I should say, from the manner in which the officers are making their way towards this spot, they have, in some manner that passes my comprehension, obtained a knowledge of our precise whereabouts."

"Are they coming direct to the cave, think you?"

"In my opinion they are, not hurriedly but carefully. They are searching every bush as they come along, so that they make sure of driving us before them."

"This is most alarming and vexatious," said Dick Turpin. "What is to be done?"

"In my opinion," said Claude, "there is but one thing we can do, and that is to get our horses and move off as quickly as possible. If they have begun to search in this quarter, they must of necessity discover the cave."

"Claude is right," said Turpin. "Wait here a moment, Maud—we will soon depart."

"It is a pity," said Tom, "that Sixteen-String Jack is not with us, and that we do not know the position of the inn."

"It is," replied Dick; "but there's no time to talk about that now."

As he spoke he uttered that faint whistling sound which we have more than once described, and which Black Bess understood so well.

In a moment afterwards there was a crashing of branches, and then Black Bess, full of fire and spirit and altogether refreshed by her long rest, made her appearance upon the spot.

CHAPTER DCCXIV.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMPANIONS MAKE A PRECIPITATE RETREAT FROM EPPING FOREST.

DICK TURPIN'S eyes glistened with pleasure, his breast swelled, when his bonny black mare—uttering a low cry which could not be interpreted as signifying anything else but pleasure and recognition—came towards him and rubbed her head against his breast.

"Bravo, Bess!" he exclaimed, patting her fondly on the neck as he spoke. "You are once more about to have some adventures on the road, and you are once more about to carry a double burden!"

Black Bess pranced and pawed the earth impatiently, as though anxious to start off at once.

She was now, in consequence of the attention she had received, in better condition for the road than she had been for many a month.

"Make haste, Dick," said Tom—"make haste! We have several things to do, and who can tell how soon the officers may make their appearance among the trees?"

This caution was not needed, for Dick was by no means unconscious of their extreme peril.

With a speed that would have done credit to an experienced ostler he placed the various trappings upon his steed, and Black Bess was saddled and bridled in complete readiness before either of the other two horses.

This being the case, Dick Turpin moved rapidly about, endeavouring to destroy all traces of that place having lately been occupied.

In an extremity of fear, Maud had seated herself upon the trunk of the fallen tree, and was weeping silently.

Well might she dread another pursuit by the police officers, for on the former occasion had she not had a very narrow escape indeed of her life?

The wound she had then received was far from well, though much better than it had been.

Yet it was with an unusual amount of depression that she looked forward to the events that would probably take place during the next few hours.

At last Claude Duval and Tom King were ready.

Although some time had elapsed since Tom King had warned them of their danger, yet in reality only a few moments had expired.

"Now, Dick," they cried, "quick—we must leave this place at once!"

"Which direction will be best to take?"

"Towards High Beech," replied Tom King, readily; "that is the nearest point at which we can emerge from the forest."

"Then you think of trying to escape by a rapid flight?"

"Yes, I believe that is our best, if not our only chance. Our horses have had a very long rest, and are now in excellent condition; those of the officers, however, are already somewhat tired by their journey from London, so that I consider we have every advantage on our side."

"I think you are right, Tom," replied Dick Turpin. "You lead the way, and I will follow, and Claude will bring up the rear."

This arrangement was fallen into instantly.

They were compelled to proceed on foot for some distance, leading their horses by their bridles in consequence of the extreme density of the forest.

But Tom King had by this time become exceedingly familiar with the locality, and so, without loss of time, he led them towards an open part where they would be able to mount.

It was a long, beautiful glade, looking scarcely as though it had been the work of nature alone.

It was many feet in width, presenting all the appearance af an avenue in a park.

The trees grew with extreme regularity on both sides of it, and the beautiful, smooth, green turf was beneath their feet stretching as far as they could see before and behind them.

"Mount," said Tom—"mount, and then follow me. I'll warrant I shall show you the quickest and the best way out of the forest."

"Make all speed, Tom!" was Dick Turpin's reply. "Rest assured that Black Bess will be able to keep up with you!"

At this moment there was a shout from the rear, and a pistol was fired.

One of the police officers, who had become somewhat separated from his companions, had either heard or seen the highwaymen.

According to the instructions that had been given him, he raised an immediate alarm.

The sharp, ringing report of the pistol sounded with alarming distinctness in that silent wood.

It reached the ears of Mr. Wriggles and his party instantly, and they rushed pell-mell in that direction.

But our friends had nothing left now but to mount.

This was very quickly done.

Dick placed Maud easily upon the saddle before him, so that, as he was flying from his foes, his body would at least form a shield for her.

Before they could fairly get their steeds in motion, however, the police officers came bursting through the trees like so many Indians.

"Fire—fire!" cried Mr. Wriggles, instantly—"fire!"

His men all had their pistols in readiness, and a straggling, irregular volley was immediately discharged.

Several bullets whistled around the highwaymen.

But the pistols had been fired without any accurate aim having being taken.

The consequence was that no harm was done, and Tom King, again crying to his companions to follow him, urged his horse forward at the top of its speed.

Away they went down the glade at a furious pace, the trees seeming to fly past them.

Upon reaching the termination of this glade they found that it connected with another, and that with another still, so that, although it was not by any means the nearest or most direct route out of the forest, yet it was the quickest, because the horses were able to maintain a rapid rate of speed.

Having once started the game, as Mr. Wriggles expressed it, the officers did not trouble themselves to continue their search.

They all eagerly scrambled into their saddles, and, as fast as they mounted, rode off in pursuit.

So that at first it was quite a straggling throng that followed the highwaymen.

Foremost among them, however, was Mr. Wriggles, for he believed if he once got the highwaymen out of the forest into the open country he should be able to keep in their rear until he had run them down.

He had very good reasons for indulging in this belief, and what those reasons were will presently become apparent.

At last, with a glad shout, Tom King announced that the boundary of the forest had been reached.

Had the dragoons still continued to patrol the roads as they had done up to so short a time before, the highwaymen could not possibly have escaped capture.

They were all that time filled with this dread, for they were not aware that the patrol had been withdrawn.

As they galloped on, however, without meeting with any interruption, their courage began to rise, though at first they were almost afraid to believe that fortune had favoured them to such an extent.

By degrees the throng of officers in the rear grew more and more compa..

Those stragglers who had before been in the rear gradually recovered their lost ground.

But the highwaymen never lost the advantage which the first start had given them, and when they were entirely clear of the forest there was a distance of considerably over half a mile between them.

And what cheered them and made them still more exultant was the fact that this space by almost rapid degrees grew greater and greater, although the officers made every effort to keep up.

"I told you this would be the best plan," shouted Tom. "Forward, my friends—forward!—we shall outdistance them easily!"

Had Dick Turpin been alone, there is no doubt that he could have accomplished this with scarcely any trouble at all.

So far from having to urge Black Bess onwards in the furious gallop he had to keep the rein somewhat tight, in order to prevent her from shooting before Tom King.

Claude Duval kept steadily in the rear, though he was not many paces behind his captain.

"Yonder is the high-road!" cried Tom King, as he pointed across a meadow. "Rely upon it, now the dragoons are removed, we cannot do better than take to it—it will be firm beneath the horses' feet, and we shall make wonderful speed! We shall be more likely to outdistance the officers then than if we continue a flight across the country."

"Be it so, then," cried Dick Turpin. "I am inclined to think you are right, though, if we should happen to fall foul of a troop of dragoons, our situation will be awkward indeed!"

"Don't think of that," said Tom King. "On—on! Look behind you and you will see how we have distanced the officers during the last ten minutes!"

CHAPTER DCCXV.

THE CHASE AFTER THE HIGHWAYMEN BECOMES MORE AND MORE EXCITING AND INTERESTING.

Dick Turpin turned his head, and so did Claude Duval.

Both felt reassured as they did so, and were encouraged to make still more strenuous efforts to get out of sight altogether.

The police officers were now at least a mile in the rear.

Many things conspired to cause this.

In the first place, the horses were all to some extent fatigued by their first journey, and Mr. Wriggles was anxious that all his men should keep up with him.

They could in consequence only proceed at an average rate.

Among the horses that the police officers rode, there were doubtless one or two that could easily have maintained the lead.

But these were checked so that the troop could keep together.

Mr. Wriggles continued to speak to his men, and what he said inspired them with a great deal of courage and confidence.

They did not seem in the least troubled about the manner in which the highwaymen gradually increased the distance, and they gave several loud cheers, as though they were quite sure of victory in the end, or as though they firmly believed that on this occasion at least the race would not be to the swift.

Directly after exchanging these few words, and looking back at their foes, the highwaymen jumped over the low hedge that divided them from the high-road.

Maud clung in the greatest terror to Dick Turpin, and when he pulled up Black Bess after her leap, he found that Maud was sobbing violently.

As well as he could, he soothed her agitation.

Yet the feeling of depression of which we have already spoken grew stronger and stronger, as though she anticipated some great misfortune in the future.

The high-road was smooth and level, and just moist enough to be agreeable to the horses' feet.

The gallop at which they went was truly alarming.

Suddenly they came upon a little village or town, the houses in which for the most part fronted the high-road.

But the village was left behind before they could take note of the buildings contained in it.

"Hurrah!" shouted Tom King, as, looking back, he discovered that the officers were out of sight altogether.

"Come, Maud," said Dick, "you see that so far all is well—our steeds have enabled us to give them the slip already. They are out of sight, and, after galloping a little further at this pace—which to you doubtless is an alarming one—all will be well."

"Come on!" cried Tom—"don't flag! Every moment now is of immense importance, since it takes us so much further from our foes. Our horses will stand a much longer gallop than this. On—on!"

Then, some time afterwards, Tom King once more turned his head.

As he did so, an exclamation escaped his lips.

But this time not one of satisfaction.

He was so astonished that he could scarcely believe that his own eyes had served him faithfully.

"Look—look!" he cried. "What can you see behind you?"

Guessing by his manner something was wrong, Dick and Claude looked hurriedly back.

What was their astonishment to perceive that the police officers they had imagined they were outdistancing were in reality actually gaining upon them?

From the distance, they could see that the officers were sparing neither whip nor spur to urge the animals onward at their utmost speed.

But how or in what manner they had managed to catch up with them they could not possibly conceive.

"There is something strange about that," said Tom King. "But no matter—we shall surely outrun them yet. Forward—forward!"

With unrelaxing speed, the highwaymen's horses galloped on.

For a considerable length of time, however, the officers, even if they did not gain upon them, contrived to keep quite as close behind them.

They could not be shaken off.

At last, however, some diminution in their speed was appreciable.

Gradually they dropped back into their former position.

The distance gradually and gradually increased, until they were lost to sight altogether.

Several towns and villages had been passed through by the highwaymen in their headlong flight.

But now a large tract of open country lay before them.

The road lay almost level, so that there was no time lost in ascending hills, nor were their horses so severely taxed as they would have been if the route they had taken had been of an undulating character.

But again, and just when a belief that they had got out of the officers' sight entirely had taken possession of them, another ejaculation of surprise broke from Tom King.

Could it be really possible that it was the same troop that had pursued them from the first?

Yes, there was no doubt about it.

By some means or other, they had recovered their lost ground, and had now got so close to the objects of their pursuit that Tom King could distinguish the form of Mr. Wriggles from the rest.

"I have it!" cried Tom, with something like a tinge of despair in his voice—"I understand how it is now!"

"What—what?"

"Look behind you, and see how close the officers are to us now, and yet we have not relaxed our speed. I will tell you how it is: Wriggles has made arrangements all along the high-road to have relays of fresh horses ready To what extent he may have carried this plan, we can not tell; but I am afraid—nay, certain—that he will run us down!"

A gloomy silence followed these words, during which Maud's sobs again broke forth.

The highwaymen could do nothing but urge their horses onward, and they began with alarm to perceive that they already showed some signs of exhaustion in consequence of such a long, hard gallop.

Those belonging to the police officers, however, seemed quite fresh, as they really were.

Tom had hit upon the right solution of the mystery that had puzzled them so much at first.

This was the reason why the police officers felt so much confidence in the ultimate success of their efforts.

Mr. Wriggles had been carefully laying his plans for many days past, and he had arranged at various inns that horses should be waiting, upon which they could mount instantly and ride off.

From this it will be seen that he calculated upon driving the highwaymen from their hiding-place.

He never for a moment imagined that they would stay, and endeavour to fight it out.

Such an attempt would have been neither more nor less than madness on their part.

A better scheme than this could never have been devised.

It seemed in every way calculated to answer the end in view.

However good the horses belonging to the highwaymen might be, they must of necessity be exhausted by the continual and never-resting gallop.

It was soon after the highwaymen lost sight of the police officers for the first time that the latter stopped in the village through which the highwaymen had passed a short time before at such a furious rate, at the principal inn.

Horses were waiting, and in an incredibly short space of time Mr. Wriggles and his party all dismounted and seated themselves on the steeds that were waiting for them.

Then, without allowing a moment's pause, they continued their pursuit.

The horses had every one been carefully chosen.

They were all above the average quality, and had had several days' rest, so that this will at once account for the officers being able to regain the ground they had lost.

"Keep on, my men!" cried Wriggles. "We must not flag for a single instant! The result I may say is certain. I have made all my arrangements for miles and miles to come, so that in the end their horses must fall beneath them from sheer exhaustion; then we shall be able to effect an easy capture."

This seemed probable in the extreme, and the officers were much elated by the prospect before them.

Again they found the highwaymen receding from their view, until at length they disappeared in the distance altogether.

"Whip and spur hard!" cried Wriggles. "Their horses are indeed of first-rate quality, or they would not make such speed as this. Don't spare the horseflesh, for I am sorry to say we have several miles to go yet before we can reach the public-house at which the next relay of horses is waiting."

These words rather damped the courage of the officers at first.

Expecting every moment, however, to reach the village where the fresh horses were, they slashed their horses with their whips until their arms ached, and gored them with the spurs in a manner that was terrible to witness, so that the poor, panting beasts flew along simply because they were maddened by intense pain.

CHAPTER DCCXVI.

DICK TURPIN DECIDES UPON TRYING A VERY HAZARDOUS SCHEME, IN THE HOPE OF BEING ABLE TO BAFFLE MR. WRIGGLES.

THE highwaymen, finding again that the police officers were out of sight, and that they continued so for rather a longer time than before, agreed to run the risk of pausing for a few moments, in order to allow their horses to recover their wind a little.

They availed themselves of the opportunity to hold a rapid and anxious consultation as to the best thing they could do

"It will be folly to keep along the high-road in this fashion," said Tom King. "It is pretty clear to me that every few miles Wriggles will be able to obtain fresh horses, so that we must of necessity be run down."

"But how are we to avoid it?" said Dick Turpin. "If we were to turn off now and gallop across the country, the brightness with which the moon is shining would render us visible for many a mile. Look across on both sides, and you will see that I am right."

A glance satisfied the highwaymen that Dick was correct.

The part of the country they were in was exceedingly flat, and it was really wonderful what a distance was commanded from the road, which was raised somewhat above the level of the meadows.

"Moreover," said Dick, "I know full well that there are large extents of marshy lands on both sides of us—ground that to all appearance looks smooth and firm to the horses' feet, but which in reality is so treacherous and soft that after awhile it would entirely carry us down."

"That is a danger not to be despised," said Claude; "and besides, you appear to me to overlook the fact that Mr. Wriggles would become aware directly that we had quitted the high-road. At the very next halting-place he would inquire how long a time had elapsed since we had passed by; and if he was told that we had not been seen, he would know immediately that we had quitted the high-road."

"It's a most unfortunate affair, take it how you will," said Tom King. "But come—forward, my friends—forward! Our horses have rested quite long enough. How in the world is it that the officers have not appeared?"

This was a question they could not answer.

Nevertheless, the fact inspired them with a great deal of confidence.

Their horses might be fleet and enduring enough to carry them past the furthest station at which Mr. Wriggles had provided change of horses.

If this should happen, they might then stand a good chance of getting clear altogether.

But Dick remained very silent and thoughtful.

He was more uneasy in his mind than he would have liked to confess to anyone.

He comprehended the full extent of the peril with which they were menaced.

Try as he would, he could not see a clear and practicable way out of this danger.

He racked his brain, but all to no effect.

His usual fruitful invention failed him in this his hour of need.

But while galloping along with almost unabated speed, he continued to ponder over the difficulties of their position.

At length an idea darted into his mind.

But it was so wild and so daring that at first he contemptuously dismissed it.

But it kept recurring to him again and again—each time it was with greater force, and each time the improbability of its success seemed to grow less and less.

He knew that in many cases during his career he had owed his safety to some very daring act, and why should he not make himself secure by the same means on the present occasion?

It was, however, risking all.

And this was what made him chiefly pause.

If the enterprise failed, the consequences of the failure were so terrible that he could not bear to think upon them.

The death or capture of himself and all who were with him must inevitably follow.

On the other hand, however, should the plan prove successful, such a degree of safety and immunity from danger would be gained as would amply compensate them for any amount of risk, no matter how great.

Notwithstanding the difficulty there was in maintaining a conversation while the horses were at full gallop, he was about to speak upon the subject to his companions, when all at once they perceived something on the road before them.

What it was they soon made out, for as they were hastening towards it, so it was hastening towards them.

It was a post-chaise—a large, cumbrous, yellow vehicle, such as in those days were made use of by the affluent, as being the very quickest mode of passing from one place to another.

It was drawn by four powerful horses.

On one of the leaders rode a postilion, and on the front seat the coachman was sitting, and beside him was another servant in the garb of a footman.

This vehicle evidently did not interfere with Turpin's plan.

On the contrary, it seemed to strengthen it, for a look of increased confidence and determination appeared in his countenance, and he muttered to himself:

"Fortune is favouring me to the utmost! I should be mad indeed not to take advantage of so fortunate an event! It must be so—it must be so!"

Tom King, seeing this post-chaise approach, took care to get his horse close to one side of the road, so that there should be no danger of a collision while passing.

But what was his astonishment to hear Dick Turpin cry:

"Stop that chaise, Tom—on your life, stop it! You, Claude, assist him. Bring it to a standstill, and then I will tell you how we shall escape. Do not ask me a single question now, or wonder at my words; if you do, the chance will be lost. Have confidence in me, and obey me."

When they first heard Dick Turpin thus speak, Tom King and Claude both believed him mad, and not without some reason.

But what he said afterwards, and, more than that, the great confidence they both had in his ability to free them from a position of danger, made them obey almost without reflecting.

They both, however, glanced apprehensively in the rear.

Not a single sign of the police officers could they see, however.

And this is not to be wondered at, for the highwaymen were now only about a mile from the village at which Mr. Wriggles would obtain a change of horses.

A longer interval had elapsed between these two stations than between the others.

But it was unavoidable, that part of the country being so very thinly populated.

Some time would necessarily elapse before the tired horses could arrive at that spot, and had the highwaymen only have been sure of this, they would have felt a much greater degree of confidence in the plan they were about to attempt to carry out.

"Hold!" cried Tom King, as soon as he was near enough for his voice to be heard. "I say, pull up, postilion, or I fire!"

The postilion was evidently a great coward, or he would certainly have risked riding on.

As it was, he obeyed the highwayman's injunction immediately, and tightened the rein.

The horses gradually reduced their speed.

Claude Duval galloped on to the coachman and footman.

He first of all fired a pistol, and the bullet passed so close to their heads that they were in a mortal state of fright immediately.

Up to that moment, the coachman had felt inclined to whip the horses and chance it, but now quite a change came over his feelings, and he made every effort to stop the vehicle.

"After all," he said, to his fellow-servant, "it cannot matter a straw to us, can it? They'll find they have had all their trouble for nothing, and of course they'll let us ride on again. I know these highwaymen. I have been stopped before to-day, and I rather like 'em, because they never interfere with servants."

In less time than anyone could have believed possible, the post-chaise was brought to a standstill, and when this much had been accomplished, Tom King and Claude Duval paused, for they did not know what to do next.

They waited for Dick Turpin to give them their instructions.

"What can this mean?" asked Maud—"what is it you intend? I am terrified almost to death!"

"Be of good heart!" replied Turpin. "Leave all to me! Cheer up! Believe me that all this will end well for us—there is safety in what I am about to do!"

At this moment Dick stopped Black Bess close to where Tom King was standing.

"Now, captain," the latter said, "we have stopped the post-chaise, what in the world are we to do next?"

CHAPTER DCCXVII.

DESCRIBES THE DETAILS OF DICK TURPIN'S PERILOUS PLAN FOR DECEIVING THE POLICE OFFICERS.

"I will show you in a moment," replied Dick. Then, turning to Maud, he added: "I want you to alight here; you will know why presently. I can't stay to answer any questions. Watch what we are about."

While speaking, he assisted her to dismount.

Then, in a low tone of voice, he uttered several sentences only just loud enough for Tom King to catch their purport.

He stared with astonishment, as well he might.

"Surely, captain," he exclaimed, "you are not in earnest?"

"I am indeed! Quick! Don't lose time by discussing the matter; we must stand or fall by the result!"

"It is bold," mused Tom, "and may succeed on that very account. But the officers! We shall not have time to complete our preparations."

"Yes we shall, if we are speedy," was Dick's resolute reply.

"I will let Claude know what you intend," said Tom King.

"Do so, and I will assist."

So saying, Dick Turpin rode towards the postilion.

He presented a pistol at that individual's head, and cried:

"Now, then, dismount this instant, or I will save you the trouble by putting a bullet through your skull, when you will fall off of your own accord!"

"Certainly, good Mr. Highwayman—certainly! I am only too glad to do anything to oblige you!"

"Well, then, make haste," continued Dick, "and take off your coat, that cap, and waistcoat—I want them!"

The postilion began to expostulate, but Dick pointed the pistol at him in such a menacing manner that he quite forgot all he was about to say, and slipped off in a twinkling all the articles of apparel that had been mentioned.

The postilion expected nothing short of death, and he trembled excessively.

Without offering the least resistance, he suffered Dick to bind him hand and foot, and to thrust a rude gag into his mouth.

"There," he said, "now lie still, and think yourself lucky you have got off so well!"

In the meanwhile, Claude and Tom had not been idle.

The former grasped at Dick's idea at once, and spoke with the utmost confidence as to his belief in its success.

By threats alone they compelled the coachman and footman to dismount.

They had rather more trouble with them than Dick had with the postillion.

But in a few minutes they succeeded in stripping off their outside clothing and binding them securely.

Dick was done first, and so he rode to the door of the post-chaise.

As yet, no sound had come from the interior of it, and therefore he concluded that it was empty.

If so, all the better, for he would be saved much trouble, and time was precious.

In order to settle this point in his mind, however, he opened the door, and peeped in.

The interior was quite dark and empty, save and excepting a cloak, a rug, and some other articles of travel.

The reader must not overlook the fact that all this was done with great rapidity.

The three highwaymen were each busily employed.

"Now, Dick," asked Claude, "where will you place those fellows?—what shall we do with them?"

"Let us put them on the other side of the hedge," was the reply. "Suppose you two set about that work—I have plenty more to do. Above all things, be quick!"

Dick's comrade knew as well as himself how great a necessity there was for expedition, and by the manner in which they handled the servants it would seem that they were in a very great hurry indeed.

They lifted them up by the head and feet, and carried them into a meadow on one side of the road.

We have already said that the highway in this part was raised several feet above the level of the country, presenting in some respects the appearance of a railway embankment.

Upon reaching the other side of the hedge, Tom and Claude laid the servants down, and gave them a gentle push, yet sufficient to make them roll over.

The ground was sloping, and they could neither make use of their hands nor feet to stop themselves; and so away they rolled until they reached the bottom of the declivity.

They were then rather suddenly brought to a stop in a ditch, that was, however, only a shallow one, so that they were in no danger of drowning.

"I don't think they will raise an alarm," said Claude, coolly, as the last one went with a splash into the water; "and if we have only time, the officers, I am sure, will be deceived."

"But if they should not," said Tom King, "what an awkward position we should be in then!"

"True! I would rather not think about it—it would be best not."

Returning to the post-chaise, they found that Dick had been busy indeed.

During their late operations, he had unharnessed three of the horses in the post-chaise—namely, two of the leaders and one of the wheelers, as they were called by the coachmen in those days.

The three horses were standing together.

"Take them," said Dick; "lead them through the hedge, and start them off at a gallop—they will soon make themselves contented along with that grass, and will not appear upon the high-road again until they are forced to it, I'll warrant."

With equal dexterity and speed, Dick then took off the saddles and bridles from the other horses, and placed these articles inside the post-chaise, stuffing them with great difficulty under the seat.

He then placed their own horses in the traces.

Claude's next to the one wheeler that was left, Tom King's for one leader, and Black Bess for the other.

Maud, trembling with fright, had taken her seat inside the vehicle.

Over and over again, Turpin assured her that all would be well, and that nothing would occur to bring them into danger, save some act of her own, which might give rise to the officers' suspicions.

She determined to keep very silent indeed, and leave the arrangement of events entirely in the hands of her husband and his two comrades.

The latter soon returned after starting the horses, and as they did so Dick completed his harnessing operations.

"Now then," he said, "you have only to dress yourselves up in this clothing, and we shall be ready to renew our journey."

"What characters shall we take?"

"I will be the postilion," said Dick, "and will ride Black Bess. You, Tom, had better be the footman, and Claude the coachman."

This settled the matter at once, and, as may be imagined, it took a very short time indeed for them to assume the long, liveried coats, and wigs, and hats.

When they had thus attired themselves, Claude and Tom King were completely metamorphosed.

Dick Turpin, however, had changed in appearance the most.

He looked exactly like a postilion.

He had on a bright blue coat, and a small scarlet cap made of cloth.

In his hand he also held a postilion's whip.

"Are you all ready?" he asked of his comrades—"is every preparation made?"

"Yes, all is well."

"Then we will start. The officers, it seems, are not yet in sight. Rely upon it, their suspicions will not now be aroused—they will think we are far enough off by this time."

"Be careful how you reply if you are spoken to," cried Tom.

"All right!" replied Dick. "And bear the caution in mind yourselves. Now, forward!"

He smacked his whip, and the horses set themselves in motion.

They went at a tolerably smart rate.

But as they drew nearer and nearer to the officers, Dick began to see in stronger colours the fearful amount of risk they were running.

If they should unluckily happen to be detected, nothing in the world could save them.

But he calculated that Mr. Wriggles and his officers would have their attention quite fixed upon the objects of their pursuit, and if they saw the post-chaise coming towards them they would not dream for a moment of connecting it with their prey.

It seemed indeed beyond belief that the highwaymen, so far from attempting to get away from their enemies, should actually be driving at a rapid rate along the road, so that in a short time a meeting must inevitably take place.

Dick fully relied upon passing the officers unquestioned, though what would be their future proceedings should they succeed in passing them, he had not yet had time to decide.

He wondered greatly how it was that they continued for such a long time in the rear, and began to indulge in the supposition that they had abandoned the chase.

This idea was soon proved to be erroneous, for shortly afterwards, on looking along the road, he perceived the police officers coming towards him at a pretty good rate of speed.

CHAPTER DCCXVIII.

MR. WRIGGLES MAKES DICK TURPIN A PRESENT OF A FIVE-SHILLING PIECE.

SPEEDY as the highwaymen had been, yet some considerable time had elapsed since they first stopped the post-chaise up to the moment when they beheld the police officers.

It was astonishing how the latter could have got so far into the rear.

Nothing but an accident could have occasioned it.

Had Dick Turpin been aware of the actual state of the case, he might have been saved the trouble he had been at.

The reader must be informed that in the midst of the chase Mr. Wriggles's horse trod upon something in the road—a loose stone probably—then stumbled and fell.

Mr. Wriggles was a good horseman, but yet on the present occasion he was not quite quick enough in his movements to save himself.

When the horse fell down, he fell also, and it is a thousand wonders he was not ridden over by his followers.

But for the fact that he kept about fifty yards in advance of them, he must have been.

But they saw the accident in time to pull up.

At the occurrence of this accident, of course, a general stoppage took place.

Mr. Wriggles was found to be insensible.

But upon being raised up he quickly recovered his consciousness.

His first thought was the pursuit in which he had been engaged, and he remembered immediately the accident that had taken place.

"Put me on another horse," he said. "We must not wait. Let one of the others ride mine; and if he will not keep up, why, he must stay behind. Now, then, be quick, or the reward will slip through our fingers again, after all!"

The men were not at all pleased at the idea of having all their trouble for nothing, so one of them dismounted, and Mr. Wriggles took his horse.

The chief police officer's own steed had been somewhat severely injured, yet there was no doubt he might be made to travel at a tolerably good speed for a short distance.

"It's all right," Wriggles cried. "We have only a few miles further to go, and then we can get a change of horses again."

Mr. Wriggles was very much bruised and hurt, and he felt altogether in a very bad way indeed.

But he was still determined to proceed with his enterprise, and after having imbibed some brandy from a bottle he carried in his pocket, he shouted to his men to follow him, and plunged the spurs deeply into his horse's flanks.

Away, then, they galloped, but not at a very rapid rate, for the horses were one and all knocked up.

This accident had been of the greatest utility to our friends.

Had it not occurred, it is questionable whether they would have succeeded in completing all their arrangements in time.

"It is strange," Mr. Wriggles muttered, "that we have come all this long way without meeting with a single vehicle. The next one I see, however, I will stop and make some inquiries of. I shall probably learn something of importance."

At this moment the post-chaise came in sight.

"Take care," cried Dick to his companions—"everything now depends upon our coolness. Yonder are the officers."

"Yes, I see them," was Tom's reply, "and there's old Wriggles riding a little in advance of the rest."

"Yes, I see him," returned Dick. "And now leave me to reply to him, in case he should ask any questions."

"But you do not apprehend a stoppage, do you?"

"No, not by any means; but still it is best to be prepared for any contingency."

"Oh, decidedly the best!"

"Well, then, let it be understood that I alone will be the spokesman!"

"But do you think he will recognise your voice?"

"No, I flatter myself I can disguise it well enough to deceive even him. It will not be the first time either," he added, with a smile.

"And do you think your disguise is tolerably perfect?"

"Yes—I am quite assured as to the result. Tom," he added, "if you can manage it, say a few words to Maud. Tell her that all will be well—that she has nothing to fear. After that we had better not speak again."

Tom obeyed.

Maud guessed, of course, what it was that Dick intended to do, and she was almost paralysed with terror.

After awhile, however, she became calm enough to be aware that she herself could do something towards furthering the deception that was about to be practised.

We have already spoken of the various articles of travel that were in the chaise.

One of these was a large grey cloak, in which she entirely enveloped herself.

It was furnished with a hood, and this she drew up over her head.

She wrapped the rug closely round her, and then sank back upon the seat as though half asleep, choosing the very darkest place she could find.

It must not be denied that on this occasion Dick Turpin's heart beat at a much more rapid rate than was usual.

He tried hard to control all manifestations of excitement.

But above everything he was anxious that no tremor in his voice should betray him.

Perceiving the post-chaise, Mr. Wriggles increased his pace, until at length coming within speaking distance, he bawled out:

"Stop—stop—in the name of the King I call upon you to stop!"

"Murder," said Dick, in a voice so unlike his usual tones that his two comrades were surprised—"murder—help! Here's a highwayman, and more of 'em down the road!"

These words were uttered entirely for the edification of Mr. Wriggles, and they were spoken just loud enough for him to hear.

"No nonsense!" he cried. "There's no danger from highwaymen. I am an officer of police, and these are my followers. Stop—stop, I tell you!"

Dick Turpin knew that it would be no good to refuse, and so, after a good deal of flourish and fuss, he brought the steaming, panting horses to a standstill.

He wished devoutly that the night had been a dark one, or that the meeting had not taken place in so exposed a part of the roadway.

Mr. Wriggles pulled up suddenly close to Black Bess.

"Whose carriage is this?" he asked, in a loud and authoritative voice.

"Master's, sir," was Dick's instantaneous reply.

"Don't be a fool!" cried Mr. Wriggles, angrily. "Take care how you answer an officer of police, or it may be the worse for you."

"I am very sorry if I have said anything to offend you, sir," said Dick, in a humble, apologetic voice; "but her ladyship's inside if you would like to speak to her."

"No—no—I don't want to trouble her ladyship, nor to interrupt you either. All I want to know is—have you observed anyone pass you on the road lately?"

Dick pretended to think.

"Do you mean," he said, at last, "three men mounted on three horses that looked as though they had travelled many a mile, and as though they would drop before they went many yards further?"

"Yes—yes!" said Wriggles, scarcely able to speak from excitement.

"And had one of 'em got a girl on the saddle with him, or, at least, something that looked like one?"

"Yes—yes, it was a girl, and the pair were riding on a black horse."

"So they were, sir," replied Dick. "How did you know that?"

"I did know it. And you saw them pass you?"

"Yes."

"How long ago?"

"Not more than ten minutes, or a quarter of an hour I should say at the outside, sir."

"And the horses looked tired, you say?"

"Yes, they did, poor brutes—they were quite knocked up. It was downright cruelty to ride them; but they were spurring away, and lashing them with their whips; but for all that, the poor creatures hardly moved, and, as I said at first, they seemed each moment as though they were about to fall down on the road."

Mr. Wriggles's followers came up in time to hear these last words.

The chief police officer himself uttered a cry of exultation.

"Hurrah!" he said, "it's not so bad after all. I thought it was odd if their horses could keep up that breakneck speed much longer. Sorry to interrupt you," he added, addressing the seeming postilion, "but here's a crown to drink to the capture of Dick Turpin and his associates! Tell her ladyship I am sorry I was obliged to interrupt her in her journey."

"Many thanks to you, sir!" said Dick, touching his forehead and pocketing the five-shilling piece. "Keep straight on along the road, and you can't help but overtake them."

CHAPTER DCCXIX.

DESCRIBES THE MANNER IN WHICH THE HIGHWAYMEN DISPOSE OF THE CHAISE.

With a sudden bound, Mr. Wriggles and his party started off upon what may be truly termed their "wild-goose chase."

Dick smacked his whip after the manner of postilions, and away rolled the post-chaise.

There was now every encouragement for the highwaymen to proceed, for they were increasing their distance from their foes at a prodigious rate.

"You did that well, Dick, I am bound to confess," cried Tom King, as soon as he believed it was safe for him to speak—"it was capital!"

"I can't help laughing myself," was the reply.

"I should think not. Have you really got the crown-piece?"

"Yes—here it is."

"Well, if old Wriggles should really find out that he has been so deceived—that he has actually put a coin into your hand—he will be almost mad; depend upon it he will never forgive you."

"I suppose not, though that does not trouble me. He would not have forgiven me as it was, so a little more cause for enmity cannot make much difference."

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AT THE LONELY INN.]

"I suppose you are right."

"Yes. Tell Maud that all's well—that the danger is entirely past."

Tom leant back in the seat, and spoke to her.

But Maud heard him not.

When the danger was over, her strength completely gave way, and she fainted.

Of this, however, Tom was not aware.

He turned towards his leader, and said:

"Now Dick, how are we to act?"

"I can only think of one thing," was the reply, "and that is to drive on with this carriage with all our might."

"But where to?"

"Anywhere away from Wriggles—we can't make too much speed just at present."

"How long do you think it will be before he discovers the trick that has been played him?"

"That is hard to say; he will find out that we have not passed the next village where he will call for fresh horses."

"But he may suspect we have turned off across the meadows."

"Or," added Claude, "he may by some accident or other learn what has taken place."

"Yes, but that can only happen if he finds one of the servants."

"True, and from where I left them I think that is hardly likely."

"Any way," said Dick, "we must drive on—it will not do to pause."

"It will soon be daylight," said Tom,—"morning is coming fast, and do not forget Sixteen-String Jack will return to the forest, and, if he finds us absent, will wonder what has happened."

"So he will, and now you speak of it, I really think the best and safest place that we could go to would be the cave in the forest."

No. 153 will be Published next Monday.

"Surely you are jesting?"

"No I am not, I am in sober earnest. The officers have driven us away, and the chances are a thousand to one if they think we should have the hardihood to go back again to the very same quarters."

"I like the idea," said Claude. "Boldness has done a great deal for us to-night, and may do more."

"At any rate," said Dick, "some one would have to go to the forest in order to meet with Jack. If he knows where the public-house is situated, and all preparations are made for our arrival there, we may perhaps be induced to start without delay."

"A bother will certainly be made about this post-chaise," said Tom King. "The more I think, the more certain I feel of it. I feel inclined to return to the forest again; but I should recommend that we drive this chaise in quite an opposite direction, then get out and ride away, leaving it there for anyone to find."

"That would certainly be destroying the clue," said Dick Turpin, "and if we left the chaise anywhere near the forest, it would of course direct old Wriggles's attention to it."

After some more discussion this plan was decided upon.

Coming at length to a road that branched off to the right, they turned down it and rattled away across the country at a pretty good pace.

The horses still kept up bravely, notwithstanding the distance they had already run.

While, however, driving in a westerly direction, Dick kept going further and further south, so that they should not have a very long gallop across the country to the forest.

At length, about an hour or rather more before daybreak, they stopped at a spot where two roads intersected each other.

They paused in the very centre of the square space thus formed.

It was a lonely, out-of-the-way place, and they took good care to satisfy themselves that no one was at hand to observe their proceedings.

Dick sprang hastily from the saddle, and went to the chaise door.

Opening it, he found Maud just recovering from her fainting fit.

"Safe!" she exclaimed—"you are safe!"

"Yes, and unhurt," was the reply; "so are the rest. We have thrown the officers off the scent entirely, and now we shall be safe for some time to come."

"Must I alight here?"

"Yes, descend at once. We will soon be in readiness to start again."

"And your destination?"

"The cave in Epping Forest."

Dick hastily assisted Maud to descend from the post-chaise.

Then he pulled off the clothing which had served so well to disguise him from his foes.

His two comrades did the same.

Their own coats and hats they had placed inside the post-chaise, and they assumed them without further loss of time.

Black Bess and the other two horses were released from the harness, and saddled in readiness for the road.

One horse then remained, and for a minute or so they were undecided as to what they should do with it.

Eventually, however, they determined to take this stood with them

In time to come it might prove useful.

"Well, now, Dick," exclaimed Claude Duval, "what are we to do with this clothing?"

He alluded to the garments that had been taken from the coachman and footman.

"I don't know—roll them up into a bundle and put them inside the chaise."

"But, before a couple of hours elapse, this chaise will be found, and the discovery of this apparel will give them the key to the mystery of the whole affair."

"What do you propose, then, Claude?"

"Why, simply this: Let us put them altogether into the chaise, lying them lightly one upon the other, and then set fire to the lot."

"But the chaise would be burned."

"Well, very likely; and if so, what matters it?"

"It seems odd to burn a vehicle."

"And you will find," said Claude, "that it will attract no slight amount of attention, and will very likely throw people off the scent altogether."

"Then let it be so. I am indifferent about it."

All these articles were thrown lightly into the post-chaise, at the bottom of which was a quantity of straw.

Claude set fire to the mass in several places.

It blazed up quickly.

He closed the doors of the post-chaise, but lowered the windows, so that there should be plenty of draught to fan the flame.

"Now, then," he cried, springing into his saddle, "the sooner we are away the better. That post-chaise seems to me like so much tinder—it will be all in a blaze in less than ten minutes."

His companions were all seated, and in readiness to start.

Tom King was leading the fresh horse by the bridle.

All the animals were greatly exhausted, yet some kind of instinct seemed to tell them what was their destination, for, as if by a sudden effort, they summoned up all their remaining strength and set forward at a rattling pace.

"Look back," said Claude, presently—"look back That will be a bewildering discovery for anyone to make I rather think."

His comrades did look back, and then they saw a great blaze ascending into the air.

Claude's words were verified, and there was every probability that before anyone could hasten to the spot to ascertain the cause of the conflagration the vehicle would be entirely consumed.

Anxious to arrive at the cave not only before daybreak but before Sixteen-String Jack, our friends continued to push onwards, meeting with no interruption by the way, and seeing nothing whatever of the police officers.

How far Mr. Wriggles went that night along the high-road before he discovered the trick that had been played him, or whether he did discover it, was more than they could tell.

At last the old trees of the forest met their welcome gaze.

"We shall be all right now," said Dick, "one thing only provided."

"And what is that?"

"I don't think it a likely event, but yet some police officers may be lingering in the vicinity."

"We must take the risk of that," replied Tom King "Anyhow, we must find Sixteen-String Jack—without him we can do nothing. I trust he has not fallen unexpectedly into any danger."

This was a serious affair, and unconsciously all quickened their pace.

The little open space in front of the cavern was at length reached.

There were no signs that the officers had penetrated to this spot at all.

By this time the dawn had fairly come, and even in the forest, objects could be distinguished easily.

But although they looked carefully around them, and although they uttered a signal-sound which Sixteen-String Jack well understood, they failed to perceive anything of their missing comrade.

CHAPTER DCCXX.

RELATES WHAT HAPPENED TO SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AFTER HIS DEPARTURE FROM THE WHITE HORSE INN.

We intend now, for a time, to follow the fortunes of Sixteen-String Jack, who we last left in a situation of considerable peril.

He believed, and so did Matthew, that if he slipped out quietly into Drury Lane, that he should be able to make his way quietly and unsuspectedly to the stable where he had left his horse

But that anticipation was not realised.

Several police officers, who, by Jim Lickfold's instructions, had been placed on the watch outside the White Horse Inn, perceived the dark figure of the highwayman as he glided swiftly along the street.

Then one of them had cried out in a loud voice:

"That's him—that's him!"

The cry reached to his nearest companion, and he communicated it to the next.

Whistles were blown and rattles sprung, so that in the space of a few seconds only after the first alarm had been given, there was a perfect uproar in the rear.

Sixteen-String Jack, when he heard the officer cry out, knew in a moment that he was recognised.

He did not wait for any further proceedings to be taken, but set off at a rapid run.

He knew that flight alone could save him, and that every second now was of immense importance.

He drew in his breath hard, and set off at a pace that promised soon to leave the officers in the rear.

It was now, however, growing towards morning and those people whose occupation compelled them to rise early were already abroad in the streets.

They heard the police officers crying out:

"A highwayman—a highwayman! A hundred pounds reward! Stop him—stop him! A highwayman!"

This was enough to make them forget the ordinary business in which they were engaged.

Actuated by one impulse, they all took up the cry and joined in the chase.

Altogether the police officers numbered about half a dozen.

They led the way, and behind them came a yelling, shouting troop of disorderly folks.

Sixteen-String Jack knew that the distance he had to run was not great.

This, and the fact that he was well acquainted with every court and alley in the neighbourhood, lent him a kind of confidence.

Despite of his exertions, the officers kept much closer behind him than he could have wished.

When near the top of Drury Lane, however, he found he had gained a tolerable advantage—an advantage, nevertheless, that he was destined to lose.

A watchman, who had been awakened by the tumult, suddenly stepped forward with outstretched arms.

"Aisy does it, me darlint! he cried. "Bedad now, there you are!"

Jack saw this man appear.

He knew that he could not possibly avoid a collision.

He knew as well, that even at the best, precious moments must be lost in struggling with him.

Luckily he had presence of mind enough to do the very best thing he could.

He accelerated his speed, and came with such force against the watchman that he could not withstand the shock.

Down he went backwards, as though he had been struck with a battering-ram.

But he strove hard to clasp Jack in his arms, and succeeded in taking a firm hold.

He might have held the highwayman there until the others came up but for one circumstance.

That was, in falling backwards with such force, his head had come into violent contact with the edge of the kerbstone, and, hard as his skull might be, it proved softer than the stone.

There was an ominous crash, a gasping sound, and then the watchman relaxed his hold, and his hands fell powerless by his side.

With the quickness of thought Jack was on his legs again, and rushing off at full speed.

But the officers had gained upon him considerably, and now they shouted one to the other in tones of triumph.

Jack nerved himself to greater and greater efforts.

He knew the stable was almost within sight, and doubted not that the ostler would have his horse all ready for him.

If such proved to be the case, and he could once gain the saddle, he felt he should not care.

He could laugh then at his foes.

Their chase would be an impotent one.

On—on he bounded, his legs every now and then trembling beneath him.

His heart beat so violently with the exertion that it seemed as though it would burst.

But his destination was in sight, and the efforts he made to reach it before his pursuers were incredible.

Panting and exhausted, he at length paused before the gateway.

It opened to a touch.

His breath was gone, but yet he managed to gasp out:

"Ostler—ostler, quick—quick!"

The man was there on the watch for his arrival.

"Here you are, sir," he cried, and never did tones sound more welcome in Jack's ears.

The ostler came across the yard leading the horse by the bridle.

It was already saddled and in perfect readiness for the road.

"Here," said Jack, as he sprang upon his horse's back, "take this—here's a guinea for you."

He tossed it to the ostler while he spoke.

By this time, however, the officers had reached the gate.

They imagined, no doubt, that they would find it secured against them.

But they were in error.

With full force they dashed themselves against it, and with great difficulty prevented themselves from falling to the ground.

Jack drew a couple of pistols from his holsters, and held them ready for immediate use.

As soon as he saw the gate open he touched his horse with the spur.

The gallant creature obeyed it well.

With one bound he dashed across the yard.

The officers were only just in time to draw aside and prevent themselves from being struck down by its hoofs

"Stop him!" they yelled—"shut the gate—stop him!"

But it was too late to give this order.

The gates were already wide open, and too many people were crowding at the entrance for them to be closed again.

But several shots were fired, one of which passed completely through Jack's hat.

He discharged both his pistols in return, and again urged his horse forward.

Some of the people made a vain and indecisive effort to stop the horse's furious career.

Most drew aside to escape from danger, and those who were foolhardy enough to try to carry out their intention were struck down to the earth and trampled underfoot.

"Safe!" said Sixteen-String Jack, patting his horse on the neck as he spoke. "On—on—quick—a few moments now will place me out of danger!"

The police officers were maddened at the defeat they had sustained.

But the boldest and most resolute of them immediately went into the stables and seized upon the horses that happened to be there.

Some little time was lost in saddling them, for they did not know where to find the necessary articles, and the ostler had disappeared.

When they rode out into Bloomsbury Fields they looked around them on all sides.

But not a vestige of the highwayman could be seen.

Sixteen-String Jack pushed his horse forward at the very top of its speed.

He knew that if for a few moments he continued at a rapid rate he should get quite out of the reach of his enemies.

At length he tightened the rein and allowed his horse to moderate his pace.

There was a hill before him, up which he allowed the animal to walk, and on gaining the top he paused.

Before him in the east he could detect those signs which indicated that the new day was close at hand.

Behind him there was a most extensive prospect.

He shaded his eyes with his hands, and looked long and scrutinisingly in the direction in which he had come.

But of his enemies he saw nothing, and therefore with a feeling of satisfaction he set his horse once more in motion, taking his way in a direct line across the country for Epping Forest.

"I shall reach it before daybreak," he muttered "I am sure I shall. It will not do to enter it afterwards Forward—forward!"

CHAPTER DCCXXI.

THE POLICE OFFICERS WILL NOT ALLOW SIXTEEN-STRING JACK TO REMAIN IN EPPING FOREST.

THE road to Epping was smooth, and so Jack's horse responded willingly to the impulse forward that he gave it.

Down the hill at a long, stretching gallop it went, and then away, with unabated speed, over the level country.

It was the hour, too, when people are least likely to be abroad; and so it is not wonderful that during the whole of his gallop the gallant highwayman did not meet with a single person.

At length, somewhat suddenly, he paused not far from the spot where Mr. Wriggles had ordered his men to come to a halt.

Just then it was beginning to get light.

Although darkness still prevailed, yet it was possible to see objects close at hand with a certain degree of distinctness.

Jack paused, for he had the road to cross before he could enter that part of the forest in which the cave was situated, and he never ventured to cross it until he had satisfied himself that there was no one in view.

On the present occasion he looked searchingly around him.

But all was still.

At a walking pace, he emerged from the trees on to the roadway.

And then, happening by chance to look down upon the ground, he saw something which caused him to check his steed abruptly.

A light rain had fallen several hours before, rendering the sandy ground just soft enough to receive and retain the impression of footprints.

All round about Jack could see the marks made by the iron-bound hoofs of many horses.

It almost seemed as though a troop had halted there, and that the horses had pranced about for some time before they could be brought to a complete standstill.

Sixteen-String Jack sat in the saddle watching these marks for several seconds.

He was wondering to himself what they could mean.

Some kind of presentiment came over his mind that during his absence from the forest the police officers had made an attack, and perhaps discovered his friends' hiding-place.

Then, all at once, there darted into his mind the recollection of what he had seen when on his way to London.

"I ought to have thought of that before," he said. "These officers I saw were certainly proceeding in this direction, though then I never imagined their destination was the forest."

Jack now felt some doubt and hesitation as to what he should do.

Certainly, the most reasonable thing appeared to repair at once to the cave.

But the officers might be in ambush among the trees—might follow in his footsteps, or perhaps the cave was already discovered, and his companions slain or captured

In this state of uncertainty he felt he could not possibly remain, and so, dismounting, he took hold of the bridle, and made his way on foot, in as direct a line as he could, for Turpin's Cave.

He reached it without seeing anything of his foes.

A deep, unbroken silence reigned all around him.

He paused in the centre of the little open space, and then the aspect of the spot showed him that something was amiss.

Not without some deliberation, he uttered the signal which was so well understood by his comrades, and waited for a response.

But none came.

"They have gone," he said—"fled! I hope no worse has happened to them than to be compelled to flee from the police officers."

Encouraged by the silence, he uttered the signal again.

But, as before, he failed to meet with a response.

Then, looking down upon the ground, he saw upon the turf the marks that had been left by the horses' feet.

He traced them in a certain direction, and was irresistibly led to the conclusion that his comrades had been compelled to beat a precipitate retreat.

He could see, however, no signs of strife or of slaughter.

He would not have been surprised had he seen upon the turf several dark-red spots of blood.

While pursuing these investigations a loud whistle suddenly assailed his ears.

He started, and, as if governed by a kind of instinct, sprang immediately into the saddle.

It was well that he changed his position so quickly as he did, for the whistle was almost instantly succeeded by the sharp explosion of a pistol.

A bullet whistled past him, but Sixteen-String Jack was unhurt.

He gave one glance behind him, and caught sight of the forms of several officers among the trees.

More than this he did not wait to see, but, clapping spurs to his horse, rode off at a headlong rate.

The cries in the rear grew fainter and fainter, until at length, when Sixteen-String Jack emerged from the forest, they had ceased altogether.

To pause now would be a most dangerous thing to do.

As to the number of the officers in the forest, he could form no idea.

There seemed only one course open to him, and that was flight.

But where?

Already in the east could be seen that faint, leaden-coloured gleam of light, showing that the day had begun.

To be pursued over the country during daylight would be perilous in the utmost degree, and yet there seemed no help for it.

Jack slackened his speed a little after he emerged from the forest, and while these reflections were passing through his mind he was looking around him as carefully as he could.

Nothing of an alarming character met his view, however.

But again he heard those sounds that indicated the approach of his foes.

Once more he galloped on, and then, when he looked back, once more he saw that three police officers had emerged from the forest, and were making every effort to overtake him.

But Jack had gained a considerable advantage, and it was not likely that it would be lost through any want of effort on his part.

Slowly and slowly the day broke.

The clouds rolled away from the east to the west, leaving the clear blue sky visible.

All around over the landscape, as far as the eye could reach was peacefulness and quiet.

All objects, animate and inanimate, seemed asleep, with the exception of the highwayman, who was riding for his life, and the police officers who were in search of him.

The leaden hue in the east gave place to a ruddy tinge, showing that the sun would ere long make his appearance.

"If I had only arrived at the forest a little earlier," Jack thought, "I might then, under cover of the darkness, have escaped; but this country is so flat and open that the officers will be able to see me for miles, and to hang on in the rear, getting reinforcements from time to time."

Up to the present moment Jack had galloped on at random, having no particular destination in view, and being actuated only by the desire to get out of the reach of his pursuers.

But now, all at once, he remembered the directions that had been given by old Matthew concerning the public-house that Tom Davis had taken.

"It will not do to go there with the officers at my heels," he muttered; "but, nevertheless, it will be a place of refuge for me. I can't gallop about all the day. I must shake those fellows off, and then, along with Tom Davis, I shall be able to find shelter until nightfall."

There was something assuring in this prospect, and

Sixteen-String Jack looked around him for some means of getting out of sight of his pursuers.

Could he only do that, and then change his course, his safety would be almost insured.

The distance to Ealing was not so very great, and, tired as his horse was, he was quite confident, if fortune favoured him, that he should be able to reach it long before the business of the day had begun.

Looking across the country towards Highgate and Hornsey, Jack perceived a plantation belonging to some gentleman's estate.

He knew the spot well, and was well aware that the trees were planted thickly enough together to screen him from observation could he succeed in plunging among them, while, at the same time, their growth was not so dense as to prevent him from making his way rapidly from one end to the other.

Towards this he directed his horse's head.

From time to time he looked back.

But although the officers were a long way in the rear, yet, nevertheless, they were in sight.

Jack knew these men would have the perseverance to keep at his heels as long as they saw him, in the hope of presently coming to a more thickly-populated part of the country where they would be able to obtain assistance.

It would be then that the chase would be in reality, and when the danger to Sixteen-String Jack would be greatest.

CHAPTER DCCXXII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK ARRIVES AT THE THREE SPIDERS.

At length Sixteen-String Jack reached the plantation, and plunged immediately among the trees.

During his gallop he had made up his mind to all his actions, and therefore, without delay, he turned his horse's head round and rode through the trees in the very direction in which the officers were coming.

He knew that they had seen him enter, and calculated they would mark the precise spot and enter there themselves.

In the meanwhile he would double upon his course, and emerge from that end of it that was nearest to the forest.

This manœuvre he carried into execution.

It was not, however, without a certain amount of anxiety that he pulled up his horse at the extremity of the plantation, and waited for the officers to come up.

Should they by any means guess his intentions, or should they take it into their heads to enter the plantation at that point, his predicament would be dangerous, and all the long start he had gained would be lost, even if his capture was not the immediate result.

Taking care to keep out of sight, yet, nevertheless, choosing a position that enabled him to command a view of the surrounding country, Sixteen-String Jack waited in suspense.

At no great distance he perceived the officers riding with redoubled speed towards the plantation.

Now that the highwayman was out of their sight they were beginning to apprehend they should lose him altogether.

Just as Jack had expected, the officers rode on until they reached that part of the plantation where he had made his entrance.

He waited a minute or two so as to allow them to get fairly under the shadow of the trees, and then he rode boldly out.

"A sharp push will do it now," he said. "Some time must elapse before the officers can force a way through the plantation either one way or the other, and before that time elapses, I trust I shall be out of sight."

Again he spurred his horse, this time without any disguise, making his way direct for his destination.

When the sun had gained a considerable altitude, he stopped and looked back.

The plantation was just visible in the distance, but that was all.

Of his enemies he could see nothing whatever.

"Safe at last!" he said. "Now, I trust, all will be well. Yet the sooner I reach the inn the better. I must get there before many people are abroad."

Few people were met by Jack during the remainder of his journey, and these consisted only of peasants who were setting out to their daily toil.

Many stared at him in surprise.

But no further notice was taken.

It was about an hour after this, and about seven o'clock in the morning, when Sixteen-String Jack fairly found himself upon Ealing Common.

This was at that time a place of very considerable extent, and not the small, continually-decreasing piece of ground that it is now.

In many places there were deep pits, and other rugged, dangerous excavations in the soil.

Dense furze bushes, too, covered it in many parts, while here and there would be a clump of trees.

Then would come a smooth piece of green turf, which looked all the more pleasant and delightful from the contrast with the other portions and with the broad, dusty high-road that completely intersected the common.

This was the road from London to Oxford, perhaps the one most travelled of any around the metropolis.

A dark, unfavourable, dismal, terrifying place was Ealing Common to all travellers.

It had been for upwards of a generation, for it was there, in Charles the Second's time, that Claude Duval was fondest of taking up his position.

On the morning when Jack reached it, he could not help noticing how pleasant, and peaceful, and beautiful it looked.

But at that time his mind was oppressed with too many subjects for anxious thought for him to bestow more than a passing glance upon any of the beauties of nature that were around him.

For his own part, he considered he was comparatively safe.

But about his companions he felt anxious in the extreme.

The more he thought of their sudden and mysterious disappearance the more alarmed he grew, and, by the time he had crossed the common, he had come to the conclusion that the worst had happened.

Bearing in mind the directions old Matthew had given him, Sixteen-String Jack at length found the narrow lane that had been described.

He proceeded along it for some distance, looking out on all sides for some indications of a dwelling.

But as he advanced, the place looked more and more lonely.

The trees grew more closely together, and the whole scene rapidly assumed a deserted aspect.

Then he paused, for on his right hand there was a narrow turning that was scarcely wide enough to be called a road.

Years seemed to have elapsed since any pedestrians or vehicles had travelled over it.

It was thickly overgrown with grass, and the deep ruts that had been left long ago by some heavy cart were now filled up by moss of a beautiful green colour.

At the corner of this lane or by-road there was something that looked like the ruins of a finger-post.

The upright part remained in tolerable preservation, though it seemed gradually nodding to the ground.

By some means or other it had lost its perpendicularity.

One of the projecting arms had been broken off, and the other was so weatherbeaten and so overgrown with that strange kind of vegetation which spreads itself over wood that remains in damp places, that it was impossible to tell what words might have been on it.

"This must be the place," said Jack, after gazing at it for a moment. "Well, I'm sure it's retired enough—rather too much so if anything; it might cause suspicion if anyone was found dwelling in such a place."

At present, however, no signs of the inn could be seen.

Sixteen-String Jack rode past the finger-post, and for a considerable distance along the grass-grown road.

Then suddenly coming to a bend in it, he all at once found himself in front of the inn.

A quaint, curious-looking, old-fashioned place it was—one that would have made a rare study for an artist's pencil.

From a stout beam of wood that projected from the building was suspended a signboard of eccentric shape.

It was now black and moss-grown with age, and only a few marks could be seen here and there upon it, but not sufficient for anyone to ascertain whether originally there had been a representation of three spiders.

For the most part the building was composed of wood.

The pointed roofs were covered with red tiles, which showed out in excellent contrast with the mass of dark-coloured trees in which the building itself was literally embosomed.

All this, Sixteen-String Jack took in at a glance; he had no opportunity then for further examination, for, with a cry of welcome on his lips, Tom Davis sprang forward and placed his hand upon his horse's bridle.

"So you have found me out, Jack?" he said, in a hearty voice, and with a smile upon his lips. "Well, I am glad and pleased to see you! Where are the rest?"

Jack shook his head.

And then, for the first time, Tom Davis noted the look of deep gloom that had settled itself upon it.

"You have no bad news to tell me, surely?" he said.

"I have," was the reply—"nothing but bad news, and it seems to me that you are most to blame in the affair."

"I hope not!" said Davis, anxiously. "But come, Jack, pray don't keep me in suspense, but tell me what has happened?"

"Why, as you are aware, when Tom King paid you that visit he forgot to make any arrangement with you for a second meeting, and you did not tell him whereabouts this inn was situated."

"I know I did not," was the reply. "I forgot it at the time, and so did he."

"Very likely, and nothing could be said about that; but how came you to leave your house without letting us know where we were to find you?"

"I will tell you," said Tom Davis. "My neighbours began to grow exceedingly curious and suspicious about me; they found I was prospering, and could not exactly make out how it was. Then I believe some of them perceived Tom King when he paid his visit, and this circumstance, simple as it was, attracted the whole of their curiosity."

"No doubt it would, but still you ought to have adopted some means of letting us know."

"What means could I adopt? I knew you were in Epping Forest, it is true, but not in which part; and by going in the direction of it I might compromise myself and you; therefore I left my home as speedily as possible, and gave out that I should not return. This was only to remove suspicion, and every night since then I have made it my business to journey there and to keep a sharp look-out close by, so as to see if any of you came to my house."

CHAPTER DCCXXIII.

TOM DAVIS RESOLVES TO PAY A VISIT TO OLD MATTHEW.

"And did you go there last night?" asked Jack.

"I did. I have not long returned."

"Then how happens it that I did not see you, or, rather, that you did not see me?"

"That is a mystery. I can only account for it by supposing you arrived there first and hastened off; had you waited, you would certainly have seen me."

"But I knew nothing of that," said Jack—"and I was afraid to stay, lest suspicion should be excited. I did the only thing that lay in my power, and that was to ride over to Drury Lane."

"And did you really venture there?"

"I did."

"Then I am astonished beyond measure to find you have returned safely."

"I have had some fearfully narrow escapes," replied Jack—"such as I would not willingly run the risk of again. However, I saw Matthew, and he told me where the inn was situated."

"It's strange news, Jack. I thought I could not have failed to see you. I must have arrived a moment or two after you had taken your departure. Yes, that's the only explanation I can give of the affair."

"Well," continued Jack, "with good luck I escaped, and made my way back to Epping Forest to communicate the news to my comrades. On getting there, however, I found that during my absence the officers had, by some means or other, discovered their retreat, and made an attack upon them."

"And the result?" asked Tom Davis, anxiously—"the result?"

"That is more than I can tell you."

"Do you not know?"

"I do not—but I fear the worst!"

"Did you go right into the forest?"

"I did—to the cave where we had been staying. I found evident traces of their having left, and soon afterwards was chased away by four police officers."

"And where are they?"

"With much trouble I shook them off, and, as I firmly believe, succeeded in getting here without being noticed by anyone."

"Well, Jack, I am glad you are safe and unhurt. You have had some narrow escapes. Let us hope that the others have been equally fortunate with yourself."

"I am afraid of it," returned Jack. "Something seems to tell me that things have gone altogether wrong."

"And the blame, it seems, chiefly rests with me," said Tom Davis.

"Well, no—I can't say that it does. You acted for the best according to your belief, and for that you cannot be blamed."

"Well, Jack, what's your next proceeding?"

"That's what we must talk about during the remainder of the day."

"But not here, though," said Tom Davis. "Come with me, and I will show you the way to the stables—after that we can go indoors and sit down. If we talk the matter over, we shall, in all probability, come to some conclusion."

"I hope so. Lead the way."

This conversation had taken place in the little open space in front of the inn door.

Tom Davis now walked towards the corner of the building.

Jack followed.

Passing through some gates, they entered a large yard, round which were built many sheds, but all of them in a decaying, dilapidated condition.

Of these, some were used for stables, and others for placing vehicles, or anything else that required to be stowed away.

Tom Davis pushed open a door, and they entered one of the sheds.

Sixteen-String Jack was pleased to see how attentive and careful Davis had been during the few days that he had occupied the inn.

The stables had been got into perfect readiness, and the one into which he led Jack's horse was as comfortable as anyone could wish.

"You are not in the mood to examine this old place, and to hear an account of it now," said Tom Davis; "nor do I feel inclined to give it to you. I am anxious that we should talk over Dick's probable position."

"So am I."

Jack's horse was placed in the stable, and had all its wants attended to.

"I shall keep no ostler," said Davis, "but perform these duties myself; we shall then be better provided against detection."

"Of course we shall."

"It will much diminish the risk; and I know something about it, you will find."

"I will help," said Jack; "and that will save time."

The horse was well groomed, and had every attention paid to Sixteen-String Jack being well aware of the importance of taking care of his steed, he could not tell what service he might require from it at night.

When all was done, they crossed the yard and entered the public-house by a back door.

They found Ellen busily engaged in preparing the breakfast.

"We must sit down and get something to eat," said Tom Davis.

"I have been out all night and have not tasted anything, and am sick and faint for want of food," replied Jack, "though I feel little inclination to touch any."

"Sit down—sit down and eat," said Tom Davis; "it strikes me that you will require all your energies; and it is a duty that you owe your friends to preserve them."

Though breakfast was, under these circumstances, not done very good justice to, still, after the meal, Jack felt disposed to look upon things from a less gloomy point of view.

"Where to look for them," he said, "I know not, nor in what direction to go; it may be that they have all been captured."

"It is within the bounds of possibility, I admit," said Davis; "and yet I scarcely think it."

"Yet it seems to me necessary to ascertain whether it is actually the case or not."

"If so, then, I will put you at your ease as regards that."

"By what means?"

"Why, I will immediately set out for London; the fact of my paying a visit to London will cause neither suspicion nor danger, while at the same time I shall easily be able to find out whether the capture has taken place."

"Yet you might be suspected."

"I think not. I believe the danger of such a thing to be trifling. Bear in mind, if the capture has really taken place, the news of it will be spread all over London in less than no time, so that I shall have no difficulty in finding it out."

"Well," said Jack, "I am inclined to think it would be best if you did go—we should then know the worst."

"We should, and if I find that your alarm was without ground, we could decide afterwards what would be the best step to take in order to rejoin your comrades."

"Yes—stay. When going to London, had you thought of paying a visit to Drury Lane?"

"I had thought of it, but had not made up my mind. I was wondering whether I should be suspected."

"I think it worth while to run the risk," said Jack. "If you would only put the case to old Matthew, and explain to him all that has occurred, rely upon it, he would show us some way out of our difficulty. I should have no hesitation in following his advice."

"That is a good thought, Jack—by far the best that we have had yet. Now you are exhausted and weary—you must be after the night you have passed through. While I am gone let me beg of you to lie down and get all the rest and sleep you can."

Jack shook his head.

"You must," he said, "for probably to-night you will require all your strength and energies. Who can tell what difficulties you may have to cope with?"

"I will try to do so, Davis, and you will make what speed you can to Drury Lane; and if you find that they have not been captured, then ask old Matthew what I had better do."

"I will. And now, in order that no time may be lost, I will say good-bye."

"How shall you reach London?"

"By the coach. It is not far from here to the London Road. In former days, before the new road was made, the coaches used to pass this very door. I shall be in time, and in less than an hour I shall be in London."

"Good!" said Jack. "May you be successful! Farewell!"

CHAPTER DCCXXIV.

JIM LICKFOLD, WITH HIS COMPANIONS, IS DISCOVERED IN THE CELLAR BY THE POLICE.

Leaving Tom Davis to make his journey by means of the stage-coach, we will precede him to the White Horse, and relate some rather singular and amusing events that took place there.

Of the search that was made after Sixteen-String Jack, so soon after he emerged from the door, old Matthew remained in happy ignorance.

He turned back to the bar, and, as all the customers had left and the house was shut up, he sat down by himself in the little back parlour, in order to have a little deliberation upon the events of the last three or four hours.

In order to assist him in his deliberations, he brewed himself a stiff glass of grog and lighted his pipe.

On the whole, Matthew felt extremely well satisfied with himself.

Sixteen-String Jack, he believed, was in safety, and he had had a nice little game at the expense of the police officers.

"Dear me," he said, "how mad Jim Lickfold will be when he wakes up and finds he has made such a fool of himself! Poor fellow, I really feel quite sorry for him—I pity him now!"

Old Matthew laughed at this idea; but at the time his mouth happened to be full of smoke, so a quantity got into his throat, and he was very nearly choked instead.

"Aha!" he exclaimed at length, with the tears standing in his eyes, "how they listened to all that tale about the ale being so old—it was capital! But, upon my word, I do think I managed matters pretty well; yet let me stop! Ah! it's well that thought occurred to me!"

Old Matthew laid down his pipe, and took a final sip at his grog.

"It is not too late to remedy it," he exclaimed, "that's one comfort! So here goes to do it!"

He hastily descended into the cellar as he spoke, availing himself of the hole in the flooring.

A most extraordinary noise assailed his ears as he advanced to the cellar in which the officers were lying.

It was a concert of snores, proceeding from the noses of Jim Lickford and his companions.

"Ah! they're sound enough asleep, that's certain!" was Matthew's remark as he held up the lantern and took a view of the prostrate forms. "It will be some time before they wake up; and when they do, how particularly good-tempered Jim Lickford will be! Aha! it's a good joke!"

Old Matthew had descended into the cellar with a particular purpose in view.

While smoking his pipe he had all at once remembered that the ale they had drunk was drugged.

Now, in the morning, it was not unlikely that some inquiry would be made—perhaps there would be some suspicion as to the actual state of affairs.

It was in order to prevent himself from getting into any trouble on this account that old Matthew descended into the cellar.

Going to the cask about which he had preached such an eloquent harangue, he turned on the tap, allowing the "splended old coronation stingo" to run wastefully on to the floor.

It was soaked up directly by the sawdust, which lay there rather thickly.

"That's the ticket," said Matthew. "In an hour or the most all the ale will run out, and when there is no more left in the barrel they will be rather puzzled, I fancy, to tell whether it was drugged or not.

"I didn't feel at all easy about Jim Lickfold," was Matthew's next remark—"he drank about twice as much ale as I intended. Well, I only hope he will wake up all right. He's got a strong constitution, so perhaps he will get over it. Now the only thing I can do is to leave him alone, and let him sleep it out.

With these words, Matthew made his way back to the bar again, and afterwards concluded he would retire for a few hours' rest before opening the house in the morning.

He slept rather later than usual, but at about eight o'clock he was aroused by a loud knocking at his front door.

Hastily dressing himself, he descended, and found that a party of officers had assembled outside.

They were those who had so unsuccessfully pursued Sixteen-String Jack.

They were part of Jim Lickfold's detachment, and had been left by that individual to keep guard outside the White Horse while he paid a visit to the interior.

They marvelled greatly that their leader and his men should have remained there for so many hours, especially after the house was shut up for the night.

They thought Jim Lickfold must have left during their absence, so they went to the police office to make inquiries.

But there, of course, nothing had been heard, so they were instructed to call at the White Horse and make inquiries without delay.

"And," said the inspector, "here is a copy of a warrant that has been issued against old Matthew for some time past. If you see any just cause, you may act upon it—it seems a very suspicious affair altogether!"

"Good morning, gentlemen," said old Matthew to the police officers, as soon as he had caught sight of them, and making a smile and a bow while he spoke, "For what am I to attribute the pleasure of this early and unlooked-for visit?"

"Oh, none of your gammon! We have come here to know what you have done with Jim Lickfold and the officers who were with him."

Old Matthew shook his head in a mysterious manner.

"Come," cried the officers, "stand aside and allow us to enter! We have authority to search for them!"

"If you will allow me," said old Matthew, coolly, "I will save you the trouble of searching entirely. I will take you direct to where they are."

"Where they are?"

"Yes—I spoke plainly, did I not?"

"You did. But we cannot, for the life of us, conceive what could induce Jim Lickfold to remain here for so long."

"It was a very powerful inducement indeed," said old Matthew. "But come, I will show you where he is."

With these words old Matthew walked to the bar, and there lighted a candle.

"Now, then," he said, "follow me. They're down in the cellar."

The officers looked at each other in wonder.

Old Matthew led the way to the regular flight of cellar steps, and descended.

The whole troop of police officers kept close at his heels.

He led them on until he came to the furthermost cellar.

Then, holding the light above his head, he allowed them to take a view of the scene.

"What the devil is the meaning of this?" asked one of the officers. "They are not asleep, surely—they must be dead?"

"No—they are asleep," said old Matthew—"just hark how they snore."

"But you must explain this! I insist upon your giving us an explanation immediately!"

Old Matthew shrugged his shoulders.

"I have no explanation to give," he said. "If you want to know what has happened, it strikes me the best you can do is to wait until they all wake up or else to put an end to their slumber."

"Now, Mr. Gale," said the officer, "you're treading on very dangerous ground."

"Am I?" said old Matthew, with a start, and looking down on to the sawdust.

"Yes, you are. So mind what you're about!"

"Well, really, you are most unreasonable men, you officers. You ask me a question, and I answer it in the best way I can. You want to know something else, and I tell you how to obtain your information. What more would you have?"

"It's suspicious—it is decidedly suspicious—and I'll take care that it is fully investigated."

The officer stooped down, and, seizing hold of one of the officers, endeavoured to wake him.

But the effort was a vain one.

He shook him, and pinched him, and tried more violent measures still.

But all to no purpose.

The effects of the drug were not overcome so readily.

"They've got their skins full," said Matthew. "It strikes me you won't awake them up like that. If I might presume to advise, I should recommend a little pump water."

The officer would not reply, but he directed two of his men to go up into the yard, and to return with some pails of water.

CHAPTER DCCXXV.

JIM LICKFOLD HAS SOME DIFFICULTY IN RECOVERING HIS SCATTERED SENSES.

Two men started off at once to obey this order, and were absent a few minutes only.

They returned with four pails of water that had been drawn from the pump in old Matthew's yard.

The well from which the water came was a deep one, so that by consequence it was only a few degrees above freezing point.

The men put down the pails, and looked inquiringly to the one who, by common consent, had taken the lead in the affair.

Now this man was one who all his life had been very jealous of Jim Lickfold.

The latter had been several times promoted, the former only once.

He was consequently highly gratified at finding his rival in such a condition as he was, though he was clever enough to conceal his feelings.

"Give me one of the pails," he said.

One was handed to him.

He had fixed his eyes upon Jim Lickfold, and had distinguished his form from the rest.

Raising the pail in both hands, he discharged all the water it contained full upon that individual's head.

It also splashed over the others.

The treatment was rough, but effectual.

With a kind of yell or scream, Jim Lickfold started up to a sitting posture.

"Murder!" he cried, with his eyes half shut. "D—n it all! what's that?"

"Wake up!" said the officer; "and, if you can, give us some explanation of your conduct!"

"You be d—d!" said Jim, half articulately.

And as the last words escaped his lips, his eyes closed entirely, and he fell back sound asleep.

"Well, d—n me if that isn't cool!" said the officer. "Here, Jenkins, hand me another pail!"

Jenkins obeyed, rather enjoying the joke than otherwise.

Splash went the water all over Jim Lickfold again.

And this time it woke him up entirely.

"Fuff! Murder!" he said, as he dashed the water off his face. "What the devil are you at? Is it the flood or what? Murder!"

"Lickfold," said the senior officer, "I am surprised at you! Is this the way you execute your duty?"

"Ask my elbow!" replied Lickfold. "Who are you, I should like to know?"

"I shall consider it my duty to make a report of these proceedings."

Jim Lickfold rubbed his head.

His intellects were in a very confused condition indeed, and it was not until this moment that he began to try to think what had last occurred.

"D—n it!" he said, "my head is working away like a watch with the mainspring broken! What has happened?"

"That is best known to yourself," said the officer. "I am waiting for an explanation to come from you."

"Oh, you be d—d!"

It was in vain that Jim Lickfold tried to recover his scattered senses—they entirely eluded him.

But he was conscious that he had been drenched with water from head to foot, and that Smithers—so the officer was named—had done it.

"You d—d ugly son of a gun!" he roared out, with electrical suddenness. "What have you been at?—what do you mean by it? I am as wet as if I had been dipped in a brook! Take that, d—n you—take that!"

Jim Lickfold accompanied the words with a couple of smart blows, one of which alighted with great force on his nose, and the other in his left eye.

"Murder!" cried Smithers. "Call him off—seize him, somebody, or he'll murder me!"

Jim Lickfold danced round his adversary, flourishing his fists.

"Time—time!" he cried. "Time, Smithers! Why don't you come up to the scratch. Oh! you're smiling there, are you?—then take that, and down you go!"

Another blow was administered that laid Smithers prostrate.

[TOM KING FORCES OPEN THE DOOR IN THE GARDEN WALL.]

But, somehow, just then Jim's brain cooled a little.

He had been almost maddened by the drug, of which he had partaken in such large quantities.

Now, from a variety of causes, the effect was wearing off.

As old Matthew had truly said, he had a strong constitution, and could stand what would have killed many a man.

"D—n it all!" he cried, as he sat down in the sawdust. "What in the world is the matter with my headpiece? Let me think."

While he was endeavouring to do this, some of the officers occupied themselves in assisting Smithers, while the others dashed pailful after pailful of water upon all their companions who yet slumbered.

Old Matthew pretended to be in a very bad way indeed, and sympathised deeply with Mr. Smithers.

That individual at last managed to check the flow of blood from his nose, and then he stood up, though his face had a decidedly damaged appearance.

One by one the officers were awakened, and they shook the water from their clothes like so many half-drowned rats.

Not one could understand the meaning of the proceedings, nor recollect what had happened the night before.

But by the time the waking process had been completed, Jim Lickfold had managed to bring his thoughts to something like clearness.

Never in all his life had he felt so thoroughly miserable as he did just then.

His head was aching ready to split—in fact, he was obliged to clasp it tightly with both hands, for he verily believed it would fall into two pieces.

He shivered from head to foot, while his mouth was so parched that he could scarcely speak a word.

No. 154 will be Published next Thursday.

"Water!" he cried at last—"water!"

"I should have thought you'd had enough," said Matthew.

Jim Lickfold heard the words, and understood them.

He scowled fearfully at the landlord.

Perceiving a pail of water standing at no great distance, he crept towards it, and plunged his head completely into it.

The cold water bubbled most pleasantly around his neck, and he drank in huge draughts of it.

As if by magic, the pain inside completely ceased, and it was most reluctantly that he drew out his head, being compelled to do for want of breath.

He looked about him more calmly than ever.

Mr. Smithers perceived it, so he said:

"Well, perhaps, Mr. Lickfold, you will be kind enough to give some explanation for your extraordinary conduct, and tell me what's the reason of my finding you here fast asleep in the cellar with all your men around you?"

"I don't know," said Jim—"I can't recollect! Yes, now I remember! We came down into the cellar to look for Sixteen-String Jack and could not find him, and when we had searched everywhere, we had some ale—we must have drunk too much of it!"

"I cautioned you about it," chimed in old Matthew—"there's none of you can deny that! I cautioned you about it and told you how uncommonly strong that ale was, but you paid no attention! The very smell of it must have affected me, or else one of you must have woke up thirsty, for I find the tap is turned on, and that all the ale has run out!"

"Matthew," said Jim Lickfold, a sudden light breaking in upon him, "this is your work—I know it—I feel sure of it."

"What on earth do you mean? Are you mad?"

"No—I have been, but I am all right now. Matthew, I tell you this is your work—you must have drugged that ale and given it to us on purpose."

"Now, hark at that," said Matthew—"just hark at that. Now, I appeal to every one of you to say whether it was my fault or not. Didn't I tell you how valuable the ale was, and that I wouldn't sell it for a shilling a pint? Didn't you insist upon drinking it, although I kept telling you how strong it was, and wishing you wouldn't taste another drop? Now, isn't it true, I ask you—isn't it true?"

"I must confess it is right," said one of the officers who had not drunk so deeply as the rest, and who was not suspicious of old Matthew—"I must confess it; you warned us all against drinking it, but we would not listen to a word you said."

"What the devil business have you to speak?" inquired Jim Lickfold, angrily.

"When you are a little cooler," returned the officer, "you will be glad I have so spoken. If you will take my advice you will hush up the affair as quickly as you can, for we have only ourselves to blame, and the more we poke into the affair the worse it will seem. We had better keep this little secret among ourselves."

CHAPTER DCCXXVI.

JIM LICKFOLD GIVES OLD MATTHEW INTO CUSTODY, AND HAS HIM TAKEN BEFORE THE MAGISTRATE AT BOW STREET.

"Oh! we had, had we?" asked Jim Lickfold, ironically. "Perhaps you'd be so good, so kind, so damnably condescending as to tell me what business you have to think at all in the matter?—there now!"

Thus abashed, the officer was silent.

Jim's faculties were still in a confused state, so he immediately returned to the charge against old Matthew.

"I tell you," he said, "it's your work—your work every bit of it! You've done it on purpose to ruin me, but you sha'n't succeed. No, d—n me, you sha'n't! I'll bring it all home to you! I'll shut up this blessed old den of yours—I'll put a stopper on to you, never fear!"

"You are making yourself very ridiculous, I think," said old Matthew. "If you'd take my advice you'd go quietly home and have a nap, and when you wake up you will look at things with quite a different eye to what you do now."

"Oh, shall I? I am in command here, I believe, and I will be obeyed! I say the ale was drugged, and that it was given us on purpose! Take that fat old villain into custody! I will have him up before the magistrate this morning, and that'll make him laugh on the other side of his mouth!"

"Surely you're not in earnest?" said Matthew.

"Ain't I? Well, you'll see about that! Do you hear?" he added, addressing his men. "Seize him—handcuff him—drag him off at once!"

"But I protest against anything of the sort!" said Matthew. "Where's your warrant?"

"It's here," said Smithers, who did not like old Matthew any better than Jim Lickfold—"it's here, already prepared for your arrest, so you will have to answer for your little game!"

"I am ready to go," said Matthew. "You need not claw hold of me or put handcuffs on my wrists. I am not going to resist. I am an innocent man—a much-injured man! I don't care what you do!"

"Put the handcuffs on him!" roared Jim Lickfold. "D—n it all, am I to be obeyed or not? Put the handcuffs on him, I say! Now, where's a tankard? I will take a drop of this beautiful ale with me to the court, and we'll have it examined! Aha!"

"You're mad," said Matthew—"quite mad! I told you you had left the tap running, and by this time every drop has been drained out of the barrel."

Jim could hardly believe this.

But when he found old Matthew's words were indeed true, he uttered a howl of disappointment.

"Oh, you're a clever man, and I give you credit for it. But I'll be even with you—I'll be even with you! Bring him along now directly. I will have all this matter cleared up."

Accordingly, all turned to leave the cellar.

They ascended to the ground floor, and passed out into Drury Lane.

Their appearance attracted much attention, and they found themselves immediately surrounded by a huge crowd.

The officers certainly presented a most rueful appearance.

Not only were they dripping wet with water, but their clothes were all sticky and soaked with the ale that had run out of the barrel, and large patches of sawdust were clinging to their persons in various places.

"Hallo!" said somebody. "My eye, here's a precious lark! Just look at those redbreasts now! Boohoo!"

A disorderly, yelling laugh followed these words, and as the officers, one by one, emerged from the White Horse, they looked ludicrous in the extreme.

At last old Matthew appeared, with the handcuffs on his wrists, and with a police officer at each side of him.

Close behind him came Jim Lickfold, who was determined the landlord should not escape.

His appearance was infinitely more grotesque than any of the others, and he kept roaring and spluttering with rage.

Next came Mr. Smithers, with one eye closed up entirely, and his nose and lips so swelled that it was impossible to distinguish those features for the flesh surrounding them.

"They are dragging me off for just nothing," said old Matthew. "Here's a pretty pass the British land has come to for a respectable tradesman to be hauled off just because the officers choose to like it! But they shall smart for it—they shall smart for it!"

"Hold your row!" roared Jim Lickfold—"hold your row, I say!"

"Sha'n't!" said old Matthew. "Look at him!" he added, addressing the people. "There's a nice-looking object to have the care of your property! Is not he a beauty, now?"

There was another roar of laughter at Jim Lickfold's expense, and he fairly turned black in the face with passion.

But he contented himself with thinking that all would be right when he got his prisoner before the magistrate.

The distance to Bow Street was trifling.

The charge was made and entered in the usual form, and then the whole party taken into court.

It was a tangled affair altogether to unravel, and the more they attempted to unravel it the more complicated it got

Jim Lickfold stalked into the witness-box, leaving a trail of moisture behind him on the floor all the way he went

The clerk then read over the charge, by which old Matthew was accused of having administered some noxious drug to his Majesty's officers of police, in order thereby to render them insensible, so as to enable a notorious criminal to escape.

"Now, prisoner at the bar," said the clerk, "do you plead guilty or not guilty?"

"Why, not guilty, your worship, of course — not guilty! Is it likely that a respectable tradesman like me would——"

"There, there,—stop—that will do! You were only asked to reply to the question."

Thus abashed, old Matthew became silent.

Jim Lickfold was then requested to state the charge.

"Your worship," he said, making a strong effort to keep calm, "from information I received, I went to the White Horse Inn last night, believing that a notorious highwayman named Sixteen-String Jack was being harboured there."

"Well, go on."

"I found many very suspicious circumstances," said Jim. "But I ought to say that when I entered I took half my men, and left the other half on the watch outside.

"At last I went down in the cellar, for I suspected the man I wanted was concealed among the barrels, and then Matthew Gale, yonder, pressed us all to have some ale. I am very sorry to confess it, your worship, but we were fools enough just to taste it. I did put the stuff to my lips, but that was about all. It knocked me down as if it had been a hammer, and all my men were served in the same way.

"And so we were found this morning by Smithers and the remainder of my men, who wondered how it was that I didn't come out."

"That's a very serious charge," said the magistrate. "What have you to say to it?" he asked, addressing old Matthew.

"Your worship, I am quite astounded at what the witness has just said and sworn to. It's quite false. I can bring no witnesses on my own behalf, except such of the police officers as happened to be there, and I don't expect they will speak a word in my favour."

"But have you any questions to ask the witness?"

"I have," said old Matthew, "but I don't know how to put them. If your worship would kindly listen to my version of the affair, I should feel much obliged."

"Well, speak out."

"Well, sir, without any cause at all, the officers have got a great spite for me, and are always breakiug into my house, so that I can do no sort of trade at all. They have regularly ruined my business."

"Well, last night the witness and some more burst in all at once, and declared they knew Sixteen-String Jack or somebody else was in the house, and that they meant to have him.

"I told them, your worship, that there was nobody of the kind on the premises; but they would not believe me, but began to search. They knocked my things about in the most reckless and dreadful manner you could think of, and would not listen to a word of expostulation from me.

"They did me no end of mischief down in the cellars by tossing the barrels about, for they got the idea into their heads that the highwayman must be hiding in one of the barrels. A most ridiculous idea, was it not, your worship?"

CHAPTER DCCXXVII.

OLD MATTHEW IS TRIUMPHANTLY ACQUITTED, AND JIM LICKFOLD MEETS WITH A COMPLETE DEFEAT.

"Go on with what you have to say," exclaimed the magistrate, "and make haste and get to the end of it."

"I will, your worship. When they had searched everywhere they could think of and could find nothing, they stopped before one of the casks in my cellar that contained a drop of very strong old ale, some that I had had in my cellar ever since George I. was crowned, and it wasn't tapped until his present gracious Majesty ascended the throne. I wouldn't have taken a shilling a pint for what little drop of that ale there was left."

"But what has this to do with it? Keep to your point."

"Your worship will find that it has everything to do with it," replied Matthew, "for, very much against my will, they insisted upon tasting some of this ale.

"Well, I thought at last that if I refused it would only make them more bitter against me than ever, so I gave my consent to draw a drop.

"I particularly requested them only just to taste it, it was so very strong, but they only laughed at me, and thought it was because I begrudged it, and so they drank all the more on that very account.

"I was foolish enough to have a little myself, but it did not take such an effect upon me as it did upon them.

"They drank away at the ale till they fell down insensible, and I managed to creep out of the cellar; but I was 'over the score,' as the saying is, for I forgot to turn the tap off, and when I went down this morning, all the beautiful old ale was gone, every drop of it—it had all been soaked up in the sawdust."

Some police were placed in rotation in the witness-box, and questioned by the magistrate.

They contradicted themselves in a very remarkable manner.

But still, from all that had been said, it could be gathered that old Matthew's account of the affair was much nearer the truth than that given by Jim Lickfold.

"I must dismiss the case," said the magistrate—"there is not evidence enough here for me to convict upon. I can form a pretty good idea in my own mind of the whole state of the case. Lickfold, I am surprised at you. An old officer, well tried like yourself, and so many years in the service, to get into this condition seems almost past belief. Is there any other charge against the prisoner?"

"Yes, your worship," said Smithers—"I have something to say."

Smithers was accordingly put into the witness-box and sworn.

"How is it your face is in that condition?" asked the magistrate.

"Jim Lickfold did it, your worship."

"Why?"

"He was mad, I think. I went down, your worship, into the cellars of the White Horse this morning, and there I found Lickfold, and all the other officers, snoring away dead drunk. I woke them up with cold water, and Jim Lickfold was in a rage because a few spots were sprinkled on to him; so, before I knew what he was about, he jumped up and gave me a couple of knock-down blows."

The magistrate looked with additional severity at Lickfold, who began to think that he let his pain get the better of him.

"There can be no doubt, your worship, that they all got drunk on this old ale; whether it was drugged or not I fancy we shall never be able to find out, because there is none of the ale left. But that Sixteen-String Jack was concealed in the house I feel pretty certain."

"Indeed? How do you know that?"

"I was watching outside the White Horse, by Jim Lickfold's instructions, and, presently, I saw some one slip out of the front door and run up the lane. I gave chase, but he escaped."

"How did you know it was Sixteen-String Jack?"

"Oh, I could swear to him, your worship!"

"And you saw him come out of the front door of the White Horse?"

"Well, no—I can't say that I saw him come out—but I saw him the very second afterwards."

"And he has got clear away, you say?"

"Yes, your worship."

The magistrate reflected for some moments.

"I feel strongly inclined to commit you to take your trial," he said, at length, addressing old Matthew—"but you may think yourself lucky that there is just a flaw or two in the evidence that makes it impossible for me to do so. I must dismiss you this once, and let it be a caution to you. I tell you if you are ever brought before me again upon a similar charge, I shall most certainly commit you for trial, even if the evidence is not so clear as it is now."

"I am sorry to hear you say that, your worship," said old Matthew, as he prepared to leave the dock—"I am a poor, honest tradesman, much persecuted by the police. It is my great misfortune, that is. They allow me no rest night and day, and the worst of it is, your worship, it is quite undeserved."

"Well, get out of the court," said the magistrate; "I want to hear no more about this business—be off! As for you, Lickfold, I shall set to work and have you dismissed from the force!"

Under his breath, Jim Lickfold uttered the most awful curses that can be conceived.

He was enraged beyond measure that he had been defeated in every respect and on all hands.

Old Matthew, with an injured look upon his countenance, walked out of the court.

He found plenty of his neighbours standing round, all ready to sympathise with him.

He took care to pour out a tale about the manner in which he had been persecuted, and, as a matter of course, all who heard him sympathised with him.

"It is a burning shame, Matthew, that you should be so treated—it is—it is indeed!"

"You are right," replied the landlord. "But I consider I have had a lucky escape, for those officers have sworn black was white all the way through; so those of you that feel that I am in the right shall have a tankard of my best ale free of charge, if they will drop into my house this evening."

That was a clever stroke of old Matthew's, and it completely enlisted the sympathies of all who heard him.

Then, feeling tolerably well satisfied in his own mind about the manner in which the whole affair had ended, Matthew returned to his house.

During his compulsory absence, Tom Davis had arrived.

He had inquired of the girl at the bar when old Matthew would return.

She could only repeat the message that the landlord had left with her, which was to the effect that he should return in an hour or two at the most, for they could not prove the charge they had brought against him.

This girl knew Tom Davis perfectly well, and was aware how necessary it was he should not be seen by any of the police, so she told him to go upstairs, and wait there until Matthew returned.

He obeyed; and, notwithstanding the confident manner in which the girl had spoken about his return, Tom Davis felt not a little anxiety concerning his friend.

He was also impatient in the extreme to learn whether Dick Turpin had been captured.

He fancied not, for if an event of such importance had taken place, he would surely have heard of it long ere this.

In anxiousness and suspense, therefore, he waited for Matthew to make his appearance.

At length he heard him down below, and waited with impatience for him to ascend.

Soon afterwards he heard a firm, deliberate step upon the staircase, and the next moment old Matthew, with his face beaming with smiles, strode into the room.

"Done again!" he exclaimed, as he closed the door behind him. "They are done again, and this time browner than ever! I rather think, Tom, that it will be a long while before they trouble me again. But how is it you look so serious? What in the world has happened to bring you here at this time in the day—in broad daylight?"

In as few words as he could, Tom Davis explained the reason of his errand.

CHAPTER DCCXXVIII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK SETS OUT IN ORDER TO MEET HIS COMPANIONS.

"I HAVE not heard a word about Dick Turpin this morning,' said the landlord, "and I have been to the right pl[illegible] for information. No; rely upon it he has managed to escape! I would wager any amount he is not captured!"

"Well, that is a great relief."

"And Jack?" added old Matthew—"you say he is quite safe?"

"Yes—he arrived all right this morning, and unharmed."

"Well, then, tell him the issue of this affair and say I am glad he baffled his foes so well."

"I will not fail to do so," said Davis. "And now that I have given you an account of all these proceedings, I want to ask your advice."

"My advice?"

"Yes. Jack said that if Dick Turpin was not captured you would most likely be able to tell me the best means to adopt by which he could rejoin them, and let them know where the inn was situated."

Old Matthew put on a look of deep thought.

"It is very hard," said Tom Davis, "to think that at the present time Dick Turpin and those who are with him should be wandering about from place to place harassed by the police officers, when there is so snug a refuge for them if they did but know where it was situated."

"It is," said old Matthew; "and you must allow me to be quiet a few moments before I can give you any answer."

"Oh, certainly!"

"My brain is a little off its balance this morning—I have had quite enough to excite me."

"You have indeed."

"But I shall calm myself down, never fear, and then I hope to hit upon some way of getting out of this difficulty—though, mind you, at present I don't see how it is to be done."

"Nor do I."

"I have had no breakfast yet," said Matthew, "so I will just take a snack; after that I shall be better, I know."

A substantial meal was brought upstairs, to which old Matthew paid his respects, and then, while he sat smoking a pipe and dipping his nose every now and then into a tankard of ale, began to think over the highwaymen's condition.

"I can't arrive at anything very satisfactory," he said, at length, "and what's more, I don't believe that anybody else could, it is such a peculiar thing."

"You are right."

"But they all know where you lived, Davis, do they not?"

"Yes, I think so; at least, I am sure Turpin and Tom King do."

"Well, then, I should think that, having been driven from the forest, they will be wondering whether Sixteen-String Jack has been captured, and will suffer no little anxiety upon that account. Then, finding he does not return, they will in all probability make their way in the direction of the house where you used to live, in the hope of being able to ascertain whereabouts the inn is situated."

"It seems quite plausible," said Tom Davis. "I only hope they will have the sense to think of such a proceeding; if they do, why, all will be well and straightforward enough."

"Yes; for my own part, the more I think it over the more I feel inclined to think that that is just exactly what they will do. However, we must leave that for time to prove."

"Then what should you recommend?"

"Why, the best thing Sixteen-String Jack can do tonight is to go quietly in the direction of Kentish Town Let him keep there, watching about; I am inclined to think that he will see something of his friends before daybreak."

"And if he does," said Tom Davis, "it will be easy enough for them to come to the inn, it is so very retired, more so even than I expected, and you may pass a long time about that spot without catching sight of a single person."

"So much the better, then—so much the better."

"And now, Matthew, I will say farewell. The sooner I am off the better, for I know Jack will be full of anxiety till I return. When he learns that his worst fears are not realised, he will be more inclined to rest and prepare him self for the fatigues he must endure to-night. So good-bye, Matthew—good-bye!"

"Good-bye, Tom! Mind how you go out, and take care that none of those inquisitive police officers dog your footsteps."

"Leave me alone to deal with them," returned Tom Davis. "I have had business with them before to-day."

"That's true enough, and you have been tolerably successful, so I feel a certain amount of confidence. Once more, good-bye!"

The two old friends shook hands, and Tom Davis walked quietly out of the inn into Drury Lane.

He walked on quietly, stopping every now and then to look into various shop windows, as though he was in no hurry, and as though he had no particular destination in view.

In this way he continued to walk on until he reached the coach-office.

He took an outside seat for Ealing.

He did not take his place until just as the coach was starting.

Then he looked anxiously all round him.

But he saw nothing to occasion any apprehension.

Away rolled the coach, and in due time stopped to allow him to alight on Ealing Common.

He walked over the large open tract, and just before he entered the lane at the north end of it, he stopped and looked back.

He could see behind him for a long, long distance, but not a single human being was in view.

"It's all right," he said, pleasantly—"there's no danger as yet."

Soon afterwards he gained his new home.

He saw Sixteen-String Jack standing near the door, watching and waiting for him.

Sleep and rest had been equally impossible while in his present uneasy state of mind.

Tom's absence had been longer than he anticipated, and more than once he felt inclined to saddle his horse and ride off, in order to put his doubts at rest.

The first words Davis spoke had the effect of reassuring him, and he asked eagerly for Matthew's plan.

He was well satisfied with it, for he felt, from what he knew of his companions, that it would be the most likely course for them to adopt.

"I wish night had already come," he said—"I am so full of impatience to be off."

"Have you rested?"

"No."

"Slept?"

"Not a moment, nor shall I be able until my mind is more at ease."

"Then, if you like," said Tom Davis, "I will while away the time by telling you what happened at old Matthew's after your departure."

"Yes, do so—do so; I am full of anxiety to hear it."

Tom then entered into a very minute account of all that had taken place.

We need not repeat what he said, for the reader knows all already.

Slowly the hours dragged by until night came, and then Sixteen-String Jack hastened to the stable in order to prepare his horse for his journey.

"Don't be so hasty," said his friend; "there is time yet—plenty of time!"

"But I can't stop—I am all impatience to be off. I must leave you!"

The horse was saddled and carefully got ready for the road.

Jack mounted and rode round to the front of the inn.

Tom Davis had walked straight through the house, giving as he did so some instructions to Ellen.

"Wait a moment, Jack," he added, as he met the highwayman outside the inn—"wait a moment."

He patted Jack's horse on the neck while he spoke.

"What must I wait for?"

There was no need for Tom to reply to this question.

Looking up, Jack saw Ellen standing underneath the rustic porch.

On a little tray she carried two glasses of ale.

One she handed to the highwayman—the other was taken by Tom Davis.

"Here's to your good luck, Jack," said the latter; "may you be successful in what you are about to do!"

"And here's to re-echo your wish, Tom. I hope before the sun rises to-morrow that we shall all be here in safety and security."

"So do I. Now, before you leave, take one word of caution from me—be very careful of yourself, Jack; the officers will be out watching for you, I will wager any money—they are so very angry at the clever manner in which you slipped through their fingers last night; so, for your own sake, beware!"

"I will be careful, never fear; and now let me start. Good-bye, Ellen—good-bye, Tom! You will see me again before daybreak!"

As he spoke, Sixteen-String Jack touched his horse with the spur and trotted down the long-deserted by-road.

Soon afterwards he emerged upon Ealing Common.

In the darkness, the large piece of open ground looked to be double its real dimensions.

The night was one extremely favourable for Jack's purpose.

It was light and dark by turns.

Sometimes the clouds would be so heavy and so dense that it would be scarcely possible to see a dozen yards in advance.

Then they would roll away, the blue sky would be made visible, and the stars peeping forth would faintly illuminate the different features in the landscape.

CHAPTER DCCXXIX.

REVERTS TO THE PROCEEDINGS OF DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMPANIONS IN EPPING FOREST.

THE reader must understand that Dick Turpin and his comrades entered Epping Forest on one side of it just a few minutes after Sixteen-String Jack left it by the other.

His visit there was then certainly productive of great good.

Those police officers who had been left about the spot were drawn away by him in a fruitless pursuit, and Dick and his friends had the place entirely to themselves.

It was as well that things happened thus, for in the exhausted condition of the horses there is little question that the police officers would have succeeded in overcoming them.

But as the time passed by the little party grew extremely anxious concerning their missing comrade.

The possibility of his having entered the forest before them, and having been compelled to leave it again, scarcely occurred to them, for they were under the impression that they had been pursued by the whole troop of officers, and that none had been left behind.

They inclined rather to the belief that by some misfortune or other Jack had been captured or slain by his foes.

Yet it might be that he was unable to return before daylight, and that in consequence he was hiding himself somewhere and waiting for night to come.

It was a long, dreary day for them all at the forest.

They were all much exhausted by what they had gone through on the preceding night, and glad enough to rest.

But they could not sleep as they should have done, in consequence of the anxiety at their hearts.

When evening came, their hopes began to revive, for they fancied that under cover of the darkness Sixteen-String Jack would probably return.

A fire was lighted and a rude meal partaken of.

But time passed by, the evening deepened into night, and still there were no signs of Jack's approach.

"He is in some danger, rely upon it!" said Claude Duval.

"And yet he may not be," said Dick Turpin. "It is not impossible that he may have heard of the attack the officers have made upon the forest, and that, consequently, he dreads to enter it lest he should fall into their hands."

"I hope that is the true version," said Claude Duval; "but for my own part, I confess I have gloomier thoughts."

"It is most vexatious," said Tom King, "that we do not know whether Tom Davis is settled at the inn, and whereabouts the building is situated."

"It is much to be regretted," said Dick Turpin. "To tell you the truth, I don't at all fancy remaining here in the forest; something seems to tell me that my best course will be to make an immediate flight!"

"I have the same feeling too" said Claude Duval

"And I," added Tom King.

"Well, then, we are unanimous. But if we decide to quit the forest, to what place can we bend our steps?"

That question was followed by a silence.

Not one of them was able to give a satisfactory reply.

Dick Turpin was the first to speak.

"It seems to me," he said, "that we must try to meet Sixteen-String Jack. Where he may be I have not the remotest notion; but if he is under the belief that the police officers are hanging about the forest, and that they have driven us out of it, he will not think of coming here. The thing to be considered, then, is, which is the most likely place to find him?"

"It will require a great deal of consideration, I fancy, captain," replied Claude Duval, "before that question can be answered. For my own part, I can only see one way of arriving at the knowledge we require."

"And how is that?"

"By riding over to the house where Tom Davis lives."

"But if Jack saw him last night he may have left."

"Well, we can but go and see. I fancy the danger of such a proceeding is not so great as it appears to be at first sight—certainly no more perilous than for us to remain where we are at present."

"What do you say, captain?—shall we ride off in that direction?"

"I can think of nothing better," replied Dick Turpin. But if we should fail to learn any intelligence in that quarter, what then?"

"Let us go there first," said Tom King, "before we consider the other. I am inclined to be of Claude's notion."

"At any rate, if we do not hear intelligence of Sixteen-String Jack, we may safely calculate upon learning where the inn is situated, and consequently of obtaining a place of refuge where we shall be secure from the police."

"Let us wait till midnight," said Dick Turpin, "and if Jack does not make his appearance then, and if in the meantime we can think of nothing better, we will carry out this proposal."

The much-wished-for hour came at length.

Sixteen-String Jack did not appear.

No better plan could be thought of, so the horses were led out and our friends mounted.

There was no need now for Black Bess to carry a double burden; the horse they had obtained possession of so strangely the night before would serve admirably for Maud.

To be sure, they looked rather a large party to be travelling by night, and it was scarcely possible for them to avoid attracting notice.

At the same time, however, they had to bear in mind that with them union was strength, and that they were able to cope better with any danger that might arise.

The principal anxiety was felt in quitting Epping Forest, so Dick Turpin was careful to leave it at a point at some distance from the cave.

"From what we saw last night," he said, "I think we may calculate that the patrols have been removed; that will much diminish our danger, and the house where Davis lives is in so lonely and retired a situation that I have strong hopes we shall be able to arrive there unperceived."

"Forward, then—forward!" said Tom King. "Let no more time be lost! Remember that at the most there are but a few hours between now and daybreak, and during these few hours we must find some place of refuge for the ensuing day."

"You are right, Tom—you are quite right!"

At a comparatively easy pace—for they did not want to distress their horses unnecessarily—the party made their way towards Kentish Town.

By making a detour they avoided Highgate Hill, and entered upon the broad high-road at a short distance from the foot of it.

Very lonely, and dark, and deserted did the broad high-road appear at that hour.

Up to the present moment they had seen scarcely any one during their long ride.

The distance to the house where Tom Davis lived was trifling, and so it was with increased confidence that they prepared themselves for the remainder of the journey.

Suddenly, however, a faint sound struck at the same instant upon the ears of all of them, and, actuated at the same instant by the same impulse, they all pulled up and listened.

"Officers!" said Tom King, breaking the silence. "I am sure I can hear officers on the road! Hark! again—there's some one else—they are in pursuit of some one!"

"Should it be Sixteen-String Jack!"

"What shall we do, captain, to avoid them?" said Tom King, glancing around. "We must be speedy in our movements, or, before we can gain any place of concealment, they will be upon us."

Dick Turpin looked about him.

On one side of the road there was a very tall brick wall, on the other side of which trees were growing, and the branches of which projected over into the road-way.

This wall was of great length, and evidently formed the boundary of some gentleman's estate.

It was so high that it was preposterous to think there was a possibility of climbing over it.

But Dick Turpin, with a keen eye, detected just opposite to where he stood a small wooden door in the wall that evidently communicated with the enclosure.

He pointed it out to his comrades.

"There," he said—"if we are quick, we may pass through there, and close the door after us. The officers will surely never suspect we have taken refuge there."

"Certainly not," said Tom King. "I did not see the door until you spoke, or I should have made the same proposition myself. Dismount, all of you. Be quick—the door is not high enough to allow you to pass under while sitting on your steeds."

Tom flung himself from his horse while he uttered these words, and the others speedily alighted.

Hastening to the door, Tom found, by pressing against it with his shoulder, that it was secured on the inner side.

He found, however, that he could shake it in its frame, thus showing that the fastening was not a very strong one.

He increased the pressure of his shoulder against it.

There was a sharp, cracking, splitting sound, and then the little door flew back suddenly upon its hinges.

CHAPTER DCCXXX.

THE HIGHWAYMEN SUDDENLY AND UNEXPECTEDLY FIND THEMSELVES INVOLVED IN A FRESH ADVENTURE.

"FORWARD!" said Tom King. "Make haste—follow me! We shall yet be in time!"

His companions quickly passed through the little wooden door in the wall—first Maud, then Turpin with her steed and Black Bess, and Claude Duval brought up the rear with the other two horses.

So soon as ever they had all passed through, Tom King closed the door again.

"Hist!" he said. "Don't speak in a loud voice, or make any more noise than you can help. We are somewhere close to a mansion. Look—there are the lights shining through the trees!"

"I see them," replied Dick Turpin. "We will keep close under the shadow of the wall. We only require this for a temporary refuge."

The clatter of horses' feet now came with very great distinctness upon the still night air.

"I should like to know what's going on," said Tom, "and if you will allow me, I will find out and let you know the result."

Taking it for granted that his comrades would have no objection, Tom King seized hold of a low-growing branch that projected horizontally from one of the trees we have mentioned as growing close to the wall, and by the aid of it drew himself up.

Then seizing another branch, he raised himself higher still, until finally he paused, being just able to look over the top of the wall.

That anyone would be likely to see him he did not for a moment think.

It was dark, and, moreover, the tree was covered with dark foliage, which served admirably to conceal his form.

A close scrutiny alone could have discovered him.

Therefore, with great confidence, he looked down the road, and in a moment afterwards caught sight of a single horseman.

He was flying at a terrific rate, and was scarcely in sight before he was out of it again.

But fleeting as this apparition was, Tom King recognised it.

The flying horseman he felt certain was no other than his companion, Sixteen-String Jack.

The impulse came strongly over him to utter a shout.

But he paused to consider whether it would be advisable, and while doing so the opportunity was lost.

Very close indeed at Jack's heels came a large troop of well-mounted police officers.

Tom saw them very plainly.

He could detect, even in the obscurity, the bright scabbards of their cutlasses dangling by their sides, and the red waistcoats which they invariably wore.

They were out of sight almost as soon as Sixteen-String Jack himself.

Until they had disappeared, Tom neither moved hand nor foot.

Then all at once he let go his hold and dropped into the garden.

He alighted softly upon the mould, making no sound.

"What was it, Tom?" his companions asked, breathlessly—"what was it?"

"Sixteen-String Jack!"

"Sixteen-String Jack?" they reiterated with astonishment.

"Yes. I thought I would shout out to him and let him know we were here, but I hesitated, and before I could make up my mind he was clear out of sight!"

"And a body of police officers were after him, I suppose?" said Claude Duval.

"Yes; and a strong, well-mounted body, too, they appeared to be. They went along at a slashing rate!"

"Let us be thankful," said Dick Turpin, "that we have escaped them; and as for Sixteen-String Jack, I doubt not he will be able to take care of himself."

"I hope so. And now, captain, what is to be done?"

"I can't think of anything better than to carry out our original intention. If we can ascertain the whereabouts of the inn and repair to it, we can afterwards set out in search of Jack."

"I suppose it is the best plan," said Claude Duval, "though I feel inclined to gallop after him now."

"No doubt you do; but I think that you would accomplish little good."

"Then shall we leave this place now, captain?" asked Tom King.

"Yes," was the reply. "I should think the officers are far enough off to make it safe for us to do so."

"So should I, so I will open the door."

"Be careful!"

"Never fear!"

Uttering these last words, Tom King opened the door cautiously and looked out.

The high-road was clear, and he was just about to give the signal to his friends to follow him, when his attentive ears caught a faint, far-off sound.

He listened more attentively, and then closed the door again.

"What's the matter?" all asked, eagerly.

"Nothing particular, only I can hear a carriage, or some such vehicle, on the road. It's a good way off at present—but then, as we are safe in hiding, we may as well wait a moment, and allow it to pass by."

"Yes, decidedly," said the captain—"decidedly!"

All now listened, and it was perfectly easy to detect the rumbling, grating noise produced by the wheels revolving rapidly over the road.

Plainer and plainer grew the sounds as the vehicle drew nearer.

"I have half a mind to get up and have a look at it!" said Tom King.

"No—no," said Turpin. "It is not worth while—besides, there is no time. Hark! What's that?"

A faint, muffled shriek at this moment reached their ears.

Two things were certain.

The first, that it proceeded from female lips; and secondly, from some place in their immediate vicinity.

Then with extreme suddenness the vehicle was brought to a standstill—so far as our friends could tell, just opposite the very door through which they had passed such a short time before.

"Back—back!" said Turpin. "We must conceal ourselves. Some one, doubtless, is about to approach. These trees will afford us shelter. Back—back!"

The little party hastily drew close to the wall, in order that they might be concealed by its shadow.

They were only just in time.

"Now," said Dick Turpin, "above all things be still. Let nothing betray you into either making a movement or uttering an exclamation. Silence! There must not be another whisper heard!"

A deep silence followed these words, for all knew that it was important to obey a command given at such a moment.

Their curiosity was very strongly roused, and with eager eyes they looked to see what was going to happen next.

Beyond all doubt the vehicle had stopped just on the other side of the wall.

They could hear the trampling of horses' feet as if they were restless and impatient to start off again upon their journey.

They heard the murmur of voices, and then another shriek, fainter and more muffled than the first.

While hearing such sounds as these, it was hard indeed for the highwaymen to keep still.

But they remembered their leader's words, and never once thought of disobeying them.

"I wonder whether the door's fastened?" growled a voice.

The words came distinctly upon the ears of the unexpected listeners.

"Give it a good kick and try," was the response.

This advice was immediately followed.

A good kick was given, and the door flew open at once.

Situated as our friends were, they could not see through the little door, and consequently were unable to form an estimate of the kind of vehicle that was waiting outside.

"Now, then," said the voice that had first spoken, "it's all right—the coast is quite clear—be quick!"

"Is she quiet now?"

"Oh yes—she's quiet!"

"Then pick her up in your arms and bring her along."

"But I must have a light, or I shall go blundering up against the trees or something."

"All right; you shall have a light. Look! this carriage lamp will suit our purpose admirably. I will take it and lead the way."

A rattling noise followed, which was caused by the man who spoke removing the carriage lamp from the socket in which it was placed.

"Now, then," he cried, "are you ready to follow me?"

"Yes, yes—I am all ready."

"Then, James," he added, evidently addressing another person, "we sha'n't want your services again to-night; so drive on—be quick out of the way!"

Some response was given, and the vehicle drove off.

By the aid of the light that issued from the carriage lamp, our friends first of all perceived the tall figure of a man wrapped in some kind of rough outer garment.

He carried the lamp in his hand, and raised it above his head.

Just as he passed through the door he paused, and it so happened that he stood with his back to our friends, who, but for this accidental circumstance, must certainly have been discovered.

"Come along," said the man with the lamp. "As soon as you are through the door I will close it, and then I will lead the way to the house."

CHAPTER DCCXXXI.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMRADES COME TO A RIGHT DECISION.

In response to these words, the highwaymen first heard a slow and heavy footstep.

Then another dark figure made its appearance upon the scene.

For about a second the light of the lamp shone upon this figure with great distinctness.

Our friends saw another man wrapped in a riding cloak, and wearing a broad-brimmed felt hat, which was pulled down as low as possible over his brows.

In his arms he carried something which looked more like a mass of clothing than aught else.

A closer view, however, showed a small white hand, that could scarcely have belonged to any but a child, and some long, waving tresses of golden hair.

Only for a moment could this be seen.

The man with the lamp moved suddenly, and then all was darkness.

He went towards the door, with the intention of fastening it.

And now came the time for the highwaymen to be alarmed lest their presence should be discovered.

"Why, curse me," he said, "if this door has not been forced open! Who's done that, I wonder?"

He looked about him suspiciously.

"Oh, come on—come on! Never mind about that!"

"But it's curious!"

"Not a bit of it! Didn't you kick the door?"

"Of course I did!"

"Well, then, you must have broken the fastening by kicking it."

"Well, I might, but it was either a very good kick or a very bad fastening. However, here's a bolt, I see, up at the top. I will shoot that into the socket, and then we shall be all right."

"I wish you'd make haste!"

"I am making haste, only we cannot be too careful."

So saying, the man worked away vigorously at the bolt that was situated near the top of the little door.

Evidently a long time had elapsed since that bolt had been made use of, for it stuck so tightly in its setting that he could scarcely move it.

In his efforts he made a dismal, squeaking sound; but each time the bolt moved a little way, until at length he worked it about half-way into its socket.

"Are you going to be all night?" said the other, impatiently.

"No, I have just done. But what a hurry you are in! Now, then, follow me. I will show you the road. Bless you, I know every inch of this ground as well as you know every inch of the Old Chequers! Aha!"

"Hold your row, you idiot! What do you mean by making a row like that, and running the risk of attracting notice?"

"I forgot—I forgot!"

The man with the lamp hastened forward.

He held it above his head, so that the beams might stream through the glass behind him.

It gave out a very tolerable amount of illumination, and enabled the one who carried the girl to walk with confidence.

In the darkness he would probably have come into violent contact with some obstacle.

Several minutes elapsed, during which the sound of their footsteps and of their voices, and the glimmering of the lamp, grew fainter and fainter.

At length they all ceased, and, after a brief pause, Turpin said:

"Well, my comrades, what think you of that?"

There was no response.

But presently Tom King exclaimed:

"What do you think of it, captain?"

"It's quite clear that there's villany of some kind or other in progress—villany of the worst kind, for it is directed against the helpless and the innocent!"

"Beyond doubt you are right!"

"Well, then, my comrades, I want to know whether you think it would be right for us to pass on and take no further notice of this affair? We are in a peculiar position, and have enough to do in looking after our own affairs without mixing ourselves up with those of other people; but in this particular case——"

"I am of opinion," interrupted Tom King, "that we ought to interfere at once and save the poor girl from the danger with which she is threatened."

"Yes," said Claude Duval, heartily; "and if we do not do it, we should deserve to be deserted by everybody at the moment when we most required help!"

"Such are my feelings," said Dick Turpin, "only I wished to know what were your thoughts upon the matter."

"You have not asked for my opinion," added Maud. "I suppose you thought it was unnecessary; my opinion of you would indeed change if you had selfishly sought to secure your own safety and have left that poor girl in the power of those two ruffians."

"I knew that would be the view you would take of the case," returned Turpin, warmly, "and I knew that it would be unnecessary to speak."

"Besides," said Tom King, "the danger after all is not worth thinking about. Here we are in this enclosure snug enough, and certainly out of the way of all the police officers. Then, as for Sixteen-String Jack, whom we are most anxious to meet, he is galloping along the road at such a speed that no steed save Black Bess could overtake him."

"Then, while we are thus engaged," said Turpin, "we will hope he will soon return."

"Then all this being settled," said Tom King, "let us decide upon our operations; it may be that even now we are losing precious time."

"That is more than possible," returned Claude Duval. "I should think we cannot do better than creep cautiously towards the house."

"And our horses—what will you do with them? It is important that we should have them close at hand in a moment of emergency."

"I know it is, but think we cannot do better than secure them to some of the trees hereabouts; we can easily hasten to this spot, and we shall know that we are close to the door that will lead us out on to the high-road."

"Let it be done," said Turpin, "and done quickly. Now, then, follow me!"

The horses were well secured to various strong branches of the trees.

They seemed quite content with the arrangement, and commenced to nibble the short sweet grass that was growing everywhere around.

With slow, stealthy steps, the little party made its way towards the house.

The highwaymen had all been in the darkness long enough for their eyes to become accustomed to the obscurity, and although the enclosure was very dark, they were able to avoid running against anybody.

In a short time they found themselves upon the borders of a spacious lawn.

Before they ventured to emerge upon this they paused to make some observations, and to reconnoitre.

Their attention was first of all directed to a large and handsome mass of building that could be seen at no great distance.

The lower portion only was indistinctly visible; but the upper part, having no other background than the sky, was thrown into strong relief.

It was a quaint and handsome edifice, such as would probably be the residence of some wealthy or titled man.

What had struck them with surprise was, that the whole front of the house was completely plunged in darkness.

Many windows could be dimly seen, but not from one of them came forth a single ray of light

[DICK TURPIN LISTENING TO THE MURDERER'S APPROACH.]

A deep silence—like the silence of the grave-yard at midnight—reigned all around.

"Come!" said Dick Turpin, in a whisper; "all is well. We will not venture to cross the lawn, lest our dark shadows should be seen. This way we can skirt it easily, and that will bring us to one of the sides of the house."

His companions followed in his footsteps.

After a short time they managed to make a complete circuit of the lawn.

They paused, as Turpin said, before one of the ends of the house, though in reality it was what is called a side front.

And now it became necessary to act with caution, for, unlike the front of the building, two windows that were here were illuminated.

One was on the ground floor, and the other in an upper story.

From that one on the ground floor there came a tolerable amount of light, and, after regarding it for a few moments, Turpin said:

"All follow me as quietly as you can. Do not let the sound of a footfall be heard. When we reach the window, we will peep in; but while doing so, you must be careful not to allow your faces to be seen."

"All right, captain—lead the way!"

Turpin took hold of Maud's hand in order to assist her.

As he did so, he was surprised to find that she was trembling violently.

Not from fear, however, but from excitement only.

It was the very first time in her life that she had found herself engaged in an adventure of this kind, and therefore it is not wonderful that it should produce a considerable effect upon her.

She was all eagerness and agitation.

"Calm yourself, dear Maud," said Turpin, in a low voice. "There is no danger either to you or to me; but you feel strange, no doubt."

"I do—I do indeed!"

"Well, calm yourself as well as you are able. Hush!—not another word. Now we are close to the window; a moment more, and we shall be able to command a view of the interior."

Then the window having been gained, Turpin stopped.

For several moments the little party stood perfectly still, gazing with extreme curiosity and interest upon the scene which they beheld.

CHAPTER DCCXXXII.

THE HIGHWAYMEN BECOME ACQUAINTED WITH SOME OF THE DETAILS OF A MOST VILLANOUS PLOT.

SEATED at a table, with a bottle and glasses before them, were two men, in all probability the two men they had seen in the garden, but whether they were or not was impossible to tell, for owing to the darkness they had not been able to obtain a clear view of their countenances.

Now, however, their countenances were plainly revealed by a lamp that was burning on the table between them.

Two more villanous-looking men could scarcely have been seen.

One was younger and much better dressed than his companion.

By his attire, indeed, one would have judged him to be a person of considerable rank and importance.

But his face had upon it no traces of high or gentle birth.

It was bloated and repulsive-looking in the utmost degree, as if he had indulged in every species of vice and debauchery.

There was a deep frown upon his face, and a degree of agitation strongly visible, and he looked threateningly at his associate.

This was a man who evidently belonged to the very lowest depths of humanity.

His dress, composed of rich materials, fitted him badly, or as though he had not the grace to wear it properly, and in many places it was stained as though strong drink had been spilled upon it.

The two men were speaking.

At first the listeners were unable to detect a single word.

But in a moment afterwards they raised their voices to a higher pitch, and then they heard distinctly.

The younger man appeared to have control over the other, for he spoke in a haughty and commanding tone of voice.

"I tell you it shall be done, and what's more, you shall do the deed. I am determined upon it, and will stand no further trifling!"

He brought his hand down with considerable violence upon the table as he uttered the last words.

"Well, well," said the other, "don't make so much fuss about it! I haven't refused, have I?"

"No, you have not refused, because you know full well you dare not, but you have shown hesitation. I tell you again you shall do it at once!"

The other looked round the apartment anxiously, and then answered:

"Hush, hush—don't speak so loud! Who can tell what ears may be listening to us?"

"Do not be a fool—there's no one here but ourselves, at least, no one who will take any notice of a disturbance."

"But it's always best to be careful."

"I know that; but don't talk to me, but listen. You know my motives in the affair quite as well as I know them myself, so that there is no need for any reference to be made to them. I will have no further delay. Will you go at once?"

"I will—I am ready; but how shall it be done?"

"In this way; pay attention, and carry out all my instructions faithfully. I must have no clumsy work—all must be done neatly and cleanly."

While speaking, the man fumbled for a moment in the breast of his coat, and then produced a small, delicate, and singular instrument, upon which not only the highwaymen outside, but his companion, looked with an extraordinary amount of interest.

In shape, then, this instrument resembled a dagger, but it was only about one-fourth of the size that such weapons were usually made.

The blade—if such it may be termed—was very slender—not flat, as blades usually are, but round.

Near the hilt it was almost as large as the tip of a man's little finger, and from that it tapered until the point was as fine as the point of a needle.

This blade appeared to be highly polished—so highly as to look as though it was transparent.

The hilt also was formed of the same material as the blade.

All this our friends saw while the stranger held it in his hand, balancing it upon his fingers.

"Is that the weapon?" said his accomplice, at length.

"It is. You never saw the like, I am convinced of that—take it, and look at it; handle it gently, for it is very fragile."

The man obeyed, and looked at the singular dagger attentively.

"Why, 'tis glass!" he said.

"Yes, I know it is; blade, hilt, and all are formed of the same material."

"How strange—a glass dagger! I never heard of such a thing before!"

"They are by no means usual, but yet they have been known for many a century past. That, however, is nothing to do with us. Attend to me, I say!"

"But where did you get this from?" asked the man, who looked upon the weapon with a great amount of admiration.

So, too, did the unseen listeners outside, not one of whom had ever heard of or seen a weapon of this description.

They thought, at first sight, it was made of glass, but dismissed the idea as unlikely in the extreme.

"When you are ready," said the one who had produced the dagger, "I will show you how to use that little instrument."

He was replied to by a stare of inquiry.

"You will go upstairs; you will find her in the room above. Take this dagger; by one blow, drive it deep into her heart, then give the handle a sudden jerk, and the blade will break off, remaining deeply buried in her body; there will be a spot or two of blood, but no more."

The man to whom these words were addressed sat perfectly still for a moment, and then, with a slight shudder, said:

"It's a frightful instrument—take it back; I would rather make use of something else!"

"No, you shall not! I will be obeyed! Refuse at your peril!"

"But—but——" said the man, and he moved the glass dagger uneasily in his hands.

"No hesitation! I tell you I have made my mind up as to the exact course to be pursued; there will be no hitch or botch in the affair; no traces of violence will remain. You will strike the one blow, and then I in a few years shall succeed to the vast properties of which that child is the heiress, and I shall be enabled to pay off all the heavy mortgages I have upon this estate."

"Yes, yes," said the man—"I know all that. I first prompted you to the idea—one stroke, and all is won."

"Truly; but the stroke must be delivered by yourself!"

"And my reward?"

"As I have told you, your reward shall be most ample—far, far indeed beyond your utmost and most sanguine expectations."

Turpin was watching the speaker narrowly, and he fancied that at these last words his countenance assumed a curious expression—one that boded his accomplice no good.

"Are you ready now?" he asked, "or are you determined to lose the opportunity? The state of insensibility in which the girl now is will not for long continue; if she awakes we shall have no end of trouble and disturbance. If you strike the blow now, all will be done with scarcely any trouble!"

The man with the dagger rose slowly to his feet.

There was an air of resolution perceptible in his manner.

He was like one who had nerved himself to do some terrible deed—a deed from which his better nature revolted, but which, nevertheless, he was determined to perpetrate.

"Beware," said the other, rising also—"beware how you attempt to play me false! When you have struck the blow, and broken off the hilt of the dagger, let me know."

"And—and——" said the man, with chattering teeth.

"And what?"

"The body!"

"What of it?"

"What shall you do with it?"

"Do with it? Why, bury it, of course."

"Here?"

"Yes, here; that is, somewhere in the grounds. I have fixed my eye upon a spot that will answer our purpose admirably. The soil is soft, and it will be easy enough to dig a deep grave; we will place her in it, fill in the mould, and then we shall be rid of all this anxiety and trouble."

"It sounds feasible," said the other—"it sounds feasible, and you are already too deeply in my debt for me to hesitate—it must be done! This and this alone, is the only chance I have of recovering the large amount of money I have lent you!"

"It is," was the reply. "You have almost as deep an interest as I have, therefore do not delay; and when you strike home, let no nervous terror make your arm tremble—the deed must be done by one blow, and one blow only!"

CHAPTER DCCXXXIII.

DICK TURPIN ENDEAVOURS TO SAVE THE YOUNG GIRL FROM HER TERRIBLE FATE.

With these words, the man with the dagger advanced reluctantly towards the door.

No sooner did Turpin observe him make this movement than he drew his companions aside, and said, hastily:

"At all risks, this horrible crime must be prevented!"

"But how," said Tom King—"but how?"

"Leave it to me," said Turpin. "Do not on any account, without you hear my signal, presume to make any demonstration of your presence. I have a plan of operations already arranged in my brain; if there was the time I would explain the details to you, but there is not; while I was doing so the chance would be lost, so you must trust to me entirely."

"We are content, captain—we are quite content!"

"Then be still—pray be still!"

Dick grasped Maud's hand, and pressed it warmly.

He did not say another word, but crept stealthily forward.

They then observed what they had not previously noticed.

This was a large tree growing by the side of the house, and sending out branches in all directions.

Some boughs were only six or seven feet from the ground, so Turpin seized one easily, and with extreme agility and rapidity mounted the tree.

His companions stood below watching all his movements eagerly.

One large branch shot out almost horizontally from the trunk, and pointed in the direction of a verandah, or balcony, that ran in front of the windows on the first floor.

Along this branch Turpin crawled hastily.

It bent and creaked beneath his weight; but it was strong enough to sustain him without making any sound of an alarming character.

He dropped upon the balcony of which we have spoken.

Then, crouching down, he hastened along it to the window from which the light proceeded.

It was immediately over the one in which the two plotters had been sitting, and that fact, coupled with the light that streamed forth from its panes, made Dick nearly certain that it was the one in which the girl had been placed.

If it was, all would be well.

The plan he had thought of would enable him to save her, but if he had made any mistake in this particular it would be very doubtful whether he would be able to do so.

By this time he fully calculated the man would have been able to ascend the stairs and enter the room.

Such deeds he knew were always done quickly.

When they had worked themselves up to a certain point, the blow was struck with extreme suddenness.

Panting and anxious, then, he paused before the window, and before he ventured to enter, looked in.

The light which he had seen came only from a fire that was burning on the hearth.

When he first saw it the blaze was leaping up towards the chimney.

Now there was little more than a dull red glow of burning embers.

He pressed his face close against the glass, and placed his hands at both sides of his temples, so as to be able to obtain a better view of the interior.

He saw then a spacious, old-fashioned apartment.

It was well, and according to the fashion of the time luxuriously, furnished.

The most noticeable article of furniture was a bedstead, a huge affair with heavy curtains drawn closely all round it, and with huge nodding plumes of feathers at the top, giving to the whole a hearse-like aspect.

Of the girl he could see nothing.

But a kind of instinct seemed to tell him that she was lying on the bed.

He had heard that she was insensible, and therefore that would be the most likely place for her to be put.

Hastily, then, he opened the window, and stepped into the chamber.

He listened.

But all was still.

On tiptoe, he strode towards the bed, and drew aside the curtains.

A slight exclamation of satisfaction arose to his lips.

Lying there, as though she had simply been thrown down, was the same young girl he had seen carried through the garden.

He could tell she was the same by her small white hands, and by her long waving tresses of golden hair.

She was either in a deep slumber or else in a state of insensibility.

Dick wondered how it was that the man had not made his appearance before then.

The reason, however, was simple enough, as he afterwards learned.

His friends had looked through the window again, and saw that the murderer in intention had turned back from the door, and demanded another draught of brandy.

He was as yet scarcely qualified for the deed he had to do, and so brutalised himself by additional draughts of the fiery stimulant.

In spite of the impatience of the other, he continued to drink glass after glass, but no perceptible effect was produced.

Then he found himself in possession of sufficient courage, and again turned towards the door.

Dick Turpin heard his footsteps on the stairs, and, confident that now no time must be lost, he took hold of the girl, and lifted her off the bed.

It was his original intention to have rushed with her on to the balcony.

But now it was too late—in another moment the room would be entered.

He deposited her on the floor by the side of the bed instead, and then, with great rapidity, arranged the bedclothes in such a fashion that by the dim, uncertain light it would appear as though some one was really lying there.

He had only just time to do this and conceal himself behind the curtains when the door opened.

The man just put his head inside, and then withdrew it.

In a low voice, Turpin heard him calling to his companion.

"A light—a light!" he said. "I must have a light! It's dark—quite dark!"

"So much the better," was the reply—"you will not see her face. If you did, it might turn you from your purpose. She is lying on the bed. You cannot fail to find her. Strike one heavy blow, and all will be done. Remember your reward!"

Apparently convinced by what his companion had just said, the man, with trembling steps, walked across the room towards the bed.

On the side towards which he walked the curtains were closely drawn.

So intent was he on his task—so anxious to get it quickly over—that he did not notice the dark shadow of some one following in his footsteps.

But Turpin saw him, and recognised him as the man's accomplice.

Silently and swiftly he stepped across the room.

What might be his purpose could only be guessed.

Perhaps it was to see that his accomplice performed the deed effectually, and that no nervousness overtook him at the last moment.

The man with the dagger averted his head when he drew aside the curtains.

He put out his left hand.

He could feel a mass of something that felt like clothing.

Without stopping to make any further examination, he raised his arm, and brought it down with the rapidity of lightning.

As he had been bidden, he jerked his wrist, and the hilt of the dagger came away in his hand.

"Done!" he gasped—"it is done! All is over!"

Then a muffled shriek escaped his own lips.

He started upright, and turned round, with his countenance frightfully distorted.

He caught sight of his accomplice standing a pace or two off, with his arms folded, and with a mocking expression on his face.

He tried hard to shriek, but he could not.

He looked at his companion, and saw that he was holding the hilt of another glass dagger in his hand.

He knew by that that the blade had found a sheath in his own back.

He was dying—surely dying.

"You have received your reward!" said the other, with a scornful laugh. "As you said, truly enough, all is over! I am rid in the same moment of the two greatest obstacles of my prosperity."

CHAPTER DCCXXXIV.

THE YOUNG GIRL IS SAVED FROM HER FOES BY DICK TURPIN.

Gasping and staggering to and fro, the man remained glaring upon his accomplice.

Dick Turpin had seen this man following in the footsteps of the other, but yet it did not occur to him that it was his intention to commit an assassination.

So suddenly was it done that he was not in time to prevent it—indeed, considering the man's character, it would have been almost a pity if he had done so.

After one or two ineffectual attempts to speak, the murdered wretch turned half round, and then fell with a crash upon the floor.

"It is done!" said the other, with a mocking laugh. "Now, then, to see whether the blow was really an effectual one. If she has perished, all will be well. I can easily dispose of the two bodies."

He dashed aside the curtains of the bed as he spoke.

At the same moment a flash of light came from the smouldering fire, and this showed him everything with great distinctness.

The girl was not there, but only a heap of clothing.

A terrible cry of rage and fear burst from his lips.

"Villain!" said Dick, as he stepped from his place of concealment, and revealed himself to the guilty wretch. "Your plan has failed! The girl is saved!"

"And you have done it, I suppose?" was the reply, and, while the words were uttered, the young man drew his sword rapidly, and aimed a desperate blow at the highwayman.

But Dick Turpin's blade was ready, and the weapons rang together with a clashing sound.

Whatever might have been that man's failing and deficiencies in other respects, certainly cowardice was not one of them.

He attacked Dick Turpin with great fury and considerable skill, so that the highwayman had much ado to defend himself.

The trampling of their feet, the clashing of their weapons, and the cries of rage and vexation to which Turpin's antagonist gave vent, aroused the young girl from her state of insensibility.

She sprang up with a scream, for the recollection of what had happened to her was strongly before her mind, and when she saw these two men engaged in mortal strife, her terror became greater, and she uttered shriek upon shriek.

Seeing the girl roused the man into a state of perfect fury.

He redoubled the violence of his attack, for he hoped to be able to put an end to his antagonist, and to slay the girl as well.

But in this anticipation he was disappointed.

Seeing that it was a matter of life and death between them, Dick Turpin did not hesitate to strike a blow that should put an end to the contest.

He saw that his adversary left his head for a moment unguarded.

Down came his sword upon it with terrific force.

There was a faint, gurgling cry, a few staggering steps, and then the villain fell half on the floor and half on the body of his scarcely less villanous companion.

Hastily sheathing his sword, Dick Turpin hastened to place himself by the girl's side.

"Fear nothing now," he said, "for all is well. The danger that has menaced you is over. You know me not. I am an utter stranger to you, but, nevertheless, I am a friend—my actions will prove such to you. Look—there are the two men who would have murdered you!"

The girl shuddered, and her face turned even a shade paler than it had been before.

"And—and—you have killed them both?" she asked, tremblingly.

"No, not both. One of them kindly saved me the trouble. But these details are nothing to you—they are unfit for your ears."

The girl looked all around her, and, by her manner, Dick concluded that she recognised the apartment she was in.

"If I am not mistaken," he said, "you know where you are?"

"I do; and yet I can scarcely believe it."

"But it is true?"

"Yes, it must be true, because——" and her eyes wandered to the wretch who had fallen beneath Turpin's sword.

"Where are you, then?"

"This is a room in my uncle's house, and—and—that is my uncle."

She pointed to the prostrate form while she spoke.

"Then," said Turpin, with a smile, "you have to thank me for ridding you of a very disagreeable and disreputable relation. Do you know what his intentions were with regard to yourself?"

"I do; I can guess them. I have always feared him."

"And how came you in his power?"

"I received a letter that I believed to be from—from—some one that I know."

"And love dearly," interrupted Turpin, as he noticed her hesitation and the blushes that suffused her cheeks.

"As the letter requested, I slipped out without anyone at home being aware of my absence. Upon reaching the appointed spot, I was seized, hurried into a carriage, and then I became insensible."

"And you next remember finding yourself here?"

"Yes, that is almost the next. I have some recollection of feeling myself whirled along at a tremendous rate, and shrieking out aloud for aid; but whether I did that or not is almost more than I can now take upon myself to say."

"Beyond doubt you did," said Turpin, "for I heard you. But hush! I will explain all presently. There are my friends."

At this moment Tom King and Claude Duval made their appearance on the balcony outside the window.

"Are you safe, captain?" they cried. "Is all well?"

"Yes, all's well!"

"We stayed away as long as we could, because we did not hear your signal; at last we grew alarmed."

"Both wretches I believe are dead," returned Turpin, "or if they are not it matters little. I am quite certain it is out of their power to do much more mischief."

"You foiled them in their plot, then?"

"Yes; but do not linger here, we will hasten away."

"Right, captain. Does the household seem alarmed in any way?"

"No; it seems as though the place was quite deserted."

"Good, then we need not hurry ourselves."

"Which way will you descend?"

"By the balcony again, I think; the distance to the ground is but trifling, and it would be better than running the risk of descending the staircase."

While speaking, Dick Turpin advanced towards the window.

He supported the young girl's steps with his arm.

She was weak, and trembled excessively.

But Dick had shown himself such a true friend and protector, that she clung to him with every confidence.

There was a little difficulty in lowering her from the balcony, but not much.

Turpin raised her in his arms, lifted her over the iron railing, and then bending over, held her down at the full length of his arms, so that she was able to drop to the ground.

In another moment he and his companions were standing by her side.

Maud was there anxiously expecting them.

She welcomed the young girl affectionately.

"Come," said Turpin, "follow me to the little door in the garden wall; we shall then be close to our horses in case there should be any necessity for instant flight; it would be much better to hold a consultation there than here."

Claude and Tom King were of the same opinion, and accordingly the whole party hastened to the spot that had been mentioned by their leader.

In a few words Dick then related to his comrades all that had taken place in the room above.

But what they heard only served to increase their curiosity and interest, for a thousand questions suggested themselves to their minds.

These questions no doubt could all be answered by the young girl whom they had befriended.

But they shrank from putting them.

She was growing calmer now, and was much rejoiced to meet with one of her own sex under such trying circumstances, and after waiting a moment or two, Dick Turpin ventured to address her.

CHAPTER DCCXXXV.

DICK TURPIN RESOLVES NOT TO DO HIS GOOD WORK BY HALVES.

"Who you are," he said, "I have no idea. Chance alone made me acquainted with the fact that you were in great personal danger, and that was sufficient to induce me to step forward and do what I could on your behalf."

"My best thanks are your due," replied the young girl. "I do thank you very, very much. I wish I could express the amount of gratitude that I feel!"

"I am not, however, disposed to do my work by halves," continued Turpin, without taking any notice of this last speech; "if, then, you will tell me where you want to go to be in safety, I will take you, for it is impossible that you should remain here."

"I wish to go home," was the reply. "This will be a bitter lesson for me. Never again will I quit my father's house in a clandestine manner!"

"Where is your home?"

"In London."

"In what portion of it?"

"In Piccadilly. My father, Colonel Walton, lives there—that is, when he is in town, as he happens to be at the present time."

"He is no doubt suffering great anxiety and suspense on account of your absence."

"Oh, sir, he is, no doubt—no doubt he is. I know he will be frantic with grief when he discovers my absence. Let me go to him—let me go!"

"But you must understand, miss, that it is not possible for you to go alone."

"Do not call me miss, it does not seem as though we were friends; call me Florence—my father calls me Floy."

"Then, Florence, I will see that you reach home safely and unhurt; but, first of all, I must hold some brief consultation with my companions here, and arrange our future proceedings."

Florence shrank back, for she could tell by Turpin's manner that he did not wish that she should overhear the conference.

Maud placed herself by her side.

"My comrades," said Dick, "I consider I have a plain and simple duty before me, and I shall perform it."

"What is it, captain?"

"To take that young girl home—to place her safely in her parent's arms. It will be a good deed done, and it will be one that I shall always be able to reflect upon with pleasure."

"But the danger, captain—the danger!"

"I don't think it will be great, no greater than I run every hour of my life, that is, if you will only pay attention to my directions."

"You may depend we shall do that. What is it you propose?"

"Simply this: I will leave you here in charge of Maud; wait about here somewhere as near this spot as you can. I ask this because I wish Sixteen-String Jack to rejoin us, and he is more likely to appear here than anywhere else."

"Very good, captain; but suppose he should not come?"

"Why, then, when you find it growing towards morning, you must seek out the best place of refuge you can find."

"We will do that, captain; there is no particular difficulty about it."

"I think not."

"But if you should not return yourself?"

"I think it hardly worth while to take that into your calculations. Depend upon it I shall be back here at this spot many hours before daybreak."

"But still, captain, should you not, how shall we find you then?"

Turpin reflected for a moment.

"It is best to make this arrangement in case of accidents," he said. "If I am not here in an hour before daybreak, do not wait for me; I will come here to-morrow night, and you must be here too."

"Very well, that understanding is quite sufficient."

"And you are quite willing that I should go?"

"Yes, quite; the young girl cannot possibly go alone, and as you have had the adventure all through, you may as well complete it."

Dick Turpin turned away, pleased enough to think that his companions approved of his intention.

But there was Maud—would she be content with this arrangement?

He drew her on one side, and spoke to her for a few moments earnestly and energetically.

If she did not accede to his request she did not refuse it.

"Now, Florence," said Dick, "in a very short time from the present moment you shall be safe beneath your father's roof."

"Oh, sir, thank you for those words—I shall indeed be under deep obligation to you!"

"No, no—all that I do is performed willingly and gladly. Come!"

He unfastened Black Bess from the tree to which she had been secured, and mounting, placed the young girl on the saddle before him.

"Can you ride?" he said.

"Oh yes!"

"Then you will have no difficulty whatever: cling tightly to me, and all will be well."

Dick waved his hat in token of farewell to his companions, and then started off at a rapid rate along the road.

"That man with whom I fought," said Turpin, presently; "was he your uncle?"

"Yes, my uncle, George Walton, my father's youngest brother."

"I see; that's how it is that he appeared only such a few years older than yourself."

"My father has always told me that he was a very bad young man. He indulged in every vice, chose his companions among the worst and lowest in the land, and passed his days in riotous extravagance."

"He had that appearance," said Dick Turpin, who listened with great interest to all the young girl said, for he fully expected that he would be made acquainted with a little family history that would clear up many points about which he was in doubt, and which to him appeared mysterious.

"I have heard also that he squandered the whole of the large fortune that had been left him, and not only that, but got deeply in debt, so that every article that he possessed was mortgaged to its utmost value; he was consequently the poorest of the poor; he had nothing, and was so deeply in debt that it seemed impossible for him to extricate himself."

"And your father," said Dick—"is he wealthy?"

"I believe so—very. We have a large mansion here in London, and several residences in the country."

"And I suppose in the event of your father's death the whole of that property would be yours?"

"Yes," said the young girl, surprised and half alarmed at the question. "I have heard him say that everything he possessed belonged to me."

"Exactly; but if you were not in existence, who would be his heir then?"

"I can hardly tell you."

"Have you a brother?"

"No."

"Nor a sister, nor any close relation?"

"No, not one; my Uncle George is my nearest relative."

"Then to him would the property have belonged. I can understand his conduct now. You have indeed had a narrow escape of your life to-night, for your uncle had everything to gain by your destruction!"

"I always feared him—always dreaded him!" was the shuddering response. "It always seemed to me as though there was murder in his eyes when he looked upon me; I have said so to my father more than once, but he has always sternly reproved me for so doing."

"You will not be alarmed now," said Dick, "because you are in safety; but I ought to tell you that your uncle had you carried off and taken to that house in order that he might murder you: he had arranged everything, and but for my accidental presence you would have been thrown into a hole in his garden! Your disappearance would have been a total mystery. The chances were a thousand to one against it being discovered that your uncle was the murderer, for he took the precaution to slay the only accomplice he appeared to have in the affair."

"Horrible," said the girl, trembling—"horrible! Do not talk to me again about it—the thought is too dreadful for me to bear!"

"I have no doubt of that," said Dick. "But now you know the worst I will increase my speed, for I am sure you must be all impatience. Now, Bess—forward, lass! Quick—quick!"

Hearing these words, Black Bess changed her pace from a trot to a rapid gallop.

She bounded over the road at a surprising speed, and when Dick Turpin again drew rein it was in the western portion of Piccadilly—not then, as now, a busy, populous street, but a country road far out of the city, and only dotted here and there with gentlemen's residences.

CHAPTER DCCXXXVI.

DICK TURPIN ACCEPTS THE HOSPITALITY OF COLONEL WALTON.

"Now, Florence," said Dick, in a kind voice, "this is Piccadilly; can you tell me which is your father's house?"

She looked around her for a moment or two, as though unable to recognise the different buildings.

Then she answered:

"Oh! you are a long way from it—it lies much nearer to Leicester Fields."

"Good," said Turpin. "I will go gently, and when we come to the right house, tell me and I will stop."

Dick would have infinitely preferred to go farther to the westward—that is, into the open country.

But he could not give up after going so far with his enterprise, and so, although it was reluctantly, he turned Black Bess round, and proceeded in the direction of the city.

Florence looked upon both sides as they went, until presently she exclaimed:

"There, that is the house—the white one with the verandah in front."

"I see it," was Dick's reply.

"You must stop at the lodge gate; Thompson is there, and he will admit us."

Dick paused in front of the gate, and then he said:

"My dear young lady, I have brought you in safety to your father's door; you have only to ring the bell and you will be admitted, therefore you can be no longer in danger. I will say farewell to you on this spot, and you can enter alone."

"No, no," said the young girl, seizing his hand tightly—"I cannot indeed permit you to leave thus! You must come in, you must see my father, and receive his thanks for the service you have done me this night!"

"No, no," said Turpin—"I cannot!"

"But what is your reason?"

"Do not ask me for it; let it be sufficient if I plead buisness—urgent business—as my excuse. There, there—say no more. Ring the bell and I will depart."

"I regret very much that you should leave me thus, and I am sure my father will be angry with me for not detaining you; but if you must go, you must—I can't prevent you."

"What's all this—what's all this?" said a voice. "What's the meaning of it? Bless my life, is that you, Floy? And you, sir—who are you?"

These words were spoken by an elderly man, with white hair, who suddenly opened the lodge gates and made his appearance on the scene.

With a shriek of delight, Florence exclaimed:

"Yes—yes, dear father, I am here—your own daughter Floy! I have been in such peril and such danger, and this gentleman has saved me from all, and brought me here, and yet he refuses to enter to receive your thanks!"

"Danger—danger? Bless my heart, what can have happened? Here have I, a soldier, been terrified almost to death by your absence! But come in—come in at once! And you, sir," he added, addressing Turpin, "if you refuse my daughter's appeal you must not refuse mine."

"Sir," said Dick, "I have saved your daughter, as she says truly, from much peril—what that peril was she can tell you as well as I can; but I don't wish to remain, and you would confer an obligation upon me if you would say farewell, and allow me to depart."

But Florence maintained her hold upon his hand, and now she cried:

"Don't take his refusal, father—don't take his refusal! I can't tell you what has happened—no, not half so well as he can!"

Dick Turpin was most anxious to be gone, and yet he could not exactly tell how he could take his departure without appearing rude and churlish in the extreme.

But at this moment the beat of horses' feet upon the road some distance off, reached his attentive ears.

It induced him to change his determination.

They might be police officers who were approaching, and the old colonel might keep him there, pressing him to enter, until they rode up.

Then his position would be far from pleasant.

He appeared, therefore, to yield to their solicitations, and he said:

"I cannot find it in my heart to refuse such urgent requests. I will enter, but I cannot stay long."

"That's right!" said Florence. "Oh, father, I am so glad!"

Turpin dismounted, and led Black Bess through the gate.

Thompson, the lodge-keeper, was there, and closed it.

"Leave your horse, sir," said the colonel. Thompson will take charge of it. It will be quite safe in his hands."

Dick hesitated at first, and then, turning round, he said:

"Just walk her up and down for a few minutes. Don't place her in the stable. I shall soon return, and shall want to set off without delay."

The man touched his cap, and the colonel and his daughter hurried him towards the house.

As he drew near to it, he observed with pleasure its beautiful and tasteful appearance.

The servants, until they saw their young mistress, all looked anxious and alarmed.

But their countenances changed like magic as soon as they caught sight of her.

"This way," said the colonel—"this way! Come into this room, and have a glass of wine with me, and tell me all about it."

He entered a sumptuously-furnished apartment as he spoke.

Dick followed in his steps.

He was treated with the utmost politeness and condescension by the colonel.

At his request, he seated himself in a large arm-chair by the fire, while the colonel occupied another.

Florence sank down upon her knees on the hearth, and clasped her hands round her father's arm, looking up into his countenance with a trustful, hoping expression.

But tears were nevertheless visible in her eyes, and she was greatly agitated, for she could not forget the terrible events of the night.

Florence produced a letter, which she handed to her father.

"I received that," she said, "and, like a wilful, disobedient girl as I am, acceded to the request contained in it."

"Why—why," said the colonel, knitting his brows angrily, "this is from Frank!"

"No, no, dear father—not from Frank! It's a forgery—a base forgery! It purports only to come from him, and it was written in order to deceive me."

But the colonel did not seem at all convinced of this until Turpin began to speak.

Then he listened with mingled horror and wonder to the narrative that fell from his lips.

He drew his daughter closer and closer to him, and trembled like a leaf when made aware of the terrible position she had been in.

"And you have rescued her?" he said—"you—a stranger? How and in what way can I repay you for what you have done?"

"I don't wish it to be considered an obligation," returned Turpin, "nor do I wish to be repaid for it."

"Then, sir," said the colonel, rising to his feet, and shaking Dick warmly by the hand, "no matter who and what you are, take my word for it, you are a man! I feel that I cannot pay a higher compliment than to say that your conduct has indeed been noble in the extreme! I admire you, sir—I respect you!"

Turpin smiled strangely and somewhat sadly while the colonel thus spoke.

The reader can perhaps guess the nature of his thoughts.

"Your daughter," he said, "has never once inquired who or what I am, and I have not thrust the knowledge upon her. It is my wish that I should remain unknown; and, if you will allow me to depart quietly and in peace, I shall esteem it the greatest favour that you can grant."

"But this is most mysterious—most inexplicable! I will not press you too closely for an answer, and yet—yet I would fain know who you are."

"Hark!" said Turpin, his manner changing suddenly. "What was that?—did you hear it?"

A loud knocking and ringing at the outer door of the mansion made itself heard.

Dick Turpin crossed the room lightly to the window, and opened it.

It fell back before his touch, for it opened on to the verandah we have mentioned.

Breathless with surprise, and anticipating they knew not what, the colonel and his daughter followed him.

Dick held up his hand for silence.

"Listen," he said, in a whisper—"listen!"

"Open!" said a voice, in loud, gruff tones—"open—open, in the name of his Majesty the King!"

"Bless my heart!" ejaculated the colonel. "What does that mean?"

"It means," replied Turpin, "that they are officers of police."

"Officers of police?"

"Yes, and they are in search of me."

"Of you?"

"Yes."

"But who are you, then?—why should they seek you?"

"I will tell you now," said Turpin—"you shall have the knowledge I withheld until a moment back. You will shortly hear it under any circumstances, and I would sooner that you heard it from my lips than another's. You have judged me by my actions, so has your daughter. From what you personally know, you both have a good opinion of me—at least, you have said as much."

"We have—we have," was the reply, "and fully mean it!"

"Then let me ask you to dismiss from your minds all that you may have previously heard from any other source. Take no notice of it—judge me as you find me."

"We will; but who are you?—what is your name?"

"I am Dick Turpin," was the reply, "the highwayman!"

CHAPTER DCCXXXVII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS DRIVE DICK TURPIN FROM THE COLONEL'S MANSION.

FLORENCE uttered a slight scream, and the colonel staggered back several paces.

"Impossible," he said—"impossible!"

"I can assure you," returned Dick, "that it is possible, for it is the fact; and, as a return for the service I have rendered you to-night, I would wish you, when you speak of me, to speak of me as you have found me. Farewell!"

"Stop—stop—stop, I say!"

"I can't—my life depends upon my speed!"

"But—but," said the colonel, a little bewildered, "how on earth could the officers have discovered that you were in this house?"

"That is more than I care to know," was the reply. "My course is plain before me—I must escape!"

"Escape?"

"Yes, yes—that's it! Once more farewell—without, indeed, you can hide me securely somewhere. But no—I will not ask you to do that."

"But I will—I will!"

"It is too late," said Dick, as he sprang over the railing of the verandah.

It was at this moment that the door of the room was dashed violently open, and a party of police officers rushed in.

"Seize him!" they cried—"seize him!"

But they were too late—the highwayman had gone.

"Through the window!" cried one of the officers—"he has jumped through the window. Be quick—we shall have him yet! Confound it, what a pity it is there were not a few more of us!"

The officer rushed on to the balcony, and seeing that the ground was not far below, he jumped down without a moment's hesitation.

But Dick Turpin had got the start.

He ran down the gravel avenue as a man only can run when he knows that life and liberty depend on his exertions.

There was a terrible dread and oppression at his heart.

Would he be able to regain possession of his steed, or had the officers taken the precaution to capture his mare before attempting to capture him?

In another instant the lodge-gate was gained.

Dick stopped and looked about him despairingly.

No traces of the gatekeeper or Black Bess could be seen.

"Thompson—Thompson!" he cried, remembering the man's name—"Thompson!"

"Here, sir," said a voice, and immediately afterwards

the old man emerged from the trees, leading Black Bess by the bridle.

This unexpected event unnerved Turpin more than the greatest danger could have done.

He had made up his mind that his steed was lost to him for ever.

"Be quick!" he cried, recovering himself—"open the gate! Quick—quick—on your life, be quick!"

"All right, sir," was the reply. "I knew you at the gate, and that's why I kept your mare out of the way of the police officers."

"Is it possible?"

"I can assure you it is true," replied Thompson, as he hurried open the gate. "Now fly, captain, and good luck to you! I heard what a service you had rendered Miss Florence, and that was enough to make me willing to lay down my life to serve you."

"Take that, then," said Turpin, "as a reward for your trouble."

He flung a heavy purse upon the ground as he spoke, and then, giving Black Bess the rein, dashed through the gateway.

But he heard loud shouts and cries in the rear, but, so far from being alarmed he laughed lightly as he said:

"I have done one good deed to-night, and I feel all the happier for it. Surely that will be something in my favour, for if I had not been what I am the girl must have surely perished."

The pursuit of the police officers gave Dick Turpin no sort of concern whatever.

He just allowed the reins to fall loosely on the neck of Black Bess, and away the gallant creature flew at a speed he was quite sure no other horse could accomplish, and, therefore, he was in no danger of being overtaken.

Gradually, however, he slackened her pace, and having gained the open country, paused to listen.

From the rear not a sound reached him, however, and at a gentle trot he allowed Black Bess to perform the remainder of her journey.

Altogether, he had not been absent very long, and, therefore, he felt little doubt about being able to rejoin his companions.

It wanted considerably more than an hour before daybreak would come.

At last he reached the vicinity of the cottage in which Tom Davis had dwelt; and now he rode forward with even more caution than before, for he expected every instant to meet with his companions.

He could neither see nor hear anything of them, however, and at last reached the little gate in the garden wall.

Here he paused, and uttered a signal with which he knew his companions would be familiar.

It was responded to in a moment, and looking up he saw his companions approaching from the direction of Highgate.

"So you are safe back!" they exclaimed, joyfully. "You have made marvellous speed."

"And yet I have done much."

"Are you unhurt?" asked Maud—"are you sure you are unhurt?"

"Not even scratched," was the reply. "By some means or other, a few officers tracked me, but I escaped them with ease. Now tell me—have you seen or heard anything of Sixteen-String Jack?"

"Nothing at present, captain."

"We must not quit this road, then, at present; we must wait in patience until he returns."

"But supposing that he should not come?"

"Why, then we must depart, conceal ourselves, and then return to-morrow night."

"I hope we shall be spared the necessity of doing that."

"So do I—so do I!"

"Hark—hark! What is that coming?"

The sound of a horse's feet at this moment reached the ears of all.

Some one was approaching, though very slowly.

Dick listened to the sound for some time, and then he said:

"I wonder who is coming? Be he who he may, his horse is quite lame. Listen how he puts his feet to the ground."

"Yes, he is lame, sure enough," said Tom King. "I should not wonder if it is Sixteen-String Jack. It is very likely, considering the pace he was going at. I only hope that he has thrown the officers off his track!"

They all drew close to the shadow of the wall, so as to get out of sight as much as possible, and then waited anxiously and impatiently for the approaching horseman to come nearer.

At the slowest possible walk he came on.

A long time—it seemed to the highwaymen a full hour—elapsed, and then the rider came in sight.

They strained their eyes, endeavouring to recognise him, and presently Dick said:

"It is well. It is Jack—I am sure of it."

He uttered the signal as he spoke.

It was responded to at once, showing that he was quite right.

The whole of the party now emerged from their place of concealment, and hastened towards their companion.

"Is it really you, Jack?" said Dick Turpin. "How comes it you are here? I began to think we should never meet again!"

"Ah! captain," was the reply, given in a faint voice—"I have found you at last! I can give you the information you want, and I am content!"

"Why, Jack, my friend, what ails you?—what ails you?—are you wounded?"

"I am—I am!"

Sixteen-String Jack spoke with difficulty, and then, for the first time, his comrades noticed that he was pressing his hand upon his breast.

"Badly wounded?" they all asked, anxiously.

"Yes—I fear so. And my horse is lame—dead lame."

"We must have your hurt attended to at once," said Turpin. "Where is it?—we must bind it up."

"No, no," said Jack, more faintly than before, "we must not stay—there is not time! I have baffled the police officers, it is true, but it will only be for a time. They will understand how I have tricked them, and then they will be after me at a tremendous rate. Hark!" he added—"I feel almost sure that I can hear them now!"

"No, no," said Turpin, "you are mistaken, and they are not coming. Your wound must be attended to."

"Alight—alight!" said Jack. "Put your ear to the ground and listen! I am certain I can hear the sound of police officers approaching!"

CHAPTER DCCXXXVIII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS FOLLOW SIXTEEN-STRING JACK BY MEANS OF THE TRAIL OF BLOOD ON THE ROADWAY.

WITHOUT another word, Tom King slipped off the back of his steed, and laid himself down at full length on the roadway.

He pressed his ear closely against the ground, and as he did so he was able to detect a faint, far-off, jarring sound.

Sixteen-String Jack steadied himself in the saddle with difficulty, and continued to listen also.

"You are right, Jack," said Tom King, leaping to his feet; "the officers are coming, but they are a long way off yet."

"But what is to be done?" asked Sixteen-String Jack, in a lower tone of voice than before. "My horse is so lame, and I am so frightfully weak, that——"

"It's quite impossible for you to proceed any further," said Dick Turpin. "Listen for a few moments. By what means have you thrown the officers off the scent?"

Jack smiled.

"An old plan," he said. "I managed to get a good distance ahead, and then I saw a horse in a field. I entered it by the gate, caught the strange horse, and, leading him into the roadway, gave him some smart cuts with a stick, and away he went at wonderful speed."

"And the officers rode by, I suppose, and, hearing the sound of a horse's hoofs in the distance, made sure you were still flying before them?"

"Just so; and I quietly rode out into the highway again, and turned my back towards them. Then all at once I discovered that my horse had fallen dead lame."

"But how came you to be wounded, Jack?"

"That was done some time before. But if I may giving you these explanations we shall be too late to do anything when the officers arrive."

"It's all right," said Dick Turpin. "Alight all of you, and follow me. We will take refuge where we were in safety a little while back, and where, I have no doubt, we shall remain undisturbed."

Dick Turpin of course alluded to the little door in the garden wall.

Towards this he bent his steps, Sixteen-String Jack wondering very much where he was going.

"We have already had some adventures here," said Turpin, "and they shall be related to you when there is an opportunity. Come on! Believe me, you are in safety."

This was welcome news indeed for Sixteen-String Jack, who had already lost an immense quantity of blood.

It was only by the strongest effort of his mind that he could prevent himself from falling into a state of insensibility.

As soon as the little party had once more placed themselves on the other side of the wall, Tom King closed the door, and pushed the bolt into its socket.

"We will go no further than this," said Dick. "The officers, I am sure, will never dream that we have taken refuge in this place. They will ride past and then we shall be quite secure."

"All right," said Tom; "and if you have no objection I will climb up this tree, as I did before, and peep over the top of the wall, and see what is going on outside."

"Do so; but pray be careful!"

"They shall not see me, depend upon it. I am not the least alarmed about that."

Again Tom King climbed up the tree, and having seated himself as comfortably as the nature of the place would permit, he rested his arms on the top of the wall and looked down.

The trees that were growing behind him would, he was quite certain, form such a dark background that it would be impossible to detect his figure.

Before he had occupied this position long, the sounds of approaching horses became more and more unequivocal.

Then, after a short time, he saw about half a dozen mounted police officers appear in sight.

They were proceeding at an irregular speed, and as though rather undecided what to do.

"Come on," said one, "he must be before us—there can be no doubt about that!"

They passed by in a straggling fashion.

Tom counted, and found they numbered six altogether.

"Have they gone by, Tom?" asked Dick, in a suppressed voice

"Yes—but do not speak at present. They hardly seem to know what to do. Keep still for awhile. I will watch their movements, and let you know the result."

This caution turned out to be a very good and necessary one.

The police officers paused abruptly before they had gone many yards further.

"I firmly believe he has doubled upon us," said one. "I can hear nothing of him in advance."

"Let us turn back," said another voice. "I am inclined to think, with you, that we have overshot the mark."

Accordingly the officers turned their horses' heads round, and rode back some distance the way they came.

Then they paused again.

Tom King bent over the wall in a somewhat dangerous manner, being anxious to make out what the officers were doing.

But as the road curved round slightly, he was unable to do this.

They had halted, and that was all he knew. He could neither see them nor hear their voices.

"Keep still!" he said to his companions. "By no means make a sound or movement. I am sadly afraid if the officers go on looking about they will discover our hiding-place."

"I hope not," said Sixteen-String Jack, faintly—"I hope not, for my strength is almost gone."

"You will be better soon," said Dick, who, as well as he was able, had bound up his comrade's wound. "The feeling of sickness and faintness that you now experience will pass away."

"Hush," said Tom King, again—"hush!—be silent!"

All were still immediately, and the highwayman resumed his watch.

The officers were most certainly in motion, only very slowly

However, soon afterwards they came in sight, and then Tom King perceived that some of them had dismounted from their steeds, and were leading them by the bridle.

One had a dark lantern in his hand, the light of which he directed upon the ground.

He was evidently searching in every direction for something, but what, Tom King could not, for the life of him, make out.

Suddenly, however, a shout reached his ears, and then a loud, exultant voice cried:

"I told you so! I knew he was wounded! Look—here is the proof!"

He allowed the beam of light that streamed through the lens of the dark lantern to rest upon one particular spot.

"Yes—that is blood, sure enough," said another voice.

"Then," added the first speaker, "it will be easy enough for us to follow him by such a trail as this. Hurrah! We have him now, beyond a doubt! He must bleed himself to death in a short time. Look here, and here."

The officers pushed forward, the one with the lantern leading the way

He continued to flash it about in various directions, and every time he saw a small spot of blood lying on the hard roadway.

Beyond a doubt it had flowed from Sixteen-String Jack's wound, and beyond a doubt it would enable his foes to follow him to his hiding-place.

"Look here," said the officer with the lantern—"look here He must have paused for some time on this spot, for, look, the blood is here in quite a pool, and these are the prints of other horses' hoofs as well. Depend upon it, he must have joined some of his companions about this spot."

Tom King did not wait to hear any more, but slipped down out of the tree.

"It's all up!" he said. "The officers have discovered that Sixteen-String Jack has left a trail of blood behind him. They are following it up step by step. They have also found, by marks upon the road, that we have joined him close at hand. Of course they will be able to follow us to this gate."

Tom King was interrupted by the sound of hasty footsteps, and then some heavy blows were struck upon the little wooden door in the wall.

CHAPTER DCCXXXIX.

THE HIGHWAYMEN TAKE REFUGE FROM THE POLICE OFFICERS IN THE MANSION.

MAUD clung tightly to Dick Turpin's arm in excess of terror.

She had to bite her lips to prevent herself from giving utterance to a shriek.

Surely now there would be no escaping—they would all fall into the hands of their enemies.

The intelligence came upon all with a suddenness that was very startling.

It was followed up so quickly by the knocking at the door that there was no time to recover from the shock.

Turpin, however, preserving his calmness by a great effort, said:

"Back—back, my friends! Follow me! It's our only chance!"

He turned round abruptly as he spoke, half carrying, half leading Maud with him.

The others had no resource but to obey.

Had Sixteen-String Jack been alone, he could never have followed.

Tom King and Claude were obliged to place themselves on either side of him, and thus assist his steps.

"Quick," said Turpin—"be quick! Everything depends now upon a little speed! Be quick!"

"But where are you going?" asked Maud, anxiously. "What is it you think of doing? How shall we escape?"

"That I know no more at present than yourself; but I am flying to the only place of refuge I can think of."

"And what is that?"

"That large house yonder, where we lately had so terrible an adventure."

"But is it not inhabited?"

"No doubt it is ordinarily, but to-night I believe it is not."

These words were spoken while Dick was continuing to hurry across the lawn in the direction of the house we have already described.

At the best it was but a poor and indifferent place of shelter from the police officers.

But still it was the only place that offered any chance at all.

A loud crash came at this moment upon their ears

The officers having knocked for a time upon the door, and meeting with no response, had burst it open.

But by the time they entered the grounds, Dick Turpin paused at the window through which they had stood looking a short time back.

"No doubt the house is secured," he said, in a hurried voice, to his companions, "but I know I can gain admittance by the window above. I will hasten down to the front door and open it, and you must be there in readiness to enter, so that I can close it again immediately."

Without waiting for his comrades to reply, Dick Turpin mounted upon the balcony, and entered the room with an agility that was produced by the imminence of his danger.

He dashed hastily across the room in which the two dead bodies lay and which was now plunged in profound darkness.

By accident more than anything else, he found the door, dashed it open, and then descended the long flight of steps that led into the entrance-hall.

Here he could see dimly about him, for over the door there was a window or fanlight.

He undid the fastenings rapidly.

Luckily, they consisted only of a chain and a lock.

The door was opened almost as soon as his companions had arrived at it.

They entered quickly, and then Dick Turpin exclaimed:

"You, Jack, cannot aid us, and so remain here for a few minutes with Maud. Claude and Tom, you will assist me to barricade all the doors and windows on the lower floor. If needs be, we will stand a siege in this place."

The front door was rapidly secured, and in a much better manner than it had been before.

Its panels were composed of stout oak, and Dick nodded his head complacently as he made the reflection that the officers would find it difficult indeed to force a passage in that direction.

They had with them the means of procuring a light, and in a few seconds each was provided with a small piece of wax taper, which, while it enabled them to see what they were about, would give out no great amount of illumination.

They were pleased to find that all the doors and windows that they came to were well secured; and although the mansion was of considerable size, it did not take them very long to make a complete circuit of it.

"Now, then, let us go back to the entrance-hall," said Dick Turpin, "and rejoin Jack. We will then ascend to the first floor; from some of the windows we shall be able to see what our enemies are about."

"And our horses?" said Tom King—"what about them?"

"To tell the truth, I had forgotten them," was Turpin's answer, "the intelligence came upon us so suddenly. I don't think there is any occasion for alarm, however, for they are well hidden among the trees, and unless the officers search in that particular direction they will not be found. Let us hope they will not, for if they are, our position will be terrible indeed."

The front door was now reached, and Maud sprang forward and clung to Turpin.

"The officers are outside!" she said, in an agitated voice—"I have heard them!"

"What are they doing?"

"That I cannot tell; but they seem to be holding some kind of consultation with each other."

"Well, we will soon see about that. Come, follow me, all of you, up the staircase. Be careful to conceal your lights."

This was done, and with rapid steps they all ascended the staircase.

They judged it to be expedient to conceal their lights in the most effective manner, so they extinguished them, for fear the faint beams should attract the attention of their enemies, and make them acquainted with their whereabouts.

Dick Turpin then led the way into one of the front rooms.

"Be cautious," he said—"pray be cautious while I am reconnoitring! Get all your arms and ammunition in readiness! Depend upon it we shall have to fight for our lives and liberties!"

Dick Turpin went to the window and looked out.

He could see nothing at all of the police officers, and wondered greatly at their silence.

He naturally expected that they would have made a demonstration long before this.

Their silence did not tend in any way to reassure him, for he concluded that the meaning of it was that they were arranging some skilful plan by which they could effect their purpose.

Just as he made this reflection, the loud reverberation of a heavy knock upon the front door reached their ears.

"Ah!" said Dick, "they are there. I could see nothing of them from the window."

By common consent all went to the head of the stairs, from which a view of the front door could be obtained.

"Have you any idea of their numbers," asked Dick.

"Yes," replied Tom King. "I counted them—there are six."

"Only six?"

"That is all, I believe."

"Then if it's so the odds are not so very unequal after all. There are four of us. Jack is wounded certainly, but still, in the event of a conflict, he would be of considerable service."

"And I am much better," was Jack's reply—"much better."

"I knew you would be as soon as the wound was staunched."

Bang! came another knock upon the door.

"Let them go on," said Turpin—"that will do us no harm."

"And cannot I be of service too?" asked Maud, faintly—"can I do nothing to assist you? Am I only to be an encumbrance?"

"No; on the contrary, you may be of great use. Hold yourself in perfect readiness, so that if I give you any directions you will be able to carry them out immediately."

Bang! came the knock again, and then followed the usual summons to open in the name of the King.

"I have a good mind to try a daring scheme," said Dick—"it may be of service, and certainly it can do us no harm. Yes, I will try it."

"What may it be?"

"To induce the officers to depart, leaving us here in security."

"If you can do that, captain, you are a cleverer man than I took you to be," said Tom King, with a smile.

"We shall see," said Dick. "I have no great hopes, but yet it shall be tried."

CHAPTER DCCXL.

THE POLICE OFFICERS MAKE A RESOLUTE ATTACK UPON THE MANSION IN WHICH THE HIGHWAYMEN ARE HIDDEN.

With these words, Dick Turpin entered the front room again, and quietly opened the window.

Few men were better gifted with the power of changing the intonation of the voice than he was.

Stepping out upon the balcony, he looked down, and a thick, pompous voice, exclaimed:

"Hullo, there—what is it? Is it fire, or thieves, what?"

The police officers hearing this voice, looked up.

All they could perceive was a dusky, indistinct-looking form.

They jumped at once to the conclusion that it was the owner of the mansion addressing them.

"Beg pardon, sir," said one, raising his hand to his hat, "but we have certain knowledge that some desperate highwaymen have sought refuge in this place."

"What, in this house?" said Dick, with well-feigned astonishment.

"Yes, we have traced them nearly all the way."

"Pooh—nonsense—it's absurd! It cannot be. I fastened all the doors myself before I retired to rest, and I know it is impossible for anyone to have entered without creating an alarm."

"We think you are mistaken, sir; and at any rate, as we are his Majesty's officers of police, you will allow us to enter and satisfy ourselves that the highwaymen are not here. If they are secreted in your house it will be no pleasant thing for you."

"I am not at all afraid about that," was Dick's reply. "If you want to know whether they are here, keep a good watch outside the house till morning, and then you can come in and search with pleasure; but I am not going to get up in the middle of the night to oblige you or anyone else."

"Fire—fire!" said a suppressed voice. "May I be d—d if that is not Dick Turpin! I will swear to him! Fire—fire!"

The officer had not a pistol ready, or he would certainly have discharged it.

Dick heard the words, and made a precipitate retreat.

"That is no good," he said to his companions. "I almost thought I should have succeeded once, but it all over now. We must look to ourselves. There will be an attack in a few moments."

A succession of heavy blows were at this moment rained upon the front door.

"Open—open!" cried a chorus of voices—"open in the name of the King, or we shall force a passage!"

Of course not the least notice was taken of this summons, and after waiting for a little while their blows upon the door were redoubled.

It was evident that, let the door be as strong as it might, it would not long be proof against such a violent attack as was now made upon it.

"Have you any idea what we can do for the best?" asked Tom King, anxiously.

"I have been thinking," said Dick. "It seems to me that this is a life-to-life matter; if we do not slay the officers they will slay us."

"You may depend upon that."

"Well, then, their numbers are somewhere near our own, and if we are only tolerably successful the odds will soon be lessened."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, I think our only chance of escape is to make a kind of running fight through the mansion. Let us contest step by step every inch of the way. If in doing this we can reduce the numbers of the officers by one-half, why, we can rush out upon the remainder, and, by a personal struggle, put an end to the attack."

In this there seemed to be some show of reason.

The plan, however, was not without a very great deal of risk, but no one could think of a better scheme or one more likely to succeed.

It was most fortunate indeed for them that the officers were not present in more overpowering numbers.

Had their force been only strong enough to surround the mansion at all points, so as to make it an impossibility for any of them to leave, and if there had then remained a sufficient quantity to make an attack upon two or three different points at once, the highwaymen must have been either slain or captured.

This, however, was not the case—there were only six officers, and as their foes were four in number, it was necessary that they should all keep close together for their joint protection, and therefore confine their attack to one point alone.

The stout oaken door now began to creak and shake before the shower of blows that were dealt upon it.

"They will be in directly," said Claude Duval. "What can we do to prevent them making a sudden rush at first?"

"That is a good thought, Claude," said Turpin; "it ought to have occurred to us before; but if we are speedy there will yet be time! Drag out all the heavy furniture you can find, and let us make a barricade upon the staircase; then, if the officers attempt to climb over it, they will be entirely at our mercy."

This was indeed a good thought.

With great rapidity, a large number of heavy articles of furniture were dragged from the contiguous rooms, and piled up and wedged together on the staircase.

The landing itself furnished some materials for this purpose, for it was adorned with numerous statues, pillars, and stone vases.

All these articles were collected together into one heterogeneous mass and piled upon the staircase.

So tightly were they all wedged together that it would be a matter of the utmost difficulty either to remove or surmount them.

This much having been done, the highwaymen were more inclined to wait for the result with patience.

"Bear in mind this much," said Dick Turpin: "We will not be the aggressors; do not fire any of you, on any account, until the officers have fired upon us first."

Claude Duval murmured a little at this, but he gave way before the wishes of his captain.

Just then the door began to lose its perpendicularity.

The violence of the blows was redoubled, and then the stout piece of oak that had so well resisted the attack made upon it fell with a tremendous crash upon the stone flooring of the hall.

The officers made their appearance in a moment on the scene.

They rushed forward over the fallen door, and then, after going a few paces across the hall, they stopped.

The darkness around them was most intense; but by common consent they all raised their lanterns, which were already lighted, and having withdrawn the dark slides from before the lenses, flashed the light about in all directions.

They caught sight of the staircase, and they saw the barricade erected at the top.

More than this, however, they could not see, for the highwaymen took care to keep out of sight.

"Surrender," cried some one in a loud voice—"surrender in the name of his Majesty the King! If you do so you will not be injured, but if you refuse the consequences will be on your own heads!"

A profound and remarkable stillness followed these words.

"Forward, my lads," said the chief officer—"forward! Up the staircase, scramble over that heap of furniture, and then you have them!"

He was a bold man was that officer, as his actions showed, for instead of keeping behind and directing his men as many leaders do, he sprang forward himself, setting an example which the remainder of his troop immediately followed.

No notice whatever was taken of their ascent, and they began slowly to climb up over the barricade.

The chief officer was the first.

Peeping over the top, he saw, crouching down at no great distance, the dusky figures of the highwaymen.

"Surrender," he cried, boldly—"surrender!"

There was no answer.

"Take that!" he cried, and as he spoke he levelled a pistol and discharged it.

The report in that silent mansion was something prodigious.

Claude Duval was only waiting for this shot.

If he had had his own way he would have fired long before.

His pistol was ready in his grasp, and, taking as good an aim at the chief police officer as he could, he pulled the trigger.

There was another report that mingled with the echoes of the first, and then, with a wild shriek of agony, the police officer fell headlong backwards down the staircase into the hall below.

CHAPTER DCCXLI.

THE HIGHWAYMEN DEFEND THEMSELVES WITH TOLERABLE SUCCESS.

This caused a complete lull to take place in the attack.

The officers crowded round their fallen leader, and seemed quite in doubt what to do.

Could but our friends have made certain of quitting the mansion unperceived by their foes, and regaining possession of their horses, they would unquestionably have done so, and sought safety in rapid flight.

But this was too dangerous to be thought of.

They were much safer intrenched as they were then.

Should they reach the gardens and the officers discover they had left the mansion, the conflict would take place upon the level ground, and that, if it did not result in the total defeat of the highwaymen, would prove most disastrous to them.

Clearly, there was nothing for them to do but to wait.

They were at present unhurt, and they had reduced the number of their enemies by one.

The chief officer was only wounded, and not killed.

His spirit was indomitable, and, despite his fearful fall down the staircase, he raised himself on one arm, and, pressing his hand upon his wound, said, faintly,

"Forward again, altogether! Storm the barricade, and then you have them sure enough! One bold push, and you will be successful!"

Yet, in the meanwhile, the highwaymen had not been idle.

Dick foresaw that this barricade would inevitably be surmounted.

Therefore it was absolutely necessary that another should be erected.

This could be easily enough done on the upper flight of stairs.

And so, while he remained with Tom King to keep watch near the first barricade, the remainder of the party was sent up the other staircase, with instructions to construct another barricade similar to the first.

In spite of the command of their leader, the police officers rather shrank back from obedience.

But he called out to them again.

"The reward will more than pay you for your trouble," he said. "And think of the credit you will gain as well! You will every one have a promotion. Down with them, I say—down with them!"

With pistols ready in their grasp, the officers, forming themselves into a compact mass steadily commenced ascending the staircase.

But all naturally shrank from exposing any portion of their bodies above the top of the barricade.

"Altogether," they whispered—"altogether! A bold rush will surely do it!"

They made the attempt to climb all at once.

Dick Turpin had a pistol in each hand, and so had Tom King.

As soon as the foremost officers came in sight, all four weapons were discharged.

Then, without waiting to see what was the result, they turned round, and ran hastily up the second flight of stairs.

They found, to their satisfaction, that the second barricade was much stronger than the first

Some very heavy chests of drawers had been dragged out, and wedged into the staircase.

Not without much difficulty, the two highwaymen rejoined their companions.

Their last volley had not been so effective as the first.

Not one of the officers had been killed, though two had been rather severely wounded, and one slightly.

The officers paused again, evidently not relishing the idea of renewing the attack.

But the voice of their wounded leader urged them on.

They scrambled over the first barricade, and then, forming themselves into a compact body as before, ascended the next flight.

There was a large oaken chest upon the landing that had not been used to form the barricade, simply because they were not strong enough to make use of it.

But Dick saw directly how it might be turned to excellent use.

"Now," he cried, "all help me—every one! The least increase of strength will be most welcome!"

He seized hold of the chest as he spoke, and those who were with him—Sixteen-String Jack and Maud included—assisted him to raise it.

With much trouble, they got it up on top of the other articles that formed the barricade.

Then they continued to push it steadily until, by a united effort, they pushed it completely over the barricade.

It fell with a crash down the stairs, and lodged itself firmly in an angle.

"Hurrah!" said Dick. "We're safe now, beyond all doubt! It will be hard indeed for them to succeed any higher! Fire a volley, so as to make them think we are waiting here, and then follow me with all speed!"

This command was obeyed, and the officers again said back.

"Quick—quick!" said Turpin. "This way—this way!"

He dashed into one of the rooms as he spoke, and flung open the window.

Looking down, he saw, about ten or twelve feet below, the balcony which surrounded the mansion.

"Now," he said, "we must pass through this window and drop down. When once upon the balcony, it will be easy enough to reach the ground. Then we must rush forward and secure our horses."

"But there's Sixteen-String Jack," said Claude. "Do you think he could accomplish such a feat?"

"It's our only chance," said Turpin, "and every second is of the utmost value."

"With a little of your assistance I can do it," said Jack. "I see now what the captain means. We should never have a better chance of making our escape."

"Decidedly not!" said Turpin, and as he spoke he lowered Maud through the window.

First he grasped her firmly by the wrists and leant down for a considerable distance, then he released her, and, as she had only a trifling distance to fall, she reached the balcony unhurt.

The others quickly followed her example.

The descent from the balcony to the ground was accomplished in the same manner.

Dick Turpin drew a long breath of relief.

"We are all right now, I firmly believe," he said—"that is, if no untoward accident occurs. On—on!—don't pause for any consideration!"

They dashed across the garden towards the spot where they had left their horses while Turpin spoke.

But they were not fated to get clear of their enemies quite so easily.

The police officers, when they saw the manner in which the oak chest was wedged into the staircase, at once abandoned all hope of proceeding further in that direction.

In their efforts to dislodge this cumbrous piece of furniture, they could be picked off easily one by one by the highwaymen.

They had already suffered very severely, and therefore, with a crestfallen air, they descended the stairs, in order to make some inquiries of their leader.

He was furious at the want of success that had attended all their efforts.

"Curse them!" he said. "But we will have them yet! Get out into the grounds all of you, and take up your positions so that every portion of the building shall be watched. If you see anyone attempt to leave it, or if you see anyone appear at the windows, fire. In the meanwhile, if you will bandage my wound with this scarf, I will ride off to London for reinforcements. They are in the house undoubtedly, and all you have got to do is to keep them there."

Having adopted this course, it was fortunate indeed that our friends should have left the mansion just when they did—if they had lingered, they would have found it difficult, if not impossible.

This plan suited the police officers much better than making another attack, and so they willingly enough sallied forth into the garden.

As they did so, they caught sight of the retreating forms of the highwaymen.

"There they are!" shrieked the chief officer—"there they are! By some means, while we have been consulting, they have left the house! Quick—quick! If we can gain our horses first, we have them safe enough!"

Dick Turpin heard the voice and heard the trampling of feet behind him.

So far, however, from feeling any despair on this account, he bounded forward at redoubled speed, for he knew that Black Bess was close at hand, and that, if he could once seat himself upon her back, he could bid defiance to the whole troop.

CHAPTER DCCXLII.

DICK TURPIN, TOM KING, AND CLAUDE DUVAL DECIDE UPON AN EXPEDITION.

It was, indeed, nothing more than a matter of time.

If the highwaymen could succeed in reaching their horses and leading them out into the high-road before the police officers could intercept them, all would be well.

There was every probability that they would succeed in doing this.

They had got the start, and already they had obtained some slight knowledge of the intricacies of the grounds, therefore they made their way to the door in the garden-wall with the utmost precision.

The police officers, however, strained every nerve to overtake them.

They were well aware that their only chance of capturing them was while the highwaymen were on foot.

In another moment the horses were reached, and Dick Turpin said, hurriedly

"Black Bess will carry double easily, as she has done many a time before. Do you think, Jack, that if you take Maud's horse you will be strong enough to ride?"

"Yes—yes! Do not feel apprehensive on that account!"

This point was soon decided, and with all speed the horses were led out into the road.

Our friends had many a time owed their lives to the rapidity with which they were able to seat themselves in the saddle, and surely never before were they so rapid in their movements as on this occasion.

Dick easily placed Maud on the saddle before him, and, crying out "Forward!" he led the way at a rattling pace.

The police officers gained the door just as they started, and a loud shout of disappointment came from their lips.

They raised their pistols, and fired a simultaneous volley.

But the highwaymen were in too rapid motion for any of the shots to be effective.

"On—on!" cried Dick. "Keep as close behind me as you can! Which way shall we bend our footsteps?"

This question was addressed to Sixteen-String Jack.

"We have a long way to go," he said, "and morning is close at hand. You will find Tom Davis near Ealing Common. Make your way in that direction, and then I will show you further."

This was all that Turpin required, and with great confidence he now led the way across the country, feeling sure that, after the start they had obtained, they should be able easily to outrun their enemies, and so find shelter with their old friends.

It will be remembered that Sixteen-String Jack was the only one who had seen this public-house, and therefore all the rest were exceedingly anxious to pay a visit to it, as they knew in the future it would many a time afford them a safe asylum from their foes.

Indeed, this was the use they were putting it to upon this occasion.

In spite of their speed, the morning broke long before they were anywhere near to their destination.

But Sixteen-String Jack urged them to proceed, assuring them of the extreme seclusion of the spot, and the unlikelihood of their seeing anyone.

Of the police officers they heard nothing, so it was evident they had given up the chase as a bad job.

One principal reason for their doing so was in consequence of their numbers being so much reduced.

Sixteen-String Jack did not say so, but he was extremely anxious to reach the public-house.

He felt himself at the point of swooning from loss of blood, and the violence of the exercise of riding at such a rate was almost too much for him.

But he sat in the saddle bravely, anxiously, and hopefully looking forward to the termination of their journey.

At length, just about sunrise, the edge of Ealing Common was reached.

There was now sufficient light to enable them to see for a considerable distance, though here and there the trees and meadows were enveloped in a white mist that would probably vanish as soon as the sun rose a little higher.

Nothing animate could be seen in advance, and, before going any further, they looked scrutinisingly behind them.

But though they shaded their eyes with their hands in order to cut off the rays of the sun, and carefully examined the whole face of the country, they saw nothing whatever of their foes.

"There is no need for such great speed now," said Sixteen-String Jack, faintly. "Let me lead the way, and I will show you where the inn is."

"Is it far from here?"

"No; when we have once crossed the common, the distance is trifling."

Taking the route we have already described, Sixteen-String Jack led his companions to the lonely inn.

Long before they could see the house, they perceived Tom Davis standing in the roadway.

No sooner did he catch sight of them than he ran hastily towards them.

"Is anything amiss?" asked Turpin, anxiously.

"No—all's well! I was only glad to see you, that's all! But, excuse me for saying it, captain, you must contrive to make your appearance here before daylight; otherwise, the risk of discovery will be very great."

"We will do so if possible."

In another moment the whole party halted in front of the inn.

A feeling of the greatest security came over all of them at the selfsame moment.

Whether that feeling of security was real or illusory time alone can show.

It often happens, however, that when we believe ourselves in the greatest safety, danger is close at hand.

With all convenient speed the horses were taken round to the stable and attended to, while Sixteen-String Jack, scarcely able to stand, was led into the inn by two of his comrades.

Here his wound was carefully dressed and attended to.

To the great satisfaction of all, it was found that it was not of a fatal or alarming character.

He suffered principally from loss of blood, and this a little rest would quickly enable him to recover from.

It was a tender and loving greeting between Maud and Ellen.

It will be remembered that they had met before.

The circumstances were so peculiar that they looked upon each other as old acquaintances.

There was much to be talked of and much to be seen that occupied the attention of our friends for a long time.

But with nearly all of it the reader is already acquainted, and therefore it is unnecessary to repeat it.

With the situation of the house all expressed themselves abundantly satisfied.

Dick believed that he had at last found a place where he could leave Maud in safety, and to which he could always fly in the hour of danger.

And in this manner, without the occurrence of a single incident of any striking character, upwards of a week passed away.

At first they had one and all enjoyed to the utmost the calmness and seclusion of the place.

But the feeling soon wore off, and they once again longed for the excitement of an adventure on the highway.

When we say all, we do not even exclude Sixteen-String Jack, though as yet he was not sufficiently recovered to be able to leave the house.

At rare intervals people called at the Three Spiders for refreshment, and whenever they did so, as a matter of course, our friends kept carefully out of sight.

This they were able to do without difficulty, for it was a large rambling building, containing many rooms.

But one evening, when sunset was approaching, and when every topic of conversation had been exhausted, Dick Turpin took out his weapons and began carefully to clean and load them.

Silently Claude Duval and Tom King followed his example.

"Are you preparing for an expedition, captain?" they asked, at length, as he stowed the pistols away.

"I am longing for a stirring adventure!" was the reply. —"something that will cause the blood to circulate more rapidly in my veins than it does at present."

"And so are we."

"But I thought of starting out alone—of having an adventure entirely to myself."

"And so did we. What's to prevent us from doing as we have done on more than one previous occasion? You could take one road, I another, and Claude another."

"I see no objection to it," replied Turpin after a pause.

"I need not caution you, and tell you to be careful, nor need I say that you ought, unhesitatingly, to engage yourselves in any adventure that you come across when you believe by so doing you will befriend the helpless and the innocent."

CHAPTER DCCXLIII.

DICK TURPIN SETS OUT UPON HIS EXPEDITION

A TEAR rose into Maud's eye when she heard of Dick's determination.

But although she looked reproachfully at him, she said not a single word to endeavour to turn him from his purpose.

Perhaps she was aware that it was altogether useless to make any such attempt, but she implored him, for her sake, to be extremely careful, and not to heedlessly run into any danger.

This he readily promised, and as soon as darkness set in he repaired to the stable and saddled Black Bess himself.

He found his two comrades, Tom King and Claude Duval, engaged in a similar manner.

"Don't start at present," said Dick. "I will go first, and allow some interval to take place before either of you leave. The caution may be superfluous, but yet think how important it is that the secret of this place should be kept."

"You shall be obeyed, captain, though we are exceedingly anxious to be off."

"I know you are, but you must curb your impatience for a short time."

"It will be a rough night, I rather think," said Claude, as he strolled to the stable door and looked up at the sky —"the clouds look heavy and black."

"They do; but the night is just such a one as will suit our purpose precisely, provided it only keeps fine."

"Oh, yes—it is not at all agreeable to have a ducking, and yet, if I am any judge of the weather, I think that more than likely. However, such a consideration will not induce me to hold back."

"Nor me either."

After such a long rest Black Bess was, as might be expected, full of fire and mettle.

Not only had she been well housed and well fed, but she had had Dick Turpin to look carefully after her, and to see that all her wants were supplied.

His eyes sparkled with pride and pleasure as he looked upon the noble creature as she stood pawing the ground and tossing her head restlessly up and down to show her impatience to start off.

"I shall fear no officers to-night," he said, as he patted the bonny mare upon her neck. "After such a rest as this, I could challenge the swiftest horse in England with the certainty of being the victor!"

He vaulted into the saddle as he spoke.

"Be careful, my comrades," he said, turning round and speaking to them, "and above all things, manage to get here before daybreak. If the officers are at your heels, on no account gallop in this direction, or they may be clever enough to scent us out."

Dick Turpin trotted Black Bess round to the front of the inn.

He had great difficulty in keeping her at all within bounds, and none but an accomplished rider could have retained a seat in the saddle while she was giving these capricious movements and bounds.

He paused a moment in front of the inn to say farewell to Maud, who was standing just outside the porch, with Tom Davis by her side.

"We shall have a rough and disagreeable night, captain!" he exclaimed. "If I were in your place I should put off the expedition."

Dick shook his head and laughed.

"A little squally weather or a few drops of rain will never keep me back," he said. "Farewell! Depend upon it I shall return here some time before daybreak!"

And again uttering the word "Farewell," he allowed Black Bess to bound rapidly forward along the road.

It had been a long, long time since Dick felt so light-hearted and so full of vigour as he did that night.

He was ready to engage in any adventure, however perilous, and having crossed the common, he looked anxiously about him on all sides, in the hope of making some discovery.

"I am too impatient," he at length muttered "it would be unwise in the extreme to do anything in this quarter. No, no—we must not give the officers room to suspect that we are in this quarter at all! Now, Bess, for a gallop!"

It really seemed as though the animal comprehended the words that were addressed to her, for, uttering a low snorting sound that seemed expressive of pride and delight, she flew onwards with the speed of a racehorse.

Going at such a rate as that, it took them over a large space of country in a very little time; and at length, having gained the broad high-road, Dick Turpin gradually drew rein, and reduced her pace to a walk.

During his ride he had more than once fancied he felt a few drops of rain upon his face.

Now that he paused he was convinced that he was not mistaken, for there came a sudden gust that made a curious sound among the tree-tops, and that bore upon it a small quantity of rain.

The cold drops dashed heavily upon and around him, and then all was still again.

But the sky looked more and more threatening.

The clouds were of a darker hue, and there was that peculiar feel in the atmosphere that generally precedes the outbreak of a violent storm.

"I am afraid there's little luck to be met with to-night," was the highwayman's reflection, and while he made it, he leaned forward in the saddle and listened intently.

Although the silence was most intense, yet he was unable to hear anything.

At the same gentle rate he trotted onwards, going further and further towards the open country.

But ere he had proceeded far, the storm that had been threatening so long burst forth with a suddenness and violence that was quite startling.

The first intimation was a loud, tremendous clap of thunder.

Then came a flash of lightning, and another peal much heavier than its predecessor.

So vivid was this lightning's flash, that all objects around were completely lighted up by it.

Its effect upon the eyes was almost blinding, yet Dick Turpin saw, or fancied he saw, some figures in the roadway at no great distance off.

Whether this was so or not, he did not take any further steps to discover.

The rain descended in such torrents that he was speedily drenched to the skin.

Nothing could be more unpleasant than to remain exposed to the pelting of such a shower as that, and therefore Dick's next thought was to find a shelter.

On his left hand was a large wood, resembling, indeed, in many respects, a large forest.

The trees were of great size, and grew very closely to each other, while the ground was covered all over with a dense undergrowth.

A flash of lightning showed him what seemed to be a narrow footpath, leading from the road into this wood, and accordingly he hastened towards it.

The wide-spreading branches of the trees would, he felt certain, afford him an almost effectual protection against the descending rain.

Black Bess, too, showed signs of great alarm whenever the thunder rolled and the lightning lit up the scene, so for her sake, he was anxious to get some where in the dark.

Turning down this narrow footpath, he found before he had gone many paces that it was impossible to proceed any further on horseback.

He alighted quickly, and led Black Bess at once into the midst of the trees.

Here he no longer felt the rain, and by patting his steed upon the neck and stroking her head, he managed to calm her apprehension in a very considerable degree.

The place where Dick Turpin had taken shelter was very close to the high-road he had just quitted, and between two peals of thunder he heard the sound of horses' feet upon the hard ground, thus convincing him that his fancy had not misled him, and that he had really seen some persons on the road before him.

CHAPTER DCCXLIV.

OF TURPIN IS A WITNESS TO SOME VERY SINGULAR AND INTERESTING PROCEEDINGS.

BETWEEN the peals of thunder that now grew more and more frequent, Dick Turpin continued to listen to the approach of these travellers.

He could detect the murmur of voices in conversation, and yet he could only hear the sound of one horse's feet.

He leaned forward as though he could pierce the dense obscurity.

But this was impossible.

The darkness seemed to grow more and more intense each moment.

Then a horse stopped, as Dick thought, at the very pathway down which he had turned.

Then again he heard the voices, and this time he was able to distinguish what was said.

"Be of good heart, dear Agnes," he heard some one say, in soothing accents—"be of good heart; for, believe me, all will yet be well. This storm is unfortunate, but don't—pray don't look upon it as an evil omen!"

"But I am terrified," replied a sweet girlish voice, "and this great forest only alarms me still more."

"Do not say that, dearest—have confidence and trust in me. You see, we are already beneath the shelter of the trees, and are no longer drenched by the rain. Lean upon me; do not fancy I am not strong enough to bear your weight. Courage—courage for a few moments longer!"

"But where are you leading me, Frederick? You seem as if you knew your way?"

"I do not; chance alone discovered to me the existence of this footpath. I have every hope that it will lead to a habitation of some kind, for by one of the flashes of lightning I saw some smoke rising up from between the trees—doubtless it proceeded from the chimney of a cottage."

"But you did not tell me that at the time."

"I know I did not, because you were so alarmed that I could do little else but endeavour to soothe your agitation. Let us take shelter in this hut if we find one, for however poor and humble it may be, it will protect us from the inclemency of the weather, and I am sure that you are too delicate to be exposed to it."

There was something in the tones in which these two people addressed each other that made Turpin aware that they were both young, and that they loved each other.

Immediately he felt a strong degree of interest in them, and he continued to bend still further forward, in order to obtain, if possible, a glimpse of their forms.

Chance favoured him, for when they were nearest to the spot where he was concealed the whole forest was lit up by a flash of lightning far more brilliant and long-lasting than any that had preceded it.

By the aid of this evanescent light Dick Turpin saw the form of a young man, who was neatly and plainly attired.

There were no evidences of wealth anywhere visible about his person, yet there was something exceedingly noble-looking and commanding in the expression of his face.

Clinging to him in order to support her steps, and encircled by her lover's arm, was a young girl, whose dress contrasted strongly with her companion's.

She was attired in the most expensive garments, and the lightning seemed to linger upon the many-jewelled ornaments upon her person.

Her form was graceful, and her countenance very beautiful.

But she trembled exceedingly with agitation.

Frederick—for so he had been called—was leading a horse by the bridle—a tall, powerful creature, that, beyond a doubt, had carried them both.

Why such a strangely-assorted pair—so far as worldly appearance went—should be journeying alone together on such a night was a matter involved in much doubt.

All this that we have been compelled to describe at some considerable length Dick Turpin saw during the second or so that the flash of lightning continued.

Then the darkness seemed doubly profound.

"Oh, what a dreadful flash!" Agnes exclaimed, in trembling accents—"it has almost blinded me!"

"I can scarcely see," was the response; "but our eyes will soon grow accustomed to the darkness again. Forward—forward, and keep up your courage! It will be a great relief to me when I know that you are safe beneath the shelter even of the humblest roof."

"But are you sure that it will be safe for us to remain here?"

"I think so," was the answer—"perhaps safer than if we continued our flight."

"You seem afraid of a pursuit!"

"If one is made, they will ride past this forest and miss us, for there could be nothing to make them aware we had sought shelter here."

"It may be so—I trust it is."

These were the last words that Turpin heard, for just then the thunder pealed out in deafening loudness, and when the muttering reverberations had died away the two speakers had got so far along the path that their voices were no longer audible.

His curiosity was most strongly excited by what he had heard.

He was about to follow stealthily in their steps, in the hope of hearing more, when he checked himself suddenly, for once more he heard the sound of horses' feet upon the road.

They were coming at a rapid pace, and all at once they checked themselves close to the end of the footpath.

The new-comers were two in number.

They were talking loudly, and in spite of the pattering of the rain upon the leaves of the trees, Dick Turpin could hear distinctly every word they uttered.

"My lord," said a harsh, disagreeable voice, "I tell you I feel convinced that I am right—this is the spot! Follow me along this footpath, and we shall secure them!"

"I think you must be mistaken, Jacob," was the reply. "I saw nothing; but, at any rate, I am not sorry. I am drenched through with this confounded rain, and the trees do serve to keep it off a little."

"But your lordship," persisted the man, "I tell you my eyes did not deceive me when we were near the summit of the hill when that terrific flash of lightning came. I happened to be looking steadily along the road, and although it only lasted for a second, yet I am sure I saw them both on foot entering the forest at this very spot."

"Well—well, it may be so. If it is, so much the better for me—so much the worse for him, Jacob!"

"Yes, my lord."

"Remember what I have told you. Give him no chance of his life, the villain—the scoundrel! He deserves to lose it!"

"But you will help me, my lord?"

"Why should I? Have I not promised you a good reward to rid me of him?"

"But his skill with every weapon is so great. I know he has practised incessantly. He seems aided by the devil, and I don't believe that any one single man could be a match for him."

"You are a coward, Jacob; but he must not live on that account! I will help you. I will tell you how he can be disposed of easily."

"How, my lord—how?"

"If, as you say, we shall find him here, I will first rush forward, sword in hand, and upbraid him for the baseness of his conduct. He will draw, and while we are exchanging the first blows you get behind him and run him through the back with your sword. If the blow is not mortal, I can deliver another at almost the same moment, and then we shall make sure."

"It's a good plan, my lord," replied Jacob—"a very good plan, and it does you great credit! I will assist you as you wish, but then what shall we do with the lady Agnes?"

The one who had been called my lord gnashed his teeth together with rage, and in a hoarse, angry voice he exclaimed:

"Leave her to me, Jacob—leave her to me! I shall require you to interfere with her in any way. Curses—curses!"

By this time the two speakers had reached that portion of the footpath opposite to the spot where Turpin was concealed.

[DICK TURPIN FOLLOWS LORD HERBERT AND JACOB THROUGH THE FOREST.]

Again the lightning flashed, and this time it revealed to him the form of a richly-dressed but dissipated-looking young man, who was gesticulating angrily, and another man who followed cringingly in his steps.

He looked the very personification of evil, and who, beyond a doubt, answered to the name of Jacob.

CHAPTER DCCXLV.

FREDERICK AND THE LADY AGNES MEET WITH AN UNEXPECTED FRIEND.

With rapid and yet cautious steps, the two men made their way along the narrow footpath in the forest along which the two fugitives—for such they evidently were—had lately passed.

The thunder pealed again, and this time the reverberations lasted much longer than they had yet done, and when, at length, something like comparative silence was produced, the two villains were out of earshot.

Not for a moment did Dick Turpin hesitate about the course he ought to pursue.

From the first he had been strongly interested in, and prepossessed by the young couple, and he also determined that they should neither come to any harm, provided it was in his power to prevent it.

Therefore, taking Black Bess by the bridle, he led her along the pathway.

The pattering of the heavy raindrops upon the leaves above produced such an incessant sound that he had little fear that his approach would be overheard by those who were going before.

Yet he was careful to preserve as much distance as he could between them consistently with keeping them in sight.

It was by no means a pleasant walk, for the trees that overhung the pathway had become by this time heavily laden with the rain, which now fell down in large, dashing drops.

The footpath continued its course in a very winding and circuitous manner.

But at length Dick Turpin paused, for he found himself in view of a small, rudely-built hut or cottage, probably the residence of some poor woodman.

He shrank back among the trees for fear that the next flash of lightning should reveal his presence, and while thus effectually concealed from observation he watched narrowly what the two men were about.

He saw them in the act of climbing over a low wooden palisading, by which a small portion of ground surrounding the cottage was fenced in from the rest.

Crouching down as though fearful of being perceived, they crossed the little garden, and presently paused at the little window of the building.

Through this there came a faint, subdued light.

While they were thus occupied, Turpin quickly hit upon his own course of action.

That Frederick and Agnes had sought shelter in that hut there could be little doubt.

There was no trace of their presence to be seen, however.

But the little conversation he had heard brought Dick irresistibly to this conclusion.

He released his hold upon the bridle of Black Bess, and placed the reins over her head.

Then he stroked her gently and fondly upon the neck for a second or two, and left her.

He made no attempt to secure her to any of the trees that were growing around, or to confine her in any way.

He was quite sure that she would remain somewhere about that spot until he returned, without he should utter that signal that she so well understood, when she would, without loss of time, and in spite of all obstacles, place herself by his side.

With great caution, he followed in the footsteps of the two men who had preceded him, Black Bess stretching out her head and watching him until the darkness hid him from her view.

Crouching down close to the ground, Dick stealthily advanced

Many shrubs and dwarf trees were growing in that half-cultivated garden, and behind these he was able effectually to conceal himself.

The two men had withdrawn from the window, and were conversing together in a low tone of voice—so low that although Dick strained his ears to the utmost, he could not detect a single word of their discourse.

From the energetic actions of the dissolute-looking young man, he came to the conclusion that he was endeavouring to persuade Jacob to do something from which, owing to some cause or other, he shrank back.

At length the point appeared to be settled, and the young nobleman—by name alone, and not by nature—advanced to the window of the cottage, and, cautiously placing his face close to the panes, looked in.

But just at that moment there came a flash of lightning so vivid, so brilliant, so intense, that for a brief space of time, during which a person might have counted rapidly four or five, every object seemed as though enveloped in a blue flame of a painful brightness.

The flash was followed almost instantaneously by the deep thunder; but before the crashing was heard overhead there came another cry, piercing and shrill but which was cut short by the louder rumblings.

It was a cry evidently of alarm, and evidently from a female's lips.

There could be but one explanation of the cause of it.

The young girl Agnes must have seen her enemy gazing in upon her.

Involuntarily Dick Turpin seized the hilt of his sword, and then silently drew the weapon from its sheath.

"D—nation!" roared his lordship, "we are discovered! Here, Jacob, follow me! Down with the door, I say! Follow me!"

Thus speaking, he rushed towards the cottage door.

But before he could gain it there was a hasty lumbering sound from within, as though some fastening—a heavy bar probably—had been placed across it

With full force, however, the two men dashed themselves against it, and so frail were the materials of which it was composed, that it gave way at once beneath the pressure.

As the door fell, the young man Frederick—with a long, slender sword in his hand, and with his arm encircling the waist of Agnes, was disclosed, standing in an attitude of calm defence.

"Villain!—dastard!" shrieked his lordship, "give back my sister, the Lady Agnes, or you perish on the spot! Villain, I say, surrender her to me!"

Agnes uttered a faint shriek when she heard her brother's voice, and then, almost insensible with terror, she clung to her lover's arm.

Frederick made no verbal reply to what had been said to him, but he shook his sword with a significant gesture.

"Since you will not deliver her fairly and honourably, I must wrest her from you!" cried his lordship. "Take that, villain! though I abase myself by thus consenting to cross blades with such a one as thou art!"

As the last word was pronounced the weapons clashed together.

Dick had heard what the man Jacob had said respecting the proficiency Frederick had gained in the use of his weapon, and therefore he did not feel much alarm on his account.

He turned his chief attention to Jacob's proceedings

Conformable with the plan that had been agreed upon, he came creeping up like some treacherous snake, watching the opportunity when he might step behind the valiant, bold-spirited young man, and, while he was engaged in the contest, give him a mortal stab in the back.

Dick judged it time to declare his presence and interfere.

He saw that Lady Agnes hung a terrible weight upon her lover's arm, and seriously hampered his movements, giving his adversary a great advantage.

"Hold!" he cried, as he stepped forward suddenly, his bright sword flashing in the semi-darkness—"hold! Let this be a fair fight—man to man—not two on to one! Mr Jacob, I will attend to you!"

As he spoke, he struck the worthy he had addressed a very sharp blow with the flat of his sword upon his knuckles.

With a yell of fright, Jacob dropped his sword and begged for mercy.

CHAPTER DCCXLVI.

A RIGHTEOUS RETRIBUTION OVERTAKES JACOB FOR HIS TREACHERY.

The sudden and unlooked-for appearance of the stranger made the young nobleman give a guilty start of alarm, for he fully and entirely believed that he was quite alone, and that there was no spy upon his actions.

Frederick might easily have availed himself of this confusion on the part of his adversary to give him a fatal thrust, but he scorned to take so unworthy an advantage, and kept quietly upon his guard.

But his heart beat high with hope, for the manner in which Dick had acted, and the few words he had spoken, convinced the young man, beyond all doubt, that the new-comer was a friend to him and not an enemy.

"Who you are I know not," said his lordship, foaming with rage, "but of this I am quite certain, you have no right to interfere in this conflict. Begone—leave us—it is nought to you!"

"Very likely," was the calm response. "I can assure you that nothing is further from my thoughts than to leave here, or to interfere with you, but I intend to remain where I now stand as a spectator of the duel, if such it is. I intend to look after Jacob, and see that he does not assist you in the manner you had arranged."

These words made the young nobleman furious, for it showed him that the stranger was aware of what had passed between himself and his dependant.

Jacob, hearing this, uttered another appeal for mercy, and abandoned his intention of seizing the sword he had dropped.

"Remain there!" said Dick, sternly, to him. "Move at your peril! If you so much as raise your finger I will cop it off!"

Perceiving the combatants still pause, Dick added:

"Let me take charge of the lady. I will pledge my life for her safety, then you will be on more equal terms with each other."

He stepped forward quickly as he spoke, and removed the senseless girl from her lover's arm.

"Now, then," he said, "do your best, and may the one who is right obtain the victory!"

"Lord Herbert," said Frederick, "you know that with me your life is most sacred. For your sister's sake," he said, pointing to Agnes, "I would not harm one single hair of your head. But beware how you tempt me too far, for when my blood is roused I know not what I may do in self-defence!"

"Fewer words, beggarly upstart!" was the instantaneous answer. "I want no consideration from you, nor will I consent to receive any. Put up your sword—depart, and I will molest you no further, provided that you, sir," he added, addressing Turpin, "surrender the Lady Agnes to my charge."

Dick shook his head.

"Not until you have proved yourself to have a better right than you have at present!"

"That's well," replied Frederick. "The lady Agnes is mine, and mine only, and she has made her free choice, and who shall prevent her doing so? Let me say, my lord, with every imaginable respect, that it will be better far for you to leave her with me."

"Never—never! I disgrace myself and all my house by deigning to speak a single word to you! Henceforth I will say nothing."

With these words, entirely blinded and carried away by an ungovernable access of rage, Lord Herbert precipitated himself upon his adversary, and for the next few minutes the conflict between them was of a terrible character.

Over and over again Dick saw how Frederick refused to avail himself of the openings that this passionate attack displayed.

He could scarcely understand the exercise of such unusual forbearance.

So intently was he watching the combatants that for a moment or two he forgot all about that dastardly wretch Jacob.

Suddenly turning his eyes towards him, however, he saw that he held something in his hand that he was moving about in an undecided manner.

Dick guessed instantly what the object was, and raising his sword with great swiftness in the air, he brought it down with full force upon it.

A most hideous yell burst from Jacob's lips.

He screamed aloud for help and mercy.

The fingers that had encircled the butt of the pistol, which he intended to discharge at Frederick so soon as he was sure that he could do so without fear of missing his aim, were cut through to the very bone, while the weapon itself, falling on the ground, was discharged, and the contents lodged themselves in his own body.

This was indeed a fearful but well-merited retribution.

With a scream of pain and agony he fell down upon the floor of the cottage, and rolled there like some mortally-wounded reptile.

Almost at this moment Frederick succeeded in disarming his opponent, the two blades becoming locked together, and Lord Herbert found his wrenched suddenly from his grasp, and sent whirling to the further end of the cottage.

Frederick pressed the point of his sword against him.

"Now, my lord, are you content?—are you willing that this contest should be over? I tell you again I cannot harm you. Leave us together. Your interference will only cause further mischief than there is already."

His lordship gnashed his teeth with rage, and, without speaking a word, he turned his eyes in the direction where his sword was lying upon the floor.

He made a slight movement as though to reach it.

But in a stern, suppressed voice, Frederick uttered the word:

"Beware!"

"You have conquered," he said, bitterly, "and I must perforce leave you. The odds are all against me! Don't think, however, that the pursuit will be relinquished—no, no. The stain which you have placed upon our family shall and must be expunged by your blood—I have sworn it, and I will keep my oath! No matter where you go, I will follow you until the matter is ended either by my death or yours!"

"I regret to hear those words, my lord," said Frederick, sadly. "It is true that we have loved, but the circumstance was wholly out of our control. We could not help it—we are not to be blamed for it. I can only hope that time and reflection will bring you to a different conclusion."

Mortified and abashed, his lordship slunk out of the cottage.

But ere he quitted the enclosure, he shook his clenched fist in the air, and, while the foam of passion gathered upon his lips, he said;

"Yes, yes—I have made the oath, and I will keep it! No earthly circumstance shall turn me from it! My heart's blood or yours, Frederick Stuart! Nothing less shall suffice! Curses on that meddling intruder, and upon that dolt and idiot, Jacob! It is he who spoilt all! But no matter, I will yet obtain the victory. The distance I have to go to find assistance is not great, and when I once commence the pursuit after them, nothing shall stay me—nothing shall turn me aside! And Lady Agnes, too, who has disgraced me, disgraced herself, and all our race, shall not live in her ignominy!—she, too, shall perish!"

Again shaking his clenched fists at the cottage, Lord Herbert sprang over the palisades with the intention of carrying out his hastily-formed but terrible plan of vengeance.

Suddenly he stopped.

The storm had almost ceased.

The thunder no longer rattled in the sky.

The lightning no longer brought all objects into view.

But the clouds had parted slightly, and through a long, straggling rift the blue sky and twinkling stars could be discerned.

A soft, gentle, and beautiful light was over all things.

And it was by the aid of this scanty illumination that the young nobleman had perceived something among the trees, a slight movement on the part of which had first attracted his attention.

"A horse," he said—"a horse, and, by all that's d—nable, one of a rare quality! This is fortunate indeed! Now, Frederick Stuart, we shall see how long your triumph will continue! Aha! I shall be speedier in my vengeance than I had dared to hope!"

CHAPTER DCCXLVII.

BLACK BESS GETS RID OF HER STRANGE RIDER, AND RENDERS THE YOUNG COUPLE A SERVICE.

THE horse that Lord Herbert had seen standing so quietly among the trees was of course no other than Dick Turpin's bonny mare, Black Bess.

Even in the semi-obscurity he could not fail to be struck by her matchless form.

A glance told him that she was one steed out of a hundred thousand.

His eyes glistened with pleasure and he advanced gently and quietly towards her.

Black Bess projected her ears at his approach, and watched his movements narrowly

Her very appearance told the young nobleman that she had a spirit which might prove dangerous, and therefore he stretched out his hand and spoke to her coaxingly

Black Bess did not move.

She suffered the stranger to gain her side

A most accomplished and fearless horseman was young Lord Herbert.

His love for this noble quadruped was the one great redeeming trait in his character.

He knew that there were many horses of spirit who would never suffer a stranger to seat himself upon their backs.

He resolved not to run any risk on the present occasion from this cause, and so no sooner was he by the side of Black Bess than he gave a sudden and surprising spring, and, with great agility and dexterity, seated himself firmly in the saddle.

It was a feat that he had often practiced.

It was one with which Black Bess was unacquainted

The suddenness with which this stranger had placed himself upon her back startled and half-subdued her.

She shivered from head to foot

Lord Herbert thrust his feet into the stirrups, and then took the reins between his fingers.

It seemed as though this served to recover Black Bess from the state of astonishment into which she had undoubtedly been thrown.

She reared upright in the air with so much abruptness, and in such a manner, that it seemed impossible for any rider to retain his seat upon her back.

But Lord Herbert seemed as though he had suddenly grown to the saddle, and become part and parcel of the steed.

He patted her upon the neck, and spoke gently to her.

But to no avail.

Black Bess reared and plunged more violently than before, but without the slightest effect.

There his lordship remained, defying all her power to unseat him.

Finding all pacific measures fruitless, his lordship adopted what he considered would be a more effectual means

He had been mounted, and spurs were upon his heels.

With these he gored Black Bess in the flanks

This was treatment to which she had never before been subjected.

Uttering a snort of pain, she gave a violent bound forward.

That bound would in itself have unseated almost any rider, but his lordship still remained firm.

Finding all her attempts unsuccessful, Black Bess, prompted by a rare but not unparalleled sagacity, adopted another method.

Before her rider could divine her intention or prepare himself for it in the least, she dropped suddenly to the earth upon her side, as though she had been shot.

Then she rolled completely over, having her rider beneath her.

He did not even in this terrible moment lose his presence of mind.

Almost instinctively he released his feet from the stirrups.

At the same instant Black Bess, completely maddened by pain and terror, made a furious effort to regain her feet.

In springing up she brought one of her fore feet down with full force upon his lordship's skull.

There was a sickening crash, and then all was over.

Black Bess stood trembling and shaking in every limb.

Her mouth was filled with foam, that rested, also, in large flecks upon her breast and flanks.

The sound of hasty footsteps through the trees could now be heard, and she listened to their approach with unmistakable alarm.

Then she heard a low, gentle, chirping sound—a sound that she knew full well came always from her master's lips.

Her agitation greatly subsided.

The signal was again given, and slowly the gallant mare moved in the direction from which the sound proceeded.

By her manner she seemed to show that she had been guilty of some deed for which she deserved a severe punishment.

Then Dick Turpin sword in hand, followed by young Frederick and the Lady Agnes, made his appearance on the scene.

Consternation was impressed upon all their countenances.

"What is it?" cried Frederick Stuart—"what—oh, what is it?"

"Advance," said Dick, "and we shall ascertain. I have my thoughts. I could guess what has happened, but we shall see."

He strode forward, followed closely by the young couple.

Black Bess walked gently to him with her head hung down.

The highwayman noticed her unusual and agitated appearance.

Patting her upon the neck, he asked, in a tone of some anxiety:

"What is it, Bess, old lass—what is it?"

Just then the moon peeped down upon the earth through the long rift in the clouds above.

Her clear beams seemed to concentrate themselves upon one spot and upon one object.

A shriek came from the Lady Agnes, and shudderingly she averted her gaze.

There, lying stretched out at full length upon the turf, with his head beaten in, and presenting so truly horrible an appearance as to be beyond description, lay her brother, the Lord Herbert.

Even the highwayman, accustomed as he was to scenes of horror, violence, and bloodshed, felt a sickening sensation come over him that he had great difficulty in subduing.

Frederick looked sad and gloomy.

One glance sufficed for him, and then he turned the whole of his attention towards the Lady Agnes, who appeared to be completely overcome by the terrible and unexpected fate that had overtaken her brother.

When the ill-fated young man left the cottage in the manner we have described, Dick Turpin and the two lovers came to the conclusion that he would take his departure, and that for some time at least they would see and hear of him no more.

The Lady Agnes still remained in a state of insensibility.

Dick congratulated Frederick upon having escaped so well in the encounter, for he had not received so much as a single scratch.

By the aid of a little water the young girl was restored to consciousness, and her first act was to fling herself upon the breast of her lover, while she wept with joy to think he had escaped all harm.

The treacherous villain Jacob continued to utter supplication after supplication for water, and when the Lady Agnes had been attended to, a small quantity was given him.

He drank it with great pain and difficulty, and, as soon as he swallowed the last drop, uttered a loud scream of mortal agony, and then, closing his eyes, fell back either insensible or dead, which of the two they did not care to inquire.

Nor, indeed, were they allowed the opportunity, for it was just then that they heard the sounds of some scuffling or struggling taking place outside.

Hastily they hurried to the spot, with what result we have already seen.

From the impetuous, hot-headed young man the lovers had certainly no more to fear, though his sudden and violent death was a terrible shock to both of them.

Nerving himself to the task, Dick Turpin stepped forward, and, stooping down, looked closely at the prostrate form.

Upon rising to his feet, he found Frederick's eyes were fixed upon him.

"He is dead," he said, in reply to the question that was put to him by the other's glance—"he is quite dead. Life is utterly extinct. Death must have been instantaneous."

Although one might scarcely expect it, yet this intelligence proved an additional shock.

Up to that time they might have indulged in some faint hope that the injury he had received was not mortal, and that by care and attention he would recover.

Now, however, that hope could be entertained no longer.

He was dead

CHAPTER DCCXLVIII.

DICK TURPIN DISCLOSES HIS IDENTITY TO FREDERICK STUART.

"Generous stranger," said Frederick, addressing the highwayman, "let us quit this terrible scene—I can bear to look at it no longer. Who you are I know not, nor do I care. You have proved yourself to be a true friend of mine in the hour of need. At present I have had no opportunity of thanking you, and now I feel myself at a loss for words. Rest assured, however, I shall never forget your behaviour to-night."

"I do not desire your thanks," was Turpin's answer. "I am quite willing, however, to turn away. It seems to me that, having done so much, I can render you no further service, and therefore, if it pleases you, I will say farewell."

"No—no, I cannot suffer you to depart thus. I must thank you for what you have done, and besides, you have taken so active a part in these events, and have shown yourself so well qualified to take the direction or command, that I feel impelled to ask you your advice. Will you, then, add to the favours you have already conferred by telling me what steps you think I had better next take in this unfortunate affair?"

Turpin did not return an immediate reply, but, taking Black Bess by the bridle, retraced his steps to the little cottage.

Near the palisades he paused, and then, turning round to the young couple, he said:

"Of your history I actually know little, yet what has occurred enables me to guess much."

"But a few words from me," returned Frederick, "will make all clear to you. I was engaged as tutor to the Lady Agnes; that is more than a year ago. Since then, her mother, who gave me the appointment, has expired, therefore the young Lord Herbert, who has this night come to so untimely an end, was the sole inheritor and possessor of the estates and wealth. He was also appointed guardian to his sister, who, as you may guess from their appearance, is many years his junior."

"And," said Turpin, with a faint smile, "it was not long before you and the Lady Agnes discovered that you loved each other?"

"It was not long, and I may say that the passion was mutual from the first. I will not weary you by repeating the efforts I made to subdue this flame, or the resolves I made and never carried out. I was weak, and love was strong, and so I remained at my post until it was too late."

"And then," said Dick, "the Lady Agnes agreed to accompany you in a flight from her brother's home?"

"She did; but not until her brother had been made acquainted with the powerful love existing between us. He laughed at it scornfully, was furious with rage, and declared that he would never consent to the union of his sister with one like myself. You may guess his feelings by the manner in which he comported himself to-night."

Turpin nodded.

Finding that all entreaties, all persuasions were entirely useless, the Lady Agnes, as you see, agreed to fly with me. Ere we had gone far we were overtaken by that frightful storm, and in order to escape from it we took refuge in yonder cottage. The young Lord Herbert must have been made aware of our flight almost immediately, otherwise he could not have been so close behind, so doubtless the spy and villain Jacob, who has met with so well-merited a fate, watched us depart and then informed him of the fact."

"Very likely; for, as you say, they were very close indeed behind you—so close that they saw you turn down the narrow path leading from the highway into this forest."

"How do you know that?"

"I overheard a conversation to that effect. But no matter—proceed."

"I have no more to tell," was the reply—"the rest you already know. He followed me to the cottage, and although he is her brother, and it ill-becomes any one to speak evil of the dead, yet I must say that it is pretty clear that by fair means or foul he intended to put an end to my life."

"That is quite certain, and I rejoice for both your sakes that the attempt was unsuccessful."

"Well now, sir," said Frederick, "to trouble you still further, I would fain ask you what I had better do in this conjuncture of affairs—how shall I act? I confess that by myself I am quite at a loss to come to a decision."

"In the first place," replied Turpin, "it is quite clear that you had nothing to do with Lord Herbert's death. You may be puzzled to know in what manner it occurred, but I am sure I can give you the true explanation of it."

"Can you, indeed?"

"I can."

"Then I confess that in that I am at a loss. Tell me how it happened."

"He must have made up his mind to seize my horse, and hasten off for assistance, that he might drag the Lady Agnes from you. But this happens to be a particular favourite of mine, and though gentle as a lamb with me, and obedient as a dog to all I say, she is yet fierce and unmanageable with a stranger. In his attempts to seize her and mount upon her back a struggle must have taken place, and in that struggle his life must have been lost, for his head was battered by one of her iron hoofs."

"A terrible fate!"

"Most terrible! We can look upon it as scarcely anything else but an accident. And now I presume your chief anxiety is to know what steps to take now that the young nobleman is dead?"

"Yes, that is precisely it."

"Well, then, let me recommend in the first instance, as you wish for your own happiness, to have a marriage solemnised between you—don't let the death of Lord Herbert be a barrier. When you have secured her as your own, then give full information of all that has taken place to-night."

"But shall I be believed? May I not find myself involved in—in—some charge of——"

"I understand," said Turpin, "but I don't think you need fear anything on that account. The inmates of this cottage will bear evidence to the facts so far as lies in their power; but should you find that any harm or difficulties arise, send a message to me, and I will extricate you from them, no matter what they may be."

"But I cannot think of increasing the obligation I already owe you to so great an extent."

"Pho—pho! it is nothing—don't think of that, but bear in mind what I say: if you find yourself in any danger from the charge of having compassed Lord Herbert's death, send a message to that effect to the landlord of a public house known as the Three Spiders, and situated not far from Ealing Common—don't forget it. If that message is delivered all will be well."

"But you are not the landlord?" interrogated Frederick.

"No, certainly not," was the response, "but the landlord is a friend of mine, and will deliver the message to me. Let that amount of knowledge on your part suffice."

"But your name—surely you will tell me that, that I may remember the person who has rendered me such important services to-night?"

"No, let my name remain secret—don't seek to know it. And now, if you have no more questions to ask, let me say farewell, for, as you perceive, the night is going fast."

"You may think me impertinent—wrong—rude; but if you would only tell me who you are that I may remember you, I shall be glad; 'tis from no motive of curiosity that I ask, but only that I may be able to name my benefactor."

"It is a secret, but you shall know it. Come nearer to me, and I will whisper it in your ear."

With his countenance expressing the greatest curiosity, the young man obeyed.

"You have heard no doubt of a personage who has created for himself some notoriety in this land, who is known by the name of Dick Turpin?"

"I have—a cowardly, murderous, plundering scoundrel! But what has that to do with us?"

"You speak strongly, and warmly," said Dick, preserving his calmness.

"I do."

"Do you speak from actual knowledge on your own part, or do you speak from hearsay—from something some one else has repeated to you?"

"Well—well——"

"Give me an answer to my first question. Do you speak from personal knowledge?—have you ever encountered this individual in your life, or had any personal dealings with him?"

"No."

"Then why presume to speak so strongly? What objection I may have felt to telling you who I am has now vanished—you shall know it. Henceforth I trust that you will judge of people by their actions, and by your own personal experience of them, and not by the word of others, for I solemnly declare that I am the person who is known throughout the length and breadth of this land as Dick Turpin, the highwayman!"

CHAPTER DCCXLIX.

DICK TURPIN EXASPERATES THE POLICE OFFICERS TO NO COMMON DEGREE.

It would be hard to say which feeling most predominated in the breast of Frederick Stuart—astonishment or confusion.

He started back several paces, and looked at the highwayman with an expression of incredulity upon his countenance.

"Your looks express disbelief," said Dick; "but what I tell you is true. There is much in my past life that I would gladly forget or have blotted out, but it is impossible. All that I can do is never to shrink from doing a good action whenever the opportunity is afforded me."

"I regret that I spoke so hastily," Frederick said, at length, "yet I can assure you that I did no more than repeat what may be heard from the lips of almost anyone."

"I do not dispute that, but it is needless to prolong this conversation further. You have asked my advice, and I think you cannot do better than follow it. Henceforth we shall be strangers—in all probability we shall never meet again. Farewell!"

With these words Turpin turned away, leading Black Bess along the pathway by the bridle.

The young man was too much abashed to say anything further than the word farewell.

Dick walked rapidly, for he was both excited and angry, and in a very short time indeed he was completely lost to sight to the young couple.

The storm, as we have said, was over, and as soon as the branches of the trees would permit, Dick mounted Black Bess.

In another moment he emerged into the high-road, when, to his great surprise, he found himself face to face with a troop of horsemen, whom he recognised at a second glance as being police officers.

But for the excited condition of his mind, he certainly would have adopted due precautions in quitting the forest and entering upon the high-road again.

As it was, he thought nothing of it.

The result so far from paralysing him, however, only had the effect of restoring him to his usual state of mind.

He saw instantly that his appearance startled and astonished the police officers in no small degree.

He was the first to recover himself, and, bringing Black Bess's head sharply round, he gently touched her with the spur, and off she bounded at a tremendous rate.

"Fire," roared a voice—"fire! Ten thousand curses! That must be him! Fire—fire after him!"

A succession of straggling shots came from the officers. They were too flurried either to fire a volley or to take any accurate aim.

The bullets whistled past the highwayman, but did him no harm.

No sooner had they discharged their weapons than the officers urged their horses onward by every means in their power—certainly the speed they made was very great indeed.

"Now, if they are inclined for a ride," said Dick, to himself, "they shall have it. Black Bess is fresh and full of spirit, so a run of a few miles will do her no harm. I will take them to the loneliest part of the country I can find, and then, when their horses are thoroughly tired out, I will leave them there."

Just as he came to this determination, Dick turned half round in his saddle, and took off his hat.

He waved it above his head with an air of defiance, and by his actions showed that he invited the officers to pursue him.

So furious did this gesture make them, that they discharged the remainder of their firearms—of course without the slightest result, for by this time Dick was too far off to be injured by them.

They could not stop and re-load, nor could they perform that operation while their horses were galloping at the very top of their speed, so that in the respect of bullets Dick had nothing to fear from them.

Looking back, he saw that they were far enough behind him to answer his purpose, so he reduced the speed of Black Bess, so that she went at only about the same rate as his pursuers.

By this means, the same distance was preserved between them, and it made the officers indulge in the hope that if they perservered a little while their success would be certain.

Dick continued along the high-road until he came to a part where the hedgerow was no great height.

Here he paused, and made Black Bess leap over into the meadow beyond—a feat that she accomplished with perfect ease.

"They shall have a rough ride of it," he said to himself—"I am just in the humour to give them a dance."

On came the officers, and, turning their horses' heads, leaped over the hedgerow gallantly.

Dick had purposely selected a spot where he knew the horses of the officers would be easily able to follow him.

Across the meadow he went, still keeping just the same distance in advance, flitting before his foes like a will-o'-the-wisp, defying all efforts at capture.

The moon was now shining brightly, for there were no clouds to obstruct her light.

All objects were plainly visible, and the officers were able to keep their prey in sight with perfect ease, for now and then Dick would pause and wave his hat.

The officers then would redouble their exertions; and when they were almost within reach of him, Dick would let go the rein, and away Black Bess would bound, until in a few moments there was just the same distance between them as there was at first.

If one thing could be more aggravating to the police officers than another it was this.

They most bitterly regretted their precipitation in discharging all their weapons.

It is true they might have stopped to re-load, but while they were doing this the highwayman would probably get such a start as would put overtaking him out of the question.

And so in this unsatisfactory way—so far as the officers were concerned—the chase was continued.

Looking around him, Dick fancied by the look of the eastern horizon that daylight would not be long in making its appearance, and therefore it behoved him to shape his course somewhere in the direction of the Three Spiders, yet not so much as to lead his foes to suspect that that was his destination.

At the end of an hour the officers' horses were quite knocked up.

They became insensible to the urging both of whip and spur, and only moved onwards at a dogged, sullen pace.

Again, and for the last time, Dick took off his hat and waved it.

Then, giving Black Bess the rein, he galloped away, feeling sure that it was no longer in the power of his foes to pursue him.

They had had all that hard riding, and had knocked up their horses for nothing at all.

Moreover, they were several miles from any habitation.

They had the unpleasant prospect before them of having to perform the whole distance at a kind of shuffling trot.

Dick galloped off in a westerly direction; but as soon as he felt sure that he was out of sight he changed his course, turning Black Bess's head in the direction of the Three Spiders.

"This has been a most unprofitable night's adventures," he muttered—"and yet there's a feeling of satisfaction and content within my breast. My safety seems secured, and I will not jeopardise it by attacking any traveller now, but take care to be safe indoors before there is a glimmer of dawn in the east.

To this determination Dick adhered.

In a short time afterwards he trotted slowly along the lane leading up to the public-house

He was quite confident that there was no one following him—that no one had observed his movements.

The sound of his horse's hoofs was heard afar off, and two persons hastily made their appearance before he could reach the front of the inn.

These were Tom Davis and Maud.

The latter had been in a state of the most painful suspense during the whole night.

She had been listening continually for the sound of Black Bess's hoofs.

Now she was standing, anxious and excited, endeavouring to pierce the gloom, and to ascertain whether the approaching horseman really was Dick Turpin or not.

With a cry of joy she recognised him.

Dick slipped lightly and quickly from the saddle.

"I am safe—quite safe!" he said, anticipating the question Maud was about to put to him. "Safe and unhurt—be under no apprehension on my account."

Maud gave a sigh of relief.

"And Tom King and Claude," asked Turpin—"where are they? Have they returned yet?"

"No—I have seen nothing of them," was Tom Davis's reply, "and I was waiting anxiously when I heard you approaching."

"Let us hope they will not be long."

"Believe me, captain, it is most important that you should never arrive here or depart during daylight. If you only observe this precaution, I believe you will be perfectly safe."

"It is a simple precaution, and one that must be observed," said Dick. "I believe the necessity of it is firmly impressed upon the minds of both, and it will only be some unusual and unforeseen circumstance that will keep them absent many moments longer."

"It only wants half an hour of daybreak," said Tom Davis. "At present I can neither see nor hear anything of them."

CHAPTER DCCL.

FOLLOWS THE FORTUNES OF TOM KING, AND RELATES HOW HE HAD A NARROW ESCAPE AT THE TOLL-GATE.

It now becomes our duty to relate what happened to Dick Turpin's two comrades on the night in question.

How it was they had not made their appearance we shall quickly see.

First, however, we will confine ourselves to the doings of Tom King.

As had been agreed, they all three took different routes.

Tom took a northerly course, and with great boldness kept steadily along the high-road, making no attempt to conceal himself whatever.

We have before said that the night was dark, and showed indications of stormy weather.

But provided the storm did not break forth, it was just the night for an expedition on the highway.

Ere going far, however, Tom found his further progress barred by a toll-gate.

Although the hour was tolerably early, yet strange to say the gates were closed.

The height was considerable, and Tom was by no means certain that his horse could clear such an obstacle, nor was there now any necessity of running the risk of such a feat.

Moreover, Tom especially liked to be on good terms with all the toll-keepers he could find.

On that evening there was present in his mind a vivid remembrance of the service that a toll-keeper had once before rendered him.

Slackening his speed, he thrust his hand into his pocket and drew forth a guinea.

"Hallo!" he cried, as he came nearer. "Gate—gate! Open the gate, I say!"

Just as he spoke, he saw the toll-keeper standing near the door of his little wooden habitation.

Upon seeing Tom King, he made some extraordinary movements with his arms, though what those gestures could possibly mean, Tom could not for the life of him conceive.

He continued to advance, though the man showed no signs of attempting to open the gate, but, on the contrary, seemed to be waving him away.

"Here's a guinea for you, my fine fellow," cried Tom, as he tossed the coin towards him. "Now, be quick and open the gate, for I am in a hurry; and if ——"

While speaking, Tom had paused close to the toll-gate, and he was suddenly interrupted in what he was about to say by a body of men rushing out tumultuously from the toll-house.

It only needed a glance to show him that they were police officers, and he comprehended, now that it was too late, what the toll-keeper meant by his gesticulations.

The man had evidently recognised him, and had given him the only warning that lay in his power.

Quick as thought, Tom drew his sword and whirled it round him.

The movement was made only just in time.

The keen blade struck sharply against the arm of one of the police officers, who was about to grasp his horse by the bridle.

But, not to be thus intimidated, the police officers clustered round him, and before Tom could get free one of them seized him by the leg.

Again his sword flashed round him, and once more he was free.

"Shoot him!" cried a voice. "Our orders are to take him dead or alive! Shoot him! Shoot his horse, and then we shall have him sure enough!"

While these words were spoken, Tom had hastily decided upon the plan of action he should pursue.

The toll-gate was still fast, and if his horse could only leap over that, he should have a capital barrier between himself and his foes, and he should be enabled to get a good start along the high-road beyond.

Uttering a loud cry, and plunging the spurs deeply into the animal's flanks, he made it face the gate.

Gallantly were his wishes responded to.

Gathering itself up for one mighty effort, the horse leaped over the toll-gate, just clearing the top rail with its hind hoofs, and then alighted safely on the road beyond.

The officers, furious with rage, drew their pistols and fired.

Many of the bullets lodged themselves in the woodwork of the gate, and one Tom thought struck his horse, for the creature uttered a strange cry.

Whether he was hurt himself or not, the highwayman did not pause to inquire.

He bent all his energies to urging his horse onwards at its fullest speed.

By the time the officers could mount their horses, and by the time the toll-gate was unlocked, Tom got a considerable distance in advance; yet the start was not so great as to prevent the officers from indulging in the hope that they should be able ere long to overtake him.

"I have lamed his horse," said one—"I am sure of it! Come—he cannot go far, and he must fall into our hands at last!"

The intelligence that the highwayman's horse was lamed was very gratifying to the feelings of the officers, and they commenced the pursuit with considerable courage.

The one, however, who had planned the ambush was excessively mortified to think so good and so original a scheme should fail.

"I know my mistake now," he said, to his followers. "I shall not be guilty of such a thing again. I was too humane—a great deal too humane! Wait until I have another opportunity, and then I will shoot him first, and call upon him to surrender afterwards!"

Tom King's danger was indeed a fearful one.

Had the toll-keeper been disposed to be his enemy, his capture would have been almost certain, for Tom would have been altogether unsuspicious of the presence of officers at such a place.

But the man's peculiar behaviour had led him to suspect something or other, though what he could not precisely make out.

But he was free—he had escaped; and if his horse was really wounded the creature showed no signs of flagging, for it kept on its way with undiminished speed.

And then the selfsame storm that had compelled Dick Turpin to seek shelter in the forest burst forth.

It came on with great suddenness, and in a few minutes Tom was thoroughly wet through to the skin.

"It will be no pleasant thing to ride through such a storm as this," he said to himself. "I should think, too, that it would very likely damp the ardour of the officers. I will see."

He gradually reined-in his horse as he spoke, and turned round, facing the way he had come.

He waited for another of the vivid flashes of lightning to illumine the landscape.

He was not kept waiting long.

A brilliant flash that took him by surprise, although he was expecting it, seemed to set everything ablaze.

He could see, as it seemed, miles and miles, but yet his keen eye failed to detect the least signs of his pursuers.

"They have given up the chase," he concluded. "It would be foolish indeed to attempt to follow me while there was such a confusion going on around as there is. I have escaped them, that is certain. Now, where can I obtain a shelter?"

Tom turned his horse round, and waited for another flash of lightning to take another look about him.

The long peal of thunder that had succeeded the former flash gradually died away, but almost before the reverberations had quite ceased, the lightning blazed forth again.

At some considerable distance over the hedgerow on his right hand, Tom perceived a kind of building that looked half in ruins.

In all probability it was a barn, or some such building, belonging to a farm-house.

"That will do," he said, as soon as he perceived it. "I shall be sheltered from the rain there, no doubt, and ten to one if I am troubled by the presence of anyone."

A wooden palisading alone divided the meadows from the high-road, and over this obstacle Tom's horse leaped easily.

Crossing over three fields, Tom found himself in front of this structure, which, as he imagined, was a barn.

As the rain continued to fall, if anything, with greater violence than before, he lost no time in slipping from his horse and pulling open the rudely-made door.

Passing inside, he led his horse in after him.

To his great joy, he discovered that, although the barn presented a very ruinous appearance, yet it was more in appearance than reality.

The roof was sound, and he was perfectly sheltered from the wet.

The barn, also, was evidently in use, for a large quantity of straw had been piled up in it.

Tom did not close the door, but stood just within the threshold looking out upon the rain.

He was by no means certain that he had altogether baffled his foes, though he believed he had.

Yet they might track him by some means to his present place of refuge.

Amid the conflict of the elements it was difficult indeed to distinguish any other sound, yet Tom listened.

After a time, however, when he found he could hear nothing, and when he discovered that the storm showed no signs of abatement, he penetrated still further into the barn,

In one corner a quantity of straw was on the ground.

It seemed as though originally there had been quite a stack of it, but which had been partially removed.

On this his horse lay down.

The creature was much fatigued.

Tom flung himself by his horse's side, and here he resolved to remain until the storm was over.

He fell into a half-waking, half-dreaming state, from which he was suddenly aroused by the unmistakable sound of footsteps and voices.

He started up to a sitting posture instantly

The voices and footsteps died away again, but Tom continued on the alert.

He was satisfied that some persons had made their way past the corner of the barn where he was hiding, and, as there were numerous crevices in the walls, he would be able to hear with extreme distinctness everything that took place outside.

While making this reflection he heard the footsteps again.

This time they were much plainer and came from another direction.

This was from the door of the barn.

Before retiring to the corner, Tom had closed the door after him.

But now it was flung open.

Just afterwards there came a flash of lightning, which showed him, standing on the threshold, two men.

Then all was darkness.

But Tom was reassured, for, transient as the glimpse had been that he had obtained of these new-comers, yet it satisfied him that they were not police officers, so he was content.

But a strong curiosity to know who these men were and what brought them to such a lonely place at such an hour sprang up in the highwayman's breast, so he laid himself down in the straw with the resolution of keeping perfectly still and listening to all that passed, keeping his presence there secret.

The men were talking, and he could hear all that they said with perfect distinctness.

CHAPTER DCCLI.

TOM KING OVERHEARS THE CONVERSATION BETWEEN THE TWO MEN IN THE BARN.

"Curse you!—come on, will you?" said a gruff voice.

"What a fool you are, to be sure!"

"Am I?" said another voice, still gruffer than the one that had spoken first.

"Yes, you are. It seems to me pretty certain that you only want some excuse to give up the job altogether; but I tell you I will not be thwarted, so, mark my words, I am determined that it shall be done to-night."

"Well, I think it had better be put off."

"I know you do; but it sha'n't be—it sha'n't be! To-night or never!"

"Well, don't make so much fuss, nor shout so loud. How can you tell whether anyone is listening to us or not?"

"Oh, you're a fool, I tell you! Who do you think would be anywhere near here at this time of the night? and on such a night as it is too? Bah!—it's ridiculous!"

"As you like; but I am glad to think that you had sense enough to come inside here while the rain lasted. I am wet through to the skin."

"Curse the rain! Of all nights in the year, why should it rain to-night, when I so particularly wanted it to be fine; but, however, neither the rain nor anything else shall change my intention, or turn me from my purpose—I am resolved."

"Well, well—you said that before. Why do you make such a fuss?—I believe you are obliged to keep talking like that to keep your courage up."

"Well, perhaps I am; and if so it's a good thing, for I can keep my courage up, and that's more than you can do—you are trembling now like a leaf."

"I know I am—I am shivering with the cold and wet."

"Oh, no doubt! Why don't you take a roll on some of this straw?—that will dry you. Curse the rain! again say I—I wonder when it intends to give over?"

"There doesn't seem much chance of it at present."

"No—curse it!"

The two men stumbled forward in the darkness, and Tom really believed that they were coming direct to the corner where he was lying so still.

But coming to the first heap of straw, they pulled a quantity on to the floor, and rolled themselves over and over in it.

For several minutes no more conversation took place.

All that he had heard did not enlighten Tom much.

[CLAUDE DUVAL'S HORSE REFUSES TO PASS THE GIBBET.]

But he jumped to the conclusion that they were certainly after no good, and that what they had determined to do, in spite of every obstacle, was beyond all doubt a desperate deed.

In the hope of hearing still more, Tom King did not venture to move from his position.

He kept his hand upon his horse's head, so as to prevent, as far as possible, the animal from making any sudden movement or any attempt to rise to his feet.

He had little difficulty in keeping it calm, owing to its state of extreme exhaustion.

Then the man who had first spoken, and who by his words appeared so very resolute, spoke again.

"Don't lie there, chattering your teeth together like that," he cried. "Sit up—the rain is passing over."

"But then, even if it is, just think how it has fallen. Why, it has been enough to soak through anything. You may depend upon it that it's spoiled our chance for to-night."

"No, no—not at all. The rain will make it all the better, if anything. Get up, I tell you, and be ready to follow me, for as soon as the drops have ceased to fall I mean to start."

A rustling of straw accompanied these words.

Then came the sound of a shuffling of footsteps as the man made his way to the door of the barn.

At present, however, there seemed little prospect of a cessation of the storm for some time to come.

There had been a kind of lull in the wind and a decrease in the quantity of rain that was falling, but it was only for a moment or so.

The wind again blew with its former violence, and the rain poured down in torrents.

Growling and swearing, the man once more laid himself down on the straw near to his companion.

Even Tom could hear how this fellow's teeth chattered together—so much so, that he could scarcely make himself understood.

The whole burden of his conversation, however, was an attempt to persuade his companion to forego his purpose for that night at all events, and to choose some other more suitable time.

But his words were mainly unheeded, or, if they produced any effect at all, they made the man adhere more obstinately to the resolution he had expressed.

The thunder kept up an incessant rattle, so that the slight movements that Tom King and his steed made from time to time were passed over unnoticed, for so loud was the thunder that it absorbed all other sounds.

After a long and weary interval, however, the tempest gradually subsided.

As soon as the rain fell at a slower rate, the two men again left the straw, and went to the door of the barn.

"Come, it will be all right directly," said the first. "The rain is leaving off nicely. Don't you see that break in the clouds yonder? I can see it growing wider and wider. We shall have a fine night yet."

"But our scheme is spoiled, I am sure," said the other, still with chattering teeth. "Consider with what steadiness the rain has come down. Everything will be soaked through and through."

"Well, we will see about that. Now you know what you have to do, don't you?"

"I do."

"Well, then, let us have no more foolery of this sort! Just summon up your courage for a little while, if you possibly can."

"Oh, I will do my part as it is to be done, never fear! I have given you my word, and I won't go from it!"

"That sounds better, Jack. I can understand your talk now. To-night we will be revenged on old Bailey! We will strike him such a blow as he will never recover from! He shall know that he cannot do just as he likes, and treat those who have to work for him just as he thinks proper! No—no, Jack, we will be revenged!"

"Yes," said the other; "this night will wipe off all old scores between us. Curse him, how I hate to hear his name mentioned!"

"Well—well, here's a drop of brandy. I haven't much left, but drink half of it, and let me have the rest. There, you feel better now, don't you?"

"Much better."

"And so do I now," added the other, after a brief pause, during which he had been employed in emptying the bottle. "I feel up to my work. Have you got everything about you in readiness?"

"Yes—everything."

"Well, then, we will part here. You know which way you have to go?"

"I do."

"Well, I will take the other course, and you know what my intentions are. Between us the old scoundrel shall be ruined!"

"Yes—when he treated me as he did, I told him that he should rue the day—that I would have my revenge; but he laughed at me, horsewhipped me, and hunted me off his farm, and now I have come back to be revenged!"

"So have I. But my wrongs, Jack, make yours sink into insignificance. However, if we both work together to one end we must succeed."

"Down with him, I say—down with him and all his hated race! This shall be a revenge that shall be talked of for many a long year to come, and it will help, no doubt, as a warning to many others."

"Come on, then. Look, the rain has ceased now, or almost ceased, at any rate."

"It has, and before we can go far it will be fine. Now, Jack, don't forget what it is you have to do. Don't falter—don't hesitate; but do the job effectually. As for me, you may depend I shall carry out the plan to the utmost."

CHAPTER DCCLII.

IN WHICH THE VILLANY OF THE TWO MEN IS MADE APPARENT.

As soon as these words were spoken, the two men shook hands with each other and moved away.

Tom waited an instant, and then sprang to his feet.

Two bounds took him to the door of the barn

He stood just within the threshold, and looked out

That soft and gentle light, of which we have already spoken, was over all things, and by the aid of it the highwayman saw the two men who had been plotting and consulting together.

By their dress they appeared to be farm-labourers, or rather poachers.

They must have parted just at the door of the barn, and they were hastening across the meadows in a diagonal direction, so that at each step they got further and further from each other.

"I should uncommonly like to know what it is they are after," muttered Tom. "It is no business of mine, however, that I can see; and yet, ought I, knowing what I do, to remain here, or gallop off in another direction and leave these two villains to wreak what mischief they think proper? No—no, I should always reproach myself for such a proceeding."

At this moment the two men jumped over a low hedge that separated the meadow in which the barn was situated from another.

"If I intend to follow them I must set about the task at once," was Tom's next thought, "or they will get out of sight. If I could divide myself into two portions I should like to follow both. I can only keep in the footsteps of one, however, and the question is, which shall that one be?"

Without deciding, Tom left the barn and closed the door behind him.

He left his horse inside—he knew the animal would be safe and in good quarters.

Then assuming a crouching, doubled-up attitude, Tom ran hastily across the field to the hedge, and there he paused.

"As I can only follow one and not both," he said, "I should like to follow the one who intends to do the most mischief. That surely must be the one who spoke so resolutely and boldly. I can see him," he added, looking over the top of the hedge. "There he goes; I will follow him and keep good watch on all his movements!"

Tom sprang over the hedge and followed in the footsteps of the man who had first spoken.

Leaping another hedge, Tom King looked up and saw before him a picturesque-looking farm-house with thatched roof and curious chimneys.

Around it were several other little habitations, or rather outhouses, in which cattle, horses, and other things were stored.

Round these could be seen numerous stacks of hay and straw.

It was towards this farm-house that the man appeared to be going.

Where the other was Tom King could not tell, for he had lost sight of him altogether.

This beyond all doubt was the residence of the man upon whom they had expressed their resolution to have their revenge.

A fair and beautiful place it seemed to be—so quiet, so peaceful, and bearing such an aspect of calmness and prosperity.

The man Tom King was following now seemed as though he was afraid of being seen, for he crouched down upon the ground, almost creeping along upon his hands and knees.

Suddenly gaining the shadow of a haystack, he paused and Tom paused also.

He flung himself flat upon the ground, and well was it for him that he did so, for the man looked warily all around him.

Then he stooped down by the side of the stack, and though Tom strained his eyes, he could not make out what he was doing.

Suddenly, however, the highwayman caught sight of a faint starlike light, and no sooner did he perceive it than the whole scheme of revenge that these men had planned flashed into his mind.

They had resolved to set fire to the farmer's property.

With the utmost speed Tom sprang to his feet and ran towards the man.

"Villain!" he cried. "Hold—hold—hold, I say!"

But Tom was too late.

Before he could gain the spot there was a sudden blaze of light, and it would really seem as though the rain had rendered the hay more easily ignitable, for the flames flashed up in an incredibly rapid manner.

Hearing a voice and the sound of hasty footsteps, the man uttered a yell of fear and ran away.

Tom did not pursue him, but, raising a pistol, aimed hastily at the retreating figure and pulled the trigger.

Mingled with the explosion came a hideous shriek, and the incendiary, after turning round strangely twice or thrice upon his heels, fell at full length upon the greensward.

Tom's whole attention was now concentrated upon undoing the mischief.

His efforts were vain, however.

The man had taken the precaution to soak a quantity of the hay with turpentine or some other inflammable substance, so that as soon as a light was applied to it it blazed up furiously, and in a second obtained such a hold as to defy all attempts to extinguish it.

Tom quickly found that the task was beyond his power, so he thought his best plan was to raise an alarm and hasten to the farm-house.

But just then, as he turned round, he saw a bright and ruddy glare before him.

Instantly his thoughts reverted to the other man.

"Curse the rascals!" he said, 'they have laid their plans well; there's fire now in another spot!"

Tom ran with all his speed to the farm-house, and then, to his horror, he discovered that the building itself was in flames.

The structure was composed of very slight materials, so that the flames quickly took hold upon it.

At the top of his voice he cried aloud:

"Fire—fire—fire—fire!"

The whole place seemed to ring with the sounds.

Yet no notice appeared to be taken.

The inmates surely were slumbering soundly.

As for the man who had perpetrated this portion of the villany, he was far enough off by this time, watching the progress of the conflagration from a distance.

The report of the pistol scared him away.

But before he heard it he had completed all his preparations.

Having been employed on the farm, they knew just which parts would catch light most readily, so he placed an armful of straw at the back part of the premises, poured over it a quantity of the inflammable spirit, and then set fire to it.

The rapidity with which the flames spread was truly incredible.

But everything in the way of the bright flames was highly combustible, and therefore the fire raged with great fury.

Tom King struck heavy blows upon the front door of the farm-house, but all to no avail

Then, seizing a large stone, he flung it at one of the upper windows.

As soon as the crash was over he cried out:

"Fire—fire! Be speedy, or you will perish! Fire—fire!"

Then the form of a hearty, good-looking, middle-aged man made its appearance at the broken window

When he looked out he uttered a shriek of despair.

The stack that had been fired and that Tom King had vainly sought to extinguish was now blazing away most furiously, and the light wind that had sprung up carried the flames several feet, and finally set fire to another stack.

All objects were illuminated as though by the noonday sun.

"Quick—quick!" said Tom; "don't be overcome by what you see! Now is the time for action! Quick—quick, I say! Rouse all the inmates of the place, and get them out, or they will perish! The back of the house is one mass of flames!"

A loud shriek followed, and then several other windows were dashed open and anxious faces appeared at them.

"Descend—descend!" cried Tom. "There is yet time, I think. I will try and break open the front door, and then you can escape easily."

Every member of the household seemed stricken with panic.

Until Tom spoke and told them what to do, they were only able to stare about them in mingled astonishment and dismay

These instructions, however, were all that was required.

A terrific scramble took place to see who should descend first.

Tom King had his eyes on a plank of wood, and, as soon as he had spoken, he seized it with both hands, and, nerved by the strength of excitement, he dealt furious blows upon the front door of the farm-house, until, with a crash, it flew back upon its hinges.

CHAPTER DCCLIII.

TOM KING IS THE MEANS OF SAVING THE FARMER'S DAUGHTER FROM A FEARFUL FATE.

A GUSH of hot and stifling air and smoke came through the open door.

Tom retreated before it, but, looking in, he saw that the interior was almost as red as a furnace.

The next moment, with loud shrieks and frantic cries, the inhabitants of the farm-house rushed out into the open air.

"Saved—saved!" they cried, and so overcome were they by their deliverance that, as if actuated by one impuse, they all sank down upon their knees.

"Rise—rise," said Tom. "Now is the time for you to put forth your utmost energies; this fire must be quenched by some means or other, or else everything upon this farm will be utterly destroyed! Do you hear me?"

The men—the farmer himself included—hearing these words, recalled their scattered thoughts.

"First of all," said Tom, "look all around you and see whether you are all here—whether anyone has been left behind."

There was a sudden movement, and then a shrill and piercing shriek.

A groan burst from the farmer's lips, and he cried:

"Sarah—Sarah, my daughter, where is she?"

There was no response.

"Sarah," he cried, in a louder voice, "surely you have not perished? Yes—yes, my own—my only one must still be in the house."

With these words he rushed impetuously to the door.

But a mass of flame burst forth and drove him back.

It was only for a moment that he retreated, however.

Nerved by a father's love, he dashed furiously through the flames; but just then the staircase leading to the rooms above fell down with a tremendous crash.

It was partially consumed when they had all descended, and their weight had tried it exceedingly.

Now it gave way utterly.

The intense heat again drove the farmer back into the open air.

He stood there with singed flesh and smoking clothes

He clasped his hands together and cried out:

"My daughter—my daughter, she is lost to me for ever!"

"No—no," cried Tom—"no—no! Look—there she is—there—there!"

He pointed to an upper window as he spoke.

It was one belonging to the attic at the top of the house.

No doubt the poor girl, aroused by the tumult and the names, had sought to descend, but, finding that impossible, had been driven upstairs by the heat, and was now looking down, helpless and imploring, upon the throng below.

A fair and beautiful child she looked—almost, as one might say, supernaturally beautiful, with the vivid flames playing upon her.

But her very lips were white with terror.

Her age appeared to be no more than ten or twelve as the most, and therefore she was almost precluded from helping herself.

"Hold!" said Tom King instantly. "Stand warn you are, my good girl! Don't be alarmed! Wait a moment, and you will be saved!"

Then, turning to the others, who stood gazing in a kind of stupified astonishment, he added, in a lower voice:

"A ladder—a ladder! Quick—quick! You must find me a ladder somewhere, and I will save her! Quick—quick, I say!"

The men, comprehending the instructions that were given them, hastened off, and presently returned with the article they had been sent for.

"Too short," said Tom, as soon as he saw it—"it is much too short; find me another from somewhere. Have you a longer one?"

"No—no," was the hurried reply—"that is the only one there is upon the premises."

Tom was in despair.

He looked up again at the young girl, and saw that the smoke was pouring in dense volumes from the window at which she stood.

She stretched out her hands imploringly towards them, and then she seemed to be gasping and struggling with the smoke.

But the heat must have been terrible and sufficient to suffocate her.

Suddenly she threw up her arms wildly above her head, and sank backwards into the room insensible.

At this the farmer was frantic, and he could scarcely be withheld from rushing into the house.

"There is only one chance of saving her," said Tom King, "and if you will assist me I will do my part."

"What is it—what is it?" asked several eager voices.

"Take that ladder, place it against the side of the house, and then raise it up. You may hold it on your shoulders or in your arms—it will add five feet to the length of it. Do that, and stand from beneath, and I will ascend and bring her down."

The men responded with a faint hurrah.

They were strong, burly fellows, and half a dozen of them could doubtless sustain the united weight that would be put upon their shoulders.

All were anxious to save the farmer's young and lovely daughter.

As quick as thought the ladder was raised, and then Tom King, hastily throwing off his coat first, stood upon the shoulders of the men, and then commenced the ascent of the ladder as they held it.

Even then it was scarcely long enough to reach the window.

But yet Tom thought he could achieve the feat.

He ascended with great agility and speed, and a loud cheer came from those below as Tom disappeared through the window.

In a second afterwards he reappeared, with the young girl in his arms.

She was safe and unhurt, only insensible and half stupified by the smoke.

"Hold firm," cried Tom to those below—"hold firm, for your lives, while we descend!"

"Right!" was the reply. "Don't feel afraid—we will stand firm!"

It was a difficult task for Tom to lower himself, and the girl as well, through the window, and gain a foothold upon the ladder.

But, in spite of the stifling heat, the suffocating smoke, and the flames that now began to shoot like long tongues out of the window, he preserved his presence of mind.

The men below trembled a little beneath the weight, but Tom descended with great rapidity until he reached the last round of the ladder.

Then he placed the young girl in the farmer's arms, who wept with joy as he received her.

Tom sprang down, and, although he saw there was scarcely any chance of saving the homestead, he cried out:

"Now then, where's the water? Get buckets, or whatever other things you can! We will try and prevent the fire from going any further."

But, although they used their utmost efforts, they could make no visible impression on the flames.

The fire had got too firm a hold upon the woodwork of the farm-house; it had seized, indeed, upon the thatch, and, unprovided as they were with the necessary means of extinguishing such a conflagration, it burned on, seeming to laugh to scorn the efforts that were made to check it.

"It's useless," Tom was compelled to say, at length. "There's no hope of saving the building now. Be thankful that none of you have perished in the flames. We must leave the house to burn down as it is, but we must see that it sets light to nothing else, and we must prevent, if we can, the spread of the fire among the stacks."

This was indeed something that required looking to, for now four stacks were blazing fiercely, and threatening to ignite as many more that were standing near them.

But the men, having now recovered themselves, set to work upon this task with great energy and skill.

Stacks had taken fire before then, and they had learnt how to extinguish them.

With pitchforks and other implements they scattered the blazing straw, and let it burn itself out in safety.

As it was flung upon the ground, many of the others trampled upon it, and so trod out the blaze.

But it was not until daybreak that the fire was subdued, and then not only the farm-house, but four stacks were utterly consumed.

CHAPTER DCCLIV

TOM KING GAINS A TRUE AND SERVICEABLE FRIEND.

From smouldering heaps of ruin the thick smoke still ascended, but Tom King felt he had done all that lay in his power, and he was anxious to leave.

It was now daybreak, though as yet the light was so very dim and uncertain as to be scarcely more than darkness.

Yet, if he left without delay, he would be able to reach the lonely inn without being very much behind the appointed time.

Before he quitted the scene, however, he felt it to be his duty to make the farmer acquainted with the facts that he had overheard in the barn.

Accordingly, he made his way towards the spot where he was standing.

His daughter had been recovered from her swoon, though she still looked pale and disordered.

No sooner did the farmer catch sight of Tom King, than, recognising him in a moment as the saviour of his child, he sprang forward, and, seizing his hand, wrung it warmly.

So great was his emotion, that at first he could not speak.

At length, in a broken, husky voice, he said:

"Thanks, sir—many thanks for the service you have rendered me to-night—so great a service that I can scarcely estimate it! You have saved my daughter—my child—the life of my heart—my only one—Sarah! God bless you for it, for without you she would now be nothing but ashes!"

"I rejoice," said Tom King, "to think I should have had the opportunity of being of assistance to you; but time presses, and I am anxious to be gone. Before I leave, I wish to make you acquainted with some facts of which, as yet, I am sure you are in ignorance."

The farmer stared at him in surprise.

Tom King then gave a brief and clear account of how he had been forced by the storm to take refuge in the barn, and what he had overheard there and its results.

"Had I suspected earlier," he said, in conclusion, "what their intentions were, all this damage could have been spared; but they spoke so ambiguously that I could not even guess their purpose. They separated, and I followed one. Come this way, and you shall see him."

Tom strode off to the spot where he had seen the man fall.

He was not there, but Tom searched all around, and presently perceived some dark object lying at a distance.

"There he is," he said. "The wound was not a mortal one. He has crawled away, but he is helpless—he was unable to go any further. Come and see him."

The farmer followed.

As they drew closer to the prostrate man, heavy, dismal groans came upon their ears.

Tom King at length stood over him.

The man was lying on his face, and so, in no gentle manner, the highwayman turned him over with his foot on to his back.

"Now, then," he said—"speak!"

With an effort, the wounded wretch raised himself upon one arm.

"Why, it's Bill Scott!" ejaculated the farmer, recognising him.

"Yes, it's Bill Scott, Farmer Bailey!" was the reply, given in savage, snarling tones. "I have been shot—I have been brought down! I am lying here wounded to death! I know that I have only an hour or two's life in me at the most, but yet I die contented, for I have been revenged!"

"Revenged?" said the farmer, with surprise—"for what?"

"For your treatment of me. You know how you drove me from your farm, and how I have since been unable to obtain employment."

"I ought to have sent you to jail!" said the farmer. "I was too lenient with you, thief and scoundrel that you are!"

"Those were the words you used then, and I swore to be revenged! I die now content, for I can see that my purpose is accomplished, and you are a ruined man! You will no longer be able to hold your head up in the way you have done! You are ruined, and I rejoice in your downfall!"

A succession of deep groans followed these words, and Bill Scott fell back upon the grass, writhing with pain.

The exertion of speaking no doubt had been too much for him, and had caused him intolerable agony.

"Come away," said Tom King. "You see there the author of this mischief. He had another with him—some man that he called Jack. That rascal, I regret to say, has escaped—he was scared, no doubt, by the firing of my pistol."

"I must thank you again," said the farmer, "for had it not been for your interference we should all have perished."

"I wish I could have saved you something," said the highwayman. "Is what this man says true?—are you a ruined man?"

"The loss will be heavy and hard to bear," said the farmer; "but I seem to look upon it as nothing. My daughter is saved, and I am content to put up with any other misfortune; yet I shall be able to struggle through this. It will be many and many a year before I recover the effects of it, if ever I do; yet I will hope for the best."

"I am glad to find, then, that things are not so bad as they might have been. Now let me say farewell! I have been much detained, and it is necessary that I should make all speed on my homeward journey."

"I would not detain you, or put you to any inconvenience for worlds," was the reply. "Good-bye, sir! You will take a father's thanks and blessings with you, yet——"

"Yet what?"

"Before you leave me, come and see my little girl. Let her thank you."

"No, no," said Tom—"I want no thanks—at least, I have had enough of them already. What I did was done freely and willingly. I would have done the same for any fellow-creatures in distress. I regret that I did not divine those men's intentions earlier, as I ought to have done."

"Take no blame to yourself, sir, on that account. You are a perfect friend to me, yet I hope that you will allow me to be your friend. Whether you should ever stand in need of one or not I cannot tell; but if you do, come in the hour of need to me, and I will do anything I can to serve you."

"Thanks—thanks! The friends I have are few indeed, and I am by no means unwilling to add to their number. But I cannot stay now—you must permit me to depart."

"But should you find yourself again travelling in this direction," said the farmer, "you will call here? Will you not let us see you once more? Luckily, this land belongs to myself, and therefore I shall have no rent to pay while all to-night's mischief is repaired. It is a sad, heavy blow to me, sir, but I will not repine, for my daughter has not perished. I had saved up some money and placed it in the bank, thinking it should be for her use; but now I shall be obliged to take it and use it to rebuild this house."

While this conversation was proceeding, Tom King and the farmer were walking towards the barn in which the highwayman had left his steed.

Upon gaining it, they pushed the door open, and the animal gladly came forth.

Before springing to the saddle, Tom hastily examined her to see whether she had been injured, for he all at once recollected the manner in which the officers had fired.

He could not trace any injury, except that the tip of one of the ears had been cut away by a bullet.

A narrow escape indeed for both horse and rider.

The pain, no doubt, had been great, but now the bleeding had ceased, and the hurt would quickly get well.

The farmer again shook Tom warmly by the hand, and regretted that he could neither induce him to stay nor offer him any hospitality.

"You shall see me again ere long," said Tom. "When I next come this way I will certainly call. Now I cannot stay, and so once more farewell!"

With those words, Tom leaped into the saddle, and took his way towards Ealing at a furious rate.

He chose the loneliest route that he could think of, and all the while he was flying at this great speed he kept continually looking around him on all sides, so as to make sure that none of his enemies were near.

Not a person, however, appeared in view, and just about sunrise he arrived safely at his destination.

CHAPTER DCCLV.

CLAUDE DUVAL HAS TWO TERRIBLE AND STARTLING ADVENTURES.

And now we have to place on record the adventures that befel Claude Duval on this eventful night of storm.

As he took a totally different direction to that pursued either by Turpin or Tom King, he knew nothing whatever of what had happened to them.

He rode steadily along the highway, determined not to attempt anything until he had succeeded in getting a safe distance from Ealing.

All at once, however, he heard before him in the distance the clatter of horses' feet, mingled with the sound of wheels revolving rapidly over the road.

He stopped immediately, and, drawing to one side of the road, took out his pistols and examined them, so as to be sure that in his ride the primings had not been shaken out.

He found all right, and so, retaining one of the weapons in his hand, he sat patiently waiting for the vehicle to come in sight.

The wind was now beginning to get violent—the wind that was the precursor of the storm that afterwards broke forth.

The wind blew from the direction in which the vehicle was coming—towards the highwayman—so that he could hear with unusual distinctness.

In a little while he detected another sound mingled with the rolling of the wheels and the sharp strokes of the horses' hoofs.

Voices were in loud and angry conversation—some point or other was being most warmly debated.

As the travellers came closer still, Claude discovered that one was a man's voice and the other a woman's.

What were the precise words that passed between them he was not able to ascertain.

As soon as ever they were level with him he rode out, and, keeping pace easily with the vehicle, he said:

"Pull up—stop your horse, whoever you are, or I will put a bullet through your skull and stop him afterwards!"

The woman gave a loud shriek, and the man scarcely knowing what he was about, he was so taken by surprise, checked the rein, and the horse obediently came to a standstill at once.

"You are wise," said Claude, "to obey my commands, for to-night I am not in the humour to stand any trifling! Quick!—your money, watch, and valuables—hand them over; you will find it best to save me the trouble of taking them!"

"There, you dolt—you idiot!" said the woman, in a shrill voice, "didn't I tell you how it would be?—didn't I say it would come to this? But it's a judgment on you for laughing at me, and paying no attention to my advice! I told you that it was as bad as madness to continue to travel all night with that large bag of gold in the gig, and now you have lost it!"

"Silence, you chattering fool!" roared the man. "But it's no good storming your jaw now the mischief is done, curse you!"

"Yes," said Claude, "you are right there. Now be wise for once—don't make a fuss about such a trifle as a bag of money, but hand it over quietly to me, and I will depart without doing you any further harm—I will be satisfied; if you refuse, you will find the consequences not so pleasant!"

"I wish I was armed," said the man, as he stooped down in the gig; "you would not find me such an easy prey if I was; but it's all my wife's fault!"

"My fault, you wretch?" screamed his better half. "You know very well that you are such a coward and so frightened of firearms that you dare not carry them with you, and you would not let me carry any either; I am ashamed of you! Oh, I wish I was a man!"

"So do I," said her husband, ruefully—"I wish that with all my heart!"

"Do you? I know what you mean; but you sha'n't insult me in that way! Take that, and that!"

"And I will take this," said Claude, as he adroitly possessed himself of a good-sized leather bag that the man had picked up from the bottom of the gig.

He tossed it in his hand, and then, with a nod of satisfaction at its weight, and the musical chink that it sent forth, he consigned it to his pocket, and trotted off, leaving the amiable pair to settle their matrimonial difficulties without interruption or interference.

Very well pleased with the success he had hitherto met with, the highwayman trotted on, hoping to meet with another adventure before going much further.

But in a short time his attention was called to the state of the weather.

The wind increased, and suddenly a heavy dash of rain-drops struck against his face.

"We shall have a storm, I fancy," he muttered. "No matter; if it is not very wet I shall get on all the easier very likely."

Before going a mile further, however, the storm burst forth with the utmost fury.

The rain that came down would have drenched him to the skin but for the partial shelter that some tall trees afforded him.

Near these, however, he was disinclined to linger, for he knew that in a thunder-storm a tree is best kept at a distance.

Then the road suddenly changed its character.

On either side was a high embankment.

From the appearance of the place it was evident that the road had been cut through the upper part of a hill, so as to obviate the difficulty of ascending it.

Here the darkness was something terrific.

The tall banks on either side, however, formed a partial shelter from the rain; but by the aspect of the elements Claude was aware the storm would be one of no ordinary severity, and that its duration would be considerable.

Therefore he pushed forward, being anxious to discover, if he possibly could, some place where he could shelter himself until the elemental strife was over.

The thunder had been muttering and grumbling in the distance for several minutes, and now, all at once, a vivid flash of lightning illuminated all objects with a ghastly brilliancy.

By the aid of that flash, although it lasted only a second, Claude saw many objects.

The end of the embankment was almost reached, yet on either side of him he could see nameless shrubs growing thickly.

In front the road descended rapidly, and there was a large expanse of country visible.

Although Claude saw these, they were not the objects upon which his eyes rested, nor the objects that enchained his attention.

With a cry upon his lips, that was rung from him partly by surprise and partly by the horror he experienced, Claude beheld, close on his left hand, a gibbet.

The wood of which it was composed was old and black, and seemed fast falling to decay.

From the cross-piece there still hung down a dark and shadowy mass.

This revolting object was seen not only by Claude but by his steed.

The frightened creature uttered a loud snorting cry, and then plunged about restively.

But for Claude's firm grasp upon the reins, the animal would have turned round and fled with all speed from the spot.

But the highwayman was anxious to advance, not to return.

In vain he tried to soothe the startled animal by caresses and gentle words.

Equally futile, too, was the use of the spur—obedience was refused altogether.

The crashing sound of the thunder increased in no inconsiderable degree the alarm under which the horse laboured.

When the peal had died away in muttering echoes, Claude succeeded in calming the creature a little.

He hoped to be able to ride past the gibbet before the lightning blazed forth again.

With trembling limbs, the horse advanced a few steps irresolutely, and then paused.

Again the lightning flashed more vividly and more continuously than before.

The horrible and loathsome object was revealed with even tenfold distinctness.

With a sickening sensation, Claude averted his eyes—the object was too horrible to be gazed upon, especially under such circumstances as these.

Furiously, Claude plunged his spurs into his horse's flanks, and, maddened by pain and terror, the terrified beast gave a convulsive bound forward, and then, having passed the gibbet, galloped at a tremendous and dangerous pace down the hill beyond.

Claude tried to recover the command over the reins, but in vain, for the horse for once was master, and would not be controlled.

CHAPTER DCCLVI.

CLAUDE DUVAL TAKES SHELTER FROM THE STORM AT THE ROSE AND CROWN INN.

Had not the rain continued to fall with so much violence, Claude Duval would have done on that night as he had often done before.

When his horse took it into its head to run away, he would just have kept the reins in hand, so as to steer him clear of any obstacle, and allow him to gallop on until he was weary.

Now this was by no means an agreeable prospect, and, moreover, the horse's terror was much increased every time the lightning flashed or the thunder rolled.

Claude was anxious in the extreme to gain some place of shelter, and accordingly he continued his efforts to regain the mastery that he had lost.

Then another vivid flash of lightning showed him in advance a little roadside public-house—a snug little dwelling, almost embosomed in trees, and from the windows of which a ruddy light was streaming.

The sight of this comfortable halting-place made him more than ever desirous to bring his horse to a standstill.

At all times a roadside inn is a pleasant place to halt at, but especially so in wet or inclement weather.

There would, of course, be considerable danger in stopping at or entering such a place.

But Claude Duval did not give that a moment's consideration, because he was quite of opinion that he was able to take his own part.

He tugged away with might and main without appearing to make much impression, when presently the front of the inn was reached.

The horse itself appeared to recognise the building, and to know that comfortable quarters for itself were close at hand.

Certain it is, however, that it stopped, and with considerable abruptness, and then, wheeling round, suddenly trotted through the gate at the side of the inn that communicated with the stables.

The yard was paved with large round stones, and on these the horse's feet made a great clatter, which aroused the ostler, for the stable door was thrown open, and a man appeared standing at it with a lantern in one hand.

"Who is it?" he said, not offering to come out into the wet—"who is it, I say?"

'A traveller," said Claude, as he slipped from his steed. "I have been caught in the storm, and want shelter."

"All right, sir," said the man, with increased respect, as soon as he caught sight of Claude. "You could not have come to a better place than this is. Lead your horse this way, and I will hold the light."

The ostler raised the lantern above his head, and Claude, taking hold of the bridle, led his steed into the stable.

The animal followed him docilely enough, and, having got inside the stable, all its late terror and apprehension completely vanished.

"Look after him well," said Claude, giving the ostler a five-shilling piece. "You will find it nothing out of your pocket if you do."

"All right, sir! Many thanks to your honour! I will drink your health! I will rub him down in a twinkling, and he shall have a bit of the best in the stable."

"That's right," said Claude. "You need not remove the saddle; just loosen the girths, and take the bit out of his mouth, for as soon as ever the storm ceases I shall want to continue my journey."

"All right, sir; everything shall be exactly as you wish. Not that I think you need be in any particular hurry, for if I am any judge, this storm will last a good while longer yet."

"I hope not," said Claude. "However, I have managed to get wet through to the skin."

"So you have; but if you will cross the yard, you will see the back door; open it, and go in—they've some rare fires indoors, and you will be able to dry yourself first-rate."

"I will; but don't forget what I have said to you about my horse."

"I will not, you may depend; I will carry out all your orders."

Claude ran across the yard to the back door of the inn, and opened it as he had been directed.

He could not push it wide open at first, owing to a slight resistance.

Directly afterwards, however, it swung back, and then he saw standing near to it, in considerable confusion, a sheepish-looking young fellow, attired as a gamekeeper, and a rosy-cheeked, good-looking girl, whose face and neck were now covered with blushes.

"I took you by surprise, I suppose," said Claude, with a laugh. "I'd no idea that lovers were standing near the door. Don't look so ashamed, now," he added, addressing the gamekeeper; "she's a very pretty girl, and you ought to feel proud when you are seen with her."

Claude walked on until he came to a door that was standing partly open.

Inside this apartment there was a bright red light, proceeding from the fire.

Without further ceremony, he pushed the door wide open, and entered.

He then found himself in the spacious and comfortable kitchen of the inn.

A very large fire was burning on the hearth, and round this some ten or a dozen persons were seated, engaged in smoking and drinking.

One, wearing a white apron with pockets in front, rose up as soon as Claude entered.

"Welcome, sir," he said—"welcome to the Rose and Crown. I am glad to see you—very glad! Dear me, how very wet you are! Walk up to the fire, sir, and dry yourself."

Claude willingly accepted this invitation, and, making a bow and an apology to the remainder of the company for taking an undue share of the fire, he stood close to the hearth and dried himself.

The landlord was inclined to be very talkative.

"Now, sir," he said, "if you will excuse me, there's something else you want to make you all right, and that's a drop of something warm inside; that, combined with the fire, will make you as right as a trivit!"

"Very good," said Claude—"have you any hot water ready?"

"Oh yes—plenty."

"Then make me a large bowl of punch—as large a bowl as you can, mind—and let it be hot and strong! Perhaps these gentlemen would have no objection to drinking my health in a few glasses of it?"

Of course there was not one in the company who had the slightest objection in the world, and they applauded the proposition most vigorously.

When Claude had entered they looked at him curiously.

When he stood before the fire they were not very well pleased, and a trifling thing would have made them suspicious.

But when he ordered the punch for them all to drink, their feelings underwent a total change.

"Take this chair," said one—"it is a nice, large, comfortable one, with arms. Draw it up before the fire and sit down—you will be able to dry yourself comfortably then."

"Thanks," said Claude—"I don't mind if I do, for I am soaking wet, I can assure you."

"Yes," said the man who had surrendered the chair—"just before you came in we were talking about this storm, and saying that it had been many a year since there had been such a one. Dear me, hark at that!"

A rattling peal of thunder now seemed to shake the very house, and the guests looked at one another in dismay.

"Yes," said Claude—"it's a severe storm; and yet there is some benefit in them after all, for on such a night as this how doubly comfortable it makes the fire-side!"

"It does—that's true enough! Have you travelled far to-night, sir?"

"No—not very far; though I am anxious to continue my journey. I was overtaken by the storm just before I reached the top of the hill yonder."

At this moment the landlord entered, bringing with him a bowl and several ingredients necessary for making the punch.

The guests watched the process with the utmost interest.

Water was boiling upon the fire, and in a very short time the steaming beverage was all ready.

Of course Claude was the centre of attraction to all.

He felt no uneasiness on this account, however, for, at the first glance, he had satisfied himself that without exception the company consisted of country persons, not one of whom probably had seen him—perhaps scarcely heard his name mentioned.

He calculated that he had won the respect and good graces of all by his liberal order for punch.

One man, however, fixed his eyes upon Claude with more intentness than any of the rest.

He did it furtively, and the highwayman did not perceive that he was being subjected to such a close scrutiny.

This man, however, continued to watch during the whole time that the punch was being brewed.

Glasses were brought in, and they were all filled by the landlord and handed round.

"Here's wishing you very good health, sir!" they all cried, and then the glasses were drained to the bottom.

"Fill them again, landlord," cried Claude; "they hold no more than a thimbleful, and such a night as this you ought to set the cold and wet at defiance! Fill them up again, and mind you have some more water boiling on the hearth, so that when this bowl is empty we can have another."

The guests were highly delighted with Claude's liberality.

Hitherto they had been solacing themselves with nothing but some rather weak home-brewed ale, after which the punch seemed very good indeed.

The prospect of having several glasses was highly satisfactory, more especially as they knew they should not have to pay for the expensive beverage.

But the man we have noticed as watching Claude turned to the landlord after the second glass had been emptied, and said:

"I don't think I shall continue my journey to-night, Mr. Landlord."

"A very wise determination, though I say it."

Well, I think it will be best. I go no further to-night;

but I have a long journey before me, so I shall retire to rest early."

"Very good, sir. I have beds in waiting."

"I have not been out to look after my sorrel mare."

"Oh, she's all right," said the landlord, interrupting him—"you need not feel anxious on her account. I have got a capital ostler, who looks well after all the horses."

"Still for all that I should like to go out and have a look at her. I shall sleep all the better if I do."

"Oh, certainly—certainly; I will go with you."

"Oh, don't trouble yourself. Whenever I am out I always make it a rule to have a look at my horse before going to bed—I sleep all the more comfortable then."

"Very well, sir," said the landlord, who, though he proposed to accompany the traveller to the stable, showed no particular desire to do so. "You know the way, of course?"

"Oh, yes, I can find my way easy enough. And the bed is prepared, you say?"

"Oh, yes."

"Well, then, gentlemen, if I don't come in again, I will say good night."

"Come in again," said Claude—"come in again by all means, and have another glass of punch; that will do more to make you sleep comfortably than looking at your horse, I'll warrant."

CHAPTER DCCLVII.

CLAUDE DUVAL IS MADE ACQUAINTED WITH SOME PARTICULARS OF THE LIFE OF THE FLYING HIGHWAYMAN.

THERE was a slight laugh at this, for all the guests were disposed to be on the best of terms with Claude.

The traveller laughed too, and said:

"If you don't mind, sir, I will have another glass before facing the cold air again."

"Oh, certainly—certainly—fill up, landlord, fill up all round!"

The traveller emptied his glass at one gulp, and then left the room.

"I think the storm has lulled a little," exclaimed the landlord, as he listened to the beating of the rain against the window; "not that I think it is passing off, for a storm of this kind generally lasts some time."

"Yes; you are right there," said the man sitting next to him. "I can only recollect one such storm as this, and that was a matter of thirty-six or thirty-seven years ago. I remember it because that was the night when the Flying Highwayman was captured."

Claude looked up in interest.

"Yes, so it was," said the landlord. "Now you come to call the circumstance to my mind, I recollect everything distinctly; "it's thirty-seven years ago, or rather will be thirty-seven years ago in next October."

"The Flying Highwayman?" said Claude Duval. "I have travelled the high-road pretty well in my time, and yet I do not recollect ever hearing anything of him."

"Is it possible, sir?" exclaimed the landlord. "I can assure you he was quite a noted character—a very noted character indeed."

"Perhaps I know him, or have heard of him by some other name," said Claude.

"That's very likely indeed, for I believe he had as many names as there are thorns in a bush. He was called sometimes one and sometimes the other, but about this part of the country he was invariably known as the Flying Highwayman."

"Then you remember all about him, landlord?"

"Well, a good deal, sir—a good deal. He used to come to this house pretty often; he came here time after time, and a very pleasant, agreeable, chatty fellow I always found him. Mind you, I had not the least idea that he was the Flying Highwayman that we had heard so much about, and I doubt whether I should have believed it if anyone had told me he was."

"And why was he called the Flying Highwayman?" asked Claude Duval.

"Well, some say for one reason, some for another; but I believe it was on account of his horse—a splendid creature it was too; I recollect it as well as if it was yesterday. After his capture, the police officers seized it, but when his master was no more, the horse ceased to be like the same animal."

"I feel very much interested," said Claude; "and if there is nothing else to talk about, and if none of you gentlemen have any objection, I should like to hear a few particulars about this said Flying Highwayman."

All were perfectly willing, for, though most of them knew the whole of the particulars by heart, yet there was such a degree of interest and fascination attached to the relation of them, that they could always sit quietly by the fireside and listen while that tale of the past was told.

Before commencing, however, the landlord handed the glasses round to the company, and then he spoke as follows:

"I may as well begin with the beginning of this history, sir, and tell you what I know to be true; I could tell you a very great deal that is said to be true, but I don't know it of my own knowledge; it is, however, very certain that about forty years ago a man made his appearance in this part of the country, who was called, as I told you, the Flying Highwayman.

"He was very bold and very daring, and scrupled very little about what he did, though, I think, no one could accuse him of any greater crime than stopping a traveller on the highway.

"He used to ride up with great boldness, and in an offhand way command them to surrender all the valuable articles they had about their persons, and such was the influence that his manner and bearing had upon all alike, that they invariably surrendered their property without more than a mere show of resistance.

"Of course he was not long in finding this out, and it made him much bolder than he otherwise would have been.

"The most extraordinary tales were told about him. One traveller would declare that at such and such an hour he was waylaid and robbed at a particular spot, and another traveller would come forward and say that he had been stopped at the same hour, but several miles off, by the same man.

"This was very likely, I think, why he was called the Flying Highwayman, without it was that he set all efforts to capture him at defiance.

"The officers tried in vain to run him down. His horse always carried him out of sight and out of danger. But this did not last for a very long while—it would have been a wonder if it had.

"A great fuss was made about his depredations; large rewards were offered, and every precaution used to make him prisoner.

"By some means or other the Flying Highwayman once learned that the Archbishop of Canterbury would arrive in London, bringing with him a very large amount of treasure in the shape of gold and jewels.

"Of course he would be well protected, and yet the Flying Highwayman determined to possess himself of this treasure, and he carried his resolution into effect.

"Some have been known to say that those who were with the Archbishop, and acting in the capacity of guards, were false to him, and sided with the highwayman.

"Whether this is true or not I can't tell. This, however, is certain: His Grace the Archbishop was travelling in a carriage drawn by four horses, and behind this there came a kind of waggon, drawn also by four horses, in which had been packed a quantity of clothing and other articles, and among them the treasure of which I have spoken.

"The journey was performed in safety until they got about half-way to London. One night, as they were travelling at full speed, by some inexplicable means or other, two of the wheels of the Archbishop's carriage came off, and down went the vehicle with a crash.

"Almost at the same time two of the wheels came off the baggage waggon as well, and that fell with a crash to the ground. The greatest confusion ensued. His Grace was picked up out of his carriage in an almost insensible state. What to do, his attendants could scarcely tell; but the moon broke out from behind a cloud, and by the aid of its light they saw at some distance the figure of a man, who looked like a farm-servant, for he was dressed in a large smock-frock, and had a round felt hat upon his head.

"They waved their hands to him, and called him, thinking to be able to extract some information from him as to the place where they could have the vehicles repaired.

"He appeared to hear them, and, in obedience to their signals, came running hastily across the meadows.

"He was, or pretended to be, very much surprised at what he saw. He was asked if he knew of a place where the wheels could be put on again, and he replied in the negative.

"But he told them there was a public-house not much farther down the road, and if they went there they might perchance obtain the assistance they needed.

"This was a difficulty, for the weight of the waggon was such that there was no hope of their being strong enough to drag it along the road.

"The Archbishop was rather severely injured by his fall, and when he heard of this public-house he declared at once that he would be led to it.

"He was attended by most of his servants, and four men were left to keep guard over the waggon.

"The farm-labourer showed them the way to the inn, which they found sure enough in the position he had described.

"From the inn several persons were sent out, armed with a few tools, with which they thought they might perhaps be able temporarily to repair the damage that had been done.

"But on their way to the spot where the waggon had been left they were met and passed by a man mounted on a powerful horse.

"He was riding at a furious rate. They drew back to the side of the road in order to let him pass, and as he went by he took off his hat and waved it.

"Still it was not until afterwards that they attached much importance to this meeting.

"On going to the waggon, however, they found a slight surprise in store for them.

"The four men who had been left on guard were found securely bound and gagged, lying under the hedge.

"The waggon itself had been broken open, and its contents strewed all over the road.

"It was then soon after discovered that the whole of the treasure had been extracted.

"The account given by the four men, as soon as they were unbound and ungagged, was that they were suddenly set upon by half a dozen men, who bound and gagged them before they were able to make any outcry or resistance; then the waggon had been broken open—as they saw—under the direction of a man on horseback.

"The treasure was abstracted, and this man on horseback took possession either of the whole or the greater portion of it, and galloped off at the top of his speed.

"The others remembered the horseman they had seen flying at such a prodigious rate, and when they described his appearance as well as they were able, the four men positively declared that he was the robber.

"When the case came to be inquired into, however, considerable suspicion fell upon these four men.

"It was thought they had been parties to the robbery, and that the account they had given was a fictitious one.

"Beyond doubt, it was the Flying Highwayman who had committed the robbery, for his appearance, as described in various bills, was that of the horseman they had seen.

"But, although the four men were suspected, yet their guilt could not be proved; they of course lost their situations.

"A tremendous outcry and uproar was of course made by the Archbishop, upon finding that he had been despoiled of so much wealth; and there was such a commotion in the land about this Flying Highwayman as there had never been before.

"Yet he set all their efforts to capture him at defiance, as he had done before, until one unlucky night the officers triumphed, and he was made prisoner, condemned to death, executed, and afterwards hung in chains, within a mile of this very house, and close to the spot where he had committed his robberies."

"Yes," broke in another, "'tis true enough, for his gibbet is to be seen to this day."

"Yes, and the remains of the Flying Highwayman himself," said the landlord, "though they would long since have disappeared but for the iron cage in which they are contained. He still remains a warning to others, who might be inclined to follow his example."

"And is the gibbet situated at the top of the hill and close to the place where the road is cut through the rock?" asked Claude.

"It is, sir," replied the landlord. "I suppose you have seen it?"

"I have."

"It is a sad sight!" said the landlord—"a hideous sight! But if you like, sir, I will tell you how it was the Flying Highwayman came to be captured."

CHAPTER DCCLVIII.

THE LANDLORD OF THE ROSE AND CROWN CONTINUES HIS INTERESTING NARRATIVE.

"Do so—do so," said Claude Duval, "for I am much interested in the story you are telling me. I think there is nothing that serves to pass an hour more pleasantly than to hear some tale of the past well told. But before you begin, landlord, I can see that several glasses are empty, and those that are not, ought to be by this time, so fill up again."

The landlord obeyed with alacrity; and as by this time a considerable quantity had been imbibed by every person present, they were consequently inclined to be very jolly and uproarious.

"I have often been asked about the gibbet," the landlord began; "travellers who have stopped at this house on their way from London have most invariably asked me about it."

"I should have done so," said Claude. "I came upon it very suddenly. A flash of lightning revealed it, and my horse was so terrified that I could scarcely manage it; however, I did manage to draw in when I reached the front of the inn."

"Yes," said the landlord. "I know very well that the gibbet must look awful on such a night as this, with the thunder rolling, and with the lightning playing all over the ironwork. It is bad enough to see it in the daytime, and with the sun shining upon it."

"It was terrible," said Claude, with a slight shudder. "But go on—I am anxious to know how such a bold and courageous man came to be captured."

"Well, it happened one night that I was sitting in the kitchen, or, as I may be now, with a few friends seated round me, as there is at the present time, that a stranger arrived and sat down, and had some brandy-and-water to drink. When I say a stranger I mean that he was a stranger to all present, except myself, and I only knew him from having seen him now and then. I had not the least notion who he was."

"But I suppose you afterwards found out he was the Flying Highwayman?"

"I did, sir. Well, he had not been sitting down very long, before there came a tremendous clatter at the door. It was burst violently open, and to my astonishment a large party of London police officers rushed into the kitchen.

"Well, I noticed this stranger, as soon as ever he heard the noise, spring up from his seat. He stood for a second as though scarcely knowing which way to turn. He seemed, I thought, half inclined to make a rush out by the door, but if such was his intention he altered his mind, because the officers were already in the passage.

"Instead of doing this he turned round, and to my amazement jumped up on to yonder table, and just as the officers rushed in he gave a tremendous spring and jumped clean through the window.

"There was a crashing of glass and a loud report that came from the pistols of the police officers, for they all fired when they saw that the man they wanted was making his escape.

"'Come on,' cried one, 'down the passage and out into the yard—that will be the quickest way! He's hurt himself ten to one, and if so we shall nab him all right!'

"Down the passage they rushed, and out of the back door, and out into the yard. I followed them, for I was full of curiosity and interest.

"But they made a miscalculation when they thought they should find the highwayman in the yard.

"It seems that after jumping from the window he must have alighted on his feet. Then he had rushed into the stable, mounted his horse, and galloped off in an incredibly short space of time.

"The officers heard the clatter of his horse's feet on the road, and they shook their heads, saying:

"'It is no good for us to attempt to pursue him; we've tried that often enough and have failed. Curse it!—this was a close touch, but it can't be long before his time will come. We shall have him sooner or later, depend upon it!'

"With these words, the officer in command of the rest turned back into the inn, and the men, getting over their disappointment as well as they could, sat down in the kitchen and had something to drink.

"No doubt you think it strange that the officers should take the matter so easy, but I soon found from their conversation that they had no longer heart to undertake a pursuit after the Flying Highwayman.

"They had chased him so often, and had always failed to overtake him, that they quite gave it up in despair.

"'Make your minds easy,' said the leader, 'it is only by a stratagem that we shall capture him, and therefore it will answer our purpose much better to sit down and decide upon what that stratagem is to be than it would to go galloping over the country.'

"In this matter all were of the same opinion; and when we come to consider the state of the weather, it is not at all wonderful that they should be

"It was a bitter, cold, bleak, wintry night, with a wind blowing that seemed as though it would cut you in two.

"As for the kitchen," added the landlord, as he glanced around him complacently, "that looked just as comfortable as it does to-night.

"Well, to make a long story short, the officers sat in the kitchen for a very long time talking and drinking.

"I found them very capital company, and I sat all the time listening to the strange stories they told of their adventures.

"I could not recollect now one-half that they said, but I know that most of the anecdotes they told related to this Flying Highwayman. Whether they were all true or all false, or whether some were true and not the rest, of course I don't know, and therefore it is not worth while for me to tell you any of them.

"Some time afterwards I heard a rumour that some very rich man was about to travel from London into the north.

"He was terribly afraid—so I was told—to undertake this expedition, because he would have to take the bulk of his money with him.

"He was frightened and suspicious of everybody—he was avaricious as well.

"I was told he was coming down in the stage-coach, and that he would probably stay all night at this inn.

"'Well,' I said to myself, 'if this tale gets much about, whether it is true or not, I warrant the Flying Highwayman stops the stage-coach before it reaches here.'

"My words were verified, for on the night when this rich man was expected, lo and behold! the coach was stopped.

"Now, when I say stopped, I don't exactly mean it, but I'll tell you just how it was done.

"You know the long, steep hill you have to climb before you can get here—the same hill, sir," added the landlord, addressing Claude, "that you spoke of a little while ago?"

Claude nodded.

"Well, it was a hard pull for the horses to get the coach up this hill, and the coachman always made it a rule to stop on the summit in order to let the horses breathe a little.

"The descent was very steep, as you know, and while they were stopping the guard used to get down from his seat and secure one of the hind wheels.

"All this the Flying Highwayman knew very well, so on the night I mention he stopped his horse at a convenient spot and waited.

"It was dark, and there was a deep shadow cast by the embankment on each side of the road, so that he was able to hide himself completely from sight.

"He heard the coach come rolling on, and prepared himself accordingly.

"As he fully expected, it stopped at the accustomed place.

"This was the opportunity he sought for. Uttering a loud cry and discharging a pistol, he rode out. He pretended that he had a great many men concealed among the bushes on each side of the road, for he called out to them to fire the moment any of his commands were disobeyed.

"He ordered the coachman to stop, and the man, fully believing that there were several men with their guns pointed at him, shrank down on the seat and never offered to stir.

"The guard, who was just putting the chain round the spoke of the wheel, crept under the coach and laid flat on his back.

"'Beware,' said the Flying Highwayman to those passengers on the roof, 'if any of you move or attempt anything against me, my men will fire a volley that will sweep you all off like so many sparrows!'

"This was a terrible threat, and all the passengers were much intimidated by it.

"Having thus completed his preparations, he rode up to the door of the coach, and, placing the barrel of a pistol on the ledge of the window, he commanded all to deliver their wealth upon pain of death.

"It was very dark inside the coach, and the highwayman could not see very well who was in it, or what they were about.

"Suddenly, however, he fel himself grasped tightly by the arms by two men, then one who was seated on the roof had the courage to disregard the threat of the men in ambush, and very dexterously slipped down and alighted on the highwayman's steed.

"He flung his arms tightly around him, and then he cried out:

"'Hold the horse—hold the horse! I've got him at last! Hurrah—hurrah!'

"The horse was seized, and more persons came to the assistance of those who had captured the highwayman.

"One of the lamps was taken down from the front of the stage-coach, and held in such a manner that it illuminated with tolerable distinctness the whole of the strange scene.

"The Flying Highwayman was in the first instance so taken by surprise that he could offer no resistance, and when he recovered himself he was too late.

"He struggled most furiously with his captors, and they had great difficulty in retaining their grasp upon him, but they held on like grim death, and after some more struggling the highwayman finally gave in.

"You may guess, perhaps, what was the meaning of all this. The police officers had set the tale afloat about the rich man making a journey.

"It was hinted at and told obscurely at first, but it soon spread from one mouth to another, and they calculated that it would finally reach the ears of the Flying Highwayman himself.

"You see it did so.

"On the night that they had mentioned, the officers entered the stage-coach like ordinary passengers. They sat down on the seats and waited impatiently for the attack of the highwayman to be made.

"I heard them say that they felt somewhat alarmed when they heard the highwayman call out as if addressing others who were concealed by the bushes, but they quickly discovered that this was a mere trick.

"It was a very ingenious stratagem, was it not, gentlemen? The Flying Highwayman was quite taken in by it.

"The officers of course exulted greatly.

"They bound their prisoner securely, and carried him to London.

"Well, after that, his career was short. He was brought up before the magistrate one day, had his trial two days afterwards, was found guilty, and had sentence pronounced upon him, and on the Monday morning was executed at Tyburn.

"After that his body was cut down and brought to the place where he had committed his last robbery.

"Here a gibbet—and a very strong one, too—was erected, the dead body was placed in that singular-looking iron cage, which of course you have all seen, and there he has remained ever since, a terror and a warning to all others who pass by.

"There is not much left of him now except bones, and as they are contained in the iron frame-work, they will remain for many a year to come, no doubt."

CHAPTER DCCLIX.

CLAUDE DUVAL FINDS HIMSELF IN A SITUATION OF EXTREME PERIL.

Claude Duval shuddered, for the landlord's words brought vividly back to his recollection the frightful sight that he had seen, and which so terrified his horse.

The movement was not noticed by any of the guests, and to recover his composure, he cried:

"More punch, landlord—more punch; it's a gloomy tale you've been telling us—enough to chill one's blood. Bring in more punch!"

This order was obeyed, and for some time the conversation turned upon subjects to which the landlord's narrative gave rise.

In the interest that had been felt ever since the Flying Highwayman had been mentioned, all forgot the traveller who had left the room ostensibly with the view of looking after his horse before retiring to rest.

It was strange he had not returned in order to bid the company good night, yet he might have retired without doing so.

Whether or not, no one bestowed a thought upon him—his existence was totally forgotten.

By this time the storm had almost passed over.

The rain was still falling, but only slowly, giving every indication of ceasing in the course of a few moments.

Perceiving this, Claude rose.

He did not feel altogether easy in his mind.

There was a slight degree of nervousness perceptible in his manner, as he said.

"I must leave you now, gentlemen all, to continue my journey; the storm is over and time is precious."

"Will you not stay all night?" said the landlord.

"No, no—that is impossible; I have a particular appointment that I should not like to break, and yet I fear I have almost stayed too long. However, my horse must make up for that."

"He has been well attended to, I'll warrant," said the landlord. "I have one of the best ostlers in the county, and he's as faithful as any human being can be."

"I'll reward him for his trouble," said Claude. "No doubt he has attended to my horse, so once more, good night, gentlemen."

Claude was just about to leave the room, when suddenly the outer door of the inn was burst open with a tremendous crash.

"Into the room," said a voice—"into the room! Be quick, and you will have him before he knows what's the matter. I saw him through the window sitting in front of the fire where I left him!"

There was a rapid rush of feet, and Claude perceived a small body of police officers, who looked as though they belonged to some country town.

They were not Bow Street officers, he was certain.

For a second Claude was uncertain what to do.

It might be that the story he had heard unnerved him somewhat.

The voice which had spoken, however, he recognised as being that of the man who had left the room on the pretext of looking after his steed.

This at once accounted for the presence of the officers, and made all clear to the highwayman.

This man had recognised Claude, and as soon as he could leave the room without exciting suspicion he had done so.

Then, greatly to the ostler's surprise, he mounted his horse and rode off.

His destination was a small town about five miles off, and where he knew constables were to be found.

He made a tremendous uproar at the station, and in a breathless, excited way, communicated the astounding intelligence that Claude Duval was at that moment seated quietly in a roadside inn.

The officers at first refused to believe him; but as he persisted in his story they at last consented to accompany him.

They had approached the house as noiselessly and carefully as they could.

The traveller had gone first as a kind of spy.

He peeped through the window, and there caught sight of Claude Duval sitting just in the same position he was when he left him.

"Now," he cried to the officers, "the front door is only on the latch—open it, and rush in as rapidly as you can! The door of the room where he is is the first on your left hand—you cannot fail to secure him!"

So the officers thought, especially as they numbered six altogether.

Claude comprehended the extent of his danger in an instant.

Then he recollected with particular distinctness the account the landlord had given him of the Flying Highwayman, and the means by which he had escaped from the police officers on one occasion.

That means he resolved to try himself.

Closing the door rapidly, he, to the great astonishment of the guests assembled, sprang on to the table close under the window, and sprang through the casement with the agility of a harlequin.

He disappeared just as the police officers opened the door and entered the room.

The confusion was so great that at first they could scarcely comprehend what had happened.

As soon as they learned beyond a doubt that the man they wanted had jumped through the window, they hastened off down the passage and out of the back door into the yard.

Claude, in taking his leap, had as well as he was able pulled his felt hat as low as he could over his face, so as to protect it from injury.

The window was one of those formed by numerous small diamond panes set in lead.

A casement of this description would offer scarce any resistance to the passage of a heavy body through it.

Claude fell on his hands and knees in the yard.

He was bruised and hurt severely; but he had no time to think of personal injuries.

He sprang to his feet, and ran to the door of the stable.

There, and there only, was his hope of escape.

Luckily, the door opened to his touch, and he found himself face to face with the ostler, who stared at him in astonishment.

He rubbed his eyes furiously, for he had been awoke out of a sound sleep by the crashing of glass.

Claude Duval was ready to despair.

A lantern was burning in the stable, and by the aid of that he saw his horse.

But, contrary to his instructions, he saw that the saddle and bridle had been removed.

To replace these articles before the officers entered the stable would be impossible.

What, then, was he to do?

How could he contend with such a large body of his foes? for he fully calculated that the officers would be reinforced by the people who had been sitting in the kitchen drinking punch at his expense.

His only hope lay with the ostler, and that hope was so frail a one as scarcely to be worthy of being called a hope at all.

Yet he clutched at it as drowning men will clutch at a straw, as being the only tangible thing to seize hold of, and be saved from destruction.

He recollected, too, what the landlord had said about the ostler's faithfulness.

"Hide me!" he cried, excitedly, as he closed the door of the stable, and placed his back against it—"hide me!—conceal me somewhere!"

"Hide you?"

"Yes, the officers are after me—they will be here in another second! No matter what reward they offer you to give me up, refuse to do so, and I will give you double the amount!"

The ostler rubbed his eyes again.

He was bewildered.

"Do you hear?" said Claude. "Hide me somewhere! Another moment, and it will be too late! Hark, the officers are coming now!"

"How can I hide you?"

"Will you do it?" asked Claude—"will you promise to be faithful—not to betray me? If you will, you shall name your own reward!"

"It's a bargain—I've passed my word! But now, where to hide you I don't know."

"I will show you," said Claude.

He could hear the trampling of the officers as they crossed the yard.

There was a wooden bar he had not previously seen, that was standing against the wall.

He comprehended its use instantly.

Placing it in the staples provided for it, he secured the door by its means.

"Now," he said, "if you will only hide me in some place or other and tell the officers that you have not seen me—that I have not entered the stable—all will be well."

"But what will they think of finding the door fastened?"

"Tell them," said Claude, reflectively—"say that you were asleep."

"All right, I'll do it now."

The light in the stable was dim indeed, but by the aid of it, Claude was looking around him on all sides for some hiding-place.

He saw that under each manger was a small heap of straw.

He thought he might hide himself here, and cover himself over with the straw.

He shrank from adopting such a very poor and easily-discovered hiding-place, yet there was no other.

His hesitation was put a stop to by the officers knocking at the door.

He explained his intention to the ostler, who slapped his thigh with exultation.

"I have it," he said—"I have it! I'll put you safe enough, I'll warrant! There's a horse here—the most vicious brute that ever was known—but he doesn't mind me—I can do what I like with him; I'll put you under that manger, and cover you over with straw."

"Come on then—quick!"

'Be careful," said the ostler. "Let me go first, for he kicks furiously!"

It was in truth a vicious-looking creature that the ostler alluded to.

It put down its ears, and looked round as though it would afford it very great pleasure to have inflicted a very serious injury on some one

But seeing the ostler its behaviour altered.

From constant companionship, this man had obtained complete mastery over it, which was more than anyone else ever had.

He walked up to it, and, seizing hold of the halter, patted it on the neck.

"Now," he said, addressing Claude, "be quick!"

Claude did not need telling.

He pulled out the straw, and crept under the manger with amazing rapidity.

The ostler covered him up again, and certainly no one could have told, by outward inspection that anyone was concealed there.

All this that we have been compelled to describe at great length, took place with a rapidity truly marvellous.

But by this time the knocking at the door had grown very loud.

"Who's there?" growled the ostler, going towards it.

"Open—open!" said a voice—"open quickly!"

"All right," he replied, and as he spoke he removed the bar.

"Seize that man," said a voice—"keep him fast prisoner!"

The ostler was instantly seized by a couple of police officers.

He looked around him in great amazement.

"What be the matter?" he said—"what is it? What have I done?"

"Why didn't you open the door when we knocked?"

"I did."

"But when we knocked the first time?"

"I was asleep up in the loft, and as soon as I could I slipped on my things and came down."

The ostler was only partially dressed, so that his appearance agreed with what he said.

"It's all right," said the landlord—"you can trust him."

CHAPTER DCCLX.

THE OFFICERS ARE VERY NEAR DISCOVERING CLAUDE'S HIDING-PLACE.

THE officers looked at one another doubtfully and suspiciously.

Then the one in command, turning to the ostler, said:

"Do you mean to say that you have been asleep in the loft till now?"

"Yes, I do."

"And when you went up in the loft did you fasten the door?"

"I did—I put the bar across it."

"And how long ago is it since you went up to keep?"

"Oh, a goodish bit now; perhaps an hour, perhaps two—I don't know exactly But what have I done?—why am I made prisoner?"

"Release him," said the one in command; "but just keep an eye on his movements."

"It is a most singular thing," said one. "I could have sworn that he would have run to the stable the first thing; but he doesn't appear to have done so."

"You are right; and yet, where can he have gone?"

"That's the mystery. Let us look again."

The officers took down the lantern that was hanging in the stable, and went out into the yard again.

There was the broken window; but as the yard was paved all over with stones, they could not see where the highwayman fell, nor could they track him by his footsteps.

"He must be hiding somewhere close at hand—that's the fact o' the matter. Look all about, my lads—he can't be far off"

"Where's his horse?" said another voice—"where's his horse?"

"In the stable, I suppose; let's go and look."

To the stable they went accordingly.

The traveller who had been the means of creating all this disturbance went with them.

He was frantic almost to think that he should have missed the reward by such a hair's-breadth.

"There's his horse!" he cried, pointing it out—"there it is."

"How do you know that?"

"Why, I asked the ostler when I came out to get my horse to ride off for you. I saw that Claude Duval's had got the saddle and bridle on, and I asked the ostler what was the meaning of it."

"Yes, you did," said the ostler, "and I told you that I had been ordered not to take it off, but only to loosen the girths."

"And what did I say then?"

"Why, you told me as how the gentleman had altered his mind, and was going to stay all night, so I was to take the saddle and bridle off, and make the horse as comfortable as I could; that was why I went off to sleep, or else I should have been sitting up waiting."

This was true enough.

The traveller had given these instructions to the ostler because he thought by so doing he should be making sure of his prey.

All looked with great curiosity and interest at Claude's steed.

"I don't believe he's gone in the stable," said the chief officer; "so now, my lads, let us have a good look all round about; if we persevere, we shall find him."

The disappearance of Claude was indeed most perplexing to these officers.

Finding things as they did, however, it is only reasonable that they should suppose Claude had gone to the stable door, and finding himself unable to open it, had rushed off and secreted himself somewhere close at hand.

A very rigid search was made, but, of course, without any result, for all the time Claude Duval was lying in anything but a comfortable condition underneath the manger.

He was watching anxiously for some opportunity to escape unperceived.

But no such opportunity presented itself.

To have left without his horse would have been madness.

The officers, believing that they must at last meet with success, kept up the search with very great vigour, nor did they cease their exertions until daylight.

By that time they had searched all round the inn for a considerable distance, and had not met with the slightest trace that would guide them to a discovery.

"This passes my comprehension," said the chief officer—"how he can have got away I can't make out. I do believe that now, after all, he's only hiding somewhere about the premises. We'll have another good look, my lads, before we give up."

Some thought he might possibly have concealed himself in the yard, and then while they were in the stable, have entered the house.

There was a slight possibility of this, and therefore the officers searched the house from its roof to its foundation, but no signs of the highwayman could be seen.

All the out-buildings attached to the premises were also searched, and at last they came back to the stable.

This they had not searched—indeed, after what had been said, it appeared ridiculous to do so.

But, after a brief hesitation, the chief officer said:

"We may as well make a complete search, and then we can say so; it often happens when people are hidden that we find them in the place where we least thought of looking."

"But," said the landlord, "if the ostler fastened the door, and then went up to bed and did not open it again until he let you in, how can he be in the stable?"

"I don't know; but at any rate, we'll look."

"Oh, certainly!" said the landlord; "and, as you say, there will be a satisfaction in knowing that you have not left any place unsearched, though there's a loft upstairs, and if he's got into that you'll have a rare job to find him, for it's stacked full of hay and straw."

"We shan't spare our trouble," said the officer; "if we can only find him the reward will pay us well!"

"Of course we all go shares?"

"Oh yes—equal shares—everyone alike, and the 5 shall all have a tidy sum apiece."

The officer directed that the loft should be searched first.

This took a long time, and they descended into the stable baffled and disappointed.

The reason why the loft had been chosen first was because it was thought it would be the most likely place of concealment.

As for the stable, there seemed no chance of hiding in that at all.

All the stalls, except one, were occupied by horses.

"There seems a good deal of litter in some of these stalls," said the chief officer.

"Yes," was the ostler's reply, "I like to make a good bed for the horses, I do—there's nothing like it."

"He may be concealed among the straw!" cried one, venturing the suggestion as a kind of forlorn hope.

"He might, certainly, though it is not very likely. We'll look and see."

The officer took his sword, and went into the first stall.

He poked about with it in all directions, and pretty soon satisfied himself that no one was there.

He entered another, and another, with the like result.

Then he came to the one where Claude was really concealed.

As he approached this horse, the officer noted its vicious look, and the landlord cried out, hastily:

"Take care—take care! Don't go near that brute—he's dangerous to approach!"

The officer thought so too, and retreated several steps.

As if to show that the warning was not in vain, the vicious horse planted his fore feet on the ground, and kicked out furiously with his hind legs."

"That's his playful way," said the ostler, with a grin—"that's what they call horse play! Rather rough, isn't it?"

"Curse the animal!" said the chief officer. "If I'd have taken another step forward he would have kicked my brains out!"

"Beyond a doubt he would."

"Why, how on earth can you keep such a wretch in your stable?"

"Well, you see, every horse has his fault, and that's his. If it wasn't for his viciousness, he'd be one of the best horses in the kingdom, and worth any amount of money; he can trot two-and-twenty miles in an hour with ease."

"Oh, gammon!" said the chief officer—"you mustn't expect me to believe that!"

"You can believe it or not—just as you think proper," replied the landlord. "You see what his temper is like—it's rather ugly, so I advise you to keep a respectful distance."

For a wonder, this piece of good advice was followed.

After the example he had had of the animal's behaviour, the chief officer did not feel inclined to peril life and limb by approaching it again.

But he searched all the other stalls in the stable, and satisfied himself that no one was hiding among the straw in them.

He went as close as he dared to the vicious horse, and looked in that stall as well.

Everything appeared just as it should do.

"I'll be d—d," he said, "if this is not the greatest mystery that ever I came across in the whole of my experience! Where on earth can he have gone to?"

"Not into the stable, certainly," said one.

"No; we might have known that from the first; however, we've searched it, and if we are asked, we shall be able to say so."

"It strikes me," said the landlord, "that as so long a time has elapsed, he has got clear off."

The officers did not like to admit this, and yet they could not help feeling that it was highly probable.

It was broad daylight now, therefore it became much easier to search than it had been.

They went further off, but, as we need hardly say, with no better success than before.

In spite of all this, however, the conviction was strong upon them that the highwayman must be hiding in some place close at hand, and therefore they lingered about the public-house during the entire day.

What were Claude's feelings during all these hours we cannot pretend to describe.

His hiding-place was miserable enough, but yet he was to some extent, reconciled to it, for it had proved a good one, and had saved him.

But as he lay in an uncomfortable position under the manger, he continued to mutter all manner of evil things about the police officers who were the means of keeping him in such undesirable quarters.

CHAPTER DCCLXI.

THE POLICE OFFICERS ARE JUST A LITTLE TOO CLEVER IN THEIR ARRANGEMENTS.

More than once while the officers were searching the stable, Claude gave himself up for lost, and it is certain that but for the viciousness of the horse he would have been discovered and dragged ignominiously forth.

But after the little exhibition of the animal's behaviour, the officers all kept, as the landlord had advised them, at a respectful distance.

Much consultation took place between them as to the course of action that they should adopt.

This discussion was very dry work, so the landlord of the inn profited considerably by it.

They were in doubt as to whether they should seize the highwayman's horse and make that their prize, or linger about the place on the watch, in order to see whether Claude would return and endeavour to repossess himself of the animal.

Some were inclined to take the horse and be off without more delay, but the majority was inclined to watch a little while longer, and see what course events would take.

"I should not wonder if he is not lurking about somewhere close at hand. He must know that he stands a poor chance without his horse, and it is possible he will come to-night and try and take it."

"Then we will be ready for him," said one. "We will sit down in the stable and keep a strict watch."

"No, no," said the chief officer—"that won't do at all,—I have a much better scheme in my head."

The men crowded about him, anxious to know what this scheme was.

"We will get our horses," he said, "and ride off—that is, we will pretend to do so. We will make a great fuss about departing, so that it should really seem as if we did not intend to come back again, but when we have got a little way we will turn back, and try to enter the inn unperceived."

The men were all highly delighted with this proposition.

They believed that its results would be thoroughly successful.

A highwayman without a horse they knew could do little, and as horses were not easily obtained, doubtless an effort would be made to recover possession of the one he had lost.

It was just about dusk when the officers had all their horses brought round to the front of the inn, and there they kept them waiting for some time.

At last they emerged and mounted, shouted out good-bye to the landlord as loud as they could bawl, and then started off in the direction of London at a sharp trot.

The ostler watched them until they began the ascent of the hill, and then he quietly and meditatively made his way back to the stable.

He carefully looked all round the yard, and all about the stable itself, and up in the loft, but finding that no one was lurking near, he took a currycomb and began to groom the vicious horse in an indefatigable manner.

While so occupied, it was an easy matter to keep up a conversation with Claude.

"All right!" the ostler cried, in a low voice. "You may speak now, but not loud—just so that I can hear you—that will do."

"But they have gone, haven't they?" said Claude, without uncovering himself at all.

"Yes, they have gone—that's true enough," replied the ostler; "but it's only a make-believe—a sham. They intend turning back in a little while, and then they will keep a very close watch, for they fancy you will come back for your horse."

"What's to be done?" said Claude.

"I don't know," replied the ostler—"leastways, I should recommend you to cut and run for it at once."

"I have a good mind to do so; but can I get away unperceived?"

"We must try. Of course I don't dispute but what you might be under the manger for a week without anyone being the wiser; but then, the officers, if they find you don't make your appearance, will go off and take your horse with them."

"And that won't do," said Claude—"he's too good a one to be spared."

"You are right enough there," said the ostler—"he's a real good 'un. I've paid great attention to him, and when he gets outside I know he'll go like the wind."

"But," said Claude, "if I ride away now and manage to get off unperceived, how shall you fare? The officers will naturally want to know what has become of my horse, and then what excuse shall you make to them?"

"Well, I haven't thought of that, to tell the truth," said the ostler, rubbing his head with a perplexed air; "but I should think that's a difficulty that might be got over."

"How long do you think those officers will be away?"

"Not long. I know for certain they will only go just far enough to make it appear as though they had really left the neighbourhood;—then they will come back quietly."

Claude remained for some time in thought.

So far as his own safety was concerned, he was certainly right enough.

He could have mounted his horse and galloped off, and bade defiance to the officers.

But in doing this he would bring the ostler, who had befriended him, into very serious danger—in fact, the man would be liable to transportation.

Claude was too generous to think of sacrificing one who had done him such a good turn, and for this reason he remained pondering over his position.

"I tell you what it is," said the ostler, after a pause—"if you don't start off now, you'll have no chance—you will certainly lose your horse, if no more; and then, you might be found out, although you have escaped so well at present."

"Yes, and I am tired of being here," said Claude, "and that's the truth. I have friends, too, who will be full of anxiety on my account."

"Well, look here," said the ostler—"you ride off and make sure of your own safety, and when the officers come back and ask me where your horse is, I will declare that he has run out of the stable, and that I could not overtake him."

"But I should think you will have great difficulty in making the officers believe that."

"I don't know," was the answer. "I rather think I can manage it. I will break the rope of the halter, and swear the horse did it, and I will throw the blame on to their shoulders for not having left one of the officers behind to be on the look-out while they went away."

"And have they not done so?"

"No, they have not—in their very great cleverness they overlooked it."

"Well, it's my only chance," said Claude. "You didn't promise to stay in the stable, or to take any particular charge of my horse, did you?"

"No—I never said a word about it.

"Well, then, if you were to go and ask the landlord if he would allow you to go somewhere—make some excuse—why, you could be out of the way when the officers return."

"I've got it at last!" cried the ostler. "I know how it can be managed beautifully!"

"Are you sure?"

"Yes, quite sure."

"Then I will get up at once and saddle my horse."

"Wait a moment. I will just have a look outside, and if there's no one about I will call you. Between the two of us we can have him ready in a very few moments."

"Of course we can."

The ostler went to the door and looked out.

It was now nearly dark, and all objects began to look confused and indistinct.

"All right!" he said, returning—"the coast is clear. But wait a moment—I must stand by the horse while you come out."

This was done, and Claude reached the side of his own steed in safety.

"Now," he cried, patting the creature upon the neck, "tell me what this plan is."

"Why, you must know the governor has got a particular job that he wants doing down in the cellar. He's talked about it a great many times, but I've shirked it, making some excuse or other all the time. Now, I'll go to him and ask whether I shall make a commencement. I know he will say yes, for he is anxious that it should be done."

"Good—good—nothing could be better!" said Claude; "and when the officers come, of course he will say you are down in the cellar, and that you have been there for some time."

"Exactly; and when I come up, I will pretend to be as much surprised and astonished to find the horse gone as they are."

"Well, now," said Claude, "to show you that I was in earnest about the reward, take this—you will find in it money enough to enable you to set up a public-house of your own."

While speaking, he handed the ostler the bag of gold that he had taken on the preceding night.

It was very weighty, and contained a very large sum—so much that the ostler rather shrank from receiving it.

But Claude insisted.

"Now," he said, "be careful with this wealth—hide it somewhere for a time—don't let anyone know you have it; and when the opportunity comes, you can turn it to the best advantage you are able."

"Many thanks, sir! This will be the best bit of work that I have done for a very long time. Never you mind me now. I only hope you will get off safe."

"Just have a look round again," said Claude, "and see if the coast is clear."

The ostler went out into the yard, and presently returned, whistling.

"It's all right," he said—"all you've got to do is to be quiet."

"I know; but I shall wait here until you have gone into the house, and when I think you have had time enough to get down into the cellar, why, I'll ride away."

This being agreed to, the ostler again expressed his thanks for his good fortune, and left the stable.

"I shall hide this in the cellar," he said, as he departed, and alluding to the bag of gold.

Claude waited a few moments in great anxiety and suspense, but finding all was quiet, he ventured to lead his horse out into the yard.

It was impossible to prevent a slight noise, but yet it was questionable whether it would attract the attention of anyone in the inn.

Then suddenly springing on the creature's back, he touched it lightly with the spur, and then off they went at a hard gallop, the sharp clatter of the horse's hoofs ringing out with extreme distinctness on the silent air.

He looked behind him once or twice, until the inn was no longer in view, but on neither occasion did he see anything of the police officers, and so he made his way to his destination at a more leisurely rate.

CHAPTER DCCLXII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS FIND THAT THEIR PLAN DOES NOT TURN OUT AS THEY HAD ANTICIPATED.

THE police officers persuaded the traveller who had given the information to accompany them in riding away, and accordingly he had done so.

Some debate took place as to how far they should go; but finally they paused just beyond the gibbet where the remains of the Flying Highwayman were swaying to and fro.

Here they paused for a little while, and had some further discussion with each other, and then, turning back, rode gently and quietly towards the inn.

They pulled up at some distance from the building.

Leaving their horses in charge of one of their number, the rest on foot crept stealthily to the inn.

They entered by the front door one after the other, and as soon as they had all assembled inside they asked anxiously whether any alarm had been given, or whether any unusual circumstance had taken place.

"No—nothing at all," said the landlord—"there hasn't been a mouse stirring since you left."

"All right," said the chief officer. "We will now go into the stable, and sit down, and watch till he comes."

"Would you like anything to drink, gentlemen?" said the landlord. "You will find it lonely sitting there."

"Yes, bring us some of your home-brewed; and we shall be glad of your company as well. If we had a few chairs, we could make ourselves comfortable enough, I'm sure."

"We could," said the landlord. "I'll call the ostler, and he shall do what you require. He's down in the cellar now at work for me."

The door at the top of the cellar steps was situated in the room where this conversation took place.

The landlord opened it, and bawled out aloud that the ostler was wanted.

"Coming, master," he said—"coming in a minute."

The sound of heavy blows being struck then reached all their ears, and directly afterwards the ostler appeared at the head of the cellar steps carrying a candle in his hand.

He was covered all over with sawdust and cobwebs, and had the appearance of having been very industrious indeed.

The fact was, however, that he had availed himself of the opportunity he had to conceal his bag of gold in the cellar.

"Here I be, master," he said. "What do you want?"

"Why, these gentlemen are going to sit out in the stable to-night, and watch for the highwayman coming back. You carry out some chairs, and then come back for the ale."

Not a muscle of the ostler's face quivered.

"All right, master," he said; "I will start at once."

He picked up two chairs while he spoke, and the chief officer said:

"We may as well make ourselves useful, and carry chairs, for aught I see. Come along."

He picked one up as he spoke, and so did the rest.

Out of the room they went, down the passage, and across the yard, looking a very singular procession indeed.

The ostler led the way.

No sooner did he enter the stable, however, than he set up a loud shout and dropped the chairs he was carrying.

The officers were much startled, and pressed forward to know what was the matter.

"Oh—oh!" he cried—"oh, murder—murder! Would anyone have thought of such a thing? Oh, murder!"

"What's the matter?" said the chief officer, who was next to him, and whom he had dexterously prevented from entering the stable by walking backwards and treading on his toes, so that he was forced to retreat.

"The matter?" said the ostler. "Why, the horse has gone!"

"Gone?" cried the officers in chorus, and then, flinging down their chairs, they rushed into the stable in a body.

The lantern that was burning showed them clearly enough that the stall in which Claude Duval's horse had been standing was vacant. Rage and disappointment for a moment or two made them immovable and dumb. At last, with a shrieking howl, the chief officer seized hold of the ostler.

"You villain!" he cried—"you wretch! But you shall suffer for this!"

"Suffer for what?" asked the ostler, struggling furiously to get free.

"Why, for what you have done! This is your work, it is plain enough to be seen!"

"My work?" said the ostler. "Well, I like that rather, I does! Why, you call master, and ax him—he'll tell you I've not been in the stable since you started."

The landlord, hearing the outcry, came running to the stable.

He was naturally very much surprised to find the highwayman's horse had gone, for he was quite in the dark as to all that had taken place.

"Here, master—master," cried the ostler, "just tell them, will you, what I've been doing. Have I been in the stable since they started?"

"I don't think you have," said the landlord; "you have been down in the cellar at work."

"Of course I have! I never knowed a bit about the hoss going at all till I came and seed the stall empty!"

"I don't believe you," said the chief officer; "and I shall keep you in custody!"

"But I can prove an alibi," said the ostler. "Master'll prove it; he knows I wasn't in the stable, so how could I have anything to do with it?"

"No, he was not in the stable—that's plain enough," said the landlord; "I'll answer for that! You know he was down in the cellar when you arrived."

"In course I was!"

The officer gradually relaxed his hold, and then turned round three times.

His next proceeding was to burst out into a torrent of oaths that were enough to have lifted the roof of the stable off.

"It's my own fault——" he began.

"I'm glad you know it," interrupted the ostler.

"I've been a d—d fool!" continued the officer, taking no notice of the interruption.

"Glad you think it as well as the rest!" said the ostler, again.

The officer half drew his cutlass, and looked very ferocious, and the ostler, dreading the consequences of what he had said, skipped nimbly behind the landlord.

"I might have known," he said, "how it would be! How was it none of you thought of stopping here and keeping watch while we went?"

"Well, you know I wanted to," said the traveller, who was more enraged than anybody else—"you know I wanted to stop, but you persuaded me to go with you."

"Well, and didn't I think it for the best?"

"Perhaps you did; but I'll tell you what I think of you—you are a lot of d—d blundering blockheads, and if I'd tried myself instead of riding five miles in the rain like a d—d fool, I should have been better off than I am now!"

The chief officer and the traveller soon got up to very high words, but one man a little more sensible than the rest, said:

"What's the use of squabbling like this? Hadn't we better ride off after him?"

"What's the good?" said the chief officer. "We may as well stop here!"

"Well, just as you like; but I can see pretty clear how things have been."

"Well, how? What's your opinion about it?"

"Why, I think there can only be one opinion, and that is that Claude Duval was hid somewhere close at hand, but in some place where we couldn't find him. He watched us off, and found that the ostler was not in the stable, and so saddled his horse, and rode quietly away, and I should not wonder if he is not half a dozen miles off by this time."

This was such a very probable supposition that all were at once struck by its truth.

It did not tend, however, to soothe the feelings of his companions in any way.

The traveller was loud in his abuse.

"I'll tell you what it is," said the chief officer, at length, "if you don't stop your jaw, I'll take you into custody on the charge of being an accomplice of Claude Duval's! And if I bring such a charge against you, you will have some difficulty in clearing yourself; so I should advise you to keep a still tongue in your head!"

"Me an accomplice?" said the traveller, furiously. "What do you mean?"

"Just what I say. I would advise you to be quiet—I won't stand any more of your jaw!"

The cursing, swearing, and wrangling continued for some time longer, to the infinite amusement and enjoyment of the ostler, who stood behind the landlord, drinking in every word.

At length the officers had a farewell glass, and, mounting their steeds, rode off, leaving the traveller to continue his journey in a state of mind that may perhaps be imagined.

He had lost the whole of the day without receiving the least benefit in return for doing so.

In the meanwhile, Claude Duval made his way towards the Three Spiders.

He had been some time in doubt as to whether he should return direct, or whether he should seek out another adventure on his way.

He did not like to return empty-handed, for of course he had nothing, as what he had taken he had given to the ostler.

But when he remembered that an adventure might delay him for an uncertain length of time, he decided in his own mind that it would be better for him to return, not only on account of his own safety, but for the safety of his comrades.

Finding that he had not returned, they might jump to the conclusion that he had got into some serious danger, and perhaps set out in search of him.

They might even be rash enough to go as far as London, in order to make inquiries.

Of his absence during the day, they might not perhaps think much.

Knowing the instructions that had been given him about returning before daybreak, they might think that he had preferred to lie concealed somewhere when he found it impossible to get back by the appointed time.

But if they did not see him soon after darkness had set in, they would beyond doubt become greatly alarmed.

On his way, then, he was careful to avoid meeting with any person, and he turned neither to the right nor to the left.

The evening was quite young when he at length pulled up in front of the inn.

It was dark, and he was quite sure that he had not been followed or seen by any of his enemies.

His comrades, he discovered, were all growing very impatient concerning him, and they pressed around him, eagerly inquiring what had happened.

They were beyond measure glad to find that he was safe and unhurt, though of necessity he was much exhausted by all he had gone through.

But at the inn there was every comfort provided, and he sat down and made a hearty meal.

He then learned what had happened to his comrades during the preceding night, and when he had been told all his turn came to recite his adventures.

At the inn all had gone on well.

There had been not the least symptom of alarm or suspicion, consequently everyone was in excellent spirits.

Thanks to the rest and attention he had received, Sixteen-String Jack had recovered considerably from his wound.

He was much better than could possibly have been expected, judging from his condition when he arrived.

He was anxious once more to take his stand upon the road, but he had the prudence to listen to the advice of his comrades.

It was determined, after some hesitation, that they would all remain at the inn during that night.

It was already almost too late to start, and besides, the events that had already taken place were in a small degree calculated to excite a commotion.

CHAPTER DCCLXIII

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK MAKES AN EXTRAORDINARY COMMUNICATION TO HIS COMRADES.

As the night grew more and more advanced, Sixteen-String Jack at frequent intervals glanced strangely and suspiciously about him.

They were all seated in a large room at the back of the inn.

The shutters of the windows were closed, and they were quite secure from interruption.

This made Jack's behaviour all the more extraordinary, and it was not long before it was noticed by his friends.

"What is it, Jack?" they asked, curiously. "Why do you look round you every now and then like that?"

"Who?—I?" said Jack, with a start.

"Yes, you—I have observed you several times," said Dick.

"It is nothing, then—nothing—nothing."

"You must not expect us to believe that, Jack. You have got something or other on your mind. Let us know what it is. Why keep it secret?"

"I don't know why, but I will tell you if you like."

"Yes, do so—do so."

"I shall only get laughed at for my pains, I know; and when I have told you, you will say that it is nothing."

"Well, let us hear it first, Jack, and then we can judge."

Again the highwayman gave that sudden look all round the room, and then he fixed his eyes upon the fire.

The strangeness of his demeanour produced a deep and immediate effect upon all.

There was not one whose imagination was not quickened into unusual activity, and they wondered what it was they were about to hear.

"I know you will laugh at me," said Jack. "I am quite prepared for it, so I will tell you in as few words as I can."

"Well, begin. You said that before, or something very like it."

"Well, you know the room in which I have slept is just over this. At night when I have been lying in my bed awake, and suffering great pain from my wound—when all around was perfectly and entirely silent, I have heard something that sounded like a long, deep-drawn breath."

"The wind," suggested Dick, quickly.

"No, it was not the wind," said Jack. "I thought it might be at first and so have said nothing, and endeavoured to pay no attention to it. The second time, however, the night was calm and still—there was no wind whatever, and yet I heard the long-drawn breath or sigh even plainer than I had the night before—in fact, it was no longer possible to mistake its character. I can imitate it, and then you can tell me whether you think the wind would produce such a sound."

Jack paused, and drew in his breath until his lungs were fully expanded, then he slowly exhaled it.

"There," he said—"that was the sound, as nearly as I can imitate it, but it was more deep-drawn, and lasted longer."

A momentary silence followed, during which they all looked curiously and inquiringly into each other's faces.

Maud and Ellen were both very pale, and even Dick himself felt his heart flutter strangely, for there was great impressiveness in the manner in which Jack spoke.

"But," said Tom King, "it seems to me that the wind could easily produce such a sound as that, or even a stranger one. Do you remember, Dick, when we were at Durley Chine what a strange noise we heard there, and how we discovered that it was caused by the wind alone?"

"I do," said Dick—"I perfectly recollect, and such must be the explanation of the sound Jack has heard."

"It may be so," was the reply. "I confess I thought so myself, and therefore said nothing. I wondered whether the sound could be produced by any animal or living creature, and I searched narrowly all round the room and looked outside the window, in order to ascertain."

"And did you find anything?"

"Nothing that explained it. The mystery left in greater darkness than before."

"And is that why you glanced around you so apprehensively? Did you expect to hear the sound again?"

"Partly so, but I have not told you all."

"What else is there, then?"

"Why, the part I have now to relate is that which you will not believe. You will say that I have been led away by my fancy—you will say that my brain is in a disordered state, in consequence of the state of weakness I am in from having lost so much blood."

"Well—well, what is it, Jack?"

"Why, last night, as you were all out, I sat here by the fireside for some time. Tom Davis stayed with me for awhile, and then he left the room. I was alone. I was scarcely conscious, however, for I must have dropped off into a kind of doze. Suddenly something awoke me—what I know not, but all at once I found myself with my eyes open, and in full possession of my faculties. While wondering as to the cause, I again heard the sigh—for so I must call it for want of a better word—that I had heard in the room above. It seemed to come from somewhere near my side, and I looked round. I saw nothing, however.

"The room was dark, for there was no light in it save that which came from the fire, and this was dim and uncertain; but I stirred the embers together, and a bright blaze shot up that revealed all but the distant corners.

"I leaned back again in my chair, but no sooner had I done so than I was startled by the sigh again. I turned quickly in the direction from which the sound came, and then I saw upon the wall a dim, obscure shadow. At first the outlines of it were so blurred and indistinct that I could make nothing of it; but after gazing for a moment I saw that the shadow strongly resembled that which would be cast by a human form. This amazed me not a little, as you may imagine, and I started up, and gazed scrutinisingly around; but I could see nothing by which the shadow could have been cast.

"Clearer and clearer it became; so much so that I could tell it was the shadow of a female—a tall, graceful figure, with flowing robes. I could even see the features, and in her arms the shadow appeared to be holding some bulky object.

"My impression was that some article of furniture in the room must have been in such a position that the fire-light cast a peculiar, distorted shadow of it on the wall, and that my heated fancy had made it resemble that of a female.

"But while I made this reflection, I heard the sigh again. The strange feeling of depression that had come over me now vanished. I resolved to ascertain what was the meaning of all this, and to solve the mystery. Accordingly I started forward with the intention of going close up to the wall, but before I could reach it I heard the sigh again, and I assure you, my friends, I do believe that it came from the shadow, and nowhere else."

"Nonsense—nonsense!" said Dick—"you must have been delirious!"

"No," said Jack, "I was not. That sigh arrested my steps, and then I saw the shadow move slowly and gently along the wall until it came to a dark corner—then I saw it no more."

Incredible as this narrative may have appeared, all those who heard it shivered slightly, and could not avoid casting hasty glances around them, as though they half expected to see the shadow of which Jack spoke.

There was a silence for several moments, and it might have continued longer had not Jack himself broke it.

"That was what I was looking for," he said—"that was why I glanced around—I wondered whether we should see the shadow again to-night. Whether we do or not, it was no fancy—no delusion upon my part—it was no exaggerated shadow of some object in the room, for how was it that it disappeared? I sat down in the chair again and looked at the wall steadfastly, but the shadow was no longer there."

"It is a most extraordinary tale," said Dick, "and, in spite of all you say, I am inclined to believe that you have fancied all this; your mind must, of course, be in a strange, diseased state in consequence of your wound, and that's how it is you have imagined you have seen all this."

Jack shook his head.

"I don't expect to gain belief," he said. "I intended to keep the matter a secret in my own breast and say nothing about it until I had made some further discovery; now, however, you know all, perhaps it will be for the best that you do.'

"It's very strange,' said Tom, "I know that you are the last to allow your fancy to mislead you, yet you must not forget that you are no longer in your usual health."

"I know that, and I admit it makes a great difference. If you think it unworthy of more thought let us dismiss the subject altogether, and talk about something else. If I glance around me again you will know what is the reason."

"But I should like to have it cleared up if possible," said Dick; "anything of this kind is disagreeable in the extreme."

"I know it is, and I am quite as anxious as you are that every pains should be taken to clear up the mystery."

"If we could only hear that sound now," said Claude Duval—"if we could all hear it, then there would be no mistake upon the point—perhaps we should be able to come to a correct conclusion respecting it."

"The worst of it is," said Tom King, "that these sounds are never heard except by one person——"

"Hush!" said Sixteen-String Jack—"stop! I heard it then!"

There was an instantaneous silence.

All was still, however, and the only sound that was audible was the monotonous ticking of a Dutch clock.

"Nonsense!" said Dick. "I am convinced now that it is a delusion of your senses! You say you heard it; but to your ears alone was it audible."

"Tom was speaking," said Sixteen-String Jack, "but I heard it for all that. Keep still for a few moments—let us all be silent; perchance it will come again."

Jack ceased speaking, and by common consent all maintained a profound silence.

Maud crept closer to Dick, and pressed his hand convulsively.

It was evident that she was greatly impressed by what she had heard.

So was Ellen.

Her face was very pale, and she clung to Tom as though she felt in need of a protector.

The others, with their sense of hearing stretched to its utmost extent, remained quite motionless.

In this manner, perhaps five minutes elapsed—it may have been more, but to those who were listening the interval seemed an hour.

Then, clearly, distinctly, and audibly, they heard a sound resembling in every respect a long, deep-drawn sigh—the same sound, beyond a doubt, that Sixteen-String Jack had described to them, and which he had imitated so well.

CHAPTER DCCLXIV.

THE HIGHWAYMEN ARE STARTLED BY THE REAPPEARANCE OF THE STRANGE SHADOW ON THE WALL.

For several moments a profound silence reigned—a silence that not one seemed capable of breaking.

At length, rousing himself suddenly, Sixteen-String Jack said:

"There, my comrades—you have heard it. Now tell me what you think."

These words seemed to have the effect of breaking the kind of spell that had come over all the rest.

Shaking off a certain mysterious, depressing influence which he could not help feeling, Dick Turpin answered:

"It is very strange—very strange, I admit; but yet such a thing as that can, I think, easily be accounted for by some natural or simple cause."

Jack shrugged his shoulders.

"Have your own belief," he said. "I confess I feel in ordinary degree gratified."

"Gratified?—why?" asked Dick, in astonishment.

"Because now you can't say it was all fancy on my part, and that I imagined this sound. It is something real—something that has struck upon the senses of you all."

"Yes—that's true enough," said Dick; "for of course," he added, glancing around him, "all of you heard it as well as myself?"

"Yes—yes!" was the murmured reply, for, strangely enough, no one felt inclined to speak in a loud key.

"You have not seen the shadow," continued Jack. "Whether that will make itself manifest to you, I know not; but I saw it—surely saw it as I heard that sound."

"There is nothing visible now, is there?"

"Nothing."

"Where do you say you first saw this mysterious shadow, Jack?" asked Turpin.

"On yonder wall."

"Well, it's clear enough now."

"But wait a moment. I'll stir up the fire till it blazes brightly."

He did so, and the ruddy light that was produced illuminated the room tolerably well.

It cast strange, fantastic shadows here and there, but there was nothing resembling the figure Sixteen-String Jack had described.

Without exception, all glanced keenly around the room, and while they were thus engaged they were silent.

Then, as before, they heard the long, deep-breathing sound—this time, if possible, more distinctly than before.

"This is almost past belief!" said Dick, springing to his feet. "But, my friends, the mystery must be elucidated, or we shall always be in uneasiness and doubt."

"Sit down," said Jack—"sit down! If we are still, it may be we may see the shadow. I hope so, if only to convince you."

Dick Turpin sank down again upon his chair.

He was certainly not himself.

Either Sixteen-String Jack's narrative had strangely affected him, or else he was deeply influenced by something impalpable that hovered over him.

"Let me entreat you to be silent!" said Sixteen-String Jack. "Do not speak again. Turn your faces, all of you, to yonder wall, and watch it closely. If the shadow comes, we shall be able to note the precise moment and manner of its appearance."

Curiosity alone would have prompted them to adopt this course.

Even Maud and Ellen, although suffering greatly from a nameless terror, turned round and gazed with anxious eyes upon the wall.

How long they may have sat thus immovable and silent, not one could tell.

They seemed to fall into that dreamy, semi-conscious condition which is generally produced by concentrating the whole of one's faculties upon a single object.

Suddenly a kind of chill shudder seemed to sweep over all.

Again came the sigh, louder and more mournful than before, and this time most certainly a sigh such as might come from some heavily-laden and grief-stricken breast.

"It's there!" said Sixteen-String Jack, pointing to the wall. "Behold!"

All saw it—saw it clearly and plainly—dim, shadowy, half-defined at first, but gradually assuming a sharper and more distinct outline.

It seemed to come from the angle of the wall which was thrown into deep obscurity.

A mass of shadow seemed lying there, and from it this figure appeared to emerge, and while assuming this great distinctness of outline that we have mentioned, the shadow glided slowly, with a peculiar movement, in the direction of the door.

Coming at length to one part of the wall on which the fire shone with the greatest brightness, the shadow became entirely revealed.

Then they found that Sixteen-String Jack had described the extraordinary appearance rightly.

It was a tall, stately-looking form, and evidently that of a female.

There were the long, flowing robes of which Jack had spoken, and which could not be mistaken for anything else.

There were the same delicate, beautiful features and in its arms, and apparently pressed closely to its breast, was an indefinable something that could not be made out.

It might have been a bundle of some material—it might have been a small trunk or box, or, in fine, half a hundred things, but it was quite impossible to say what.

When near the centre of the wall—that is to say, about half-way between the corner from which it had emerged and the doorway—the figure ceased its odd, gliding movement, and remained perfectly stationary, as if to allow those who saw it to examine its appearance minutely.

Then, after a short pause, the room was filled with that deep, heavy sigh, and certainly the sound appeared to proceed from the direction of the shadow.

The movement recommenced, and this time it was more rapid than before.

At length the door was reached.

It was standing partly open, and through this space the shadow seemed to vanish.

Another sigh was heard as it disappeared.

While the shadow was visible, not one who beheld it could have moved hand or foot, even if their lives had depended upon their doing so; but as soon as ever the shadow was gone they recovered possession of their suspended faculties, and, as if actuated by one impulse, sprang simultaneously to their feet.

And there they paused, not making a step forward, but gazing with a strange, puzzled expression into each other's countenances.

As before, it was Sixteen-String Jack who first found his speech.

"Now, my friends," he said, "are you convinced?—are you satisfied? You saw there was the shadow there, and no object which could possibly have cast it. Then what can be the meaning of the figure that we saw? Where has it gone?"

These were unanswerable questions, and Dick said:

"Let us wait a moment, Jack, to know whether it really has gone or not, and whether we shall hear the sigh again."

They did listen, but vainly—a complete silence prevailed.

"This is something that we must speak of," said Dick—"something that requires our deepest consideration. Let us sit down."

It was easier, as they then felt, to obey any injunction than to adopt any independent course of action, so they all turned round and sank down into their seats.

Bold and daring as we know the four highwaymen to be, will it be wondered at when we say that now they were completely overcome?

Their hearts no longer continued their accustomed action, and the breath issued from their lips in short, irregular gasps.

"I regret to make the admission," said Dick, "but I must confess that what we have seen and heard to-night quite passes my comprehension. Had we only heard the sigh, I should have contended that the wind, forcing its way through some narrow place, must have produced the sound; but the shadow—the mysterious figure which we all saw—is something that cannot be explained by any natural cause."

"But what does it portend?" said Jack. "Although I have never before seen anything of a supernatural character, yet I have heard much, and especially that a visitation of this kind betokens evil to the one who witness it."

"But I, for one, am not inclined to adopt any such belief," said Tom King, "nor will I. It is true we stand in a perilous condition, yet not more dangerous than we have done for a long time past—in fact, I may say that now we are here we are much safer than we have ever been before."

"I am with you, Tom—I will not believe that the appearance of this shadow bodes any ill to us, and I am even loth to come to the conclusion that it is anything supernatural."

"But remember," said Maud, in a faint whisper—"remember what I—what you all heard in the deserted mansion."

"Yes," said Dick—"that added to what we have seen and heard to-night is almost enough to make people believe in supernatural visitations, but yet I will hold out until I am convinced beyond all possibility of doubt."

"But I have heard much in my lifetime about such things," said Tom Davis, speaking for the first time. "I could tell many mysterous stories—not certainly of things that I have been an eye-witness of myself, but which I have had from the lips of others."

"But in this case," said Dick, "what are we to do? Accepting for a moment the belief that it may be an apparition, it would certainly have some object in appearing to us; now, let me ask, what can that object be?"

"That's hard to say," said Tom Davis; "but I have always been told that the appearance of anything like this either foretokens some great misfortune that is to happen, or else that it is the unquiet spirit of some one who has left this world in some secret and terrible manner, or else some one who has died with a mystery or a secret locked up in his breast."

"Yes, Tom," replied Turpin, "you are right there—I have heard the self-same things myself, though I confess I have attached but slight importance to them; yet, if this really is an apparition we have seen, it must be from one of the three causes that you have mentioned."

"It seemed to me," said Claude Duval, "as though it glided out of the door, and then sighed, as if to entreat us to follow it. Let us get lights and go into the passage; perhaps it may present itself again."

This was a proposition from which they all shrank at first.

"This seems to have affected our spirits and our courage strangely," said Dick; "but come, let us have lights—we will try whether we can make anything further of it."

In a few moments lights were procured, and then, with fast-beating hearts and chilled blood, they crossed the room towards the doorway.

Maud was greatly terrified, and clung tightly to Dick's arm.

She tried to speak and to entreat him to forego this intention.

Claude, who was unencumbered by anything, and who had first proposed this course of action, considered it his duty and right to take the lead.

Accordingly, he flung open the door, and then stepped out into the passage beyond, where he paused.

The others all clustered closely round him in a dense throng.

Then they held up their lights, so that the beams should fall upon the walls.

For several moments they waited, looking with straining eyes around them on all sides.

But they saw nothing.

They listened for a repetition of the sigh.

But the sound no longer made itself heard.

They were reluctant to turn away, for now the mystery seemed deeper than ever.

But they were compelled to do so, for there was no farther knowledge to be gained by waiting there.

"Come," said Dick, "it is useless to linger here longer. There is no more to be seen. Come."

They all followed him into the kitchen.

CHAPTER DCCLXV

DICK TURPIN HAS A MOST SINGULAR AND MYSTERIOUS ADVENTURE ON THE HIGHWAY.

IT was long before our friends could make up their minds to retire to rest.

For a long time they sat round the fire, indulging in many speculations upon what they had seen.

In the end, however, they were no nearer coming to a conclusion than at first.

As the excitement under which they laboured slowly passed away, the fatigue that was the natural result of all they had gone through made itself manifest, and they at length retired.

The remainder of the night passed by in silence.

There were no more strange sounds heard—no more strange sights seen.

In the morning they were half inclined to laugh at their superstitious feelings of the previous night.

The corner from which the shadow had appeared to come, and the wall along which it had so slowly passed, were closely scrutinised, without, however, producing any result.

Nothing of an unusual or peculiar character could be detected during the day.

It of course happened that this was the chief subject of conversation.

It seemed to drive the remembrance of all other things from their minds.

"We are wrong to attach so much importance to something which probably arises from a simple cause," Dick Turpin said, at length, "and I am determined to take no further part in the discussion, for it will come to no good. I think the best thing to remove all these fancies from our minds will be an excursion on the highway."

This idea was warmly seconded by Jack.

His confinement to the inn had been terribly irksome to him, and now he had to a very great extent recovered from the effects of his wound, he was anxious for the time to come when he could once more sally forth in the pursuit of his old calling.

Tom King and Claude Duval also required but little pressing to accompany them.

In vain Maud persuaded Dick to forego his intention.

"Think of what we have seen," she said—"something which made itself manifest to all. May it not be a warning of some dreadful events, that will take place? Might it not be intended to warn you from setting out again upon such a dangerous mission?"

"I should want the warning to come in a more clear and definite shape than that," said Turpin, with a laugh. "Rely upon it that this figure, whatever may be the cause of it, does not concern us in the least."

Maud could tell that Dick was determined to carry out his project, and therefore withdrew all opposition.

But she thought with a shudder of the suspense she should be in during the long dark hours while he was away.

How fervently she longed that she might be able to accompany him. However great the danger might be, she should think but little of it if she was by his side to share it with him.

In that case she would at least know the worst, but while left alone she would be all the time a victim to her imagination.

As soon as ever darkness came, the highwaymen proceeded to the stables and got their horses in readiness for the road.

Their arms they had already seen to.

"Let us hope," said Claude Duval, "that our adventures to night will be somewhat more profitable than they were last time."

Tom King laughed as he said:

"Which is it to be to-night, captain? Shall we all four go together in a band, or two and two, or singly as before?"

"Singly, I think," said Turpin—"it seems to me that we then stand a better chance of getting clear in case of a pursuit. Run into no unnecessary danger, and at the same time, if you find it is in your power to render a service to those who cannot help themselves, do not scruple to turn out of your way to do so."

"We will not, captain, you may depend upon it."

"As there are four of us," said Claude, "I think we had better take the four points of the compass, and go north, south, east, and west. What do you say, captain?"

"Just as you like."

"Well, then, which direction will you take?"

Turpin considered for a moment, and then said:

"East."

"Be careful, captain," said Sixteen-String Jack—"don't venture too far; remember, the east leads to London."

"I know it does; but don't think I shall be so rash as to venture to enter London. I will keep clear of it, never fear."

"And is the same understanding to hold good respecting our return?"

"What is that?"

"To get back, if possible, before daybreak; and if not, to remain in hiding somewhere during the day, and to appear soon after dark."

"Yes," said Dick—"let that be clearly understood. If you do not return by daybreak, we shall not feel uneasy; but if you fail to make your appearance between sunset and midnight, we shall conclude that you are in real danger, and take steps to ascertain what that danger is."

"Yes, that will be a convenient arrangement for all of us."

"Then let it be understood."

Dick Turpin watched his comrades ride away one by one at short intervals after each other.

Then his own turn came.

"Do not be apprehensive, Maud," he said. "I will be most careful for your sake, and rely upon it I shall be back by daylight."

So saying, he sprang lightly into the saddle, and waving his hand as a last adieu, trotted swiftly away.

When, in answer to his comrades, Dick had chosen the east for his direction, it was done almost without a thought.

There was in his mind not the remotest intention of venturing into London, such a course being fraught with danger and unlikely to produce any profit.

As soon as he passed Ealing Common, Black Bess broke out into a canter, and in this style the highwayman made his way along the Uxbridge Road, as it was called, towards the metropolis.

This road now has houses on each side of it nearly all the way to Ealing, but at that time there were scarcely any dwellings further west than Hyde Park Corner.

A dark, lonely, ill-kept road it was—one that travellers avoided as much as possible, because it held out such advantages to highwaymen.

Yet, as it was the only means of communication between London and all other places on the west of it, it followed that, great as their disinclination might have been, people were compelled to journey along it.

Dick rode along, silent and thoughtful.

The fact was that he had proposed this excursion as much for a desire to have an opportunity of thinking quietly over what had taken place as anything else

He fancied that, when seated on the back of bonny Black Bess with the cold air blowing freshly upon his face, he should be able to think with more calmness and clearness upon the mysterious incidents of the preceding night, and so deeply was he occupied by these reflections that he took scarcely any notice of the various objects around him.

He knew very well that Black Bess would not fail to apprise him of the presence of any danger.

The more he pondered upon the appearance of the strange shadow, the more at a loss he became to account for it.

It was useless to imagine that some object similar in appearance had cast that shadow on the wall.

Moreover, there was one thing about it perhaps stranger than any other.

He remembered that as the blaze of the fire sprang up with a dancing motion it threw a tremulous light upon all objects.

The shadows that it cast were in continual and rapid motion, sometimes very clear and sometimes scarcely visible.

But the shadow of this female figure was all the time perfectly distinct and clear; it had not the waving motion the other shadows had; it seemed to be entirely independent of the firelight: and although he was by no means certain of it, yet he could scarcely come to any other conclusion than that the deep, heartrending sighs he had heard came from this shadowy form.

And the more he thought and reflected, the more he felt superstitious influences creeping over him.

Suddenly he started

His ruminations were broken in upon by a kind of neighing sound produced by Black Bess.

As soon as he heard it, the highwayman became immediately attentive.

He knew full well what the sound meant.

Some stranger was close at hand.

Dick listened, expecting to hear the sound of horses approaching.

But all was still.

Impulsively he checked Black Bess, and reduced her speed to a walk.

It was a dark, misty night, so that it was difficult to distinguish objects at any distance.

Dick shaded his eyes with his hand, however, and looked scrutinisingly along the road before him.

Then he fancied he could perceive, some distance off, the figure of a man on horseback, but the horse itself was most certainly not in motion, and Dick wondered why any rider should be stopping thus in the middle of the road.

It was an attitude such as a highwayman would be likely to take up.

Was it possible that he was about to encounter one?

As he continued to gaze he was able to see with more distinctness, and he found that he had not been mistaken.

The horse was white, or nearly so.

Had it been any other colour, it is questionable whether he would have seen it.

Partially covering the crupper and the flank of this white horse was something dark, evidently a cloak or some portion of the rider's dress.

Dick felt immediately no small degree of curiosity and interest respecting this strange horseman, and therefore, almost without knowing it, he sat still in the saddle, straining his eyes and endeavouring to pierce the gloom.

He might continue to do this, however, for a length of time without being able to learn anything more than he then knew.

Clearly his best course of action was to ride forward and ascertain what his intentions were.

Holding a pistol in his right hand ready for immediate use, Dick gave Black Bess the rein again.

At a gentle trot she took her way along the road.

The horseman could now be seen much more plainly than before.

He was sitting quite immovable in the saddle, with his face turned towards Dick Turpin, and appearing as though he was waiting and expecting him to approach.

This was indeed most singular behaviour—behaviour for which the highwayman could not account.

Not one step did he move as Dick came nearer and nearer, and as he occupied the centre of the roadway Dick could only continue his journey by passing close to him.

That was not the time for people to wait on the highway for the approach of another without some particular motive, and Turpin felt more and more convinced that he was about to have an encounter with a highwayman.

Determined, however, that he would be the first to give the challenge, he drew up abruptly, and presenting his pistol, commanded the horseman to hand over whatever valuables he might have about his person.

CHAPTER DCCLXVI.

DICK TURPIN IS MUCH PUZZLED BY THE MYSTERIOUS BEHAVIOUR OF THE ECCENTRIC STRANGER

THE coolness of this horseman was as strange as it was imperturbable.

He took not the least notice of Dick Turpin's aggressive manner, nor did he seem disturbed in the least by the pistol that was levelled at him.

"It is useless to make any such demand of me," he said, calmly, "for I have no article of value anywhere about my person."

"I will not be trifled with!" said Dick—"give me what you have!"

"I tell you again, I have nothing. I set out to-night with the hope of being stopped, and therefore was careful to empty all my pockets."

Dick's astonishment increased.

He considered himself a sufficiently good judge of human nature to be able to feel satisfied that the man was speaking the truth.

"Your communication is a strange one," he said "Why should you hope to be stopped?"

"I have my reasons," was the reply, "and I don't feel inclined to impart them to you at present."

"Well," said Dick, "I have no time to waste with you. It appears to me that this is some extraordinary freak upon your part, though what end it may serve I am at a loss to think. However, I will take your word for what you say, and pass on."

"Stop!" bawled the horseman, as Dick slackened the rein—"stop! I have one question I want to ask of you!"

Dick wheeled round again, for there was something so extraordinary in this stranger's conduct.

"What question do you want to ask?" he said.

"Will you answer it?"

"That depends upon the nature of the question. I can't tell until you have made me acquainted with it."

"Well, then, I want to know simply and truly who you are."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, that is the question I want answered. Who are you?"

"A highwayman."

"I scarcely needed to be told that. That is not the answer I require. I want to know your name."

"Well, then, before I give it you I must know your motive for asking the question."

"I cannot tell you that. If you are the one I seek, and have business with, well and good; if not, ride on in peace, and don't trouble me any further."

"Why not say who it is you wish to meet?"

"Because then you might declare yourself to be the person, and I should have no means of disproving your assertion."

"Sir!"

"Oh, don't chafe, I beg! This is a matter that requires plain speaking."

"You have spoken pretty plainly, but the conversation, I assure you, is quite unprofitable to me, and therefore once more good night!"

"No, no," said the stranger—"don't depart without first declaring your name. Mention it to me, and I shall be satisfied."

Dick hesitated.

The request was altogether such a singular and unheard-of one, and the man's behaviour was so out of the common, that he scarcely knew whether to refuse or not.

He was exceedingly curious to hear something further—to obtain, if possible, a clue to the meaning of these mysterious proceedings.

The stranger, perceiving that he was deliberating, sat quite still and unconcerned upon his horse.

"You are a bold man," said Dick, at length.

The stranger took off his hat and bowed.

"Thank you for the compliment," he answered, "but I don't altogether deserve it. I admit I take things as coolly as I can, but then, you don't know the meaning of my presence here to-night, nor could you by any possibility guess it. Once more, however, will you tell me your name? If you refuse, say so, and pass on."

"It can make no difference that I know of if I do tell you my name, and you shall hear it on one condition."

"What is that?"

"Why, that if you find I am not the person you want that you will tell me who that person is."

It was now the stranger's turn to hesitate.

But apparently he soon made up his mind, for he said:

"Agreed. I don't know what harm that can do me."

"Well, then," said Dick, "my name is John Palmer."

"Is that indeed your name?"

"It is."

"Then I must tell you that it is not you I seek. I am sorry for it, for I may have to wait a long time. I fancied, from your manner, that I was right at last."

"Well, now then," said Dick, "as I have told you, I claim the performance of the condition you agreed to. What is the name of the person you want?"

"As you are a highwayman, perhaps you can assist me. You may even know him."

"If I do, I will convey any message you may think proper to give."

"Then ask him to come here to this spot on any night that may suit him best, for I have a particular communication to make to him."

"Well, who is he?"

"Dick Turpin."

"Dick Turpin?" echoed the highwayman.

"Yes, that is who I seek. If you know him—if you can convey such a message to him—tell him that I am waiting here, and have been waiting for many a night in the hope of seeing him."

Dick was silent for a few moments.

The behaviour of this eccentric stranger grew more and more mysterious.

He was completely puzzled and bewildered.

"Will you deliver the message?" said the stranger, at length.

"There is no occasion," was the reply, "for I am Dick Turpin. Now tell me what it is you require of me."

The man shook his head.

"I can't believe you," he said. "You told me your name is John Palmer. Don't think you can pass yourself off upon me as anyone else."

"I have told you the truth. My name is Palmer, though I am not generally known by it. Most people call me Dick Turpin."

The stranger looked incredulous.

"What proof have you of what you state?" he asked.

"No proof at all, except that I maintain I am Dick Turpin, and this is my mare, Black Bess. Now tell me what business you have with me."

The stranger leaned forward in the saddle, and looked keenly and critically at Black Bess.

"Your steed is black, I perceive," he said, "and of matchless form. I begin to believe you."

"You can do so or not, as you like. You must make up your mind quickly, however, for I cannot and will not linger here."

The stranger seemed to be in doubt, but at last he exclaimed:

"Well, I can do no more than believe you, and if you are deceiving me, the consequences will be serious to yourself, for, sooner or later, your fraud will be discovered."

"Trouble yourself no further about that," said Dick. "Let me know what business it is that you can have with me that has caused you to wait here night after night in the expectation of encountering me."

"It was to request the aid of a strong hand and a bold heart in favour of one who possesses neither, but yet who is greatly in need of both."

"Be more explicit," said Dick—"say simply what you wish."

"It is not upon my own business that I seek your aid. I come here commissioned by another. I was told to answer all questions by delivering this letter, and requesting you to peruse it."

While speaking, the stranger took a folded paper from his pocket and handed it to the highwayman.

Dick took it with mingled feelings of surprise and curiosity.

He unfolded it, and endeavoured to make out what was written.

But this, owing to the darkness, he found impossible.

"This letter is of little use to me," he said—"without you wish me to read it at some future opportunity."

"No—no! I want you to read it now, if you are willing to do so, and to give me an answer to it."

"But I say it is impossible!"

"No, no—it is not! I have provided for the contingency. Wait a moment."

The stranger threw aside his cloak as he spoke, and then Turpin saw that he had got suspended to the belt he wore round his waist a small dark lantern.

This he took off and handed to Dick, who drew aside the dark slide over the lens.

By directing the beam of light upon the paper, he was able to read it.

It contained only a few lines, and these were written in a delicate and trembling manner.

The handwriting was evidently a lady's, and while writing she must have been considerably agitated.

Dick read as follows:—

"The writer of these lines has heard from various sources that Dick Turpin the highwayman is always ready and willing to succour those who are helpless and to defend the innocent from the guilty.

"One in deep distress and trouble, knowing no other means by which she could obtain her end, ventures to ask for the assistance that has been so often given unasked to others.

"If Dick Turpin is willing, let him follow the bearer of this letter, and he will know more."

That was all.

A strange communication, truly, and as mysterious as the man who brought it.

Dick read it over several times before he could thoroughly comprehend its purport.

At length, looking up, he said interrogatively:

"The writer of this letter is so placed by circumstances that she believes I can render her assistance. Is that so?"

"I know not," was the reply. "I am unacquainted with the contents of the paper I have given you, for I cannot read."

"What were your instructions, then?"

"Simply to give the letter to Dick Turpin, if I could succeed in finding him, and then to ask him to follow me."

"But where?"

"That I was expressly forbidden to tell."

"But to what person—who is it that requires my aid?"

"That, also, I have sworn to keep secret."

"Then do you expect that I could run so great a risk as to accompany you I know not where—to see I know not who?"

The stranger shrugged his shoulders.

"I suppose it is open to you to refuse or consent. You are asked a favour, and of course you can please yourself whether you grant it."

"I would grant it willingly if I was assured of my own safety; but what guarantee have I of your good faith?"

"My good faith?"

"Yes; do you not understand me?"

"Not quite."

"Then I will speak more plainly. What guarantee have I that this is not some elaborate plot on the part of my enemies to get me into their power? How do I know but what you may take me to some place where I should fall a helpless victim into the hands of the officers of police?"

"I didn't think of that," said the stranger. "But as I know there is no thought or intention of betraying you, I will give you a guarantee that I think will be satisfactory."

"If that is the case, then, I consent."

"Well, take either a sword or pistol—I care not which—and keep close by my side wherever I go; if you see anything in the least suspicious in my manner, or if you find I am contemplating any treachery towards you, don't hesitate to put an end to my life with whichever weapon you may happen to have in readiness."

CHAPTER DCCLXVII.

DICK TURPIN RESOLVES TO PROSECUTE TO ITS CLOSE HIS MYSTERIOUS ADVENTURE WITH THE ECCENTRIC STRANGER.

THE stranger spoke with an earnestness and resolution that could not be mistaken, and that evidently was not feigned.

But Dick still hesitated.

In spite of the man's apparent frankness and sincerity a doubt or suspicion haunted his mind.

He reflected that it would be easy indeed for his enemies to get up some case similar to the present in order to entrap him.

They might calculate upon the chivalric generosity he had so often shown, and use it as a means to bring about his destruction.

Looking up after some moments' silence, he said:

"You can at least answer me this question. Is it to London that you intend to take me?"

"Yes, if you will come; the lady lives in London."

"Allow me a few moments for consideration," said Dick. "I will just walk quietly up and down for a little time, and then you shall have my final answer."

"As you please."

Dick carried out the intention he had expressed.

Caution whispered to him, and told him to beware.

But then that love of adventure which he possessed so strongly prompted him to run what risk there was, and follow out the incident to its end.

It would be base indeed to lure him into a place of danger on such a pretence, but he knew that the officers of police did not shrink from any stratagem.

He believed, however, that they were not clever enough to elaborate such a scheme as this, for none knew better than himself that there was always a degree of clumsiness perceptible in all their plans.

There was something romantic in the idea of some female, a stranger to himself, requesting his aid for some purpose, but for what he could not imagine, though a hundred things suggested themselves to his imagination.

The more he reflected and paced Black Bess up and down, the more undecided he felt.

He glanced at the stranger, and found that he was still sitting calmly and easily as before, treating the whole matter with an air of great indifference.

"I will go," said Dick, suddenly. "I will take you at your word. I will accompany you. Lead the way."

"I am glad you have come to that decision, because of the pleasure and happiness it will bring to the writer of that letter. It would indeed have been a deep and bitter disappointment if you had refused her summons.

"Lead the way, then," said Dick. "I have not much time to spare, and, at all risks, I must keep a certain appointment I have made at a place some distance off, before daybreak."

"Well, then, come on. But where is your sword or your pistol? Do you remember what I said to you?"

"Certainly. You told me that upon the least sign of treachery on your part I was to endeavour, by one well-directed blow, to deprive you of life."

"That was it. Why do you not make use of the guarantee you were so anxious to obtain?"

"Because," said Dick, "I am going to place trust in you—I believe that your intentions are honest and untreacherous."

"They are," said the stranger, warmly; "but I am amazed that you should omit to take so excellent a precaution—remember what a safeguard it would be to you."

"I would sooner put faith in your assurances."

"Come, then," said the stranger, "if that's your humour let us make good speed. I am chilled through to the bone," he added, with a shiver; "I have been waiting there for so many hours."

As he spoke, he put his horse in rapid motion, and Dick did the same.

Black Bess kept easily abreast with the stranger's horse.

As they drew nearer to London, Dick could not help feeling a slight degree of uneasiness.

He knew that the danger he was running by merely riding in that direction was extreme.

He could not tell how soon he might be seen and recognised by some of his foes.

It was too late now to retract, however. He had given his word, and at all risks he determined to adhere to it.

The stranger kept his horse's head in the direction of one of the most fashionable quarters of London.

But as they drew nearer and nearer to London, those doubts and suspicions of which we have spoken as lurking in Dick's breast grew stronger and stronger.

The man, after all, with all his seeming openness, might only be a creature in the pay of the police, and although he had offered such a guarantee, yet he would be led into a house, and, of course separated from Black Bess.

The subject was an uneasy one to think of, but Dick could not banish it from his mind.

Most certainly, however, he regretted his determination.

At length the stranger paused at the back of a large, noble-looking mansion, that formed one of a long terrace of such residences.

There was a long strip of garden in the rear, bounded by a wall, and it was at a door in this wall that the stranger paused.

He alighted quickly, and opened the door by means of a key that he took from his pocket.

"You had better dismount here," he said, addressing Dick. "Take your mare by the bridle and lead her in."

Dick obeyed, and the next moment the door was closed and secured behind him, so that in the event of danger there was one barrier in the way of his escape.

A groom came forward, who took charge of the two horses, and led them to the stable, while the man took hold of Turpin by the arm and conducted him along the broad gravel path.

Dick felt a strong inclination to shake off this grasp, but yet he judged it would be prudent not to do so.

A settled idea, however, now began to occupy his mind.

Some young men might have decided among themselves to accomplish something that the officers had failed to do.

One of their number had met Dick, and, by an excellent pretence, had contrived to lure him to this spot, and to separate him from his steed.

Perhaps as soon as he entered the house he should be suddenly pounced upon and overpowered by the force of numbers.

This was by no means an agreeable conviction to have in one's mind, and it was by no means an agreeable sensation to pass through the doorway.

The eccentric stranger altered not his manner in the least.

He was calm and indifferent as ever.

The door leading from the garden into the house yielded to his hand, and, having led Dick across the threshold, he closed it after him.

They were now in almost total darkness.

But there was a certain warmth, and, if we may so term it, luxuriousness in the very air they breathed, that told Dick he had entered the abode of some one who possessed a more than usually large share of this world's riches.

His feet sank deeply into a soft carpet that seemed almost like snow beneath them.

"Take my arm," said the stranger, "and follow me. It is not so dark as to prevent me from finding my way, for I am familiar with the place. Come, it will be lighter presently."

Dick followed unhesitatingly.

The first fear that had come over him had now worn away.

His immediate capture had not been meditated.

After going a few paces, the stranger pushed open another door, and then Dick found himself standing in the entrance-hall of the mansion.

One solitary lamp, held by a marble figure on a pedestal, alone lighted up the scene, yet the light seemed brilliant when contrasted with the previous darkness.

A spacious hall it was, well carpeted, and with magnificent paintings adorning the walls.

There were pedestals ranged along each side, on some of which stood vases, and on others marble figures similar to the one that held the light.

What struck Dick most, however, was the perfect and intense silence that reigned.

It was a silence that was truly oppressive.

No domestics were visible, but this might be because of the lateness of the hour.

The stranger did not pause when he entered this hall, though Dick saw what we have described as he crossed it.

"Ascend," said his guide, as they reached the foot of the broad staircase. "In a few moments you will find yourself in the presence of the writer of the letter."

Up the richly-carpeted stairs the highwayman

[DICK TURPIN'S INTRODUCTION TO THE MYSTERIOUS LADY.]

across a landing, until, finally, they paused before a door.

The stranger tapped gently, and, as Dick thought, deferentially, upon one of the panels.

There was no answer; but he opened the door, and, glancing within, said:

"She is not here, but enter."

Dick obeyed, and then found himself in an apartment that harmonised in every respect with all that he had previously seen within the building, but which, nevertheless, far surpassed any idea he might have formed of its grandeur.

At the further extremity of this room there was another door, and towards this the stranger walked.

Again he tapped upon the panel, and Dick fancied he caught the faint murmur of a voice.

The door was opened by the stranger, who stood aside to allow Dick to enter.

"Now go in," he said. "She is there."

With a strange, dizzy, confused feeling in both heart and brain, Dick crossed the threshold.

For a moment he was dazzled and half-blinded by the brilliancy with which it was illuminated, and to conceal this as much as possible he made a low bow.

"Approach," said a voice, in low and gentle accents—"approach, and listen to the favour that I would ask of you."

Dick raised his head, and saw, seated, or rather half reclining upon a couch, a lady, richly attired, and possessed of no ordinary beauty.

But her countenance, which would have looked much better in calm repose, was now distorted by some powerful feeling, but of what character Dick could not guess.

That she was strongly agitated from some cause or other was perfectly certain.

No 160.—Black Ress.

No. 160.

Price One Halfpenny.

Upon reaching the couch Dick bowed again, and waited for the lady to speak, his curiosity now being increased a hundredfold by all that he had witnessed.

"Be seated," were the next words that fell upon his ear, and Dick sat down upon the kind of ottoman to which the lady pointed.

CHAPTER DCCLXVIII.

IN WHICH DICK IS MADE ACQUAINTED WITH THE NATURE OF THE SERVICE THAT IS REQUIRED OF HIM.

A MOMENT'S pause ensued, and then the lady spoke.

"I scarcely know how to thank you for thus complying with my request," she began; "for days past I have been in a state of the greatest suspense, and doubt, and fear, and yet hoping that you would come, for it is you and you alone who can aid me in my present difficulty."

"Whatever I can do," said Dick, "it will be done willingly—make yourself quite easy upon that point."

"Thanks for that assurance! But you look tired and weary; you have doubtless ridden far—permit me to offer you some refreshment."

The lady rose immediately, and with her own hands brought several articles of refreshment from an adjacent sideboard.

"It is better for us to remain alone," she said. "I don't want to have servants here, nor do I suppose that you desire to be gazed at."

"By no means," said Dick. "I care not by how few people I am seen."

"Here is some wine," said the lady—"take it, help yourself, and we will proceed to business afterwards."

Dick complied, for, to tell the truth, he was greatly excited by the strange adventures of that night, and a glass of wine was about as welcome a thing as could be.

The lady reseated herself on the couch, and gazed attentively and admiringly at the highwayman.

When she noticed his broad shoulders, deep chest, and powerful frame, and the resolute air that was stamped upon his features, she nodded her head, as it seemed, approvingly.

Dick set down his wine-glass, and waited for her to speak.

"I scarcely know how to make this confession," she said—"I scarcely know how to begin. However, I must tell you that a short time since I possessed a certain document or paper. What was written upon it I must not tell you, nor must you seek to know: that must remain a secret."

Dick bowed, and the lady, now that she had initiated her subject, continued with great confidence and ease.

"This paper," she said, "which I ought to have destroyed or kept in a secure place, was taken from me by a cunning stratagem—so cunning, that almost anyone would be deceived by it; but that matters not—the paper is gone."

"Taken?"

"Yes."

"Then you want it recovered?"

The lady's eyes flashed.

"I do," she exclaimed, "and something more. But wait a moment and I will tell you all. Help yourself again to the wine—don't spare it; you are quite welcome to anything this house contains."

Dick poured out some wine, and the lady resumed:

"A gentleman—a nobleman, in fact—took that paper from me, and he now holds it in his possession. In his hands it has a terrible influence, for it gives him every power over me, and he does not scruple to put that power into force. It is to me a most vital secret—it is important that it should be known only to myself."

"But this nobleman," interposed Dick—"he is acquainted with it?"

"Yes, unfortunately he is; but at present I don't believe that he has confided the secret to any other breast save his own; he has had no occasion to do so; but, understand me, means must be taken to prevent the secret spreading any further than it has done already!"

These words were uttered in a peculiar tone, and accompanied by a significant look.

But Dick affected to take no notice of either.

"Can you guess now?" said the lady, after a pause, during which she watched the highwayman attentively "what it is that I require you to do?"

"I think I can," said Dick. "You wish me to recover that paper for you, though why you should have considered that I was a fitting agent I know not."

"My sole hope rested in you," was the response. "I have tried every means that I could devise to obtain that paper back again and insure his lordship's further silence, but I have failed utterly and completely, and it is in consequence of this failure that I have sent for you."

"And yet at present," said Dick, "I scarcely see how I am to aid you."

"Indeed! Is it possible? Why, I took you to be a man of daring and resolution."

"I think I am."

"A man who would accomplish any object upon which he had set his mind—a man who nightly perils his life to obtain a few guineas, and therefore a desperate man, and careless of what he did to obtain wealth."

"If such is your impression," said Dick, "let me tell you before we go any further that it is an incorrect one."

"How so?"

"It is true when I make up my mind to a thing I bend all my energies to accomplish it. It is also true that I have risked my life a thousand times to gain a sum of money that to you would seem insignificant and scarcely worth stooping to pick up."

"Just so; and does not that show that you must be badly in need of that wealth of which I possess an almost unlimited supply?"

"It does."

"Well, then, perform this service for me—perform it thoroughly and completely, and you shall name your own reward. Do not think that I am not in earnest, and do not be afraid to fix your price too high; no matter what the sum may be that you demand, be it ever so great, you have it, for, as I am now situated, my immense wealth is valueless to me."

To speak the truth, Dick was considerably dazzled by this last speech.

The idea of being able by one desperate service to obtain as large an amount of money as he might ask for was enough to tempt anyone, and it tempted him.

With it he should be able to quit his present perilous mode of life, and in another land live in peace and affluence.

The lady saw that he was reflecting, and remained silent, determined not to disturb his meditations.

At length Dick looked up and said:

"But the precise nature of this service—what is it that you require me to do for so large an amount of money?"

"First of all," said the lady, sinking her voice, and leaning forward eagerly, "you must obtain possession of that paper and hand it back to me."

"And what else?"

Her voice sank lower and lower still, and she bent forward yet more.

"You must prevent the nobleman from making the secret known to others!"

"But how?"

"Must I tell you? Does not your own mind suggest to you in a moment the only means by which this can be done?"

Dick glanced into the lady's face, and was astonished by the expression that it wore.

Surely if murder was ever legibly impressed upon the features of anyone it was upon hers.

There was no need for her to pronounce the words with her lips—her countenance said it so plainly as to be unmistakable.

Dick shook his head slowly.

"I thought you had mistaken my nature, and I find now that you have. You must seek elsewhere for an instrument for your purpose, though I hope you will never find one."

The lady sprang angrily to her feet.

Dick rose also, but slowly and calmly.

"Then you refuse?" she said, with pallid lips and a shrieking voice—"you refuse to do what I require?"

"If I understand you aright—if you mean that you want me not only to obtain possession of that paper but to murder the nobleman who owns it, I say at once plainly and peremptorily, I refuse! I am no brave or assassin to be hired by anyone who may bid high enough for my services. I am guilty and crimestained, but yet not so villanous as you would make me."

These words seemed to render the lady frantic with rage, but by a powerful effort she mastered her emotions and kept down the expression of her anger.

"Beware!" she said, in a harsh, constrained voice, like one making unnatural struggles to be calm—"beware, I say—beware!"

"Of what?"

"You do not comprehend your danger—you do not know the peril in which you stand."

Dick looked slowly and steadfastly around him.

"I say beware how you refuse! Consider what will be the consequences of your refusal!"

"All threats are unavailing," said Dick—"perfectly unavailing; and, let the consequences of the refusal be what they may, I defy them!"

"You speak thus boldly because, as I told you, you do not know your danger."

"And I say that you threaten idly. It is useless to prolong this consultation further. Let me retire, but before I go I will promise faithfully never to disclose one word of what I have seen or heard in connection with you this night."

The lady laughed low and scornfully.

"You would like to retire, no doubt," she said; "but you will find that although it was easy enough to enter this house when I chose to permit you, you will discover that it is proportionately difficult to leave it without my permission."

"Indeed?" said Dick, as he drew his sword from its sheath and held it in an attitude of defence. "Do you mean, then, that I have been entrapped?"

"Entrapped you may call it if you like. But there is yet time to avert the danger that is impending over you. Wait a moment, and you shall know indubitably what that danger is."

She hurried across the room towards the fireplace, and rang a bell violently.

The summons was obeyed in a few moments by a low tapping at the door.

Then it was flung open upon its hinges, and then the man who had behaved in so eccentrical a manner appeared upon the threshold.

"Rupert," said the lady, sharply and quickly.

"Yes, my lady."

"Are those men below in waiting that I ordered you to fetch?"

"They are, my lady."

"What men are they—speak, tell me?"

"Police officers, my lady."

Dick started.

"How many?"

"Fourteen, my lady—the number you mentioned. I fetched them myself from Bow Street. They are picked, tried men, and are only waiting to receive your ladyship's further orders."

"Exactly. That is well. I wished to ascertain the point with clearness and certainty. Now listen."

"Yes, my lady."

"When I ring the bell again, let them hasten here with all speed. By the way, you had better bring them up into the adjoining room: they will then be in perfect readiness. Now go—be speedy, and remember my instructions."

CHAPTER DCCLXIX.

THE LADY FINDS THAT SHE IS BY NO MEANS A MATCH FOR DICK TURPIN

RUPERT bowed and retired.

To say that Dick was astonished at this scene would only weakly express the state of his feelings.

He was bewildered and astounded—so much so, that he was incapable either of rapid thought or rapid action.

So he stood with his drawn sword in his hand listening to the extraordinary colloquy.

"Now," said the lady, with an air of determination, as soon as ever the door had closed, "you understand that I will not be trifled with. Your life—your liberty—rests entirely with my breath! I can destroy both, or I can preserve them!"

Dick Turpin glanced at the window, as though he was half inclined to make a leap through it.

Divining his intention, the lady cried:

"Beware what you do. Look, I am holding the bell-rope in my hand, and I can give the signal in an instant. Let me caution you, too, not to attempt to make your escape in that direction!"

She pointed to the window.

"The depth to the ground is not considerable," she said; "but half-way down there is a large, deep tank full of water. It would receive you, and before you could scramble out the officers would be upon you."

Dick turned round.

"If you were a man," he said, "I should know how to deal with you; but as you are a woman I am at a loss to know how to act."

The lady smiled derisively.

"Come," she said, "follow me to this door, and then you will see whether the officers are really in the house, or whether it was only an empty boast upon my part."

Whether to follow her or not Dick scarcely knew, but she beckoned him, and he stepped towards the door.

The lady opened it a little way—perhaps wide enough to allow a couple of fingers to be placed between the edge of the door and the doorpost.

It was perfectly easy to see into the next apartment.

As soon as he had taken up his station here, the door at the farther end was flung open, and Rupert appeared.

"This way," he said—"this way. Her ladyship's instructions are that you should wait her pleasure in this room. Sit down, and be ready for immediate action in case you shall be called upon."

Like one rooted to the spot, Dick stood gazing at the singular scene.

Having spoken, Rupert stepped aside, holding the door wide open.

Then, two by two, the police officers marched into the room, and Dick, rapidly counting them, found that Rupert had stated their number correctly.

The officers sat down at the table, and the lady, judging that Dick had seen enough, gently closed the door, but she did not latch it.

"Now," she said, in a suppressed voice, "I suppose you have seen enough. You don't doubt now that the police officers are in the house waiting for my commands? You have seen them with your own eyes, so that there can be no mistake."

"But," said Dick, "you will learn that I am not to be trifled with, and, woman though you may be, yet I shall not permit any chivalric ideas to interfere with the preservation of my life."

The lady smiled.

"I am not at all afraid of what you may do. But come, this talk is idle and ridiculous. You see your position: you are wholly in my power, and therefore the best thing you can do is to submit. You have two evils to choose between, and assuredly you will be wise enough to choose the less."

"But what do you consider the least?" said Dick, smiling.

"To comply with my demands—obtain that paper back again, or witness its destruction, and rid me of the man who has penetrated my secret, and you shall be free and placed in possession of an amount that will represent to you an ample fortune."

"It is in vain to tempt me," said Dick. "I am firm—immovable—you will never induce me to change my determination—no, not even if the officers, instead of being in the next room, actually held me by the throat!"

"You are a bold man to speak thus."

"Perhaps I am too bold to commit a base and cowardly assassination, no matter how great may be the advantages to myself."

In spite of herself, the lady could not help admiring Dick Turpin's bold manner and his sentiments; but just then they did not coincide with her humour, and she did not altogether despair of bending him to her purpose.

But just when she was about to speak, Dick interrupted her.

"At present," he said, "you have had all the say. Now listen to me. For all your threats I feel the utmost contempt; and what greater proof can I give you that I despise the danger I am in than by standing here calmly and quietly as I now am?"

"But you know your own safety lies in the adoption of this course; if you ventured to move, or if I thought you had any intention of escaping, I should ring the bell."

"Ring it now, then," said Dick. "I am not appalled at the idea of fourteen officers sitting in the next room. I have escaped them too often to dread falling into their power now."

This coolness—this audacity staggered the lady completely.

She was at a loss to understand the highwayman's behaviour.

Her calculation had been, that no sooner was he made aware of the presence of the police officers in the mansion than he would have adopted her plan without hesitation.

Now she saw him calm and defiant, and utterly despising the danger with which she fully expected he would be overcome.

In this state of things she scarcely knew how to act, and her irresolution did not escape Turpin's notice.

She released her hold upon the bell-pull, but probably this was done unconsciously.

Clasping her hands together, she gazed wonderingly and incredulously into the highwayman's countenance.

"Let me tell you," continued Dick, "that you will never coerce me into doing a thing that I absolutely refuse. Moreover, any attempt of this kind upon your part seems to me ridiculous, and I will tell you why."

The lady looked more and more surprised.

"Supposing, in order to secure my own safety, I gave you my promise that I would do what you required, what guarantee would you have that I should fulfil my promise when I once left here? I should be at liberty to go wherever I chose, there would then be no compulsion, and, having an entire abhorrence of the crime, do you think I should commit it?"

This was a view of the case that had certainly not occurred to the lady before.

The truth was that she was half-frantic, half-maddened by the loss of a paper and the discovery of a secret so inimical to her interests.

What that secret was of course he did not know; but it must have been something of more than usual importance, or it would never have produced so profound an impression upon her, or reconciled her to the idea of committing an assassination.

"Listen to me," said Dick. "I can, in a great measure, comprehend your situation. You sent for me here to render you a service, and I think I shall not depart without doing you a much greater one than you have at present asked."

"How so?"

"If you like, I will explain, but first of all I want to know whether you see clearly and plainly that the police officers are of no service to you?"

"But if I liked I could have you instantly captured."

"You mean," corrected Dick, "that you could call in the officers to make the attempt to capture me. Whether they would succeed or not is another matter; but, putting that aside, as I said before, supposing I promised to do as you demand, what guarantee have you that I should keep my word? The officers would be of no use to you in that case, would they?"

The lady was silent, and Dick repeated the question.

She was then compelled to admit that they were not.

"Now then," he continued, "if you will follow all my instructions I believe I can show you the way out of your difficulty."

"Indeed?" said the lady, eagerly, taking a step towards him and looking beseechingly into his countenance.

"I think I can," said Dick; "but it will be necessary for you to obey me implicitly in all things."

"I will—I will," said the lady, "for I am distracted and maddened by my loss. I want the counsel of some clearer head and cooler brain than I possess. I begin to think now that calling in the police officers to my aid is not the only mistake that I have made."

"I am quite certain that it is not; and now do you consent to follow out my instructions?"

"I do. I will be guided by what you say, for the manner in which you have acted in this hour of extreme peril has proved to me that you are the man to conduct such an enterprise to a successful termination."

Dick smiled and bowed, and then, perceiving that the lady was looking inquiringly at him, he said:

"Call Rupert."

The lady at once advanced towards the bell-pull and laid her hand upon it.

"Don't ring the bell," said Dick. "Have you forgotten your instructions?"

"I had—believe me, indeed, I had."

"I do believe you. Go to the door and call him in."

"What shall I say to him?"

"Nothing."

"Nothing?"

"Yes—except that you may say he is to take his instructions from me and obey them instantly."

"I will—I will."

"Then call him now, for there is no time to lose."

The lady advanced towards the door, and, opening it a little way, called Rupert and bade him enter.

Wondering greatly what could be the meaning of this order, he obeyed; but his wonder considerably increased when his mistress told him that he was to take his instructions from Dick Turpin, the highwayman.

CHAPTER DCCLXX.

DICK TURPIN GETS RID OF THE POLICE OFFICERS IN A VERY ADROIT MANNER.

THAT influence which a strong and powerful mind will always exert over a weaker one made itself particularly apparent in the present instance.

The lady could not help feeling that so far as vigour and acuteness of intellect were concerned she was far inferior to the man who stood before her, and who had shown himself totally unmoved by all her threats.

Now that she had once resigned herself to following out his instructions, their relative positions would be entirely changed.

After this, it was not to be expected that she would be able to regain her supremacy. Henceforth Dick Turpin would assume the rule—he would issue the directions, and she would obey them.

Fortunate indeed was it for her that she came across him at this juncture, for had she found some weak and willing tool, it is hard to say into what crimes, and dangers, and difficulties she might have been led.

But Dick meant sincerely, and truly, and honestly by her, and whatever he advised her to do would be from a strong conviction that it would result in her own good.

That peculiar indifference upon which the man Rupert so prided himself now entirely gave place to another feeling, and that was intense astonishment.

To a considerable extent he was in the confidence of his mistress, though he knew not what the business was that had brought them together, yet, from various things, he was able to give a tolerably shrewd guess.

Dick Turpin did not allow him time for his astonishment to subside.

In a short, sharp tone, that was calculated to command immediate attention, he said:

"Rupert, your mistress has placed herself under my commands. Now, attend to my instructions!"

Rupert bowed.

"Then, in the first place, I require you to tell me what arrangement you have made with the police officers in the next room?"

Rupert looked inquiringly at his mistress before he answered, but as she nodded her head, he replied:

"The arrangement I have made is this: I was told to fetch them here, as they might be wanted on a particular service—if they performed it, their reward would be ample."

"Well?"

"I suppose you understand what that is?"

"I think I do. You mean if they had captured me, the reward for my apprehension shared among them would have been all they would have wished for."

"Exactly; but of course I did not tell them that you were here. I merely said that in the event of their services not being required, they would be presented by my mistress with the sum of five guineas each."

"Oh indeed! and very good pay too. I suppose they were quite willing to come and spend the night upon such terms?"

"Quite willing, especially as they were to have unlimited supplies in the shape of eating and drinking."

"And have you the seventy guineas in readiness in your pocket?" asked Dick.

"No, I have not—my mistress has not given them to me yet."

"Well, then, ask her for them, and go into the next room, pay the officers, and tell them, with as many thanks as you like, that they can return to Bow Street, and that to-night their services will not be called into requisition at all."

Rupert looked startled, but his mistress, having determined to place herself entirely under Dick's commands, said:

"Here is the money—take it, pay them, and be sure that you dispatch them. I particularly wish them to go."

"That's enough," said Rupert, as he took the money and vanished.

In a few moments afterwards there was a considerable commotion in the next room.

But it gradually subsided as the officers departed.

The lady sank down upon a chair breathless and exhausted.

"There," she exclaimed, "now that I have given you this proof of my confidence, now that you again stand in perfect safety, and are at liberty to remain in this house or quit it, as you may think proper, tell me by what means I am to prevent the publication of my secret."

"That is just what I propose to consider. The nature of the secret of course you will not disclose to me, nor do I wish you to do so; the chief thing is, as I take it from your explanation, to obtain possession of the paper that has been stolen from you."

"Exactly."

"Well, if you obtain that paper, in what position shall you be placed?"

"Do you mean as regards the nobleman I mentioned?"

"Certainly—and as regards your secret. You say he now holds you in his power?"

"Quite—I am perfectly helpless."

"Well, then, suppose by some means the paper was taken from him, how then—what would be the extent of his power?"

The lady considered.

"He could make known the contents of the paper," she said, at length.

"Well, and suppose he did, what would be the effect upon you?"

"Ruinous!"

"Indeed? But supposing that it was only an assertion on his part—that he had nothing to back up that assertion with—that, in fact, the proof of his statement was taken from him—would he be believed?"

The lady again reflected.

"He might, and he might not."

"Well, then," said Dick, "so far as I can tell, it seems to me that he would not be believed—he would have nothing to advance in corroboration of his statement; you could easily put it down as a calumny—a slander."

The lady looked as though she would have liked to say that the death of the nobleman would have settled the matter satisfactorily and speedily, but after what Dick had said, she shrank from doing so.

"Now," said Dick, "I will tell you exactly what I will do, and rely upon it, it will be the very best thing under these peculiar and awkward circumstances."

"I am all attention—pray let me hear it."

"Well, then, in the first place you must tell me the name of this nobleman, where he resides, or where I shall be likely to meet with him."

"Well, then, his name is Lord Spindelow, and he lives in a large, white house, situated on the north side of Fulham Green; you cannot mistake it, because the house stands by itself, and there is no other answering to its description. It is surrounded by a very high brick wall."

"That will do," said Dick. "I believe I know the very house you mention."

"Well, then, I have certain knowledge that he will be approaching his own home to-morrow night a little after ten o'clock. His equipage you cannot mistake,—it is a large yellow vehicle, of a very cumbersome description, and it is drawn by four handsome brown and white horses. A coachman and a footman will be with him, dressed in blue livery."

"That is quite sufficient," said Dick. "With a less particular direction than that I would guarantee to find him."

"And is that all you wish to know?"

"Not quite; you forget the paper. Describe to me its appearance."

"It is a large sheet of paper folded up into the shape of a letter—the seal, no doubt, is broken."

"And is there any address upon it?"

"No; the outer envelope has been torn off."

"But how am I to tell which is the right paper when I obtain it?"

"You must not look at the contents!" said the lady, hastily. "You must give me an undertaking to that effect! Promise faithfully that you will make no attempt to become master of my unhappy secret!"

"I swear solemnly that I will not!" said Dick. "But my sole desire is to have the means of identifying the document."

"Then you will find that in one place it has a dark, reddish-coloured stain—a very peculiar stain—one that you cannot mistake, though you may recognise it better if I tell you that it is the stain of blood."

"Of blood?"

"Yes; and now is this sufficient?"

"I think it is, and, in a word, you shall know my purpose. To-morrow night, at the appointed hour, I will stop his lordship's carriage, and obtain the paper from him. I will also compel him to take an oath to keep the whole transaction a profound secret."

The lady shook her head despondingly.

"You doubt my success?" said Dick. "Well, then, I will not enter into my plans more fully, but on the night after next I will be here with the document you want, and I will undertake that his lordship keeps the secret."

The lady gazed at him incredulously.

"Don't doubt me," said Dick. "Unless something cuts short my life in the meantime, I shall be here at the time I mentioned, and, rely upon it, I shall fulfil the whole of my engagements to the very letter."

"Then if you do," said the lady, "your reward shall indeed exceed your utmost expectations! I do not desire his death, but only my own safety. If you can secure that, I shall be perfectly content."

"I will undertake to do it. And now let me again ask you whether you are sure that you have told me all that is necessary for me to know."

The lady remained reflecting for some time.

"I believe I have told you all," she said. "I can think of nothing further."

"Then," said Dick, "I can take my leave. Farewell for a short time, and during my absence make your mind as easy as you can, and rest assured that I shall fulfil my promise. Allow no doubts to enter your mind."

"But it seems to me to be an impossible task that you have undertaken."

"Let me be the judge of that. Now call Rupert. Let him show me the way to my steed. I have a long ride before me, and a particular appointment at daybreak, which I fear I shall hardly keep, for the night is already far advanced."

The lady rang the bell, and Rupert entered.

"Take me to the stable," said Dick. "It is time for me to be gone."

Rupert did not say a word, but, shrugging his shoulders, obeyed.

Dick turned to bid the lady once more farewell, and then followed him.

When they reached the open air, Dick linked his arm familiarly in that of Rupert.

"I don't think you told me what share you reserved for yourself to-night for your trouble. Did you pay the officers all round?"

"I did."

"Then you had nothing left for yourself?"

"No. But I suppose, as this is secret service, I shall be well paid."

"Yes, you are quite right—for instance, I am going to ask you a question with just ten words in it, and if you answer me faithfully and truly, you shall have ten guineas for your trouble."

Rupert held out his hand instantly.

CHAPTER DCCLXXI.

DICK TURPIN HAS AN AMUSING ADVENTURE WITH THE OXFORD MAIL COACH.

"THE question I am going to ask," said Dick, "is this: Are you sure that no police officers are lurking about?"

"Not to my knowledge," said Rupert, honestly. "I told them to go, but whether they thought fit to do so is more than I can exactly say."

"But what is your impression?"

"Why, that they have gone."

"You didn't give them any reason to suppose that I was in the house, did you?"

"Oh, no! I never breathed a word upon the subject! It was against the express orders that I had received."

"Then they would have no motive for lurking around, would they?"

None that I can think of—besides, I let them out at the front entrance, and you will ride away from the back."

"You think I shall be safe, then?"

"I feel pretty sure of it. But I will tell you what I will do, if you like, in order to earn the ten guineas."

"What is that?"

"Why, before you start, I will throw your cloak over my shoulders, and ride out a little way. If I am not molested, you may take it for granted that it will be safe for you to ride out also."

"It will. That's a good thought of yours, and I shall pay you the ten guineas willingly for such a piece of work."

Rupert was, of course, well enough content with this arrangement, or he would not have proposed it.

He went to the stable, and proceeded to saddle Black Bess himself, as the groom was nowhere about.

"I will do that," said Dick. "You saddle the other horse. I question whether Black Bess would permit you to seat yourself upon her back."

"Very well."

Rupert saddled the horse he had brought in a little time before, and having obtained Turpin's cloak, he muffled it around him, and rode out.

Dick watched the result of this experiment with much anxiety.

But all remained perfectly still, so, with a feeling of great security about his heart, he sprang into the saddle, and rode out also.

The police officers were certainly not watching for him, for they made no demonstration.

At a little distance off Dick overtook Rupert, who returned him his cloak, and Dick placed the ten guineas in his hand in exchange.

"Good night!" he said. "Be on the watch for me the night after next."

"At what time?"

"I cannot tell at what time, but certainly between midnight and daybreak."

"Very good. I will be here, depend upon it!"

Dick trotted off, and was quickly on his way back to Ealing.

He was at no loss for materials for thought, for all that had taken place deserved serious consideration.

He fell into a reverie, from which he was aroused by the rumbling of wheels and the sharp clatter of horses' feet.

Looking up, he saw approaching him a large vehicle with flashing lights, which at a second glance he recognised as the Oxford coach.

"The mail is late to-night," he muttered. "What can have happened to it? I've a good mind to make it later still!"

This thought no sooner occurred to him than he resolved to act upon it.

He believed he had yet time to carry out this little bit of business before daybreak, and although the peril of stopping the mail-coach single-handed was very great, yet the amount of booty he would obtain would be proportionately large.

Almost without considering what precise course he should adopt, he stopped Black Bess, and drew out a pistol.

"It is very close to London," he said. "I'll warrant the passengers are all congratulating themselves upon having made the journey in safety. Aha! It will be a good joke."

How to bring the coach to a standstill was the first question, and Dick soon made up his mind as to the course he would pursue in this instance.

When the vehicle was near enough, he raised the pistol in his left hand and fired.

The report was loud, and came with startling suddenness upon the previous silence.

"Hold!" said Dick. "Pull up, coachman, or as sure as you are there the next bullet will find a way into your brain!"

The horses reared and pranced, for they were terrified by the flash of the pistol before their eyes, and the coachman, giving a great start, checked the reins, and the horses stopped at once, trembling with fear.

The fact was, the coachman, believing that all danger was past, had dropped off into a kind of dozy slumber.

In this condition he could drive well enough, for the horses all knew every inch of the road, and but little more was required on the coachman's part than to hold the reins.

The discharge of the pistol cut short his slumbers very suddenly, and, without knowing what he was doing, he found he was pulling the reins with all his might.

Dick was very rapid with all his motions.

"Tom," he cried, in a loud voice, as though he was addressing some one who was with him, "if that coachman moves hand or foot bring him down with a bullet; I won't be bothered by him!"

Then, trotting up to the coach, he cried out:

"You, Claude, cover the guard well with your carbine, and don't hesitate to shoot him if you see occasion."

The name "Claude" of course suggested that of "Duval," and it put the guard into such a state of panic to think that the celebrated highwayman was aiming at him with a carbine that he made the most ridiculous efforts to squeeze himself out of sight into the little box in which he sat at the back of the vehicle.

Then Dick, making his way to the door of the coach, took off his hat and held it out at arm's length.

No sooner was the brim of his hat caught sight of by the people inside the coach than some one, making sure that the highwayman's head must be in it, banged away with a pistol.

The bullet tore a great hole in the felt, but did no other damage whatever.

"Hurrah!" cried a voice. "I had him then—I had him! He's dead for a thousand pounds!"

"No," said Dick, looking in, "you are wrong!"

"Murder!" cried the man who had fired. "Murder—murder! Save me, good people all! I tried to defend you, and now, if you don't stick by me, I shall be murdered!"

He slipped down on to the floor of the coach, and endeavoured to conceal himself beneath the voluminous garments of an elderly female with a very severe look on her countenance.

A shriek and a commotion was the result.

"Quick!" said Dick; "I'm in a great hurry to-night, and if you'll just contribute something all round I will let you off easy. If you refuse, why, I shall be driven to the necessity of taking all you have!"

"It's Dick Turpin," said some one inside—"I know it's Dick Turpin, so the best thing you can do is to spare him something all round, and then we shall come to no further damage."

"You are quite right," said Dick, "and I will give you my word that for once in a way I will rely upon your generosity. See, in my hat: it has a hole in it, but never mind that. Put what you like in it, and give it back to me. I will trouble you for no more than you like to give."

The hat was passed round, but a very small amount was placed in it.

"Is this all?" said Dick, when it was returned to him.

"Yes, all, and pretty well too!"

"I don't think so. But, however, I gave my word, and I will keep to it; but I'm sadly afraid of one thing."

"What's that?" asked everybody in a breath.

"Why, that you will be rather late before you arrive at your destination—that's all. Good night!"

And Dick vanished.

"The paltry wretches!" he said. "They don't deserve to be treated with consideration! However, they will wish before long that they had been a little more generous!"

As he spoke he stooped down, and, without an eye observing what he was about, he quickly and quietly drew the linch-pin out of one of the hind wheels.

"Now, coachman," he said, "you can drive on to London as fast as you like—such a coach as yours is not worth stopping!"

"Well, we shall see about that," was the answer, as the coachman gave his horses a smart cut with the whip. "Wait till I get to London, and if you don't have the officers after you pretty quick, it will be a very odd thing to me! Aha! I will—— Oh, murder!"

The coachman little dreamt of the sudden downfall that awaited him.

He whipped his horses into a gallop, and the wheels of the coach performed several revolutions in perfect safety.

But all of a sudden the wheel that Dick had tampered with went rolling away, and down came the whole equipage with a tremendous crash.

"Serves you right," said Dick, as he stood gazing after it—"serves you right! There goes the wheel, by Jove!"

There was rather a steep hill close to the place where the accident happened, and away the wheel went rolling down it, swaying first to one side and then to the other, but yet going at a tremendous rate.

Then the oaths, and shouts, and screams made up a chorus that was truly deafening.

The spectacle of a coach lying on its side was a very ludicrous one, and Dick laughed heartily.

The horses were plunging about in a furious manner, and it so happened that the coach itself fell broadside across the road, so as almost to block it up.

A sound in the rear caused Dick to look behind him, and well it was for him that he did so.

He caught sight of a body of mounted police officers, who instantly set up a shout.

They had been endeavouring to approach him unperceived.

But when they found out that they were seen, they cried:

"Quick—quick! Down with him if you can! He secs us now! Quick—quick!"

To ride along the road in the direction in which the officers were coming was of course an impossibility.

Then on each side of the highway a very tall hedgerow had been planted—so tall, that Dick hesitated to allow Black Bess the opportunity of attempting to leap it.

In front there was the stage-coach lying in a huge mass, with the four horses plunging, and kicking, and rolling about in every direction.

Such being the state of affairs, the officers thought they had got the highwayman tolerably secure, and so they pushed forward as fast as their horses would carry them.

They were already within pistol range, but Dick speedily made up his mind as to the course he should pursue.

"Forward, Bess—forward!" he cried. "Over it, lass! Now! Hurrah!"

Black Bess obeyed him gallantly, for she galloped swiftly along the road until she reached the stage-coach, then, giving a marvellous spring, she cleared the obstruction, and came down safely on the other side.

The people in the interior of the coach, who had been actively engaged in scrambling out of the window, now uttered doleful shrieks, for they were afraid of being caught by the hoofs of Black Bess.

The officers, seeing this astonishing leap and hesitating to take it themselves, at once brought their pistols to a level and fired a volley, which terrified the passengers still more.

The shouting and scrambling increased in vehemence, and such a Babel of sounds had surely never been heard on that highway before.

Dick knew he was tolerably safe as soon as he had reached the other side of the coach.

Accordingly he pulled up, and, wheeling round waved his hat derisively at his foes.

But he perceived by the look of the sky that morning was approaching, and he remembered the particular promise he had made to return before daybreak.

Therefore, replacing his hat, he again turned Black Bess's head towards London, and, giving her the impulse forward, swept down the hill at a furious rate.

Reaching the bottom, he observed a place where the hedge was of no great height, so he stopped and jumped over it.

Across the meadow, then, Black Bess stretched in gallant style, her bounds resembling those of a greyhound.

The speed was tremendous, and in an incredibly short space of time the scene of this last adventure was left behind.

Just as a faint, dull, leaden-coloured light was beginning to creep over all things, Dick Turpin trotted slowly up the lane leading to the Three Spiders.

CHAPTER DCCLXXII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK HAS A RARE ADVENTURE WITH AN OLD FARMER ON THE NORTH ROAD.

While Dick Turpin was engaged in the manner we have just been describing, his three companions were also occupied with some dangerous and peculiar adventures.

In their expedition we can only follow them singly, and we think that Sixteen-String Jack is fairly entitled to priority of consideration.

It will be borne in mind that this was the first excursion he had had upon the highway by himself for a considerable length of time.

Remaining cooped up in the inn so long as he had done was quite contrary to his inclinations, and therefore he hailed this expedition with delight.

He chose the northerly direction, and at first did nothing but allow his horse to gallop along the highway at full speed.

The exercise was most delightful and inspiriting to him.

Once again he felt the life-blood grow warm in his veins.

"I shall look for some more than usually good adventure to-night," he said—"something that will amuse me and clear my mind of all the heaviness that encumbers it."

Having come to this conclusion, and not wishing to distress his horse any more than he could help, Sixteen-String Jack slackened his speed and began to look around him.

He had got a considerable distance from the inn, and therefore he did not fear to engage in an adventure.

But the high-road on that night appeared to be unusually deserted, and at a gentle trot he rode for some considerable distance without perceiving anyone.

Suddenly, however, a faint sound like that produced by a horse's feet reached his ears, and he listened attentively.

He found that he was not mistaken.

Some one was journeying along before him at a very shambling, jog-trot sort of pace.

"That's a farmer or a grazier on a good, stout cob, I'll be bound!" said Jack, after listening to the sound. "If so, I shall be all right, I'll warrant!"

He quickened his pace slightly, and very soon the sound he had heard became more and more audible.

Then through the darkness he perceived the black figure of a man seated upon a small but strong-looking horse.

Hearing Jack approach he looked round apprehensively, for in those days all meetings or encounters on the highway were shunned—they generally ended in a disastrous manner.

But Sixteen-String Jack put on a pacific demeanour.

Stratagem, he felt, was more likely to succeed in this case than force, for he came to the conclusion that being either farmer or grazier, the stout man was in the habit of travelling much about the country, and therefore he would be careful to secrete his money.

In a few moments, Jack managed to put himself abreast with the traveller.

He took off his hat and bowed, and then, in a gentle, persuasive voice, said:

"Good evening, sir! I see you are journeying my way, and, to be frank, I should be very glad of your society."

The stout man made no reply, but looked [illegible] inquisitively at Jack.

The highwayman continued:

"I think it so much better and safer for two to ride along the highway than one, especially in these times, when Dick Turpin and his band are so much abroad at night."

"Then you are frightened of these highwaymen, are you, sir?" said the stout man.

"Well, I can't exactly say that I'm frightened," returned Sixteen-String Jack, "but I don't like them, and that's the truth. When it comes to the parting either with your money or your life, you prefer saving the last and delivering up the first."

"Yes, that's right enough," said the stout man, "but I don't allow them to trouble me not a bit—I should think not indeed!"

"Then," said Sixteen-String Jack, "you must be one of those who can manage to travel about the country without much money."

"Well, perhaps that is it; but if a highwayman was to ride up to me to-night I should take it very coolly, I promise you."

"Then you are a bold man."

"Well, perhaps I am, perhaps I am not; but any way, I should say that I had no money to surrender—at least, none worth talking about, and I should tell them they could search my pockets if they liked, and if they found more than two or three shillings I would eat my head."

"Well," said Jack, "I don't mind confessing to you that it would very seriously disturb and put me about if I met with a highwayman, and I sincerely hope that we shall not be so unfortunate."

"Indeed?"

"Yes; and that was why I wished to avail myself of your company if you would not mind, for on this present occasion I have no less a sum than seven hundred and fifty pounds."

"That's a dangerous thing to tell any stranger on the highway," said the stout man.

"Well, so it would be, I grant, but then, I know you are not a highwayman—you look to me like a farmer."

"Well, yes, that's partly my profession—I may say that I am half a farmer, half a grazier. I combine the two, you see."

"I thought as much, and you being an honest man, I didn't mind telling you this. I can assure you, however, that it makes me very uncomfortable."

"Well, perhaps it does."

"I can assure you it does, because, although this money is all I possess, and if I lost it I should be utterly ruined, yet should a highwayman present his pistol to my breast I should prefer saving my life to my money."

"And if you threw away your life," said the farmer, "you would not save your money then."

"No, truly, and that's why I may say I have been in a perpetual tremble ever since I started from London, though I have come all this way in safety."

"Well, I'm going a matter of fifty miles further to a place called Dubbleton, if that lies in your way."

"Yes, I shall go past it, and if you will only permit me to ride so far in your company I shall esteem it a very great favour."

"Oh! you're welcome—you're welcome."

"Many thanks, for I think a single highwayman would hesitate to attack us if we were both riding together."

"Yes—I am inclined to think the same, and what's more, I am not afraid of them in the least—they can do their worst."

"But you are in a very different position to myself," said Jack—"you have nothing to lose."

"Well, perhaps I have—perhaps I haven't," was the reply. "But I'll tell you what."

"What?"

"Why, I have not quenched my thirst since I left London, and now I am uncommonly dry. There is a house just round the bend in the road yonder, 'ways make a point of calling The landlord is quite a decent fellow, and a friend of mine. Perhaps you would like to come in too?"

"Oh! certainly, certainly," said Jack. "I am very dry indeed, and my horse will be all the better for a mouthful of hay and water, though I suppose you are not going to stay very long?"

"No—a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes at the most."

"That's all right then, for I can assure you I am anxious to get to the end of my journey—in fact the sooner I do the better I shall be pleased."

"Well, then, there's the public-house," said the farmer—"The Horns, and yonder is the sign."

He pointed while he spoke to an old-fashioned-looking public-house a few paces farther off down the road.

Jack hardly knew what to do about entering it with his companion.

But to refuse would, he knew, provoke immediate suspicion, and if he entered he might be recognised by someone there.

This last, however, he looked upon as a remote contingency, and suffered it to trouble him but little.

Upon pulling up in front of the inn, the ostler came forward to take charge of the horses.

Jack slipped lightly from the saddle.

But with the farmer, dismounting was a very difficult process, and only accomplished after many grunts and groans.

At last he reached the ground in safety, and then walked, or rather waddled, to the inn door.

Jack could not help gazing at him, his mode of walking was so peculiar—but he attributed it to his obesity.

It rather seemed, however, as though the farmer had sat in the saddle so long as to have lost all use and feeling in his feet.

Fortunately the distance he had to walk was not very great, and he seated himself with a sigh of relief upon a bench that was drawn up near the fire.

The piece of furniture creaked beneath his weight, but did not give way.

Jack glanced around him, and was pleased to find that no other customers were present besides themselves.

From the manner in which the tables were littered over with jugs and pipes, it was pretty clear that people had been sitting there very lately.

But the fact was, it was past the usual hour for the country people to assemble, and the house was only kept open for the accommodation of such chance travellers who might happen to call in while passing.

Some home-brewed ale was called for, and the farmer and Jack sat down opposite each other near the fire and talked like old friends.

But the discourse ran chiefly upon highwaymen.

"Why, bless your life," said the farmer, "I have been stopped more than once or twice, and I have never had my money taken from me!"

"But perhaps you never had any for them to take," said Jack, with a laugh.

"Oh, yes—I don't mind telling you how I manage it: on all occasions when I have been stopped I have had some hundreds with me, but so cleverly hidden that the highwaymen have never found it."

"Indeed?" said Jack, growing much interested—"and where might that be?"

"Why, I always put the money in my boots—they are large, and no one ever thinks of looking for cash in such a curious place, and that, I can assure you, is the sole reason why I have escaped in safety so far."

"Is it indeed?" said Jack—"how very strange! You will scarcely believe me, however, when I tell you that my seven hundred and fifty pounds, which I have all in bank-notes, are actually hidden in the very place you mention."

"In your boots?"

"Yes—in my boots."

"How strange!"

"It's a fact, I can assure you."

The farmer looked rather incredulous, and much disappointed.

"I didn't think anyone had laid hold of that idea except myself," he said.

"Well, I have adopted it," said Jack, "and if you like I will pull off my boots and prove it."

[SIXTEEN-STRING JACK POURS THE MONEY OUT OF THE FARMER'S BOOT.]

CHAPTER DCCLXXIII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK EASES THE OLD FARMER OF HIS UNCOMFORTABLE RIDING BOOTS, BUT IS UNFORTUNATELY DEPRIVED OF HIS HORSE BY THE POLICE OFFICERS.

Jack stooped down, as though he fully intended to pull off his boots and convince the farmer that he spoke the truth.

But before venturing to do so he glanced behind him, and very fortunately a stranger came into the room and sat down.

Jack put his finger by the side of his nose.

"Hush!" he said—"we don't know who that may be You will have to take my word for it now, but it's a fact, I assure you."

It was very amusing to watch the farmer's disappointment, however.

It was quite evident that concealing his money in his boots was quite an original idea with him, and he was vexed to find that anyone else had thought of the same thing.

That such actually was the case he could now no longer doubt; but, strange as it may seem, he did not care half so much about Jack's society as he had done.

The man who had arrived called for some ale and sat down peaceably enough.

But Jack did not continue the conversation, nor was the farmer inclined to do so; and at length, having finished his jug, he rose.

"Come," he said—"it's time we started on again."

"Quite time," said Jack, preparing to follow him.

While doing so he watched the old farmer with a critical eye.

He observed that he walked with as much difficulty as ever, his feet being placed very slowly and gently upon the ground.

No. 161.—BLACK BESS.

"He has money in his boots," Jack mentally remarked. "I feel sure of it, by the way he treads. What a joke! I will have it, as sure as I'm a highwayman!"

Little dreaming of the danger he was in, or that he had disclosed his secret to one from whom he ought to have guarded it most zealously, the farmer waddled out to the front of the inn, and with very great trouble managed to seat himself on the back of his cob.

At last the mounting process was completed and Jack nimbly and lightly sprang into the saddle.

"Ah!" said the farmer, with a sigh of envy, "I wish I could do that! Why, you are as spry as a harlequin!"

"I don't carry quite so much flesh as you do," said Jack, with a laugh. "But then, you know, I am a young man, and have to work hard for my living."

"Well, I can't help thinking," said the farmer, as they rode away, "how very strange it is that you should have thought of hiding your money in your boots."

"Well, it is singular, but before I started I wondered where I could put my bank-notes for safety, and while I was wondering, in came the waiter, bringing in my boots. I was putting them on, when I thought how very easily I could fold up my notes and stuff them in so that they would be secure; and no sooner did the idea strike me than I carried it into effect."

"Well," said the farmer, "that's my secret, and when I have been searched by the highwaymen, they have found nothing in my pockets, but of course they never thought of pulling off my boots to find whether I had any money there or not."

"No, I should think not! The highwaymen would be cleverer fellows than I take them to be if they should think of such a thing!"

"Well, then, I don't see that you have any cause for alarm. If we are stopped you must treat the matter indifferently, and say you have no money; they will ask to search you, and you must submit without dread. They will then ride off, and your wealth will be secure."

"I sincerely hope it will!" said Jack.

In such-like conversation as this the time was whiled away as they journeyed onward.

Jack was only looking for some favourable spot in order to carry his design into execution.

At last, coming to a very dark and lonely place in the road, he said:

"Well, I should think, if there are any highwaymen about, they will attack us somewhere here. I don't half like riding through such a dark shadow."

"No; it is the most unpleasant bit of road there is, and it was here I was stopped on both occasions."

"Well, then," said Jack, "judging from that, I should not wonder if you are stopped here again."

"No, nor I. But I am indifferent about it."

Jack laughed to himself, and felt carefully for his pistol.

The farmer did not observe what he was about, so the highwayman was able to grasp his weapon securely.

When in the darkest part of the road, Jack turned round, and pressed the muzzle of his pistol against the farmer's cheek.

It sunk deeply into the soft fat.

"Do you feel that?" said Jack, in short, sharp, sudden tones, very different to those in which he had previously spoken.

"Yes, I feel it plain enough—what is it?"

"A pistol!" replied Jack. "And if you offer to call out, or speak above a whisper, and if you don't pull your horse up at this moment, I will fire; and the pistol is so well loaded that I know it will carry the top of your head off!"

The farmer was completely paralysed with fright.

As soon as he heard this dreadful threat, he pulled up his horse, and sat trembling and shaking like a huge lump of jelly, and quite unable to speak.

Jack nimbly dismounted from his steed.

"Now, then, my friend," he cried, "I am going to find out what you have got in your boots."

"Murder!"

"If you say that again I will fire, and your life will be at an end!"

The farmer groaned dismally.

"I told you," said Jack, "that I thought you would very likely be stopped here for the third time, and so you are. Now, then, off with your boot!"

The farmer made a faint resistance, but very faint, for he was overawed by Jack's pistol.

Some violent tugging was required to pull off the huge riding-boot that he wore.

But at last Jack fairly succeeded.

"Now for the prize!" he said, and while he spoke he turned the boot sole uppermost, and gave it a good shaking.

Quite a shower of gold was then poured forth, and it would seem that the farmer had actually placed as many guineas as he could at the bottom of his boots, and then filled some little bags that he had made in the lining.

He groaned when he heard his money fall with metallic chink on to the highway.

"Now for the other boot!" said Jack. "It's very odd to me if that hasn't got the most in it. Take care! You'd better not try any fun, or else I'll shoot you first and pull your boot off afterwards! But, in either case, off the boot must come, so I will leave you to take your choice."

After many more struggles Jack got this boot off, but no sooner was it in his hands than he said:

"Now, be off with you! I have done with you! Make haste!"

"But my boots?"

"Oh, bother your boots! What do you want with them if they have no money in them? Be quick, I say!"

Jack raised his pistol, and gave the farmer's cob a sharp blow with the butt-end of it.

He flung up his heels at once, and then away he went at a plunging gallop that must have inconvenienced the rider exceedingly, and which threatened every moment to dislodge him from the saddle, and pitch him to the earth.

Jack laughed so heartily over this adventure and the manner in which he had outwitted the farmer that he was fairly compelled to put down the boot and hold his sides.

But aware that it would be dangerous to linger in that spot very long, he quickly picked the boot up again, and emptied it.

Then, stooping down, he gathered all the money from the ground.

For the most it was in gold, though there were a few bank-notes.

While thus engaged, Jack heard distinctly the clatter of horses' hoofs, and by their regularity he concluded that police officers in rather strong numbers must be approaching.

"Confound them!" he said. "What a rate they are coming at! Why didn't they wait a moment longer? I shall hardly have time to pick up this gold."

Indeed, it did not seem as though he would have time, but Jack continued his task with very great composure, although the officers were frightfully close at hand.

But he knew that he would always be laughed at if he galloped off and left his booty on the highway behind him, so he made all speed to cram it into his pockets.

At length the last coin was picked up, and then he found that the officers were almost upon him.

"Surrender! You are our prisoner!"

"Shoot him!" added another voice.

"Down with his horse!" cried another. "Don't let him mount! If he does, he will be off!"

Several such cries as these were raised by the police, but Jack maintained his calmness admirably.

With one bound he seated himself firmly in the saddle, and then, turning his horse's head towards the hedgerow, he plunged the spurs deeply into its flanks.

"He'll be off—he'll be off!" cried the officers. "Fire—fire! Down with him! Shoot him—shoot him or his horse—it doesn't matter which!"

A volley was fired, and Jack's horse gave a tremendous bound forward.

But as for the highwayman himself, he did not believe that he had been struck by any of the bullets.

With loud shouts and cries, the officers commenced a pursuit.

They leaped over the hedge in capital style, and, from their manner, it was evident they intended to give the highwayman a hard run for his life.

But their courage and perseverance were kept up by the belief that one of the bullets had wounded the highwayman's horse.

This belief, unfortunately, was but too well grounded.

Jack noticed that his horse bounded over the meadow in a strange, erratic, spasmodic fashion; and while he was wondering whether the creature was severely hurt, its legs gave way beneath it, and it fell, as if stricken by lightning, upon the soft turf in the meadow.

To disengage himself from the stirrups was to Jack the work of a moment.

His horse was dead, or nearly so, and it was useless to waste another thought upon him—he must bend his energies to making his own escape.

Accordingly, he ran off as fast as his legs would carry him across the meadows.

But he stood a poor chance of escape, for surely the officers' horses would gallop faster than he could run.

In a moment afterwards they came up to the spot where Jack's horse had fallen, and then they all gave vent to a simultaneous shout of exultation.

"Hurrah!" they said. "His horse is down—it's a case with him now! Be quick! Yonder he goes, across the meadow! There—there! Be quick! We are bound to have him—he cannot possibly escape now!"

CHAPTER DCCLXXIV.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK ENDEAVOURS TO FIND A PLACE OF REFUGE FROM HIS PURSUERS.

Sixteen-String Jack heard the exultant shouts and cries of his foes, but so far from being disheartened thereby, he only compressed his teeth closer together, and prepared himself to make a yet greater effort to escape.

The manner in which he bounded over the fields was truly surprising.

Even the officers, although mounted, could not diminish the distance that was at first between them.

It was not likely, however, that Jack could maintain his start for any length of time.

His powers of endurance while running at such a furious rate would very quickly be exhausted.

He knew this well, and therefore looked all around him in the hope of being able to perceive some place of refuge.

Yet, what place could there be that would afford him a protection from his foes?

They were behind him in such overwhelming numbers that it would be folly to attempt to stand at bay and show them fight.

His only chance—and that was a very poor one indeed—was, if he should be able while favoured by the darkness and obscurity of the night, to secrete himself somewhere out of the sight of the officers.

It was in search of some such place that Sixteen-String Jack looked round.

But he saw nothing save one building that stood at no great distance.

This was the only object upon which his eyes rested, excepting trees, and meadows, and the like, none of which afforded him the slightest chance of concealment.

But, then, in this house it was doubtful whether he would be able to get out of the way of his foes; they would surely track him there, and the inhabitants would be most unlikely to secrete him and declare he was not there.

Panting for breath, with his heart beating painfully, and every vein in his body throbbing, Sixteen-String Jack made all these reflections as he bounded on.

But as there was no other place towards which to fly except the house that we have mentioned, of course he bent his steps towards it.

And yet, if the truth must be told, it was more on the impulse of the moment than upon reflection that he thus shaped his course.

He crouched down as low on the grass as he could, so as to render himself less conspicuous to his pursuers.

And this proceeding certainly bewildered his pursuers, for once or twice they got off his track, and galloped in a wrong direction.

This was very favourable to the highwayman—in fact, it was greater good fortune than he could have hoped for.

The house to which we have alluded stood by itself, and was surrounded by a small garden, that was bounded by a low palisade.

Upon reaching this, Sixteen-String Jack cleared it at a bound, and then ran hastily to the front of the house.

He was quite breathless when he reached it, and he grasped one of the stone pillars that formed a support to the portico with a sensation of great relief.

For a moment or so his brain spun round, but, mastering this feeling, he again looked attentively about him on all sides.

His first glance was given to the officers.

He could perceive their dusky forms some distance off across the meadows, but evidently galloping at full speed towards the house.

Jack thought if he could only enter somewhere and lie down out of sight he should escape notice.

In fact, this was his only chance, and therefore he began to wonder which would be the easiest and readiest way of entering the house without creating an alarm.

The front door was fast, so it was useless to attempt to think of entering in that direction.

But at the side of the portico some trelliswork had been placed, and up this various trailing plants were growing.

Over the portico was a window, and Jack thought if he could only manage to climb up by this trelliswork that the window would enable him to gain the house easily.

To make such a reflection as this and to set about carrying it into effect were simultaneous things.

With an agility of which he might have been justly proud, Jack climbed up, and then crouched down on the upper part of the portico.

From this window there came a very faint, subdued light, and in making this discovery, Jack's heart sank within him.

The blind was drawn down, so he could not see into the room; but upon closer examination, he luckily found that the blind was not drawn quite down to the bottom.

A little crevice was left, through which he could peep.

Gazing in, he beheld a large-sized room, that was dimly lighted by a small taper that was standing on a table.

Ranged along all sides of this room, however, were many small beds, somewhat resembling those that may be seen in a hospital or in barracks.

But these beds looked of a better quality, and they were all furnished with snow-white drapery, that gave the room a very chaste and elegant appearance.

This was about all that Jack saw.

But yet it enabled him to come to a tolerably correct conclusion.

"This is a boarding school," he said—"that must be it, and this is one of the sleeping chambers. Now, if I can enter here unheard, or if I can get the pupils to conceal me all will be well; at any rate, I will try."

It must be borne in mind that all this occurred very speedily indeed—in fact, with that rapidity of which thought alone is capable.

Yet, short as the time had been, it had enabled the police officers to get from the meadows close to the palisadings surrounding the garden of the school-house.

If Jack was to enter at all he must be speedy.

To his great joy, he discovered something that had previously escaped his notice.

This was, that the window had been opened a little way at the top, doubtless for the purpose of ventilation. Perhaps it was done unconsciously; at any rate, the window was open, and consequently unfastened.

To raise the lower sash took Jack only a second, though he was careful not to make any more noise than he could help.

Then he gently stepped on to the dressing-table that was placed close to the window, and drew the sash down again.

Scarcely had he done this than some one said, in a female voice:

"What's that?"

Jack crouched down at once.

"I am sure I saw something!" said the same voice. "Don't scream, anybody, because if you do, you know, we shall have the old gorgon at once!"

"But what did you see, Julia?" said another voice.

"Hush!—don't speak so loud, or else we shall be heard!"

"But what was it?" ran in a whisper all round the room, and it was evident that the light sleepers were all aroused.

"I don't know," said the first speaker, "but it looked to me like a man stepping down off the dressing-table into the room."

At this announcement there was an immediate commotion.

But it was subdued instantly.

If they had not dreaded the consequences, such startling intelligence as this would have brought a scream to some of their lips.

But the fact was, that, not long before, one of the girls had declared in the night that she saw a ghost, and all the others shrieked out accordingly, whereupon the schoolmistress chastised them so severely that they never thought of making such an uproar again.

Sixteen-String Jack no sooner found where he was and by whom he was surrounded than a sensation of thankfulness came over his heart.

He fully believed that he was safe.

In a low, whispering voice, he ventured to speak:

"Ladies—dear young ladies," he began, "don't scream or call out—pray don't. If you do, you will cause my death!"

The temptation to scream was, however, very strong indeed.

But they thought of their governess, and the inclination was subdued in an instant.

"I am here hiding from my foes, who are thirsting for my blood," said Jack. "I ought to tell you first that I am a young nobleman, but that, unfortunately, I was drawn into a duel, and, having slain my adversary, I have been forced to fly for my life."

It is impossible to describe the effect that this announcement made.

In their excitement, the young ladies one and all sat bolt upright in bed, and gazed at the intruder.

Their eyes were all accustomed to the semi-darkness that filled the room, and therefore they made out the form of Sixteen-String Jack with tolerable ease.

It is hard to say what turn events would have taken at this juncture but for a loud hammering and knocking at the front door of the house.

So alarming was the sound, and so suddenly did it come upon all their ears, that, forgetting all notions of precaution, they set up a succession of shrieks, and drew the bedclothes over their faces.

The calm, subdued voice in which Sixteen-String Jack spoke reached their ears notwithstanding.

"Now, my dear young ladies," he said, "it rests with you whether I escape or whether I am slain! These men are here, and their intention is, if they can find me, to drag me off to prison, and afterwards put me to an ignominious death. I know if I am captured I must be executed; and that is such a disgrace, that I have determined to resist to the last, so I shall be probably pierced with a bullet or cut down with a sword before your very eyes."

This idea was a dreadful one to the minds of the young school-girls, and they forgot all their alarm in the intense and breathless interest with which they listened to what Sixteen-String Jack said.

They were all filled with romantic notions, which they had derived from a five-volumed novel that one of the girls had smuggled into the school, and which contained a lively account of various young and handsome noblemen unjustly pursued and punished for things they were not guilty of, or which were altogether venial.

CHAPTER DCCLXXV

THE POLICE OFFICERS SEARCH THE SCHOOL-HOUSE, AND ASK FOR THE KEY OF THE CUPBOARD IN WHICH SIXTEEN-STRING JACK IS CONCEALED.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK was well aware that, if he could only excite in their breasts a feeling of romantic generosity, he should be quite safe.

Therefore he continued:

"You heard those sounds—that loud knocking at the door? Hark! there it is again! Can you guess the cause of it? It is the men of whom I have spoken—the officers of justice, who, having tracked me here, are clamouring for admission."

"Go away!" said a voice. "Why don't you go away? Make haste!"

"I am afraid," said Jack, "if I tried to do so, that I should only precipitate my fate. Now I feel that I have a chance of safety."

"What is it?" said some one, in a whisper, anxiously.

"Let me conceal myself somewhere in this room—no matter where—and if you are asked, say that you have not seen anything of me, and that you are quite certain I am not here. Promise to do that, my dear young ladies, and my life is saved, the generosity of a nobleman will always be yours, and I will promise you that I shall make you some day or other, a substantial recognition of your kindness. Say will you conceal me or not? You must make up your minds quickly, or it will be too late!"

The noise of the opening of the front door now came quite plainly to the ears of all, and there immediately ensued among the girls a very anxious and serious discussion.

"Let him hide in the large cupboard," said some one. "Do hide him! Think how dreadful it would be if he was killed here before our eyes. And besides, who can tell what his kindness may prompt him to do for us in return?"

"Yes," said Jack, overhearing this suggestion, "you can conceal me anywhere you like, and I will grant any favour that you may like to ask—I assure you I will upon my word of honour as a nobleman!"

"But what would be said," cried another, "if it was discovered we had hidden a man in our room? What a scandal it would be!"

This appealed to the feelings of all instantly.

"I didn't think about that," said Sixteen-String Jack. "It was selfish and foolish of me, but I forgot it. Don't trouble yourselves any further about me—I am not worthy another thought. Lie down quietly and close your eyes—my life will soon be over, for I will rush unarmed upon my foes!"

This was such a dreadful idea that the young ladies could not bear to entertain it at all, and Jack found that it was a point that told more in his favour than anything else.

"Get into the cupboard," cried several, "and hide yourself there! If you will close the door we will come and lock it and then they will never think that you are there."

"A thousand thanks, dear girls!" said Jack. "I wish I could requite you for your kindness!"

Time was now pressing, for a great confusion of voices and trampling of feet could be heard below.

Jack saw the cupboard to which they alluded, and, opening the door, concealed himself in it without difficulty.

Drawing the door close, he whispered:

"Now, then, if you will lock the door and take away the key, and declare that you have never heard or seen anything of me, I shall consider I am quite safe. I wish I could make an offer of my love and coronet to you all; but, unfortunately, that is impossible!"

This was another dazzling idea, and the young ladies were all so overpowered by it that several seconds elapsed before one of them could venture to slip out of the bed and turn the key in the lock.

But during those few seconds the idea occurred to all of them in a moment, as if communicated by an electric spark, that the one who performed this service for the fugitive nobleman would be the one for whom he would entertain the greatest regard, and to whom he would be most likely to offer his hand in marriage.

The result of this similarity of feeling was rather ludicrous, and well-nigh caused Jack's discovery.

As if actuated by one impulse, they all sprang from their beds together, and rushed towards the cupboard.

Of course, those who were nearest stood the best chance, and the one who had first of all made the proposition was fortunate enough to secure possession of the key.

"There," she said, "I have it, and who is better entitled to it, I should like to know? Oh, goodness, here they come!"

The sound of footsteps just outside the chamber door struck them all with a kind of panic, and such a scrambling to return to their beds had surely never been before witnessed.

They did not attempt to draw the clothes properly over them before the door was flung open, and a voice said, in sharp tones of asperity:

"It is monstrous—it is disgraceful—it shall never be permitted! You ought to be ashamed of yourselves, one and all! I shall be ruined—quite ruined, for who would send their girls to my school after such a night's work as this?"

"The gorgon," thought Jack, as he screwed himself down still closer in the cupboard.

"Well, ma'am," said a gruff voice, "how can we help it? Didn't I explicate to you as plain as anybody could explicate that we had traced the villain to this very house? We're quite sure he must be hidden in it somewhere; and if you obstruct us in the execution of our duty it will be at your own peril!"

"But it is impossible," said the schoolmistress, again. "How could anyone have got into the house without being heard? I am obliged to sleep light—very light—and if so much as a mouse had stirred I should have awoke, so I tell you again I am quite sure he is not here!"

"Well, ma'am," said the officer, doggedly, "we must satisfy ourselves upon that point by making a search."

"But don't you know, you profane man, that this is the room where all my pupils sleep? I dare say, if the truth was known, you would be very glad of the opportunity to search there."

"Well, ma'am, all I can say is, one place to me is just the same as another; so let us have no further words about it!"

"But," said the schoolmistress, "how many of you will be required to make this search? Wouldn't it do for one to come in and look round, because I am quite sure he is not in here?"

"Oh yes, that will do!" said the one in command. "I will go in with you and look round; but don't you be afraid, for if he is there and tries to escape I shall bring him down with a bullet!"

All this was distinctly heard, not only by Sixteen-String Jack, but by all the girls in the dormitory, and some slight, muffled screams escaped their lips.

It will be noticed that all that had been said by the police officers tended to confirm the story Sixteen-String Jack had told.

It was not once mentioned that they were in search of a highwayman.

The door was now opened, and the schoolmistress, with her garments huddled about her in a very singular fashion, and carrying a candle in her hand, entered the apartment.

She was followed by the officer of police, upon whose features was a broad grin, for the whole scene amused him vastly.

The girls pretended to be all in a very bad way indeed, and by common consent drew the clothes over their heads and trembled.

That is, there was one exception, and this was the bold young lady who had fastened Jack in the cupboard, and who still held the key in her hand.

She sat bolt upright in bed, staring about her, for which she was severely reprimanded by the gorgon.

The officer glanced around him.

All was peacefulness and quiet, and he did not believe for a moment that it would be possible for anyone to enter the room without attracting the attention of some one of the persons in it.

But seeing that this young lady was awake, he addressed himself to her.

"Beg pardon," he cried, "for disturbing your night's rest, miss; but would you be so kind as to say whether you have been alarmed by anyone coming into this room?"

"Oh yes, I have."

"You have?"

"Yes—I most certainly have."

The officer looked triumphantly and exultingly at the schoolmistress, as he said:

"Now, ma'am, we shall hear something about it, I rather think."

"You impertinent hussy!" cried the schoolmistress, "but I'll serve you out for this! How dare you scandalise my whole establishment by such unseemly conduct!"

Upon this rebuke, the young lady shrank down in bed again.

"Come, come," said the officer—"just please to tell me who has alarmed you by entering the room? I insist upon knowing, so speak at once!"

"Don't you know?"

"No, of course I don't, or I should hardly take the trouble to ask the question. Be quick, for every moment is of importance!"

"Well, then," was the reply, "I have been very much alarmed, and so have we all."

"Yes—yes"

"By your sudden entrance at this time of night along with our governess."

The police officer rapped out an oath.

The young lady squealed, and the gorgon sat down on the side of a bed, quite overcome with horror at such a desecration.

"You profane wretch!" she said, "why don't you search, and make haste out of this room? I believe it is only a pretext on your part, and I will take care to report you to your superior officers!"

The police officer muttered something that was not very polite, but it was too indistinct to be audible.

"What's in this cupboard?" he cried, suddenly pointing at it with his cutlass—"what's in it, I say?"

The young lady made no reply.

She could not, for terror made her completely dumb.

She concluded at once that the young nobleman's fate was sealed.

"Well, we'll soon see," said the officer, going towards it, and attempting to open the door.

But he found that it had been secured.

"What do you want there?" cried the governess, in shrill tones.

"Why, to look in, to be sure!"

"Well, then, why don't you?"

"Because it's locked."

"Of course it's locked," was the reply. "I should not wonder if the man you want has not come into this room without any of these eighteen young ladies seeing him, and then have slipped into the cupboard and locked himself inside! I shouldn't wonder at all—in fact, I consider it very likely indeed."

CHAPTER DCCLXXVI.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND THE PUPILS ARE ALARMED BY THE SUDDEN ENTRANCE OF THE GOVERNESS.

THE officer muttered something again, and this time rather louder, so that all could tell that it was nothing complimentary.

The scornful manner in which the schoolmistress spoke vexed him exceedingly, while, at the same time, it made him conscious of the folly of seeking there for the man he wanted.

He must be concealed upon some other part of the premises.

Sixteen-String Jack, however, felt very far from comfortable in his present position.

He knew that, to make the best of it, the chances were about equal whether the police officer insisted upon having the key or not.

If he had done so, of course his discovery and capture were certain.

But this danger passed away, Jack escaping by what may truly be termed a hair's-breadth.

In passing out of the room, however, the officer could not resist glancing all around him, and peeping into all the corners, as though there was in his mind some secret conviction, or as if some instinct had told him that the highwayman was there.

But he passed out of the room, and the door was closed behind him.

Now was the time, Sixteen-String Jack thought, for his greatest danger.

The young ladies might be incautious enough to commence a conversation, and of course he would be the subject of it.

If any portion of it was overheard either by the officers or the schoolmistress, they would rush in, and drag him from his hiding-place.

But the girl who had already shown herself to have a mind readier to act than any of her companions again made her superiority in this respect manifest.

"Hush!" she said, in a faint whisper, but which was nevertheless audible all over the room—"hush! Pray don't speak a word, or else we shall be overheard! Perhaps they are only listening outside the door. Now, we must wait until we are quite certain that they have all gone."

Jack heard this whisper, and he felt a thrill of delight.

The danger he so much dreaded passed away like the former one.

The idea that their much-dreaded schoolmistress might be listening outside the door served to deter all from speaking a single word.

They well knew, from former experience, that their governess was quite capable of such an act as this and so they were silent accordingly.

But their hearts beat at a most alarming rate as they sat up in bed listening to what was going on below.

The officers were searching about everywhere, and poking into every nook and corner—of course without the slightest success.

There was just this danger, if the highwayman had but thought of it.

In making their investigations, they might be able to trace his footsteps up to the house, and in climbing up the pillar of the portico he may have made certain marks or scratches that would arouse their suspicions.

In that case, his position was very ticklish.

Indeed, the search continued for some time, and all the while the governess assailed them with a continual string of abuse.

She called them by almost all names, and uttered all manner of threats as to what she should do in consequence.

But the officers stood her abuse manfully enough, though it only enraged her the more to find that so little notice was taken of her words.

At last, however, there was not a room in the schoolhouse that the officers had not been in and searched thoroughly.

They were then forced to come to the uncomfortable conclusion that they had made a sad mistake.

The highwayman had certainly not taken refuge there, or else they would have found him beyond all doubt.

They thought they had missed him, and, in consequence, he was miles off by that time.

"We are done again!" said the leader of the troop, as he passed out into the garden and had the door of the schoolhouse banged behind him. "I made sure we should have him this time, but it's no go! It was you, Jenkins, that said you saw him leap over the palings!"

"It was, sir," said a voice, "and I verily believe I did see him! I might have been mistaken, though, but I don't think it!"

"If he did, all I can say is, he must have hidden himself somewhere else, and while we have been poking about the house he must have taken himself off, and is by this time in a place of security."

There was a strong degree of probability about this assertion, and the officers did not hesitate to believe it, although their disappointment was great in the extreme.

It did indeed seem extraordinary that, after depriving the highwayman of his horse, he should actually escape them.

Leaving them in the garden, however, to take whatever steps they might judge prudent, we will return to Sixteen-String Jack.

The front door was heard to be banged shut with great violence, and the girl with the key said:

"Oh, how thankful I am! What an escape! They are gone—positively gone! It is an escape indeed!"

"Be cautious!" said Jack, in a low voice, which sounded strange and muffled coming from the cupboard. "Wait until your governess and the remainder of the household have retired to rest. Then, and not till then, will it be safe for me to emerge and to thank you for your great kindness in having saved my life. You see that what I told you was perfectly true."

"Hush—hush!" said the young girl. "I believe I heard some one!"

All were silent immediately, and assumed listening attitudes.

But the silence that prevailed was not broken in upon by any sound, so they concluded that she must have been mistaken.

In this manner some time passed—not very long certainly, though to the pupils, owing to the state of suspense they were in, it seemed an age.

At last, however, Sixteen-String Jack believed that it would be prudent to emerge from his uncomfortable hiding-place.

Accordingly, he tapped slightly on the panel of the door, and said:

"Open—open! Let me out! It will be quite safe to do so now!"

The young lady with the key was now in a little bit of a difficulty.

But slipping out of bed, she tapped in return upon the cupboard door, and, placing her lips close to the keyhole, said:

"Promise me not to open the door as soon as I unlock it! Wait until I give you permission!"

"Certainly!" replied Jack. "I am entirely at your commands, and any command you may choose to give me I shall unhesitatingly obey."

Upon receipt of this assurance, the young lady without further hesitation unlocked the cupboard door, and then sprang quickly into bed.

"Now you can open!" she said.

Jack pushed open the door a little way, and listened.

But, reassured by the silence that continued to prevail, he ventured to emerge.

The very greatest degree of curiosity to gaze upon him took possession of all the young girls.

"You have saved my life," said Jack, in tones of unfeigned sincerity, "and I am thankful to you for it! I wish I could reward you in some suitable manner; but, as you find, I am a fugitive, and for some time to come I shall have much difficulty in keeping myself clear of the police officers, so what reward I can give you or what return I can make I know not."

"We don't want anything," said a chorus of voices, in suppressed tones—"we don't want anything, only to learn that you are safe. Make haste and fly while you have the opportunity!"

"I will," said Jack, "for there may be great danger in lingering here. I should like, however, to give you some token by which to remember me, but, alas! I have nothing."

There was a silence at this, from which it may be inferred that they would have been glad to receive a souvenir of some kind.

Jack turned, however, to the one who had been of so much assistance and service to him.

He approached near enough to take her hand, and then, bending forward suddenly, he kissed her.

"There," he said, "that's the only return I can make—that's the only thing I can leave behind me by which you can remember me."

The young lady screamed, for she was taken by surprise, and the cry was echoed by the others.

Then the door was suddenly burst open, and in rushed the schoolmistress, with her apparel in a still greater condition of disorder than before.

"Oh, mercy!" she shrieked—"have mercy upon us! The world is coming to an end! That ever I should have lived to see such a day as this! Ring the alarm bell! Murder—murder! Where are the police? Fetch them—here he is!"

Jack was so startled by this sudden apparition, and by its grotesque appearance, that he was not so quick in his action as he generally was.

But happening to be near the bed, he seized one of the pillows upon it, and flung it with full force at the governess, and with such accuracy of aim that it sent her backwards at once, and she fell with a crash to the floor.

In a moment he was by her side.

Over her head the governess wore a small shawl or handkerchief, and this Jack seized, rolled up rapidly in the shape of a rope, and tied over her mouth, so that making any further sound was quite out of the question.

She shook her fists defiantly and threateningly.

Jack stood over her, and said, in an impressive voice:

"Now mark me! I am a dangerous and desperate man! Beware how you trouble yourself or interfere with me again—the consequences will be serious if you do: as I don't attempt to punish anyone here for whatever share they may have had in the proceedings of this night! If you do, I shall be certain to hear of it, and when the knowledge does come to my ears, I will have such a retribution upon you as shall serve to make all the world tremble!"

Jack's manner was so ferocious as he uttered these threatening words, that the schoolmistress turned very pale.

"Do you solemnly promise," he continued, "not to take any further notice of the proceedings of this night? Be quick, or it will be the worse for you!"

The governess nodded—that was the only way by which she could express her assent.

"Very good," said Jack.

Then turning round, he said, addressing the pupils:

"Once more, young ladies, accept my deep and heartfelt thanks for the service you have rendered me to-night; but for you I should most certainly have been killed, for, as you could tell by the manner of those men, they were thirsting for my blood! It must always be a satisfaction to remember that you have saved the life of a fellow-creature, and you may rest assured that up to the longest day of my life my heart will always be filled with gratitude to the whole of you. But I must hasten to make good my escape, and so once more I say farewell, though I sincerely hope that we shall some time meet again."

CHAPTER DCCLXXVII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK REPLACES THE HORSE THAT WAS SHOT UNDER HIM BY THE POLICE OFFICERS.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK hastily left the room.

But in passing out of the door he stumbled, and very nearly fell over some object that was lying in his way.

It would have been difficult for him to have discovered what this object was but for the fact that the candle was lying on the ground and burning in a very dangerous manner, for it had fallen out of the candlestick and the flame was in contact with the carpet.

Jack picked it up suddenly, for he knew that the light would aid him greatly in making his way through the house.

As he did so he looked at the obstacle, and then saw that it was a female—apparently a servant, who had been aroused by the tumult.

She was lying there in a faint, so it was pretty clear that she had fallen down in a swoon and dropped the candle.

From her Jack knew there was nothing to fear, and there really appeared to be no other inhabitants in the house.

The stairs were before him, so he ran down as quickly as he could, and made his way to the door at the bottom of the house.

Here he extinguished his light, and with great care and caution ventured to open the door a little way and peep out.

He saw nothing to alarm him.

The clouds that had covered the sky had now passed away, and the stars could be seen shining brightly, and diffusing a faint radiance over all things.

He looked keenly and scrutinisingly around, but failed to see anything of his foes, and, reassured by this and by the silence that prevailed, he ventured to step out.

Here he again reconnoitred, but with the same satisfactory result.

Notwithstanding all this apparent security, yet it might be that the officers were lurking and watching somewhere close at hand, and it especially behoved him to ascertain whether this was really the case, or else to creep away from the schoolhouse in such a manner that he would not be perceived.

Accordingly he assumed a crouching position, and by going a short distance at a time, and then pausing, he managed to get clear of the premises.

Then, turning round, he gave one more glance at the place he had incurred so much danger at, and saw standing in a group in the garden the figures of a number of men, evidently the police officers.

Jack drew a long breath when he saw them.

"I have had a narrow escape and no mistake," he cried, "and I am not yet free from all danger. However, my chances are better now than they have been—no doubt I shall give them the slip."

Still maintaining his cautious manner of proceeding, Jack hastened over the fields until he gained the high-road at some considerable distance off.

The night was now very far advanced, and he was well aware that he was a long way from Ealing Common.

Indeed, the distance was so great that without a horse it would be impossible to return there before daybreak, as he had agreed to do.

The idea of remaining somewhere during the day, especially when he knew the officers were making active search after him, was by no means an agreeable one to him, and he altogether refused to entertain it.

"No," he said to himself, as if reasoning the matter over, "a horse I must and will have, I am determined somehow or other! I will possess myself of one—how, I scarcely know."

Jack walked hastily and confidently along the high-way.

He was going in the direction he wished to take, and he was perfectly certain that he had thrown the officers off the scent entirely.

He kept a sharp look-out on each side of him over the hedges, thinking he might see a horse grazing in one of the meadows.

If he had seen one he would have endeavoured to capture it, and would have done as well as he could without the necessary trappings.

But he could not perceive the object he so wished to see.

It was that hour of the night, too, or rather morning when there are fewest people abroad.

It would be an unusual circumstance to meet with a traveller at such a time.

If he had met with one, Jack would certainly have relieved him of his horse.

Jack hurried forward on foot, until at length he was compelled to pause a few moments to recover his breath and strength.

"I must have a horse!" he said, again. "But where am I to get it? that is the question."

He sat down on a stile to rest, and looked over the fields in the hope of seeing the animal he so much wished to find.

But he saw instead, situated at no great distance off, a well-built, substantial-looking residence, doubtless the abode of some country squire.

It was an unpretending-looking place, and yet it seemed to carry along with it an impression of prosperity on the part of its occupiers.

"I'll warrant there are stables there," said Jack. "I'll go and see. If there is, I'll borrow one of the horses."

No sooner had he said this than he changed the direction of his steps, and made his way straight to the buildings at the rear of the house we have mentioned.

They were stables sure enough, as Jack found upon closer approach.

To get into the yard was easy enough, though he hesitated for some moments lest there should be a dog about, who, by his barking, might arouse the slumberers.

But no such animal appeared to be there, and so he advanced with a great degree of confidence

Going to the door of the stables, he raised the latch, and found it open readily to his hand.

"There are no horses here, I fear," he murmured, "or else they would be more particular in securing the doors."

In this he was mistaken, for he heard a faint rustling of straw.

The interior of the stable was very dark, so Jack had to procure a light.

As he carried the means of lighting a taper about his person this was rapidly done, and to his satisfaction he saw three horses standing in their separate stalls.

He fixed his eyes upon one immediately.

In colour it was a bright bay, and after one critical glance Jack pronounced it to be just the one suited to his purpose.

The harness-room he was aware would be somewhere close at hand, and, perceiving a door at one end of the stable, he opened it, and there found several saddles and bridles.

Selecting one of each, he returned, placed them on the horse with great rapidity, and then turned him round.

Hitherto there had not been the slightest token of an alarm having been given, and Jack thought it would be truly a pity to arouse anyone now.

Accordingly, in order to make his escape as noiseless as possible, he took up a quantity of straw and littered it down in the yard, so that the horse should walk upon it without his iron hoofs producing a sound.

This having been done, he sprang into the saddle and walked the horse slowly and gently into the yard.

Jack's precautions all went for nothing, for the animal, surprised, no doubt, at this strange occurrence, uttered a loud neighing sound, which awoke the echoes far and near.

Jack was convinced that all hope of secrecy was at an end, so he turned the animal's head towards the low wall, over which he had climbed a short time before.

The horse leaped it gallantly.

But just as he was in the act of rising from the ground a loud voice cried out:

"Thieves — thieves! Murder — murder! Thieves! Fire!"

These outcries were succeeded by the loud report of a fowling-piece.

Glancing behind him, Jack saw the nightcapped head of a man protruding from a window over the stables.

In his hand he held a gun, which he had just discharged.

"All right!" shouted Jack. "Don't make yourself uneasy—you have done me no harm, nor the horse either! I have just borrowed him for a short time; you shall have him back as soon as I can spare him! Good night!"

He touched the beautiful creature slightly with the spur, and the manner in which he answered to it gratified Jack exceedingly, for it proved that his anticipations were correct.

Away it went at a prodigious speed, and very soon, not only the stable, but the house itself was lost to view.

But morning was now advancing with great rapidity, and Jack was aware that he would have a very hard ride in order to regain the appointed spot in time.

Yet, if he met with no interruptions, he had great hopes of being able to accomplish the distance.

The horse was either one of a very superior quality indeed, or else he had had a long rest in the stable, for he was full of fire and vigour, and dashed along as though fatigue was a thing that he knew nothing about.

Before there was even a streak of light in the eastern horizon, Sixteen-String Jack pulled up with a dash in the front of the inn.

The sound of horses' feet immediately brought two persons to the front door.

Jack flung himself from the back of his steed, and cried:

"Safe back again, Davis, you see! Ah, captain," he added, as he saw the other, "you have returned all right?"

"Yes," replied Turpin, "but only a few minutes since. Are you safe and unhurt?"

"Yes, and I have had capital luck; but I'll tell you all about it presently. Do you see my new horse?"

"Yes. Where is the other?"

"I will tell you as soon as we get indoors. But Tom King and Claude—where are they?"

"They have not come back yet," returned Dick. "I am expecting them every moment: it is quite time they were here."

"Yes," said Jack, turning round. "Look, captain—it is just about daybreak now; they will have to be here pretty quick if they intend to keep their appointment."

He pointed to the sky as he spoke.

That faint grey light which always precedes the dawn of a new day, and which resembles twilight, could now be seen, particularly in the east.

As they continued to gaze, it grew lighter and lighter every moment.

"If they are not close at hand," said Dick, as he accompanied Jack towards the stable, "I hope they will make themselves comfortable somewhere, for the risk of coming here by daylight is excessive."

"I can hear nothing of them yet," said Tom Davis, "and I can generally tell as soon as any of you turn up the lane."

CHAPTER DCCLXXVIII.

RELATES THE STRANGE ADVENTURES THAT BEFEL CLAUDE DUVAL AND TOM KING UPON THE WESTERN ROAD.

In order to bring the relation of the night's adventures to a conclusion, it is necessary that we should describe the proceedings of Claude Duval and Tom King, about whose return their comrades were beginning to grow so anxious.

We will start first with Claude Duval, who had agreed to take the Western Road, while Tom King rode off in a southerly direction.

Claude was well enough pleased with the direction that had fallen to his lot.

The Western Road was one always well frequented by passengers, and, as a rule, they generally carried good booties with them.

He was exceedingly anxious to make up for the losses of the preceding nights, and therefore he galloped off as far as he could in half an hour, and then pulled up, determined to wait the approach of any traveller who might chance either to be going to London or returning from it.

The spot he had chosen was one exactly suited for the purpose he required.

His weapons were all in readiness, and holding a pistol in his grasp, so as to be prepared to use it in a second, if necessary, he sat quite still and waited.

Some time passed by in perfect silence, and then the sound that he so desired to hear broke the stillness of the night.

Faint at first, but gradually becoming sharper and more distinct.

A traveller, mounted on horseback, was going from the direction of London.

His horse was going at a tremendous rate.

The manner in which his hoofs touched the ground told Claude that he was going at full gallop.

"I'll put a stop to your race," he thought. "I must be ready, though, or he will pass me."

The night was dim and obscure, owing to the quantity of clouds that had piled themselves up in the sky, and which made it very difficult to distinguish objects unless they were very close at hand indeed.

Nevertheless, the piercing gaze of the highwayman enabled him to perceive the figure of this traveller as he came along at such a wonderful rate.

"He goes as though he meant to break his neck," muttered Claude. "Perhaps he thinks that by adopting this course he shall avoid the danger of being stopped; he will discover his mistake, however."

As soon as the traveller came within earshot, Claude rode out into the road and uttered a loud shout.

"Hold!" he cried. "Pull up—pull up, I say!"

Not the slightest notice was taken of this injunction.

The horse swerved suddenly to one side of the highway, almost unseating his rider by the quickness of the movement.

Claude made an ineffectual attempt to grasp the rein.

Away at undiminished speed the horse flew, and the highwayman was disappointed of his prey.

"Balked!" he said; "but yet I will not be defeated thus."

He stuck the spurs into his own steed as he spoke, and shot off in pursuit.

The race was a most exciting one, and the longer it continued the more determined did Claude become that he would overtake the traveller.

At length, greatly to his surprise, upon reaching a lonely part of the road the traveller reined up suddenly, and turned round so as to face him.

Claude checked his horse also.

"He's a bold fellow," he muttered, "but yet he will have to succumb."

The traveller planted his horse exactly in the centre of the highway, and there waited for his pursuer to come up.

Claude by no means held back, and when he was within a few yards of him he cried:

"Resistance will be useless! Put up your weapons, and hand me your money and valuables! If you refuse, the consequences will be on your own head!"

To Claude's great astonishment, the only reply that was made to this speech came in the shape of a clear, ringing laugh.

[CLAUDE DUVAL ENCOUNTERS TOM KING ON THE HIGHWAY.]

This surprised him beyond measure.

But his amazement quickly subsided, for the supposed traveller said:

"Why, Claude, what a strange meeting, and what a ridiculous mistake for both of us to make! Ha, ha!"

"Tom King?" ejaculated Claude Duval.

"Yes. Then you really did not recognise me?"

"No. And I suppose that you did not recognise me either?"

"No, I did not."

"But how comes it that you are on the Western Road? It is quite in opposition to our arrangements."

"I know that, Claude; but as I started off in the direction I intended to take, I didn't go far before I found myself confronted by a troop of police officers. I came upon them suddenly, and had only just time to pull up and turn back. They commenced an immediate pursuit, but luckily I got clear of them, though I had to turn on the Western Road to do so."

"And that was the reason you were going at such a furious rate, then?" said Claude.

"It was. I was excited by what had happened, and, by the speed I was going at, I did not recognise your voice—in fact, I jumped at once to the conclusion that you were a police officer."

"Ha, ha! it's a good joke! But if you did that, why did you pull up in the way you did?"

"Why, I found that whoever it was after me was almost as well mounted as I was, and certainly determined to capture me if possible, and as you were alone, I resolved to turn round and show fight."

"Well, I am very glad you came to that decision. Not knowing who you were, I began to lose all patience, and perhaps I should have tried to bring you up by a bullet, and if I had injured you I should never have forgiven myself."

"All's well that ends well," said Tom King, coolly, "and I am heartily glad we have met."

"So am I, and as our meeting has taken place in so singular a manner, and under circumstances over which neither of us had any control, I propose that we pass the remainder of the night in each other's company. What do you say?"

"With all my heart," was the reply—"in fact, if you had allowed me the opportunity, I should have made the same proposition. It's a long while since we both took to the highway in company, and rely upon it some good adventures are waiting us to-night."

"Let us hope so, for although when going out before I had adventures enough in all conscience, yet they were not so profitable as I should have desired."

"Nor were mine; but if we possibly can, we will remedy that to-night."

"So we will—that is, if fortune will favour us."

"Let us take our stand here then. You could not wish for a better bit of road, and surely before long we shall hear a traveller approaching."

This was agreed to, and the two highwaymen backed their horses close against the hedge, and remained there as motionless as possible, waiting for an adventure to present itself.

But on that particular night it seemed as though they were to have the Western Road all to themselves.

Much frequented as it was generally, to-night appeared destined to prove an exception.

They waited until their patience was completely exhausted—they waited, indeed, until the character of the night entirely changed.

Hitherto it had been as favourable for their purpose as they could wish, but now the dense heavy clouds slowly rolled away to windward, leaving the blue sky fully revealed.

Then the moon appeared.

She was only a few degrees above the horizon, it is true, but yet her beams served to illuminate the landscape with considerable brightness, and each moment, as she rose higher and higher in the sky, the power of her rays increased.

"Everything goes against us," said Claude, half impatiently. "In an hour at the most the moon will be shining so bright that all objects far and near will be as plainly visible as at noonday."

"Unless some clouds come up," interposed Tom King.

"Yes; if that happens, of course, all will be well; but I have my doubts."

"So have I."

"With the moon shining like this we shall be seen a long way off, and rely upon it we shall gain little from travellers to-night."

"Don't be down-hearted just yet, Claude. Remember the night is young, and we cannot tell what is going to happen."

"Very true. But look over there—what do you think is the meaning of that?"

He pointed across the meadows as he spoke.

There could be seen plainly and easily enough the figures of two men standing by the side of a large sheet of water—either a very large pond or else a lake.

Upon this water the moon seemed to shine with much greater brilliancy than upon any other object.

The consequence was that these two men we have mentioned standing near the edge of the water could be seen with great distinctness, for their outlines were clearly defined.

To see two men standing in such a situation was by no means an extraordinary circumstance.

But it was the furious gestures they made that attracted the highwaymen's notice.

They were too far off to catch any of the sounds; but, from their actions, it was evident that some very stormy discussion or dispute was taking place between them.

Once or twice one raised his arm in such a threatening manner that Claude and Tom believed he was about to deal a heavy blow.

But if such had been his intention his purpose changed.

From having sat so long on their steeds, waiting patiently and seeing nothing, the highwaymen were just ready to look with the utmost degree of curiosity upon a scene of this kind, and as they continued to gaze, the curiosity that they felt increased each moment.

A strong desire to draw nearer and to ascertain if possible what these two men were disputing about took possession of them, and yet neither liked to mention it to the other, lest the proposition should not be agreeable.

But at last Claude Duval, finding there were no more signs of the approach of any traveller than there were at first, turned suddenly to Tom King, and said:

"I am strangely and powerfully interested in the proceedings of those two men. What, think you, are they doing?"

"I am at a loss to know, and I am to the full as anxious to learn as you are."

"Then, if it is agreeable to your wishes," said Claude, "we will leave the highway for a short time, and endeavour to approach close enough to them to overhear their conversation."

"With all my heart—anything would be better than waiting here in this fashion."

"So it would. But our horses—what shall we do with them?"

"We cannot take them with us," was the reply—"at least, not without being seen. I propose that we secure them among yonder clump of trees, and then creep along under the shadow of that hedgerow; you see we shall then be able to get very close to the margin of the water, and I doubt not we shall be within earshot."

"Agreed!" was the response. "Come on without further delay—I am impatient to have my curiosity gratified."

CHAPTER DCCLXXIX.

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN OVERHEAR A SINGULAR CONFERENCE.

THE little clump of trees that was mentioned was situated on the opposite side of the road, and at no great distance from it.

From the nature of their position, they would be easily able to gain this without attracting the attention of the two men whose proceedings they desired to watch.

Indeed, it is questionable whether anything would have attracted their attention, they seemed so wholly engrossed by the topic they had under consideration.

Among these trees the horses could be concealed from anything but a search in that quarter, and for greater security they tied them by their bridles to low-lying branches of the trees in such a way as to allow them to crop the soft herbage at their feet.

Then acting upon the plan they had already agreed upon, the two highwaymen crept along under the shadow of the hedgerow, which was one that formed a line of separation between two large meadows.

At the bottom of both of these was the large sheet of water, and the two men were standing upon its brink on the opposite side of the hedge.

Taking care to tread gently, and not to make any more rustling among the grass than they could possibly help the two highwaymen at length approached as close as they thought was prudent or necessary.

They remained perfectly still, listening, and then they heard a voice say:

"All this discussion is useless, George. I tell you not a thousand times as much talk would move me from my purpose."

"But will you not listen to reason?" replied the other.

"I have listened long enough," angrily rejoined the first speaker, "and I am determined that I will listen no longer!"

"But you shall listen, John—it is important that you should!"

"Bah!"

"I say that before we part you shall relinquish all your claim! I say it, and I have sworn it!"

The other laughed scornfully.

"I dare say you would like to threaten me out of it; but you ought to know my character well enough by this time to feel certain that you will fail in any such attempt."

"But, brother John," said the other, and evidently the younger of the two speakers—"remember I call you brother."

"Well, what of that?"

"You are not my brother actually, and I have hitherto always refused to address you by such a title, but now for the first time I call you brother."

"Well, what difference will that make? Do you imagine I am so foolish and childish as to allow a name to make the slightest difference to me?"

"There is much in a name. There has been hitherto not sufficient affection between us; it may have been that there are faults on both sides, but I am anxious that it should be altered."

"Of course you are, in order that you may bring me to your purpose; but it is in vain—no argument, I tell you, will prevail. Is it likely that I should forego such a delight, and especially to you? I have never forgiven your mother for entering our family and endeavouring to take my mother's place!"

"But," said the young man, "you surely cannot blame me for that. How could I help it? what control could I possibly exercise over such events?"

"I care not, and that is not the point we came here to discuss. I met you on the border of this lake in order that another matter should be settled between us either one way or the other."

"I know you did."

"Well, then, now I call upon you to relinquish."

"Why should you expect me to give way any more than yourself?"

"Because I consider that you are the one who ought to give way."

"No doubt—no doubt."

"I think with good reason," returned the other.

"I fail to see it."

"I tell you I love her with a thousand times more affection than anyone else can bestow, and have loved her for years and years past; and do you think that such a passion as I feel could be lightly cast out from my breast? It has been growing there for years, and is stronger now than ever."

"But," said the other, "you seem entirely to overlook the fact that this love of yours is ill-bestowed in every way. I have told you, and Edith has told you over and over again, that she does not and cannot love you."

"But she will alter her mind," was the reply.

"I should not despair of gaining here affections if you were to give up your pretensions."

"But I tell you, great as you may imagine your love to be, mine far surpasses it, and, what is more, my passion is returned by Edith herself. Why, then, should you step in and blight the happiness of both of us? Is it not reasonable that you should give way? because by so doing you would insure the happiness of two persons; whereas, if I gave way, you alone would be happy."

"I tell you I will not listen to such words," said the other, angrily, "and now that we are here I command and will compel you to give up all your pretensions to her hand'"

"Then I may end the matter by saying that I firmly and distinctly refuse."

"The consequences be upon your own head then!" said the other. "You have tried my temper to the utmost! Take that as the reward of your folly and obstinacy!"

So saying, the elder brother raised his hand and struck the other a violent blow.

There was a shriek of agony, and the young man fell to the ground.

"Now you have your reward!" said the other. "I will be troubled with you no longer! You shall follow the instrument which has wrought your destruction!"

"So saying, he flung a large, dagger-like knife into the water, and stooped down to pick up the form that was lying so near to the edge of the lake

But seeing this, Claude and Tom both uttered a loud shout.

The wound had been given so quickly that they were not in time to prevent it.

But they resolved to prevent the mischief going any further.

Upon hearing the shout, the elder brother started to his feet with a cry of alarm.

He saw two men hastening towards him, and, thoroughly terrified at this sight, he turned and fled with the fleetness of a greyhound.

The highwaymen were half inclined to run after him and capture him.

But they considered that their time would be best bestowed upon the unfortunate young man, who was groaning heavily.

They knelt down beside him, and then found that the blood was pouring in torrents from a wound in his breast.

He made desperate efforts to speak, but could not.

At last, however, he managed to gasp out:

"Go—go—to Myrtle Cottage, and ask for Edith Grey—tell her that—that——"

Articulation failed him, for the blood seemed to rise up in his throat and choke him.

"No," said Claude, "we will take you to Myrtle Cottage; it is possible that if you have immediate and careful attention you will recover from this hurt."

The young man shook his head slowly.

"No—no," he said, "I am wounded to the death, I am sure of it. I am fully sensible of it—no one could mistake such a feeling as I have now, his knife has entered my heart."

He spoke these words by a strong effort, and slowly raised himself upon one arm.

But his strength left him with extreme suddenness, and he fell back upon the grass.

Then a spasm seemed to convulse his whole frame, after which he lay perfectly still.

"He is dead," said Tom King, a moment or so afterwards; "his forebodings were correct—the wound was mortal."

"Are you sure he is dead?" said Claude.

"Yes, I can say that I have no doubt about it. We were just too late to interfere," he said. "What shall we do now?"

"That rascal ought to be captured."

"He ought, but he's far enough off by this time."

"So he is; in my opinion we cannot do better than carry out the injunctions of this young man. Myrtle Cottage is doubtless close at hand; let us find it, and tell its inmates what we have witnessed. It will be an unpleasant errand, truly, and yet it will be merciful to let them know just how events occurred, and then they will be secure from the risk of all misrepresentation."

The highwaymen looked around them, and by the aid of the now brilliant rays of the moon, they saw, about half a mile off, the roof of a dwelling, which, from its size and general appearance, they conjectured must be Myrtle Cottage.

At any rate, they resolved to remount their steeds and ride towards it.

While walking back to the clump of trees where their horses had been left, Claude said:

"I knew that something of no common interest was going on when I sat watching them from the distance. How I wish that we had been in time to avert that fatal blow."

"So do I, though I am afraid it would have been impossible, it was so quickly done. What strikes me as strangest of all, is that we should have been there long enough to be able to comprehend from their conversation the exact conditions of all parties."

"Yes, the one who lies so cold and still in death was the brother-in-law of the one who has murdered him. It is but rarely that affection subsists in such cases as these."

"Very rarely, indeed; more frequently there is open enmity, and quite as often it happens that they both fall in love with the same person."

"Yes, as we have witnessed in this case. It will be sad tidings indeed that we have to communicate to Edith Grey."

By this time the horses were reached, and vaulting into their saddles, the highwaymen went at full speed towards the cottage.

The hour was so late that it was scarcely probable any of the inmates would be astir.

But as they drew closer, they perceived that a light was shining from one of the windows.

"This is the place, depend upon it," said Claude Duval

"Ring the bell then," replied his companion, "and we shall soon know for certain."

The bell was rung, and before the clanging ceased, the front door of the cottage was opened.

"Who is there?" said a low and gentle voice.

"Is this Myrtle Cottage?" asked Claude. "If it is, we have a message to deliver."

"Yes, yes, this is Myrtle Cottage," responded the same voice. "What is the nature of the message you have to give?"

The speaker advanced into the garden, and walked timidly towards the gate, close to which the highwaymen were standing.

"You are Miss Grey, I suppose," said Claude, in a mournful voice—"Miss Edith Grey, is not that your name?"

CHAPTER DCCLXXX.

TOM KING AND CLAUDE DUVAL FIND THEMSELVES INVOLVED IN A DEEP MYSTERY.

CLAUDE'S manner and the way in which he spoke were sufficient to convince anyone that he was the bearer of sad tidings.

The young girl had to clasp the bars of the little wooden gate very tightly before she could manage to reply to the question that had been addressed to her.

Then, in an agitated, hysterical voice, she said:

"Yes, yes—this is Myrtle Cottage, and my name is Edith Grey! What business is it that can have brought you here to-night?"

"The very worst that you can possibly imagine—the most unwelcome news that you could possibly hear! Prepare yourself to hear the direst intelligence—summon up all your fortitude for the shock."

Whiter and whiter grew the young girl, and her grasp upon the gate tightened.

Claude hardly knew how to proceed further, and she was in such a state that she could not ask him a question.

To his great relief, another person emerged from the cottage.

This was an old lady dressed in black, and wearing a widow's cap.

"What is it, Edith?" she asked. "What is the meaning of all this?"

Edith could not answer, but Claude spoke for her.

"I have been told to inform Miss Edith Grey that—hat——"

He paused, and could go no further.

"Something dreadful has happened," said the old lady, hastening forward.

"You are right in your surmise. Can you guess who it is that has met with a sad fate?"

A stifled shriek came from Edith's lips.

She guessed readily enough.

"I know not," said the old lady, "without it is George Shaw."

"I know not whether that is his name," replied Claude, "but if he is the brother-in-law of some one named John——"

"Yes, John Shaw—that's his elder brother's name."

"Well, then, it is of him I have to speak. Come nearer—let me whisper the tidings in your ear. I will leave you to break them to your daughter afterwards."

Dreading by his manner she knew not what, the old lady came forward.

Claude bent down in the saddle, and whispered a few words in her ear.

"Good heavens!" she ejaculated. "This will be a frightful shock! Are you sure that what you say is true?"

"It is quite true. I wish it was not. I wish, also, that we were permitted to stay and see the matter investigated. But that is impossible—we cannot linger longer. Farewell!"

He waved his hand as he spoke, and rode off.

"I could not stop," he said to Tom King, when they had got to a little distance. "The sight of that young girl's agony would have been more than I could bear."

"It would have been dreadful indeed—and besides, there was no need for us to witness it."

"So I thought. We performed the charge that had been given us, which would be sufficient."

"Quite. But did you notice how gentle, how good, and how beautiful that young girl appeared to be? Is it not hard to think that for the future her life will be overshadowed by a heavy cloud?"

"Very; it makes me wish more than ever that we had been in time to prevent the perpetration of that dastardly deed."

"Yet we have nothing to reproach ourselves for."

"Oh, nothing! The chances were a thousand to one against our going to listen there at all."

"My friend, let us try a gallop—that will do us the most good under these circumstances."

"It will. It will serve to dispel these gloomy ideas that now fill our minds."

This suggestion was at once put into practice.

The highwaymen pressed their horses into a gallop, and for some time they continued to fly at full speed across the country.

Suddenly, however, by one accord, Claude and Tom King stopped their horses.

As if they had only one impulse, they both sat upon their steeds in attitudes of intense listening.

But the sound, whatever it was, that had first attracted their attention was heard no more.

They listened in vain for its repetition.

"Claude," said Tom King at last, finding all was still, "did you hear it?"

"That shriek?"

"Yes; it sounded like a shriek, but a most unearthly one. It prompted me in a moment to pull up."

"And me the same, as you see. But all is still now."

"Very."

"How strange! It is impossible that our fancies have misled us, for both heard it at the same time."

"Oh, yes, a shrill, unnatural, shrieking cry that arose all at once, and died as suddenly. Yet where it came from I have no idea."

"Nor I. At any rate, it cannot concern us much. Let us ride on."

"Claude."

"What?"

"Do you recollect what the captain said to us?"

"When?"

"To-night, before we started."

"What was it?"

"He told us on no account to hesitate to turn out of our way if by so doing we could render assistance to those who require it."

"Oh, yes, he said that!"

"Well, then, I think no one would give a cry like that who was not in immediate need of succour. It was a cry full of heartrending agony."

"It was—you are right enough about that."

"But how silent it is now! Where can the cry come from?"

"That is what I propose to find out, Claude. Let us look around."

"We shall see better in a moment," said Claude, glancing up at the heavens. "There's a cloud now over the moon's disc, but it will soon pass away, and then we shall see distinctly."

Even as he spoke the moon burst out into its full flood of silvery lustre, and instantly everything was revealed with a clearness and beauty that was enchanting to look upon.

The meadows seemed as though coated over with silver, and the smooth, shining leaves upon the trees glistened as the wind blew them to and fro, making them look like so many diamonds.

To the surprise of the highwaymen, upon looking around, they could not at first detect either any signs of a human habitation or of human beings abroad.

But they noticed on their left hand that the lane they were traversing was bounded by some high, stout wooden palisades.

Behind these was planted a row of holly-bushes of unusual height and density—their sharp, prickly leaves formed, indeed, a perfect wall, and one that anyone would have hesitated before attempting to climb over.

From the appearance of this palisade, and the careful manner in which the holly trees were kept up in a regular line, Claude and Tom King came to the conclusion that it must be the boundary of an estate of some kind or other.

Perhaps in the centre was situated a house, and from this dwelling the cry might have come.

"Let us go a little further," said Tom King, as he pointed all this out to his comrade. "Doubtless we shall come presently to some point where we shall be able to tell whether there is a house here or not."

"With all my heart, my friend! Lead the way."

Tom King obeyed, and they trotted for nearly half a mile down the lane before they reached the point where the palisades turned off at a right angle.

They followed the direction of it, determined to make an entire circuit, if necessary.

But so high were the holly trees, and so dense their foliage, that they could not possibly obtain a glimpse of what there was to be seen on the other side.

The next corner was reached with the same result, and here began a brick wall, higher, if anything, than the holly trees, and equally efficacious, so far as keeping out a view went.

"It must be some one who is uncommonly fond of retirement and privacy," said Claude Duval. "I never met with a place so hemmed-in before."

"In this circumstance there is matter for conjecture," said Tom King.

"It is indeed most unusual to find a place so well barricaded, for I know not what other term to apply to it—I don't know a better word. But come on! We may as well see all round it now."

Going for some distance along this brick wall, the highwaymen came to a large pair of folding gates—their size, in fact, was immense, for, from private motives, they had been made of a great height, and, in order to look proportionate, they had been made much wider than was really necessary.

There was no such thing as obtaining a view in that quarter, however, and so the highwaymen continued on their way.

Upon reaching the termination of the wall, they found that another paling, similar to the one they had examined, joined up to it.

"I see how it is," said Tom King. "This is evidently the front portion of the inclosure, and those gates there constitute the entrance. The other three sides are composed of these palings and fence of holly bushes."

"That's just it."

"Well, then, my friend, does it not strike you as being singular that a place should be so well and thoroughly inclosed as to make it an impossiblity for anyone to obtain a view from any point?"

"It does seem strange, and I confess my curiosity is greatly excited by it."

"Yes, and I would wish you to couple that with the dreadful cry that we both heard. In my opinion, it came from somewhere over the palings."

"That was the conclusion I myself came to, and you may rely upon it no good end is served by so much secrecy as there is evidently here. Can you form any idea of what the nature of such a place as this might be?"

"No, that I can't," said Tom. "I don't intend to be baulked! At all risks I will have one peep."

"But how shall you accomplish it?"

"If you will lead my horse close to the wall, I will stand upon its back. By reaching up my arms, I think I shall then be able to touch the top of the wall."

"I see."

"And if I can once obtain a grasp with the end of my fingers, I know I can draw my body up sufficiently high to take a peep over, and see what there is beyond."

"Then do so," said Claude. "I will lead your horse with the greatest pleasure in life."

Tom King's horse was led close to the wall, and kept in that position by Claude Duval.

Tom King himself then disengaged his feet from the stirrups, and stood up on the saddle.

His height was by this means increased, and, as he had fully expected, he found that he was just able to take hold of the top of the wall with the ends of his fingers.

CHAPTER DCCLXXXI.

TOM KING AND CLAUDE DUVAL CLIMB OVER THE WALL, AND MAKE SOME SINGULAR DISCOVERIES.

As he had said, Tom King, having obtained this grasp, could pull himself up with ease.

His head was soon above the level of the wall, and then he made as accurate a survey as he possibly could.

He saw below him a large enclosure—not planted with shrubs and flowers, and tastefully laid out as one might imagine to find it, but simply composed of one flat, level piece of ground covered over with gravel.

In appearance, then, the enclosure resembled a desert on a small scale more than anything else.

In the centre of this arid plain was a house—a large, dull-red, rambling structure, with many small latticed windows.

From no one of these windows came forth a gleam of light.

All was uniformly dark, and seemed as cheerless as the ground upon which the residence was built.

What could be the nature of such a place Tom King could not imagine.

Surely no one would be eccentric enough in his tastes to prefer such a prison-like place for a dwelling.

Yet there were evidences that the house and the piece of ground around it were carefully kept in order.

An aspect of neatness and order could be seen on all sides.

While gazing on this scene, Tom King's attention was suddenly attracted by the opening of one of the latticed casements.

As it turned upon its hinges he saw, standing just within the room which it illuminated, a white, shadowy form, whose outlines he could not well make out, owing to the darkness.

But that it was a female he had not the slightest doubt.

Suddenly two long, white arms were thrust out of the window, and again the dreadful shrieking cry was uttered which he had heard once before, and which had sufficed to make him check the speed of his steed so abruptly.

But the shriek was suddenly cut short by the sound of heavy blows.

The cracking of a whip could be heard, accompanied by angry words uttered in a gruff, savage tone of voice.

Then faint, smothered cries for help and appeals for mercy next made themselves heard.

This was a scene that Tom King could no longer endure to remain a passive spectator of, and therefore he lowered himself down from the wall at once, in order to relate what he had seen to his companion.

Claude was all impatience to hear what his comrade had to impart.

But as soon as ever the intelligence was received by him, he cried:

"My friend, this is something that surely calls for our interference. Some dark, evil deeds are certainly going on in this place—we have abundant and ample evidence of it."

"We have," said Tom King, "and we will try and put an end to them."

"And it was a girl, you say, that uttered that cry?"

"It was, or else I make a great mistake."

"And it seemed to you, then, as though she was confined there as in a kind of prison, and that she was uttering that cry in the hope of the sound reaching the ears of some passers-by and attracting their attention?"

"Just so; and then it seemed to me that one of her jailers, aroused by the noise, had entered, and then had inflicted a frightful punishment upon her for so doing."

"Yes, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion; but let the wretches beware!"

"How shall we obtain admittance, though?"

"That, I fancy, is the most difficult point that we have to consider; it is a difficulty, but one that must be surmounted. Do you think this would aid us?"

As he spoke, Claude Duval unwound from round his waist a quantity of thin but strong rope.

"The very thing," said Tom. "There's a chevaux de frise on the top of the wall, and if I get up again I am sure I can tie the rope round the bar, we can then pull ourselves up easily, and lower ourselves down on the other side."

"And our horses—what shall we do with them?"

"They seem rather in the way of our adventures to-night, do they not?"

"They do."

"I suppose we cannot do better than secure them somewhere, as we did on the previous occasion—that is the only thing I can think of, and look, yonder are some trees that will be just calculated to answer our purpose."

"The very thing, because in the event of our being compelled to beat a precipitate retreat, we shall not be long in regaining them."

"True."

The horses were accordingly disposed of in a similar fashion to that which had been adopted on the preceding occasion—of course, after Tom King had once more stood on the back of his steed and secured the rope in the way he had proposed.

With such an auxiliary as this, it was a very easy matter to climb over the wall.

Tom King was up to the top in a twinkling, and he was soon rejoined by Claude Duval.

The rope was then lowered on the other side, and they descended with speed and safety.

Owing to the brightness with which the moon was shining, some care would have to be taken in crossing the open space, in order to get to the house without being seen.

Tom King crouched down in the shadow of the wall, and remained for a moment watching.

All was still, however, and he was enabled to point out with precision and certainty the very identical window at which the white form had appeared.

"We will try and get towards it," said Tom King; "let us make one bold rush for it; we shall not be so likely to be seen then as we shall be if we go slowly."

"You are right."

"Now then—quick!"

With rapid and yet almost noiseless footsteps, the two highwaymen rushed across the gravelled enclosure, and paused close against the wall of the house.

But the window at which the white form had appeared was very far above them.

To reach it without more tools and appliances than they possessed appeared to be totally impossible.

The walls of the house were uniformly smooth.

There was not a projection of any kind that would have assisted them to mount.

They much wished they had the means of making their presence known to the unhappy prisoner, for such in their minds they fully believed her to be.

They might have called out, it is true, or whistled, or made use of some other ordinary sound, only there was this fear, that the sound might reach the ears of her captors.

"I wish she would come to the window again," said Tom King—"the matter would be easy enough then."

"I am afraid, however," said Claude, "from what you say, that it is hardly likely that she will make her appearance; the punishment she has received has doubtless been too severe."

"Yes," said Tom King, "it makes my blood boil to think of it."

"Our best plan, I think, will be to reconnoitre round the premises; perhaps we may be able to find some means of entrance."

"It may be so, but yet I am exceedingly doubtful whether we shall."

"You think the people, after walling in the place so well, would not be likely to omit the precaution of fastening up all the doors and windows?"

"I do."

"And yet it may not be so; the nature of the outward defences—if I may so term them—might beget in their minds a feeling of confidence, and they might relax in their vigilance in securing the inner doors."

"That is only to be tested by trying. Come along, let us begin, for time is flying fast."

This was true, for although at present they had done little else but gallop about the country to no profit, yet more than half the night was consumed, for in this manner time passes with exceeding quickness.

One by one, as the nearest doors and windows were come to, Tom King and Claude Duval tried them.

But they found them uniformly secure, and from the manner in which they resisted all attempts to shake them even, it was clear that considerable force would be required to effect an entrance.

But they had not the means of exerting that force, nor had they the tools requisite for such a purpose.

At length they came round to the very spot from which they had started, and then they looked rather blankly into each other's countenances.

"Now, Claude," said Tom King, "what are we to do?"

"There's no getting into this confounded place from the ground floor, that's quite clear, and it seems equally impossible to gain the upper stories."

"It does. The house is almost as impregnable as a fortress, yet we must not despair, my comrade. I have quite set my heart upon this adventure, and I shall not rest again until I have been able to discover what the nature of this place is, who the young girl may be, and why she is kept here such a close prisoner."

Claude laughed.

"I rather think you have set yourself some difficult things to find out, Tom; but, however, in all this I am most heartily with you, for I question whether the curiosity and interest I feel is less in amount than yours."

"Well, then, let us make a trial in some quarter."

"Wait a moment or two; I would prefer to hold a consultation, and while we are doing so let us take care not to speak above our breaths if we can help it—you don't know what ears may be listening to us."

"What is it you wish to consult about?"

"The best manner of proceeding. You see it will never do for us to fail. Before we begin our operations in any shape it will be necessary for us to feel perfectly assured and confident that we shall succeed."

"Of course. But then it is at all times difficult to make certain of a success."

"Certainly it is; and in this case the effects of failure would be disastrous, from this cause: even if we effected our retreat without gaining our end, we should not be allowed the opportunity of making a second attack, as they would so strongly protect the place by means of men and such-like that we should never be able to get near."

"Or they might move her away entirely."

"Just so. And in either of these cases our plan for delivering this girl would be at an end."

"So it would," said Tom King, thoughtfully—"so it would. I had not thought of that, Claude. What now do you advise?"

CHAPTER DCCLXXXII.

TOM KING AND CLAUDE DUVAL ARE BAFFLED IN THEIR EFFORTS TO OBTAIN A CLUE TO THE MYSTERIOUS THINGS THAT THEY HAVE WITNESSED.

"Well," said Claude Duval, "it seems to me, Tom, that there is about only one safe thing that we can do under the circumstances."

"Indeed! And what may that be?"

"Why, single-handed and unaided as we are by tools or anything, I don't see how it is possible for us to effect an entrance into this house, so I propose that we leave it as it is, and return to the inn. We can communicate all that we have witnessed to the captain and Sixteen-String Jack, and it is very odd to me if they don't deem it of sufficient importance to merit their attention."

"I see, Claude," said Tom—"you would have us all four make the attack together?"

"Certainly."

"Well, it would be more like ensuring success, I admit."

"It would indeed! I shall then have very little doubt, especially if we could contrive one thing."

"What's that?"

"To have a few minutes' conversation with the girl who screamed out; if we could let her know that friends were near she might be able to render us great assistance."

"So she might. She would be very likely to tell us at which point we should gain admittance with the most ease, and, in fact, enlighten us upon all those points upon which we are now in darkness."

"Yes, that is much to be wished for."

"Then my propositon is agreeable to you?"

"Yes."

"Then let us remain here beneath this window for some time longer, in the hope that this girl will presently appear; as soon as she does we will try to communicate to her in such a manner as not to raise an alarm."

"Very good. But if we can get into conversation with get the information she will give will enable us to mature our plans for the succeeding night."

"You are perfectly right, Claude, and I quite agree with all that you have said—I am sure it will be the best course to adopt."

"Very well, then, that's all settled, and we need not trouble any further about it."

"How long will you wait?"

"Oh, as long as we possibly can. So long as we are back at the inn by daybreak, that will do."

"I know it will; but don't let us be a moment after it if we can possibly avoid it. We have already been made sensible of the advantages of having such a place where we can retire to, and it would be a world of pities if, by any act of carelessness on our parts, we made the police officers acquainted with our secret."

"We should be greatly to blame—there can be no doubt about that."

"But hush! If you will take my advice, we shall watch in silence."

"We will. It will be safer and better far."

Keeping just within the shadow cast by the house, the two highwaymen stood watching and waiting, hoping that the window above would again open, and that they should be allowed the opportunity of exchanging a few words with the prisoner.

But this opportunity was denied them.

Time passed away not very rapidly it is true; but all within the building remained as profoundly silent as if it had been uninhabited.

At length, with great disappointment perceptible in his tones, Tom King said:

"We had better not remain here any longer, Claude; let us start back. Recollect we have a long way to go, and it will be a hard ride to get there by the appointed time."

"So it will. I was waiting for you to speak; I did not like to suggest a move first; I have been thinking of it for some time, because I have got the disagreeable conviction in my mind that as soon as ever we shall get away to a little distance the window will be opened again."

"If such a thing should happen it will be vexatious in the extreme."

"But rely upon it, Tom, we had better move off and communicate what we have seen to the captain; we shall then be able to discuss the matter altogether, and finally start out in good time to-morrow night and ride here direct."

"Lead the way, then—I will follow you. A quick dash across to the wall must do it; it would never do to be seen now."

There was a good deal of risk in crossing this open space, because if anyone had happened to be at a window they could not have failed to be perceived.

But no alarm was given, and therefore they concluded that no one had seen them.

The rope was easily reached, and quickly mounted.

Claude descended first, leaving Tom King sitting astride upon the top.

"How shall I get down, Claude?" he said. "I can't descend by the rope."

"No, very true—I forgot that. But untie it, then hang down as low as you can, and let go. I will catch you. You will not be hurt, rely upon it."

Tom thought so, and he untied the rope as he had been requested, and afterwards lowered himself down, and let go.

He was caught in the arms of Claude Duval, and then the pair ran hastily to the spot where their horses had been left.

"I tell you what, Tom," said Claude—"we have stayed there rather longer than we ought to have done. We shall have hard work to get back by daybreak. Our horses will have to make use of their best speed."

"Come on, then! Let us put them to a gallop, and take our way straight across the country. The ride will do me good, I feel sure, and we have nothing to interrupt us."

"No, absolutely nothing, unless we are so unfortunate as to run full tilt against a body of police officers."

"We must try to guard against that. But come—are you ready?"

"Quite."

"Forward, then!"

At a rattling gallop the two highwaymen directed their course across the fields and meadows towards the public-house at Ealing.

Owing to the rapid rate at which they travelled, they could not keep up a conversation—besides, they were not particularly desirous of doing so, for each wished to think over the events of the night.

In spite of all their efforts, they found that the grey light of morning was fast stealing over all things, and they had yet a considerable distance to go.

They continued to urge their horses on, but nevertheless it was not until all objects were rendered tolerably distinct that they reached the end of the grass-grown lane.

This, however, we should explain, was not more than two minutes after Tom Davis had spoken in the manner we have recorded at the end of a preceding chapter.

They trotted up the lane swiftly, and, instead of pausing in front of the inn as usual, rode round to the stables, and got their horses under cover as quickly as they possibly could.

They found Dick Turpin, Sixteen-String Jack, and Tom Davis waiting anxiously for them.

"This is stretching it almost too far," said Dick. "We ought indeed to be most careful—it would be such a great misfortune if the officers penetrated our secret."

"I have been saying so, too," said Claude Duval; "but when you have heard all the strange adventures that have happened to us to-night, you will cease to wonder."

"I will undertake to say," exclaimed Dick, "that they fall far short of mine."

Claude and Tom smiled significantly, and said:

"Wait awhile, captain, and you will see. I rather think you will have occasion to change your opinion."

In the best of spirits, they all went back to the inn, where an excellent meal was prepared for them.

While seated at this, they all related their adventures.

It was Dick's turn first, and when they heard his account of the singular circumstances he had witnessed, they readily confessed that theirs were by no means so extraordinary.

However, at last all their confidences were exchanged, and, as Claude and Tom had fully anticipated, Dick considered the subject one of great importance.

"But I cannot possibly accompany you to-night," he said. "I am sorry it is out of the question, but I have made an engagement, and one for to-morrow night as well, so I shall leave you to take your choice, whether to wait until the night after next, in order for me to go with you, or whether you set out to-night, taking Sixteen-String Jack only."

"We will consider it, captain," said Tom King. "I confess I should have liked your company."

"Yes, nothing would have given me greater pleasure than to accompany you, for, rely upon it, there's some great wrong and evil being committed, and the girl you have seen is the victim of it."

"There can scarcely be any doubt as to that," said Claude.

"And now," said Dick, involuntarily sinking his voice, and assuming a greater solemnity of demeanour, "there's one question I wish particularly to ask, and which I have hesitated to put until now."

"What is that?"

"I want to ask you, Tom, and you, Maud and Ellen, and all of you who passed last night beneath this roof, whether you saw or heard anything resembling what took place the night before?"

All shook their heads.

"No," said Tom Davis. "I thought you would be anxious about that, and so I remained watching myself, but I neither heard the sigh nor saw the shadow on the wall."

"It's very strange," said Turpin. "I can scarcely think it bodes any ill to us, for we have succeeded marvellously well to-night."

"I only hope," said Tom King, "that we are allowed the opportunity of seeing it again."

"Yes, if so," said Dick Turpin, "I have firmly made up my mind that, let the risk be what it may, I will get close to it, and follow it. I am determined not to allow a mystery of this kind to remain in the house undiscovered."

"Quite right too, captain," said Tom Davis. "I can assure you I don't feel at all easy in my mind, and if it is a ghost—and I don't know what else to call it—the sooner it is laid the better."

"Yes, decidedly, but we can do no more than watch and wait. As I have told you, to-night I cannot be here, nor the next night, and if the shadow appears in my absence I shall be vexed indeed. On the following night, however, I propose that we all remain here and keep watch; then, if any discovery is made, we shall all be cognisant of it at the same moment."

"So we shall," said Tom Davis, with a slight shiver, "and I only wish the time had come."

CHAPTER DCCLXXXIII.

A TROOP OF POLICE OFFICERS PAY A VISIT TO THE HIGHWAYMEN'S HAUNT, AND ASK ELLEN A GREAT MANY QUESTIONS.

This was a wish that all most fervently re-echoed for it was no pleasant thing to have such an inexplicable and terrible mystery hanging over them.

That it was no delusion they were all quite confident. But then, what was it? Were they at once to resign themselves to a belief in supernatural influences?

Not one was willing to do this.

"We must be content to let it wait," said Sixteen-String Jack, "until these important matters that we have in hand are quite disposed of."

"Yes," said Turpin. "Mine admits of no delay. I have pledged my word, and at all risks the engagement must be kept."

"And," said Tom King, "I feel that I could not rest another night without endeavouring to pierce the mystery that hangs about that prison-like-looking abode. What I have already witnessed makes my blood boil to remember!"

"And mine," said Claude.

"It is clear that we must wait until the time I mentioned. Come, my comrades, let us retire and get what rest we can, in order to be well fitted for our night of adventures."

All were, of course, thoroughly weary, for the amount of exertion they had gone through was something tremendous.

None felt the fatigue more than Sixteen-String Jack, and no wonder, for not only had his adventures been of a very tiring description, but he was yet weak from the effects of the wound he had so lately received.

In fact, this very over-exertion was near bringing a relapse.

Consequently, they were all ready and willing enough to mount to the upper story of the inn, and scarcely had they reached the top of the staircase than a sudden clatter of horses' hoofs announced the fact that some travellers had halted in front of the inn.

"Don't show yourselves at any of the upper windows on any account," said Tom Davis. "They might be officers, you know!"

"All right!" said Dick—"take care of yourself!"

"Oh, I won't be seen!"

At this moment Ellen came running towards them with a look of alarm upon her countenance.

"What is the matter?" asked Davis.

"Officers!"

"I thought so.

"What shall we do?"

"Don't be afraid, my girl—I will keep out of sight, and I must leave the rest to you."

Tom Davis hastily ascended the stairs.

Ellen was a little bewildered.

But she knew quite well that all depended upon herself, and therefore she summoned all her fortitude to her aid.

Her duty was to allay the suspicions of the officers—if they had any. It might turn out, however, that it was only a chance visit.

The information she had given Davis was quite correct. They were indeed officers who had just arrived so unexpectedly and so unwelcomely.

They numbered in all about a dozen.

"House—house!" they cried, in a loud voice—"house—house! Who is within?"

Ellen made her appearance at the front door.

"Well, my lass," said the one in command, "so you are here at last, are you? Where's your ostler? We want him to take charge of our horses."

"He is out, sir."

"Out, is he? Well, where's the landlord?"

"He is out, too, sir."

"Upon my word, a nice state of things! But really, my dear, you are quite a pretty girl."

"I know that.

"Do you indeed?"

"Yes—but don't begin paying compliments to me, for, of course, you will expect some of them back again, and I am the worst one in the world for saying things that are not true, and, without I told a barefaced lie, how could I say you were handsome or even good-looking?"

There was a general laugh at this, and the police officer began to look very red about the cheeks.

"Come, come, my girl," he said, "don't be too merry, but attend to our orders."

"Certainly, sir, with pleasure. What are they?"

"Why, fetch some hay, and we will give our horses something to eat at the door. You, Robins, stay and attend to them. The rest follow me."

"This way, sir, if you please!" said Ellen, ushering her unwelcome guests into one of the front rooms. "Pray make yourselves comfortable. What can I bring you!"

"A jug of ale apiece all round."

Ellen flew off first to supply the officer outside with the hay he wanted, for fear he should go round to the back and there make some disagreeble discovery or other.

This done, she carried in the jugs of ale.

"Have you given one to Robins outside?"

"No, sir."

"Then do so."

This command was also obeyed, and then she was called into the front room again.

"Tobacco," said the chief officer.

This was also brought, and he (the chief officer) continued:

"Have you lived here long, my lass?"

"Not very long, sir."

"It's a very lonely place, isn't it?"

"Very."

"So I thought. Can't possibly have much custom. Why, I should think no one passes your house once in a month."

"Oftener than that, sir."

"But how on earth can your master continue to make the place pay? It passes my comprehension."

"I don't think he cares about making it pay, sir," answered Ellen.

"Indeed! How is that?"

"Well, sir, it's more master's business than my own; but I have heard him say that he bought the house with money that he had been working hard all his life to save, and that he intended to live here till the end of his days."

"Then I suppose you mean that he has money enough to live independent of any business."

"Yes, that is it."

"Then, why on earth don't he retire?"

"He has, sir."

"I mean, why does he keep a public-house?"

"Oh, I think that is because of a fancy. He don't like to be too lonely. It is pleasant to him, people dropping in now and then, though I don't think he would care about too much of it."

"Oh, very likely," said the officer, looking around him. "It seems a pleasant enough place, and I don't wonder at people feeling inclined to spend their lives here. But, I say, what do you call that? What brings such a thing as that here, I wonder?"

Ellen felt her limbs tremble.

She almost fell to the floor with fright.

She was sure her face turned the colour of ashes.

"That—that?" was all she could stammer.

"Yes, that!" cried the officer, rising from his seat, and walking towards the door.

"It's a hat!" gasped Ellen.

"I see that," said the officer, reaching the article mentioned from the nail in the door on which it had been hung.

It was rather a singular-looking hat.

[DICK TURPIN FAILS IN HIS ATTEMPT TO STOP LORD SPINDELOW'S CARRIAGE.]

It was of black felt, with the brim so turned up as to give it a three-cornered shape.

The upper edge was trimmed with a border of gold lace—rather tarnished, it is true, but still retaining much of its original magnificence.

Then in front was placed a long scarlet, rakish-looking feather, that was kept in its place by means of a diamond brooch.

The officer turned this hat over and over, and examined it with a truly critical eye.

His companions crowded around him, and gazed at it with an equal amount of interest.

As soon as the scrutiny was finished, the chief officer turned his eyes towards Ellen.

So did all the rest.

But by this time Ellen had been able to recover herself.

She had quite regained her composure.

It was no wonder that at the first her mind should have been thrown off its balance.

The hat belonged to Tom King.

How it came to be hanging there she could not tell.

Certainly it was a very improper place for it.

And although she had schooled herself into quietude, and hoped to allay all suspicions, yet she could by no means make sure of doing so, nor could she tell how disastrous might be the results of this discovery.

We have said that the police officers all fixed their eyes upon her.

The chief said, while indicating the hat:

"This is a dainty article, truly! Pray tell me how it came to be in this place."

"Oh, such a beautiful young man!"

"What!"

"Oh, lovely!"

"What do you mean?"

"Why, one day, ever so long ago, a young man came in here—here in this very room, and sat down and called for a bottle of wine. Oh, he was a perfect beauty, with such a fine moustache, such splendid eyes, and a delightful smile!"

"What on earth are you talking about?"

"Don't you understand me?"

"No, I'll be hanged if I do!"

"Well, then, he had on such a magnificent scarlet coat, trimmed all over with real gold lace, and large riding boots, and a beautiful amber waistcoat! Oh, he looked like a prince!"

"But what the devil has he to do with this hat?"

"Why, everything. Don't I keep telling you that it belonged to him."

"Belonged to him!"

"Yes. And he talked so nicely; but before he could finish his bottle of wine, a man rode up to the door of the inn and rushed into this room. Well, no sooner was that done than he cried, 'Surrender, will you! You are my prisoner!'"

"Who said that?"

"The one that rushed in."

"Was he a police officer?"

"Yes. Didn't I tell you he was? Well, the other—that was, the one with the bottle of wine, you know——"

"Yes—yes; go on."

"He said, 'You have got to take me yet, and I should advise you not to try it on!' Well, the police officer dashed at him, and then there was an awful struggle. I screamed and shrieked, but all to no purpose; when all at once the one with the scarlet coat rushed out into the front, mounted his horse, and rode off."

"What did the officer do?"

"He began the pursuit, and asked everyone to join in, offering all manner of sums for a reward, so that it made me wish I was a man."

"And who did he say the man in the scarlet coat was?"

"Tom King. And soon afterwards, what should I find but this hat, and I have kept it in remembrance ever since. I can never think of that day without trembling!"

"And have you ever seen Tom King since?"

"No, never."

"And this is his hat?"

"Yes. Isn't it a beauty?"

The officer did not reply.

He turned the hat over and over in his hands with a meditative air.

He was not a very fast-thinking man, and as he turned the hat over so did he turn over in his mind all that Ellen had said

"Humph!" he said, at last "Very strange, my girl!"

"Yes, sir."

"Here, take the reckoning out of this, and keep the change for yourself."

"Thank you, sir."

"Only I intend to keep the hat."

"I should like that, sir."

"But I insist upon having it! I seize it in the name of the King. Now, my lads," he added, "follow me! We must be getting on our road again."

"I wonder whether he believes what I have told him, or whether he suspects the truth?" asked Ellen of herself, as she watched the officers out of the front door. "How odd that he should make up his mind to leave so suddenly!"

CHAPTER DCCLXXXIV.

THE HIGHWAYMEN ARE CONSIDERABLY DISCONCERTED BY THE PRESENCE OF THE POLICE OFFICERS.

THERE was something very strange and peculiar about this police officer's conduct, and it is no wonder that Ellen should feel her suspicions and doubts concerning it.

Upon reaching the front door, however, she found that they all mounted their horses leisurely enough; and then the whole party trotted off at rather a swift pace down the lane.

She watched them for a moment, and then turned back. In the passage she met Tom Davis.

"So they are gone at last, are they?" he said.

"Yes," said Ellen; "but I am sadly afraid——"

"Yes—yes, so am I."

"Did you hear what took place between us, then?"

"Yes, I did; I overheard every word of it."

"Then it will spare me the trouble of telling you, and besides, will be a great deal better, for now you can form your own opinions from the manner of the police officer."

"Yes, it was confoundedly awkward to think Tom King's hat should be hanging up there."

"I was frightened at first, I confess."

"But you displayed admirable presence of mind. No one could have behaved better under the circumstances."

"I felt at first as though I should sink down to the floor in alarm!"

"I dare say you did. But just go to the front door again, and stand there, keeping watch. In the meanwhile, I will go upstairs and tell them what has happened."

Tom Davis's intelligence was received by the highwaymen with a good deal of consternation.

"In the first place," said Dick, "what could have brought them here at all?"

"I know no better than yourself, captain."

"I am afraid some of us have been seen either returning or departing."

"It may be so," said Davis, "or it may be that they called here just for a few minutes for refreshment as they often do at roadside inns."

"The fact is," said Turpin, "our apparent safety has made us all careless and blind to caution. How came it that Tom's hat should be hanging up in the public room?"

"I can't tell you that either, captain; but we have so few visitors, that, as you say, we have grown careless."

"Well, this sort of thing must be altered," said Dick, decisively, "because the consequences of discovery will be something fearful. If once the officers have an idea that we are in this place, they will put forth all the cunning they are the masters of, and so surround and attack this house, that it will be impossible for us to escape from it."

Tom Davis started as though struck with a sudden thought.

"Captain," he said, suddenly, after a momentary pause.

"Yes, Davis, what is it?"

"I have just thought of something."

"Something good, I can tell, by the look of your face," said Dick. "By all means let us know what it is."

"Why, it was your words that suggested the idea. Who knows but that some of these days, in spite of all our precautions, the officers might make the discovery you have just mentioned?"

"Such a thing is very far from improbable."

"Well, captain, they may do it, and we ought to be prepared beforehand for such a contingency. Perhaps now you guess at my idea. It is to construct a secret passage, leading somewhere from the foundations of this building out into some other place to be decided upon when we have made a careful survey around."

"A most admirable thought," said Dick. "Davis, I am glad you have made the suggestion. I can't understand how it is that we have never thought of it before."

Dick Turpin's companions were similarly surprised. It was palpably necessary.

"We must set about that at once," said Claude Duval, "and not allow ourselves any rest until we have completed it. I long to make a commencement."

Dick smiled.

"You must control your impulsiveness a little," he said. "You forget how we are situated just at the present time: those rascally officers!"

"Yes, I did forget them."

"They may have ridden off," said Tom Davis.

"Or, more likely, are lurking somewhere near," interrupted Turpin.

"Well, in either case, if they approach any closer Ellen will let us know; she is standing at the front door as a sentinel."

"Good!"

"It seems to me," said Tom King, "that the chief difficulty will be in leaving here to-night."

"How so?"

"Why, these officers may perhaps ride off to London, and there hold a consultation with some more respecting what they have seen; and as they cannot fail to think it suspicious they will watch the place closely all night to see who goes out."

"I fear that is only too likely," said Turpin—"I thought so from the first."

"So did I. It happens at a most unfortunate time for us—for you, Dick, because of your disappointment, and for Claude, Jack and myself because of the excursion we have planned for to-night."

"Still," said Davis, "if the officers are lurking about, you would not think of running the frightful risk of leaving?"

"We must wait and see," replied Dick. "Perhaps the danger may not be so great as we imagine, and my appointment is one I have given my word to keep."

"Well," said Tom Davis, "that is a point you will have to settle among yourselves. But now, as I have made you acquainted with all the danger, I will just go down again and see Ellen."

"Be careful not to show yourself."

"Oh, I'll take care of that, never fear. I shall be most particular not to face any of the police, for fear my features should be recollected; besides, Ellen told them that I was out."

"Then, above all things, don't be seen. If you are, that will increase their suspicions tenfold."

Tom Davis assented, and, again promising to be careful, descended the stairs.

Contrary to their expectations, the remainder of the day passed off quietly and calmly enough.

Ellen was most careful to keep a strict and most observant watch around, but failed to detect any sign of the presence of the police.

"Depend upon it," said Tom Davis, "it is the night that we shall have to fear. I shall be greatly surprised if they are not back again at dark."

Finding all was peaceful, the highwaymen availed themselves of the opportunity to snatch a few hours' repose.

They were soon rested, and when they arose Tom King and his two comrades set to work to make a rope ladder.

The necessary articles were all at hand, and they worked away industriously.

They calculated that this article would prove a most valuable auxiliary to them, for they had hopes that they should be able to communicate in some manner with the prisoner Tom had caught sight of at the window.

By dusk the ladder was finished.

It was of great length, and, for greater convenience in carrying, was divided into three portions, but in such a manner that they could be easily joined again.

Dick Turpin explained to Maud the nature of his arrangement with the mysterious lady.

He had given his word to perform a certain service for her, and she knew full well that it would be perfectly useless to request him to break his promise.

Moreover, she fancied that if he was successful, the lady might give him a large enough reward to enable him to quit his present hazardous mode of life and to leave England.

This, more than anything else, reconciled her to allowing him to set out.

As it began to grow darker, the anxiety of the highwaymen considerably increased to know whether the police officers had really returned.

If they had, it would be difficult indeed to take their departure without being seen or captured.

The latter they might avoid, but the former seemed scarcely possible.

They were in earnest consultation upon this point, when Tom Davis suddenly entered the room.

"Our fears are confirmed," he said,—"fully confirmed. The police officers have come back."

"I guessed as much," said Turpin.

"Ellen saw them groping about in the darkness, and it is pretty evident they are posting themselves in various positions so as to command a view of the entire premises, and to make it impossible for anyone to leave unseen."

"But we must manage to leave somehow," said Turpin, "and therefore we must call stratagem to our aid."

"Leave me to think," said Tom Davis,—"leave me to think."

"I think we had better all occupy ourselves with this subject," said Turpin.

"Very good," said Davis. "The first difficulty to be got over is crossing the yard. I question whether you will be able to enter the stables unperceived."

"Then if so," said Maud, "how are you to leave the stables again with your horses?"

"It seems to me," said Tom Davis, "that there is only one course to be pursued, and that is, to throw the officers off the scent in some way."

"But is such a thing possible?"

"I think if we gave our attention to it we might manage to raise a false alarm. The officers would then run all in one direction, leaving the coast clear."

"Yes," said Turpin, "that would put an end to the difficulty at once, provided it could be managed, though for my own part I can scarcely see how you are to do it."

"Nor I, at present," said Davis; "but you had better be in readiness to act at any moment, to be quick to take the hint, and when you see the chance, slip off."

"Rely upon it we shall do that."

"Then are you all ready?"

"Yes, we have made every preparation except saddling our horses."

"Well, that you can do easily as soon as you gain the stable. And now I have something else to tell you that perhaps you are not aware of."

"What is it?"

"The other day, when in the stable, I noticed that there was a door that appeared to have been closed up and disused for many years."

"Where is this door situated?"

"At what I might call the back of the stable. With a good deal of trouble I managed to get it open, and then found it led direct into the little plantation of trees that you can see yonder."

He pointed through the window to the tops of some trees that could be seen behind the stable at the back of the inn.

"That sounds more like getting away," said Dick Turpin, with his face lighting up.

"Yes, provided none of the officers are there, and provided none see you cross the yard. But it is evident we must raise an alarm of some kind, so as to draw all the officers to one spot; and when it is done, you must take the opportunity of slipping off as quickly as possible."

"And," said Sixteen-String Jack, "while we are planning all this, there is something else that we shall have to bear in mind."

CHAPTER DCCLXXXV.

IN WHICH TOM DAVIS RATHER ASTONISHES JENKINS THE POLICE OFFICER.

"AND what may that be, Jack?" they all asked, with one voice.

"Why, just supposing for a moment that we all ride off in safety, and without being perceived by the officers, how are we to know whether it will be safe for us to return?"

Tom Davis rubbed his head.

"That certainly is a most important point," he remarked,—"as important as your departure."

"Yes, decidedly."

"But yet," he continued, "I think it is one that could be settled with much more ease."

"How so?"

"It only depends upon my giving you some kind of signal."

"True; but what kind could you give?"

"Why, in the first place, it would be necessary for you all to take up your positions about daybreak at some point from which you can command a view of the top of the inn."

"Well, and what then?"

"As soon as ever the least signs of dawn are in the sky I will let off three rockets—that is, provided I am certain the police officers have departed, and that it is safe for you to return."

"Very good," said Dick. "I don't know what better arrangement we can make than that."

"Nor I," said Davis.

"It is simple in the extreme. But suppose the officers are in the vicinity, what shall you do then?"

"Just nothing at all, so that when it is daybreak, if you don't see the rockets ascend, seek for safety in some other quarter, and don't attempt to come near until about twelve o clock on the following night, at which time, if all is well, I will let off the rockets."

"A very good arrangement," said Dick, "and all we have to be careful in is to be somewhere so as to be able to see the rockets."

"Yes, and at the proper time," said Claude Duval.

"Well, as that is settled," said Sixteen-String Jack, "suppose we go back to the present. We have agreed all about returning, and now how are we to depart?"

"As a preliminary step," said Tom Davis, "will it not be better for you to descend to the ground floor? You will be more in readiness to act then, and you will be quite as secure from observation."

"Yes, it will be better."

"Come, then, follow me."

They all descended into a room at the back of the inn that had a large window looking into the yard.

"Well, now," said Davis, "I am going out to reconnoitre a little myself. If I make any disturbance or bother don't fail to be in readiness to avail yourself of it; I shall try to attract the attention of the officers all to one spot if I am able, and then, when I have done so, you must be off."

Tom Davis had no very clear idea how he was to effect this very desirable object.

Nevertheless, he left the room with considerable confidence, and walked to the back door of the inn.

Opening it, he passed out into the yard, and no sooner had he crossed the threshold than he perceived, close to the stables, the dark figure of a man.

That he was a police officer he did not for a moment doubt, and, seeing him in that situation suggested a thought to the landlord, which he acted upon in an instant.

"Thieves—thieves!" he yelled, at the top of his voice. "Murder! Thieves—thieves!"

He ran hastily across the yard while he spoke, and the officer, wondering what was the matter, stopped short, and looked about him in bewildered surprise.

Tom Davis ran at him with undiminished speed, and, to his unutterable astonishment, seized hold of him by the throat in a manner that threatened to strangle him.

"So I have caught you at last," he cried, "have I? Oh, you villain!—you rascal! Come on! I knew that I should have you sooner or later, and here you are sure enough! Thieves—thieves! It's no good calling them in this out-of-the-way place, for there are never any to be seen!"

The officer gurgled and struggled, and endeavoured to free himself from the landlord's grasp.

But all in vain. He was much inferior in size and stature to our friend, Tom Davis, who, by putting out the whole of his strength, dragged the officer rapidly across the yard towards the back door of the inn.

All the while he contrived to raise a tremendous outcry that could not fail to be heard for some distance around.

He was quickly rewarded for all this by hearing the rapid trampling of many feet.

Breathless and exhausted, he dragged the officer into the kitchen.

"Oh, you rascally thief!" he said. "Have not you robbed me often enough? But you have come once too often, and now I've caught you! I will make an example of you!"

The officer tried to explain.

But Tom Davis only grew more furious, and increased the pressure upon his throat.

In another moment a number of police officers rushed into the house.

They entered the kitchen pell-mell, and Tom Davis, though not appearing to do so, actually counted them, and found they numbered seven in all.

"What on earth's the matter?" cried one, who was no other than the chief over the rest—"what's the meaning of this tremendous disturbance?"

The officer kicked furiously.

That was the only means by which he could make any sort of reply.

"Oh!" said Tom Davis, "can I believe my own eyes—is it really true? Why, are you police officers?"

"Yes, yes—can't you see we are? But what are you doing there?"

"Take this wretch prisoner—handcuff him—load him with chains—drag him off to the gaol! Oh, the wretch—the villain! He's robbed my henroost night after night, but I resolved to keep watch this evening, and so, you see, I've caught him!"

"Why, you idiot!" said the chief officer.

"What?" cried Tom, indignantly.

"You idiot—you ninny—you fool! Can't you see who you've got there?"

"Yes, of course I can. And why don't you take him off me? I tell you I caught him skulking along by the stable, and I know he was after the last few fowls I have got left!"

"The man's mad!" said the chief officer. "Just take him off Jenkins, will you?"

The officers hastened forward and released their companion from the landlord's ferocious grip.

"Why, can't you see," said the one in command, "what a stupid mistake you have made? That's no thief you have caught, but a police officer—one of my men!"

Tom Davis rubbed his eyes, and looked like one in a dream.

"A police officer?" he said. "Well, so he is—I see it now, by his dress! But what in the world brought you creeping about in the dark?"

"That's nothing to you," said the chief officer; "you have made a great mistake, you can see that plain enough!"

"But why are you all here?" asked Tom Davis, pretending to be struck with surprise for the first time. "Why, I never saw so many police officers in this part since I opened the public-house."

"Very likely not," said the chief, with a peculiar smile.

"You have got some secret business on hand?" said Davis.

"Yes, we have; but at the same time, it is nothing to you. Confound you and your fowls as well, say I! You have seriously upset our arrangements."

Tom Davis pretended to get frightened.

"I am sure I am very sorry," he said, in a humble, apologetic voice—"very sorry indeed; but you can't be surprised at my making such a mistake: you would not believe how I have been robbed."

"Bother your hens!" cried Jenkins, who by this time managed to recover his voice. "You ought to know better than to seize hold of a police officer in that wild-animal sort of a way!"

"I am sure I humbly beg your pardon," said Tom, "but I never once thought of a police officer skulking about in such a way. However, as it was an unfortunate mistake—nothing more perhaps—you would not be above forgiving it by taking something to drink at my expense."

"Well, my throat don't feel exactly right," said Jenkins, glancing at his chief.

"Oh, yes," said the one in command, "you can have something at the landlord's expense, Jenkins, and I think he ought not to forget how he has interfered with our plan."

"Perhaps you would like a drop of something all round?" said Tom, delighted at the success he had met with.

"Well, it is a very cold night, and that's a fact," was the evasive but significant reply.

"Well, then," said Tom Davis, "if you'd all condescend to sit down for a moment or two I will go into the bar and fetch you a drop of the finest ale that, I'll be bound to say, you ever tasted in all your lives; I praise it myself, but I am not afraid to do so, because I know the quality of it."

The officers condescended to sit down willingly enough.

As soon as the landlord left the room they whispered together:

"We are on the wrong scent," said the chief officer—"I feel sure of it—this place is as quiet as the grave; however, a thought has just struck me, by which we can make sure whether we are right or wrong."

"What is it?" the others asked anxiously.

"Why, if the people we suspect are hidden anywhere about these premises their horses must be here as well. Now, under some pretence or other, I will get the landlord to allow us to search the stable at the back, and if we find the horses, why, we shall know what to do, but if they are not there we may conclude that our suspicions are unjust."

He would probably have said more, but just at that moment Tom Davis re-entered the room, carrying with him a large brown earthenware pitcher full of ale.

The froth rose up above the top of it two or three inches, and looked very white, and creamy, and tempting.

"There," he said, putting it down on the table, and looking at it with proud admiration, "that's what I call first rate. What do you think of it, gentlemen?"

The officers' mouths all watered at the sight.

CHAPTER DCCLXXXVI.

TOM DAVIS COMPLETELY SUCCEEDS IN STULTIFYING THE POLICE OFFICERS.

"It looks well," said the chief officer, with a grin. "Now let us try the taste."

"With all my heart," said Tom Davis, as he poured some of the ale into a drinking cup and handed it to the one in command.

"Well," said the officer, looking at Davis, "here's hoping that the next time you catch anybody in your yard it will be the man who has robbed you of your fowls!"

"Yes, d—n it, and so do I!" muttered Jenkins.

The officer emptied the cup at a draught, and Davis quickly filled it.

In this way the ale was circulated all round.

It was indeed of excellent quality, and the officers were unanimous in their praises of it.

"Would any of you like a pipe?" said Tom Davis. "I have heard of that as being a kind of peace-offering, and I feel that in some way or other I have upset you a good deal."

"No, no—not particularly," said the chief officer; "but by all means let us have a pipe."

Pipes and tobacco were brought, and the officers and Tom Davis sat round the fire in the kitchen, just in the same manner as he had sat with the highwaymen such a short time before.

Everything about the inn was, however, particularly quiet and peaceful, and it went far towards banishing the officers of any suspicions that might have been lingering in their breasts.

Tom talked away upon a great variety of subjects, and endeavoured to ascertain what the officers' intentions really were

On this point, however, they remained quiet, and the one in command, looking him steadfastly in the face for some moments, said, all at once:

"By-the-way, my friend, your voice and face seem familiar to me—have I not seen you somewhere before?"

Tom winced a little, but preserved his composure pretty well.

There was no other light in the room except that which came from the fire, and under these circumstances he had hoped to escape the officers' recognition.

"It is quite possible you have seen me," he said, as calmly as he could, "but I don't recollect ever having seen you before."

"Well, I know your face," said the chief, "but I can't for the life of me remember where I have seen it; if you told me your name, though, perhaps I should remember."

"Yes," said Davis—"yes, I shouldn't wonder."

"What is your name, then?"

"Thomas."

"Thomas what?"

"Thomas."

"What do you mean by saying Thomas in that fashion—is that the only name you've got?"

"It is."

"How can that be? Who ever heard of a man with one name? That's your christian name, I suppose?"

"Yes, it is."

"What's your surname, then?"

"Thomas."

"Oh, bother. What do you mean by saying Thomas in that curious way for?"

"Well, don't you understand? I say my name is Thomas Thomas, christian and surname, and if you go outside and look at the sign, why there you will see it in good large letters."

"Oh! I understand now; but you told me in such a way that I'll be hanged if I could at first. Well, Mr. Thomas Thomas, I can't help thinking I've seen you before, and I shall recollect where in a while."

"I wish I could spare you the trouble," said Tom Davis, "but I hope you will believe me when I say that I can't recollect ever having seen you before in my life."

"Very likely not—very likely not," said the officer, abruptly.

He was evidently endeavouring to refresh his recollection.

This was what Tom Davis dreaded, so he endeavoured to turn the conversation.

Addressing himself to Jenkins, he said:

"I hope, sir, that you've quite overlooked that unfortunate little mistake of mine. I can assure you I meant no harm."

"Oh, it's all right," said Jenkins—"all right; don't name it! I wish we could catch the rascal for you."

"So do I. If I told you what he has stolen at one time or another you would scarcely believe me."

"Perhaps it's a weazel," said Jenkins.

"It's a two-legged one, then; it's a great disappointment to me, however, for I made sure I'd got hold of the right man at last."

The chief officer could not help taking note of this conversation, and it immediately suggested an idea to his mind by which his intention to search the stable might be carried out.

"I'll tell you what," he cried, suddenly: "perhaps this rascally thief is actually hiding about in the stable at the present moment, only waiting for an opportunity to carry off the few fowls that you have left!"

"I hope not," said Davis, with well-feigned alarm.

"Well, I'll tell you what we'll do, landlord: As one good turn deserves another, we'll go out and search your back premises, and if we can find the thief we'll capture him."

Tom Davis hardly knew how to reply, yet he felt that he could not refuse.

Surely, however, the highwaymen had taken advantage of the opportunity to leave the inn, and there would be no fear of discovery.

As no alarm had been raised, it was only reasonable to suppose that they had got clear off.

The officer did not wait for any reply, but rose to his feet, in which he was followed by the whole of his men.

"Now, landlord," he cried, "just lead the way, and you, my lads, unmask your lanterns."

The officers produced the dark lanterns they carried, and turned back the slides that were over the lenses.

In an irregular line this singular-looking procession left the kitchen, and passed out of the back door of the inn into the yard.

"Where do you keep your fowls?" said the chief officer. "We will search there first."

This was rather a poser, the truth being that Tom Davis had no fowls of any kind on the premises.

He was spared the trouble of replying by the chief officer, who continued:

"I suppose you keep them in the stable?—people generally do."

"Yes, yes," said Davis, somewhat nervously—"in the stable, of course!"

The officers walked briskly forward, and pushed open the stable door.

They flashed their lights around them in a moment.

No signs of any horses could be seen in the stalls.

Tom could scarcely repress a sigh of relief.

The officers exchanged glances with each other.

"You have plenty of accommodation here," said the chief officer. "I am surprised to find it in such an out-of-the-way place."

"Many people have made the same remark," said Davis, "for it is so long ago that it is almost forgotten, but at one time this public-house faced the high-road, and then there was a much better business done at it than there is at the present time."

"Well, where are the fowls?" said Jenkins. "I can't see any here."

"Then the very last has gone," said Davis. "Oh, confound the thief! There's not even one left now! I suppose all hope of catching him will be at an end, for he has fetched them every one."

Having ascertained that the highwaymen's horses were not in the stable, the officers felt but little inclination to search after the man who was said to have stolen the lot.

They made a pretence of searching round the premises, but Tom Davis was very glad that they performed it in the incomplete manner they did, as they might have found some trifling article that would have given rise to their suspicions.

Once more they followed him back gladly enough into the kitchen of the public-house, for the night was indeed a bitter cold one, so that a seat by the fireside was more than usually pleasant.

More ale was brought, and after the second pitcher was emptied the officers began to grow rather uproarious.

They crowded round Tom Davis, shook him by the hand, swore he was a jolly good fellow, and that they would never interfere with him, let him do what he might.

Our old friend pretended to be quite overcome with these protestations, although he knew that they would disappear as quickly as they had arisen.

They insisted upon having a song from him, however, and, in order to humour them, he complied.

Then the chief officer sung, then Jenkins, and some more, so that the night was passed in a very jovial manner.

"It is time we got back," said the chief officer at last, rising somewhat unsteadily from his seat. "Come, my lads, we'll be off!"

"Where are your horses?" asked Tom.

"Oh, not here," was the reply, given with a hiccup. "We left them at a public-house on the common. Good night, old fellow! We'll call and see you again the next time we are this way."

"Do—do!" said Tom, though he wished from the bottom of his heart that he should never catch sight of them again.

After some further delay, the whole of the party reeled off, and the officer in command, on making his report the next morning, gave it to the effect that, having carefully watched the inn from all points, they had come to the conclusion that their suspicions were groundless.

It was a great satisfaction to Tom Davis to see them depart.

He watched them as long as he could, and then followed them at a safe distance on foot.

They had drunk too much strong ale to pay much attention to such a slight sound as Tom made in following them, and he had the satisfaction of watching them mount their horses at the inn they had mentioned, and ride off in the direction of London.

"That's one narrow escape," he said, drawing a long breath—"a very narrow escape! I hope I have seen the last of them, but that secret passage must be commenced without delay."

He turned back to the inn as he spoke, and, having reached it, he sat down in the kitchen to wait patiently for day to dawn.

CHAPTER DCCLXXXVII.

DICK TURPIN SETS OUT UPON HIS HIGHLY-DANGEROUS MISSION, AND MAKES AN ABORTIVE ATTEMPT TO STOP LORD SPINDELOW'S CARRIAGE.

As may be supposed, the highwaymen were by no means slow to avail themselves of the very excellent opportunity they had of leaving the public-house.

We know already that they did so successfully.

They ran hastily across the yard, saddled their steeds, and then, finding the little door of which Tom Davis had spoken, passed through it, and found themselves in the rather dense plantation behind.

The door was carefully closed, and then, for some distance, all four of the highwaymen rode in company.

Having gone some distance, however, they halted and separated.

Dick's last words to them were that on no account were they to fail to be somewhere in front of the inn at the appointed time, and to watch there for the appearance of the rockets.

He then turned away, and as he had started much later than he intended, he allowed Black Bess to go at rather a slashing pace towards Fulham Green.

He was rather fearful that he should not be in time to intercept his carriage.

He took the nearest possible route to his destination, however, and carefully avoided an encounter with every one.

At length he stopped at this pleasant, rural spot—in those days, being a portion of a village, it was entirely removed from London.

Around the green only a few residences were built, and these belonged chiefly to people of position.

One of these was a large, white stone edifice, very imposing, and yet very pleasant to look upon.

Various twining plants had been trained to grow up the side of it, and the contrast between the bright green leaves and the white walls was very striking to the eye.

"That's the place," said Dick, looking at it. "There can be no mistake, for it is the only white building to be seen."

Selecting a spot where he should be entirely out of sight of any chance passer-by, and yet where he could command a good view up and down the road, Dick stopped, and waited patiently for the carriage to approach.

It had been accurately described to him in all its details, so that he could scarcely make a mistake, and accordingly, as he sat thus still on the back of his steed, his thoughts reverted to his singular adventures on the preceding night.

As may be expected, it had occupied his thoughts a great deal, though the appearance of the officers so unexpectedly at the public-house had for a time driven it from his mind.

Above all things, his curiosity was roused with respect to the document which he was to obtain.

He was full of speculation as to what could be the contents of it.

What could it be that gave the nobleman in question such a terrible and tremendous power over the lady as to make her anxious and willing to compass his death?

This was something, however, that he would never know, for he had solemnly pledged his word to make no attempt to master the contents of the paper.

A thousand ideas started up into his mind, but there was not one of them that satisfied him.

He was aroused from these meditations by the sound of carriage wheels.

It was so faint and so far off that scarcely anyone but a highwayman could have detected it, and Dick's attention was attracted more by the behaviour of Black Bess.

He rode on at once from his place of concealment, and galloped at full speed in the direction from which the vehicle was coming.

It was not long before he caught sight of a couple of bright lights flashing through the darkness.

In another moment he could make out the forms of the horses, of the coachman, and of the bright yellow vehicle behind.

As soon as he was near enough, Dick called out:

"Hold—hold! Stop, coachman, or you are a dead man! Pull up, I say, without you want an ounce of lead in your brain!"

The coachman uttered a yell of fright, and would probably have stopped the carriage without further hesitation, but just at that moment a window in the carriage was violently let down, and a head was projected.

"Drive on, Joseph, you cowardly rascal!" said a voice—"drive on! If you don't lash your horses into a gallop, I will favour you with a bullet!"

The coachman was alarmed, and whipped his horses savagely.

Dick fired, thinking very likely that the sound of the pistol would terrify him into bringing the horses to a stop.

But it did not, and the occupant of the coach, who was doubtless Lord Spindelow, catching sight of Dick Turpin, raised a pistol suddenly, and fired.

He fired it with a laugh of exultation, and Dick pulled up Black Bess suddenly, for he believed he was shot.

In another instant he found that this was a groundless apprehension.

Therefore he once more gave her the rein.

From this little circumstance, Dick had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that Lord Spindelow was a man of a violent and somewhat courageous disposition

Certainly he did not appear likely to be easily frightened out of the document that was of importance to him.

Although the horses in the carriage were going at a furious rate, yet, by urging Black Bess to the top of her speed, Dick easily got abreast with the carriage door.

"My lord," he cried, in a loud voice, "if you wish to save the shedding of blood, order your coachman to pull up! I have important business with you!"

"No doubt," was the reply—"very important! Take that!"

Another pistol was discharged, and Dick narrowly escaped being injured by it.

"Pull up!" he cried again, to the coachman—"pull up, I say!"

But no notice was taken of this command, and immediately afterwards the vehicle stopped in front of his lordship's residence.

Perceiving this, Dick turned Black Bess's head round and rode off, though he did so very reluctantly.

All hope of stopping the carriage was now at an end.

To have gone up to it while close to Lord Spindelow's residence would have been nothing short of madness, as the servants would have quickly made their appearance, and attacked him.

"Confound it," he said. "I must have managed matters very awkwardly, or I should not have bungled like this! What's to be done? This attempt will only serve to put him on his guard, and will increase my trouble tenfold!"

Finding himself at a safe distance, Dick pulled up, and allowed Black Bess to proceed only at a gentle trot.

For some time he remained perfectly silent, though his brain was very busy.

He was endeavouring to come to some conclusion as to which would be the best mode of endeavouring to obtain possession of the paper.

He could think of nothing satisfactory, however.

"I can only do one thing," he said, at last, "and that is, to enter the house, and endeavour to surprise him alone. It will be running a fearful amount of risk, for he is a resolute, determined man, I feel certain; but yet I will not go back from what I have promised without a hard struggle."

Having come to this determination, Dick Turpin once more slowly approached his lordship's residence.

This time, however, he made his way round to the rear of the premises, judging that this would be the point at which an entrance would be easiest gained.

At the back he found that Lord Spindelow's grounds were bounded by a high stone wall.

Over this he could doubtless climb himself, but it was out of the question that he should be able to take Black Bess along with him.

He knew, however, that it would be perfectly safe to leave her where she was—a signal from him that she perfectly understood would suffice to bring her to his side, and he had lately had good proof that she would not allow anyone to capture her except at the price of their lives.

Slipping from her back, he stroked and patted her upon the neck.

"Stay there, old lass," he cried—"stay there till I return."

Although it may be doubted whether the exact words were understood, yet it is certain that Black Bess rubbed her head carressingly against his hand, and then stood perfectly still.

Dick then went close to the wall, looking about for some place where he could scale it easily.

Coming to one portion where a kind of buttress had been built, as though to support it, he resolved to make the attempt there.

He had but little to seize hold of, yet, by the exercise of some agility and patience, he at length managed to reach the top of the wall.

Before he ventured to show much of his body above it, he took a peep over, to see what there was on the other side.

To his satisfaction, he perceived that it was a kind of garden or pleasure-ground, and that rather dense ornamental shrubs had been planted around on the inner side, so as to conceal it.

To drop down, then, would be the easiest matter in the world.

Judging from the silence that no one was near, Dick gradually raised his body, and lowered himself over on the other side

Soft soil was beneath his feet, so that he came down quite noiselessly.

Keeping in between these ornamental trees and the wall, he crept slowly and gently towards the house.

He could see it plainly enough before him, though not one of the windows appeared to be illuminated—if there was a light in any one of the rooms into which they looked, it was certain that either the shutters were closed or the curtains closely drawn, for no ray of light escaped.

Indeed, Dick was surprised to find everything so exceedingly quiet.

He fully expected to see several servants busy about.

But all was as still and as silent as it possibly could be if the house was deserted.

Whether to interpret this as favourable or unfavourable to his enterprise he knew not, but, at any rate, it did not make him abate any of the caution he used in drawing closer to the building.

At last one of the windows on the ground floor was reached.

"Fortune favours me," he muttered, as he paused before it. "Surely I may venture to look upon this as a good omen?"

CHAPTER DCCLXXXVIII.

DICK TURPIN FINDS HIS POSITION IN LORD SPINDELOW'S MANSION BECOMES CRITICAL.

Dick Turpin's satisfaction arose from the fact of his having discovered that the window before which he paused was partly open.

To step through into the room beyond took him but a moment, for he perceived at once that it was vacant and plunged in darkness.

He waited here for a little while before he ventured to proceed any further.

Then he groped his way across the dark apartment to the door.

In his progress he had to be particularly careful, for had he come into contact with any article of furniture, the noise produced would probably have reached the ears of the inmates of the dwelling.

Feeling along the wall, he came at length to the door.

Turning the handle slowly, he opened it to the extent of about half an inch, he then found that he commanded a view of a passage or entrance-hall, in which a large candelabra filled with wax lights was burning.

This also appeared to be deserted, and after some hesitation he resolved to emerge.

He had nothing whatever but chance to lead him to the room in which Lord Spindelow was seated.

Gaining the passage, however, he saw on his left hand a partially-open door, and at the same time he discovered that the apartment with which it communicated was brilliantly lighted up.

Towards this he stepped on tiptoe and peeped in.

It was vacant.

He was about to turn away, when all at once he heard the sound of an approaching footstep.

He paused irresolutely, not knowing what to do.

Quickly making up his mind, however, he crossed the threshold of this room, and then hastily glanced about in search of some place of concealment.

He could see nothing that afforded the chance of a hiding-place, except the long damask curtains that were closely drawn over the windows.

They reached completely to the soft carpet, and if he once got behind them he should doubtless be able to remain concealed until any person chanced to draw the curtains on one side.

The footstep which had startled him came nearer and nearer, and in order to avoid being seen he had to dart rapidly across the spacious apartment.

On the soft, thick carpet, however, his footsteps were unheard.

In another second he drew the curtains back and ensconced himself behind them.

He found, as he fully expected, that he was standing in a kind of recess

He held the curtains close, but yet not so close as to prevent him from taking a peep into the apartment beyond.

He had only taken up his position just in time, for the door through which he had entered was flung open, and an individual, whom he recognised as Lord Spindelow, strode in.

The description he had had given him corresponded exactly with his appearance.

A servant appeared at the door.

"Do you want anything more, my lord?" he said, in the humblest, softest tones.

"Nothing at all, booby, and on no account come in again, or allow anyone to disturb me until you know who arrives!"

"Very well, my lord," said the servant, who seemed exceedingly glad of the permission to retire.

Dick wondered greatly who it could be that his lordship expected.

There was something strange that he should only allude to his visitor in such an indirect manner to his servant, when he could have no idea that anyone was at hand to overhear him.

After the door was closed his lordship paced up and down the room as though in great perturbation.

Then at length, as if exhausted, he flung himself into a chair near the table, and helped himself to some wine that was placed upon it.

He drank off several glasses in succession.

Then, shading his face with his hand, and resting his elbow upon the arm of the chair, he appeared to sink into a profound meditation.

Dick watched him a moment, and then resolved upon his course of action.

With the utmost caution he drew aside the curtains slowly, and stepped forth from his hiding-place.

Had he been some insubstantial ghost, his appearance could not have been more noiseless, and three long strides took him to the opposite side of the table at which Lord Spindelow sat.

Here there was another chair similar to the one in which his lordship was sitting, and placed so as to be exactly opposite to him.

Into this chair Dick noiselessly sank down, and so silent had been the whole of his proceedings, and so deep the reverie into which his lordship was plunged, that he remained perfectly unaware of what had happened.

Dick sat still for some time in the chair, looking intently at the nobleman.

He judged that when the time came for him to raise his head that he would experience no slight shock upon perceiving him there.

He preferred remaining silent to making any sound to attract his lordship's attention.

He wished, if he possibly could, to overcome him by the shock of sudden surprise.

With the same gentleness that characterised all his movements, Dick Turpin drew a pistol from his belt.

He knew it was carefully loaded and well primed, and in perfect readiness for instant use with the exception of cocking it.

This operation he did not venture to perform, for he knew it would be inevitably accompanied by a sharp clicking sound.

He contented himself by retaining the weapon in his grasp.

In this way some time—perhaps five minutes—elapsed, and Dick began to think that he should have to arouse his strange companion, for he began to grow apprehensive that the servant would return to make the expected announcement.

Luckily, he was spared the trouble of doing this.

A curiously-gilt and rather gaudy-looking timepiece that stood upon the mantelshelf began, in a tinkling way, to strike the hour.

Faint as the sound was, yet in that silent apartment it sounded very loud.

His lordship removed his hands suddenly and looked up.

Then turning round, doubtless with the intention of helping himself to some more wine, he perceived Dick Turpin sitting near him.

As the highwayman fully expected, he was for a moment quite aghast with astonishment.

Dick took advantage of this moment.

Rapidly cocking his pistol and bringing it to a level, he said, in a low, resolute voice:

"My lord, I am as desperate a man as yourself, and I solemnly swear if you venture to move or utter a cry, or attempt in any way to summon assistance, that I will there and then blow out your brains with this pistol, and make my escape by yonder window!"

What little colour there was in his lordship's face gradually left it, and, with protruding eyes, he glared at his strange and unwelcome visitor.

There was something so intense in the manner in which Dick spoke that it left no room for doubt that he would be as good as his word, and carry out his terrible threat.

"What do you want?" said his lordship, in a whisper, and glancing up apprehensively at the timepiece—"what is it you require? I know you have come for something; if it is gold, name the amount and go!"

"It is not gold that I require," said Turpin, firmly, "but something that you have in your possession wrongfully and unjustly, and which I am determined to compel you to relinquish."

Lord Spindelow smiled.

"I can guess now who has sent you," he said, "and what it is you want; but rest assured you shall never have it!"

"My lord, I will."

"Look here," was the reply. "We may as well understand each other without any further bother. Put up your pistol."

Dick shook his head.

"I prefer continuing the conversation in this manner," he said.

"Very well, but be careful how you keep your finger on the trigger—the weapon might go off when you least intend it. I feel pretty sure that we shall come to terms with each other."

"I am not so sure of that," said Dick; "and, believe me, I am too well accustomed to the use of firearms to have any fear of such an accident as you mention."

"Well, then," said his lordship, "of course you have been paid for undertaking this service, or perhaps will be paid when you have performed it; so to you it must be a mere consideration of money. Now, just tell me how much you have been offered to restore the paper, and I will give you double the amount upon the spot."

Dick shook his head.

"You mistake, my lord," he said; "it is no money consideration on my part: I am doing it because I have solemnly given my word."

His lordship smiled derisively.

"Do you know the danger you stand in?" he asked.

Dick replied by saying, very significantly:

"Do you?"

"I tell you," continued his lordship, half angrily, "that a word from me would bring my servants into this room, and then your capture would follow as a matter of course."

"Perhaps," said Dick,—"perhaps. That you might be able to utter the one word you speak of I don't doubt. I question very much whether I should be able to prevent you; but rest assured of this, that if you did pronounce it, it would be the very last that would ever pass your lips in this life, for I would shoot you down without hesitation, and trust to making my escape afterwards!"

Lord Spindelow shrank back.

He could not help feeling intimidated by Dick's manner.

"I imagine it would be very poor consolation to you," said Dick, "to know that you had procured my death by the sacrifice of your own; but now, as you understand the position in which you are, listen to me, and comply with my demands."

At this moment there came a faint tapping at the door.

His lordship started.

His face flushed.

[DICK TURPIN RELEASES HIMSELF FROM THE POLICE OFFICER'S GRASP.]

His eyes lighted up with an expression of triumph.

"My lord," said Dick, quickly, "beware what you say! Remember my words! And I solemnly swear that I will fulfil my purpose up to the very letter!"

His lordship shrank back into his former position.

Tap, tap, tap.

Whoever it was thus seeking for admittance into the apartment was growing impatient at permission being withheld from them.

CHAPTER DCCLXXXIX.

LORD SPINDELOW IS VERY RELUCTANT TO RELINQUISH THE IMPORTANT DOCUMENT.

"My lord," said Dick, "just raise your voice a little and reply to the man who is knocking at the door. Mind what you say—no treachery, or the consequences will fall heaviest on your own head! Tell him that you are busy, and can't be disturbed."

Lord Spindelow hesitated.

The servant, for such doubtless it was, wondering greatly that his summons upon the panel should be disregarded, knocked again.

"Francis!" cried his lordship, angrily, "I am busy and cannot be disturbed!"

Dick nodded approvingly.

"But, my lord——" said the servant outside.

"Silence, sirrah!" was the reply of Lord Spindelow, who was at all times short-tempered, and particularly so just then, and he was vexed that his order was not immediately obeyed.

The servant drew back, and all was silent

Dick was rather pleased at this little incident that otherwise.

He had been enabled to display an amount of command over the nobleman, and this would doubtless be of great assistance to him in what was to follow.

It was only necessary that he should maintain the position that he had gained.

"My lord," he said, "let me explain to you clearly that I have made up my mind to have that paper. Have it I will, I am determined, and offer you two chances: you may either surrender it to me quietly, and I will go away, leaving you and your whole house unmolested and undisturbed; or, on the other hand, you may refuse, in which case I shall take your life, call in my comrades, who are outside, and we will rifle and ransack this house from top to bottom, leaving not one article of value in it, and never ceasing our search until we have found the paper I demand!"

There was something so cool—so calm about the manner in which Dick Turpin pronounced these words, that it was impossible for Lord Spindelow or anyone else to entertain the slightest doubt that he fully intended to carry his threat into execution.

His brows were knit with resolution, and the barrel of the pistol was still pointed and held perfectly steady in the direction of his lordship's head.

Further and further back his lordship shrank into his chair, as though he would gladly, if he could, have pushed himself right through the back of it.

"I don't wish to hurry you," said Dick. "Look up at the clock. You will see it is just five minutes past the hour. Wait five minutes longer, and at the end of that time you must give me your decision either one way or the other."

"You take things coolly," said the nobleman, endeavouring to smile and treat the matter as a joke. "You are a bold man, too, I give you credit for that; if you were not you would certainly never have trusted yourself in this house alone."

"You don't know that I am alone," said Dick, quietly.

"Well, well—it has often been said, and it's perfectly true, that every man has his price, and it does not seem at all likely that you would prove the exception. You are to be paid a high price for the performance of the service, but I will solemnly undertake, by any obligations you may think proper to impose, to double the price, no matter what it may be, if you will leave it undone."

"My lord," said Dick, glaring at the clock, "I should advise you not to trifle and to waste these few remaining minutes in idle talk, for it is idle—perfectly idle. Just think over your position, and let me know your decision."

Lord Spindelow bit his lip, and glanced around him with a look of despair.

Under such circumstances as these, how was he to act?

How could he avoid giving up the paper that he was so solicitous to retain?

The man who was sitting before him with levelled pistol was unquestionably one who at all hazards would keep his word, and would consider taking his life a thing of no consequence.

He dared not move—he dared not speak.

There was a silence, in which the faint ticking of the ornamental clock was distinctly audible.

"Now," said Dick, abruptly, "the time has expired, my lord; give me your answer."

The nobleman hesitated before he replied.

"Be quick!" said Dick. "All you have to say is, which you prize most, the possession of that paper or the loss of your life."

"I am helplessly in your power," was the answer, "or else I would never give it up; and now, in order to retain it, I would gladly part with half my wealth. Remember what it is I am offering you, and think again."

"It is quite useless, and I will wait no longer; give me your answer, one way or the other!"

"Well, then, since I cannot resist, I can do nothing more than give up the document."

The words were accompanied by a heavy sigh, that showed how much it went against his inclination so to do.

"You have come to a wise determination," said Dick; "but now beware how you attempt an act of treachery, for upon the least signs of it—even upon the least suspicion—I will scatter your brains against the wall!"

"But the paper is not here."

"Is it not about your person?"

"No."

"Nor in the room?"

"No."

"Where is it, then?"

"In my dressing-room."

"Then we will go there and fetch it," said Dick, rising. "My lord, give me your arm. There—that will do. I am now so close to you that if I discharge the pistol you could not fail to receive the whole contents of it, and rest assured that I will discharge it if there is anything at all suspicious in your behaviour. I am in a dangerous position, and I know it, and I shall omit no precaution necessary to my own safety."

Lord Spindelow ground his teeth.

"Now," said Dick, "forward—we will go upstairs together—come."

Almost foaming at the mouth with passion, his lordship obeyed this injunction, and walked arm-in-arm across the room with Dick Turpin.

The door was reached and opened, and at this moment Dick pressed the muzzle of his long-barrelled pistol against his lordship's cheek.

"Beware!" he said, in a significant tone—"beware!"

In the passage or hall outside there was no one to be seen, and the foot of the grand staircase was only a few steps off.

On the delightfully-soft carpet that was spread over every portion of the floor no sound was raised by their footsteps, and they ascended the stairs like a couple of ghosts.

Lord Spindelow looked around him as if in search of one of his domestics.

Perhaps he thought he might be able to make some slight sign to him that would cause his danger to be comprehended

But, as it happened, he had on that particular night, to serve his own purposes, given particular instructions that none of his servants should be at their accustomed posts.

The top of the staircase was therefore reached in safety, and having gone for a little distance along a passage, his lordship paused before a door.

"Open it," he said to Dick—"open it and enter.'

"No," was the reply; "my two hands are fully occupied just at present."

Lord Spindelow opened the door himself, and then stood on one side as if to allow Dick to enter.

At the same time he endeavoured to snatch his arm away, but Dick was fully on his guard, and held him firm.

"Beware, my lord," he said—"beware! If you attempt anything of that kind your life will pay the forfeit, as I told you. Come in, and let me advise you to make a virtue of necessity."

His lordship suffered himself to be led into the room, and Dick closed the door.

"Now," he said, "time is flying, and I am resolved to stand no more trifling. Where is the paper? Give it me at once."

But the nobleman grew more and more reluctant to part with this precious document, and Dick kept an eye upon all his movements and upon the expression of his face, for he had an idea that he would attempt to foist some spurious paper upon him.

This was rather a difficult thing to prevent, for it will be remembered that Dick himself had no idea of what this paper was about, and had no other means of recognising it except by its general outward appearance.

Certainly that was singular enough, and would serve to point it out from a thousand.

Yet his lordship might have had sufficient cunning to have prepared a counterfeit.

This risk would have to be run, but the highwayman thought he should be able to tell by his lordship's manner whether it was the original document that was given up.

It was well that he had his suspicions directed in this quarter, for Lord Spindelow, going to a drawer that opened with a secret spring, produced a folded piece of paper.

"Once more," he said, "before I part with it—and it is only because my life is at stake that I do it—let me assure you I will give up one-half my wealth to retain it."

"No," said Dick, "the paper, and nothing but the paper!"

"Take it, then."

His lordship's hand trembled a little as he surrendered it.

"There," he said, "be content; you have it, and I have no longer the means of exerting power over one of my bitterest enemies!"

Dick looked at the paper suspiciously.

He could not believe that it was the one he required.

To have taken it unquestioned, and then to have discovered that it was false, would have rendered any future attempt that he might make abortive.

At the risk, therefore, of breaking the oath he had taken not to attempt to make himself acquainted with the mysterious document, he unfolded it, for it was not sealed.

An exclamation of rage escaped his lips.

"A trick," he said—"this is a trick, my lord! You cannot comprehend that you are playing with your life. This paper is not the one, I see!"

About this there could be no doubt, for it was perfectly blank.

The discovery of this cheat affected his lordship more than anything else, and he trembled excessively.

Perceiving this, Dick again threatened him, and with such good effect, that the nobleman produced a small memorandum book from his pocket, and from one of the pockets in it drew out the real paper.

In his eagerness to obtain possession of it, Dick stretched out his hand and suddenly snatched it from him.

An effort was made to recover it, but it was a vain one.

"Now, my lord," said Dick, "I am content. I have what I require, and I will trouble you no further. Your money, your valuables, or whatever things there may be I will not touch, nor shall my comrades either. It is necessary that I should get some distance from this house before you are able to raise an alarm, and you must not object to the adoption of the means that will be best calculated to achieve that end."

CHAPTER DCCXC.

DICK TURPIN IS MENACED BY AN UNSEEN AND UNEXPECTED DANGER.

Upon hearing these words, Lord Spindelow started, and his face—if we may be allowed the use of the expression—assumed a kind of dusky-white tint: it might have been compared to some very old dried putty.

"You need be in no particular state of alarm," said Dick, as he observed the change—"that is, of course, if you are reasonable, and comply with my wishes. If you refuse or resist, I cannot tell what the consequences may be."

His lordship licked his lips nervously.

His first idea when Dick spoke was that he intended to take most effectual means to prevent him creating an alarm—namely, to put an end to his life at once.

Even now he could scarcely get over the terror which this idea inspired.

Dick placed the document safely in one of his inner pockets, and then, placing the pistol in his right hand, he seized hold of his lordship by the arm, just above his elbow, with his left hand.

"Now," he said, "I may as well tell you all I require you to do. These measures that I am taking for my safety are as simple as they will be efficacious. In this manner we will pass out of the room, down the stairs, along the hall, and out into the open air. When I have gone far enough I will release you, and you can return home, or do what you like."

Lord Spindelow glanced around him, but said nothing.

"Come!" said Dick, advancing towards the door.

His strange, unwilling companion was obliged to accompany him.

As they crossed the threshold, Turpin said, in a most emphatic and significant tone:

"Now, for the last time, my lord, I bid you beware of attempting any treachery against myself! It is very likely that we may meet with some of your domestics. They will naturally be astonished at finding a stranger in the house, but take no notice of their astonishment, for, as I have told you more than once before, I am a desperate man, and will not part with my own life and liberty until I have sacrificed yours! Now come, for the sooner this little affair is over now the better I shall be pleased!"

His lordship sighed, and seemed to think so too.

He followed Dick obediently and docilely enough along the corridor and down the spacious staircase.

In the hall below was a footman, in all the splendour of a most gorgeous livery.

"Begs parding, my lud——"

He got so far in what he had to say, and then stopped short.

His eyes expanded to an unusual size, and his mouth remained wide open, reminding one of some huge dead fish.

"Tell him to go," whispered Turpin, in the nobleman's ear—"tell him to be gone at once, or——"

The glance that he gave was quite sufficient.

He had no necessity to complete his sentence.

His lordship tried to speak.

But he opened his mouth several times, and failed to say anything.

"Thomas!" he gasped at last.

"Yas, my lud," was the reply.

"Go—go! I don't want you! Be off—be off, I say, at once!"

"But, my lud——" expostulated the footman.

"Thomas, you rascal," roared Dick, in a voice of thunder, "do you not hear what his lordship says? Obey this minute, or take a month and leave!"

Thomas started in bewildered surprise, and then vanished so suddenly into the servants' quarters that his disappearance almost looked like magic.

Dick could not forbear laughing at this ridiculous encounter.

"Don't drag me forth into the open air," said Lord Spindelow, as they neared the front door. "You see I am not properly appareled for walking; I have not even a hat upon my head. Go—depart in peace; I will do nothing towards creating an alarm."

"Really, my lord," said Dick, in a bantering tone, "I am much hurt to think you should be so desirous of quitting my company; but I assure you that I take so much pleasure and delight in your society that I could not on any account make up my mind to a parting yet—a little further, and all will be well. As for your hat, never mind; take mine—that will supply the deficiency."

Dick suited the action to the word by pulling off his three-cornered hat and clapping it suddenly on his lordship's head.

The hand with which he performed this service had the pistol in it, and, as it was done very hastily, his lordship—by accident, of course—felt a sharp rap, that made him cry aloud.

He cut a most ridiculous figure with Dick's hat on his head, for it in no way corresponded with the rest of his attire.

The front door was opened, and the strange-looking pair sallied forth.

Dick insisted upon walking down the winding avenue as far as the lodge gates.

As the hour was late, these were closed.

"Call up the gate-keeper," said Dick; "we must really walk a little further together. But never mind, I will save you the trouble."

Dick bawled out lustily for the gate to be opened, and presently the lodge-keeper's wife appeared.

She carried a candle in her hand, and when she saw Lord Spindelow standing near in such a trim she was so astonished that she almost dropped it.

"Quick!" said Dick. "His lordship is in a hurry, and going out on most particular business! Open the gate immediately!"

The good woman had been accustomed all her life to do nothing else but obey such commands as these, and so, without more ado, she turned round, thrust the key into the lock, and pushed open the gate.

"You need not lock it again without you like," said Dick, as he passed through, "his lordship will most likely be back in a few moments—he is not going far."

It will be seen that Lord Spindelow had completely resigned himself to the force of circumstances.

The paper was gone, and he felt pretty certain that the recovery of it was hopeless.

He was in company also with a desperate character, and surely it would be better not to lose the paper and his life as well.

He had the chance of saving the one, and it was his duty to avail himself of it.

Dick walked some distance along the high-road going in a direction quite contrary to that he would have to take in order to rejoin Black Bess.

But he had a motive for this proceeding.

At length, having gone, as he considered, far enough to answer his purpose, he stopped, and, releasing his hold upon the nobleman, he cried:

"Now, my lord, I shall have the honour and pleasure of wishing you good night—you are at perfect liberty to return. While you are walking along I shall take the liberty of standing here with my pistol pointed at you; if you turn back, or if you utter a cry, I shall fire! And now, once more, good night!"

Lord Spindelow scarcely waited to hear the conclusion of this speech, but started off with a very undignified rush, being anxious to escape while his skin was whole, and while he had an opportunity.

Dick felt pretty certain that he would neither cry out nor turn round, and so, instead of carrying out the threat he had expressed, he returned the pistol to his belt, and, forcing his way through a small gap in the hedgerow, ran as rapidly as he could towards the spot where he had left Black Bess.

Before describing how he reached this spot, it will be necessary to go back a little way, and narrate something that took place during his absence.

It was not long after he had effected an entrance into Lord Spindelow's mansion that a police officer came riding by.

To all appearance, he was engaged upon some most important duty, that required immense speed to be made, for although his horse was going at a rapid rate, he continued to spur and whip it without mercy.

All at once, however, the tormented creature, which had performed a long journey, without resting, at this breakneck speed, suddenly gave way.

It seemed as though it had kept up till the last moment, and then, its strength having given way, it fell down as though shot.

The police officer was bruised and stunned a little by his fall, but, luckily, he fell upon his head.

To anyone else but a police officer, probably, this would have been decidedly unlucky; but as his skull was the hardest and most invulnerable part of his body, he escaped with slight injury.

Nevertheless, the sudden concussion confused his intellects a little.

But rapidly recovering, he sat up in the middle of the road and gazed about him.

After that, his next proceeding was to burst forth into a continuous stream of the most horrible curses and imprecations imaginable, containing such choice expressions as the vocabulary of a police officer alone could furnish.

That he was greatly enraged and disappointed as well at the occurrence of this accident was, however, pretty clear.

When he had relieved himself by this outburst, he slowly rose to his feet, and proceeded to make an examination of his horse.

He kicked the poor brute savagely.

But all in vain.

The animal was thoroughly and entirely exhausted, and no doubt would speedily perish.

"I must have another horse from somewhere," growled the officer; "and I wonder where on earth I am to find one? Ah! what was that? There's one close at hand, I feel certain!"

A faint neighing sound, evidently made by a horse at no great distance, at this moment reached his ears.

"It's a horse loose in the fields, no doubt," he cried. "I will just have off the saddle and bridle, and go and catch it. No one can say anything against me for doing it, because it is only my duty."

The officer carried his intentions into effect.

With nimble fingers he unbuckled the girths, took off the saddle, and removed the bridle.

Then, guided by the sound that he had heard, he forced his way through the hedgerow, and crossed the meadow beyond.

CHAPTER DCCXCI

THE POLICE OFFICER'S RASHNESS MEETS WITH A NATURAL RESULT, AND DICK TURPIN LIES IN WAIT FOR AN ADVENTURE.

As fate would have it, this officer directed his footsteps towards the very spot where Black Bess had been left by her rider.

It was not Black Bess who had uttered the neigh that had attracted his attention, but another horse in an adjoining field.

But this was further on, and, consequently, the officer came to Black Bess first.

In the darkness, he had some difficulty in making out her dark form.

But his eyes were keen, and so he managed to catch sight of her.

"Oh, there you are, are you?" he cried, puffing from exhaustion. "Now, my beauty, let's see if I can catch you."

He placed down the saddle and bridle, and then, extending his hand, walked gently towards Black Bess, who stood perfectly still, waiting his approach with apparent composure.

"Why," ejaculated the officer, as he came closer, "he is saddled and bridled, and yet loose in a field! How odd! Never mind, it will save me some trouble, and certainly it will make catching him much easier."

Coming closer still, he endeavoured to seize hold of the reins.

But just then Black Bess threw up her hind legs, and kicked in a manner that made him pause at once.

"Oh, that's your temper, is it? Well, wait till I am on your back, my beauty, and you shall soon know you have a master!"

The police officer, nevertheless, was well enough acquainted with the habits of horses to know that he would not be able to succeed by violent measures, and, therefore, he began a soothing process.

When he judged he had produced an effect, he ventured a step or two closer.

The result was that Black Bess reared up suddenly on her hind legs, and then came down again, striking out with great force with her fore feet.

As she did so, the officer hastily retreated.

Black Bess remained just in the same position as she was at first, and, as nearly as possible, occupied the identical spot.

This behaviour on the part of the horse was altogether so extraordinary and eccentric that the police officer hardly knew what to make of it, and his attention was immediately aroused.

That it was no ordinary horse was tolerably certain.

While he stood gazing attentively upon her, a sudden thought entered his mind.

A kind of howl of satisfaction came from his lips.

"As I live," he cried, "it is Dick Turpin's mare, Black Bess! What an idiot I must have been not to have recognised her before! Whew! Why, this is a slice of good luck with a vengeance! Whoever would have dreamt of it? Let me think a minute. How shall I act?"

And the police officer rubbed his head slowly, as though the process had something to do with rubbing up and brightening his intellects.

"As for Black Bess, she's the very devil, so I sha'n't go near her! It's pretty certain, however, that Dick Turpin has left her here while he has gone off on some little expedition or other. She is waiting here for him, and I'll wait for him too! Ha, ha! Now, I call that a good joke!"

The officer looked around him, and felt rather disappointed upon discovering that this witticism was unheard.

"How shall I act?" he said. "Which will be my best method of proceeding? I know! I will crouch down here with a pistol, and keep my eye on Black Bess. As soon as ever he comes to mount her, I will fire; and then—pop!—down he goes! I will rush forward then, and seize him! That's the trick! Besides, if he only waits long enough, those other fellows will be up, and then we can make sure of capturing him!"

By "those other fellows" the officer probably meant some more police officers who might be on the road, following in his track.

With an air of cold-blooded deliberation, he withdrew the charge from one of his pistols, and then most carefully reloaded it.

He then threw open the pan, and shook the weapon well, for he was most anxious to guard against the mishap of a misfire.

Then he put in the priming, and all was ready.

In those days, firearms were by no means to be relied upon. They frequently failed to explode, from defects in the construction of the weapons; and, with the usual perversity that can be traced in all things, it was always on the most important occasions that they refused to go off.

The officer crouched down in the long grass in the meadow, and, in the obscurity of the night, it was scarcely possible that he would be seen.

This, then, was just the state of affairs when Dick Turpin, after he left Lord Spindelow, began to cross the meadows, in order to rejoin his steed.

Not for a moment did he anticipate that he was menaced by so great a danger. In fact, it is a question whether he ever felt more self-satisfied and secure than he did on that occasion.

It was only natural that he should feel a great degree of elation at having so well carried out his daring scheme.

The important paper was safe in his pocket. Indeed, he was, as we might say, quite intoxicated with success; and, consequently, he failed to make use of that amount of caution that ordinarily characterised all his proceedings.

If he had only been usually observant, he would most certainly have noticed something odd in the behaviour of Black Bess.

The noble animal could not by speech warn him of his danger, but she moved about restlessly, and presented every possible token of being ill at ease.

Dick did not notice this until he was close to her, and then he failed to understand it properly.

"What, old lass," he said, "are you impatient at having been left alone by yourself so long? Well, well, no matter; that sort of thing will soon be remedied, and——"

At this moment, the police officer, who had been watching for his opportunity, believing that the favourable time had come, raised the pistol, and took a most accurate aim.

He pulled the trigger.

The hammer descended.

There was a flash, succeeded by a puff of white smoke, and that was all.

The whole of his extraordinary pains had gone for nothing, for the pistol had missed fire.

With an angry yell of disappointment and vexation, he flung the pistol with full force in the direction of the highwayman; and having done so, he rushed forward with the intention of seizing him, and hoping to be successful in effecting his capture.

But this little mishap had served to make Dick aware that he was in danger, and he was on the alert accordingly.

He saw the heavy pistol come whizzing through the air towards him, and he stepped on one side, in order to avoid it.

It would have been better had he remained quite still, in which case it would have passed by him harmlessly.

As it was, he only put his head in the way, and had a sharp crack for his pains, that confused him for a few seconds, and allowed the police officer an opportunity of getting close up to him.

Although half bewildered, and scarcely conscious of what he was about, there was yet the idea in his brain that it was necessary for his safety that he should mount Black Bess, and therefore he made some rather extraordinary attempts to do so.

Each second, however, made the stunned feeling about his brain subside; but before he could seat himself, the officer was at his side.

With one hand he seized hold of Black Bess by the rein, and with the other he laid hold of Turpin's leg, hoping to be able to fling him from the saddle.

If he had succeeded in doing this, his chances of capturing him would have been very much increased.

Dick, however, maintained his hold well, and, pressing his knees firmly against the flaps of the saddle, in order to obtain a secure hold, he, with great rapidity, drew forth the pistol with which he had threatened Lord Spindelow, and, grasping it by the barrel, he struck the officer a tremendous blow with the heavy, brass-bound butt.

Its effects were instantaneous.

A sharp cracking sound was heard, followed by a deep groan.

The hold of the police officer upon the rein and the highwayman's leg relaxed at once, and he fell down on his back in the meadow, unable to move hand or foot.

Finding he had discomfited his adversary so far, Dick troubled himself no further concerning him.

Fearful that other police officers might be near, he turned Black Bess round and gave her the rein.

She was equally willing to leave that spot, and the pace at which she went was one that no other steed could hope to equal.

Very soon Lord Spindelow's mansion was left behind, and the police officer also.

By slow degrees he then tightened his hold upon the rein, and reduced Black Bess to a more gentle speed.

"Easy—easy," he said—"not quite so fast! I should like you to reserve your powers against a time of necessity. Woa—woa—gently now—gently!"

Dick Turpin was now upon the high-road, and he glanced quickly all around him.

"It is nowhere near daylight yet," he said—"that's quite certain; there won't be the least signs of dawn for an hour or two at least. It's no good going back, for I don't know whether the officers have left. The time must be filled up somehow. I will look for an adventure—a profitable one. I think it's about time, considering how long ago it is since the last."

While coming to this conclusion, he also brought Black Bess to a walk

He was now able to listen with tolerable precision, and fancied that he could hear some one on the road before him.

He stopped at once to ascertain, and found that he had not been mistaken.

"Good!" he said—"this is just in the nick of time. Back, Bess—back! I shall be in the shadow here capitally; and if he looks like a traveller carrying much booty, I will ride out and trouble him for it."

Close to where Dick Turpin had stopped, a very large tree, with a trunk of unusual circumference, was growing near the wayside.

Its branches were dense and wide-spreading, some of them projecting a considerable way into the road.

Of course, all round this trunk and under the branches was in very deep shadow, and a place better calculated for concealing the forms of himself and his steed could scarcely have been found.

Having taken up this position, Dick listened again.

CHAPTER DCCXCII.

DICK TURPIN WITNESSES THE OCCURRENCE OF SOME EXTRAORDINARY EVENTS ON THE HIGHWAY.

THE well-known sound of a horse's hoofs could now be most unmistakably heard.

The traveller, whoever he might be, was journeying at a rapid rate, and Dick began to think he should have some difficulty in stopping him in the midst of such a wild career.

To his equal surprise and satisfaction, however, the speed of the horse was very much diminished, and it kept slackening and slackening the nearer it came to where he was in ambush.

"Surely he must be going to stop," muttered Dick. "I wonder what he can be pulling up in that fashion for?"

The traveller did pull up, and brought his horse to a standstill some few yards below the spot where Dick was waiting.

The highwayman's first impulse was to avail himself of this opportunity to dart forward and demand his purse.

But before he could make up his mind he perceived the traveller slip swiftly and dexterously from his horse.

Dick, by straining his eyes a little, could make out what was going on, and so he muttered to himself:

"Something amiss with the trappings, I suppose—a girth loose, perhaps. Well, I will be on to him before he can mount. Yet no—what on earth is he doing?"

Dick leaned forward, in his eager anxiety to ascertain what the traveller was doing.

But not feeling satisfied with being at such a distance, he gently dismounted from Black Bess, and then, keeping close under the shadow of the hedgerow, he crept noiselessly and slowly towards the spot where the traveller had paused.

Dick might well be astonished, for, instead of troubling himself about any portion of his horse's trappings, the rider laid himself down on his back in the middle of the road.

The horse was left at liberty to do just what it liked, so it walked to the side of the road and began cropping the grass that was growing there.

This was a most peculiar and unaccountable proceeding.

What motive could a man have for behaving in so eccentric a fashion?

Dick was full of wonder and doubt, and was so undecided and surprised that he could not make up his mind what to do.

Having approached as near as he thought he could venture with safety, he stopped, and his bewilderment was still further increased by hearing the traveller chuckling to himself, as though he had just done something that was exceedingly clever.

He was very busy fumbling about with something as he lay on his back, but what this something was, Dick tried in vain to find out.

Perhaps if he had been allowed the opportunity he would have made the discovery.

But all at once the stranger raised his head about a foot from the ground, and, in a deep, hoarse voice, said:

"Ah, he comes! Now for it! Aha!"

Down he lay on his back again, and remained as perfectly still as he could have done had he been dead.

Dick's curiosity and interest increased.

With perfect plainness he could hear some one else approaching at full gallop.

"The man must be mad," he thought—"a lunatic, or he would never lie down in the middle of the road like that in order to be rode over, for rode over he will be if he remains where he is."

Yet, somehow, Dick shrank from meddling or interfering in any way.

Not from any feeling of fear, however, although he knew that madmen were by no means safe persons to have any encounter with.

"Aha!" said the stranger in the roadway—"how fast he comes! I wonder, now, what sort of a groan I could give, and whether he would hear it?"

The stranger uttered a deep groan

It was loud, deep, and prolonged; and but for the few occasional remarks he had overheard, Dick would have jumped to the conclusion that the man was seriously hurt.

"Upon my word," he said, "I did that well! I will practise it again."

He groaned once more, and then remained perfectly quiet.

No doubt, like Dick Turpin, he was listening to the approach of the second traveller, who was now very close at hand indeed.

More than once Dick rubbed his eyes and shook himself, in order to make quite sure that he was awake.

Certainly, what he saw going forward partook more of the character of some dream than of sober reality.

The traveller in the roadway now commenced a succession of deep groans, as though he was suffering almost mortal agony.

By a strange coincidence, the traveller who was approaching slightly reduced the speed of his horse, and, upon coming nearer, the animal, discovering that something was in its pathway, stopped and swerved aside so suddenly as almost to unseat his rider.

Then the first traveller—for so we must continue to call him, for distinction's sake—groaned frightfully.

No sooner did the sound reach the second traveller's ears than he uttered an ejaculation.

"Ha," he cried, "the villain has met with an accident! Then he has been overtaken by a just retribution. I was growing fearful that he had escaped me. Yes—there he lies, and there is his horse."

This second comer with great alacrity lowered himself from the saddle, and hastened to the spot where the first was lying.

As present Dick saw no cause for interference.

He contented himself by remaining a passive spectator.

The second traveller bent down over the first, and then he cried:

"Villain, rascal, destroyer of my peace and happiness, I have you at last—you shall never more escape me!"

Then this second traveller seemed absolutely paralysed by the first uttering a wild, demoniacal scream of laughter.

Before it ceased, there was a bright flash and a tremendous report.

With a cry of unmistakable pain, the second traveller staggered back several paces, and then, unable to keep his feet any longer, fell backwards to the ground.

At the same moment, the other, still laughing with the same diabolical discordance, rose to his feet.

"Aha!" he cried. "I had you then, did I? How sure you made of me! But you are deceived. How do you feel now, John Marchmont—eh?"

While he spoke, he advanced to the spot where the second traveller was lying.

He met with no other response but a groan.

When he heard it he laughed again.

"Aha! that's music in my ears! Groan away—the more the better! I had you nicely, and you little expected it! You fell into the snare well! Now at last I have had my revenge upon you, and you will die with the disagreeable conviction remaining in your mind that——"

At this moment Dick interfered.

Accustomed as he was to all kinds of surprises, yet it must be confessed that on the present occasion he was rendered powerless with astonishment.

But as soon as he recovered himself, he interrupted the first traveller in what he was saying by bounding forward, exclaiming:

"Rascal, don't think that your villany has been unwitnessed! I have seen all!"

A yell of the most abject terror burst from the lips of the first traveller, and before Dick could seize him or prevent him he bounded away.

"Hold—hold!" cried the highwayman. "Stop, I charge you—stop! Surrender to me, do you hear? Stop at once, or I will send a bullet after you!"

To these words the first traveller took not the least notice but continued to run as fast as his legs would carry him.

Turpin saw that he was in a fair way of making his escape, and, unwilling that he should remain unpunished for such an atrocious act, and vexed as well to find that his commands were taken no notice of, he carried his threat into execution, and fired.

The aim was taken well.

The first traveller gave a bound into the air, shrieked, staggered, tried to run, then, wheeling round like a drunken man, he fell at full length upon the dusty road.

Although he felt that the rascal deserved to be caught, yet Dick almost regretted this shot the moment after he had fired it.

The condition of the second traveller, who had been so basely and yet so ingeniously assassinated, called for his immediate attention.

Therefore, thrusting the pistol back into his pocket, he hastened towards him.

Kneeling down by his side, he took hold of his hand, and said:

"Sir—sir, whoever you may be, believe that I am a friend. Where are you hurt? Do you think you are injured seriously?"

It cost the second traveller a severe effort to reply, but he managed to utter:

"My breast—my breast! I fear the villain has murdered me. The bullet from his pistol seems to have entered my breast."

"Wait a moment," said Dick—"I will get a light, then we shall see the nature of the hurt."

Dick not only carried the means of procuring a light, but a small lantern as well.

He never knew when such things might be necessary.

The wind was blowing rather strongly, so that it was a somewhat difficult job to ignite the lantern.

But at length, having succeeded, he turned its rays upon the prostrate form.

He saw that the unfortunate man was clad in the attire of a gentleman.

Every article he had on was of the richest possible material and most expensive make.

It was elaborately trimmed and embroidered, and on his fingers several rings of rare value were glistening.

"It is your right breast," said Dick, stooping down again—"there's some consolation to be derived from that; the bullet has not touched your heart."

Dick was rather surprised to find that so little blood had escaped.

Hastily, however, he tore open the traveller's clothes, thinking and fearing that the wound was probably bleeding inwardly.

"Why, this is better than I could have believed," he said, a moment afterwards; "you are by no means seriously injured. The bullet must first of all have struck some hard resisting ornament on your apparel, and then struck against your ribs, not with sufficient force to penetrate, however. The bullet has glanced aside. It is a flesh wound, and will soon be well."

Upon hearing these words, it was really wonderful to notice what a marked change took place in the traveller's manner.

He had firmly believed himself to be at death's door, and it is by no means unlikely that if he had remained in possession of the idea that his wound was mortal, he would have died.

Hearing that it was a trifling hurt, however, he raised himself at once, and spoke in quite a different tone of voice:

"Thanks—thanks, good sir!" he said. "Those are indeed most welcome words that you have uttered. I cling to life, and yet I know not why I should, for all of earthly happiness I know has been for ever wrecked."

The last words were uttered dejectedly.

"Be of good heart," said Dick. "If you will have patience for a minute or so I will bandage you wound. There—that will do; I think the dressing will serve until you can obtain proper medical assistance."

"I feel already better," was the answer. "And that villain, Francis Cross, the ruthless destroyer of my happiness—where is he?"

"Do you mean the one who assassinated you in so treacherous a manner?"

"Yes—yes."

"Then he lies yonder on the road; I was determined that he should not escape the consequences of such a deed, for I believed you had been killed. I called upon him to stop, but he refused, and therefore I fired."

"Have you killed him?"

"No, no—at least, that is, I hope not. He seems to be lying very still, however."

"Let us go to him," said the second traveller, whose name, it will be remembered, was John Marchmont—"let us go to him, and hear what he has to say."

"Can you rise?"

"I think so—at least, that is if you give me your assistance."

"Come, then—there, that will do."

The traveller slowly stood upright.

But as soon as he assumed this position his brain swam round, and he would have fallen but for Dick's sustaining arm.

"You are weak," he said; "but you must expect that."

"I am right now," was the response—"the feeling was only a passing one. Let us hasten forward."

"Beware how you approach him," said Dick; "it is clear he is a man full of wiles and deceit—he may be only acting a part, and when we draw near to him he may try to be revenged upon us yet."

"That is well thought of—the caution is a good one; we will advance with care."

Francis Cross—as he had been called—had, in a short space of time, run a considerable distance, and as Mr. Marchmont only walked very slowly, they were some time in drawing near to him.

But as they got closer and closer, they heard him uttering many most dismal groans.

From the tone of them, they appeared to be wrung from his lips by extreme pain.

But then, as they both knew, the villain was capable of simulating a groan to great perfection.

CHAPTER DCCXCIII.

DICK TURPIN WAITS IN SOME ANXIETY AND SUSPENSE FOR THE APPEARANCE OF THE THREE SIGNAL ROCKETS.

"HELP—help! Mercy!" he cried, as they drew closer. "Oh, have mercy upon me—help me, or I die!"

"I would help you willingly if I could," said Turpin, "but how am I to know that this is not another treacherous design upon your part. Perhaps you hope to succeed, finding that you have failed."

"Failed?"

"Yes."

"Does John Marchmont live, then?"

"He does, and is scarcely hurt."

A heavy groan followed.

"Then," he said, "I shall die with one crime less upon my conscience. I rejoice. The hand of death is already on me. In a few moments I shall be no more. The bullet was a fatal one."

He writhed about as though in the direst agony.

Both Turpin and John Marchmont were inclined to believe that on this occasion he was not deceiving them, and therefore they drew closer.

Turpin, however, watched him with a wary eye.

He determined that he would not be taken by surprise by any sudden movement.

If he saw any signs of treachery, he should be quick enough to prevent them from being carried out.

"John Marchmont," said the first traveller, "I have something to confess to you—something to tell you in my last dying moments—something that I will swear to, if necessary, and which will remove a load of care and trouble from your heart, and make you as happy as you were a short time since."

The second traveller advanced several paces, and clasped his hands.

He looked eagerly and wistfully into the face of Francis Cross.

"I swear it is the truth," continued the wounded man,—"swear it by all that is solemn and secret! The reports I set abroad so injurious to your wife's fair fame are false—wholly and entirely false, and having a foundation nowhere else but in my own breast."

"Will you swear it?" said John Marchmont, in a broken voice.

"I will. Don't you remember that when you crossed my path, when I found that you were the favoured rival, and that Catherine preferred you to me, did I not swear then, in the presence of you both, that I would have a deep and deadly revenge for the injury I had suffered?"

"You did; but it was a fancied injury."

"It may be so, but I have not thought it. I have dwelt upon the one idea ever since, and have spared no pains to bring it to fruition. I had well-nigh accomplished my purpose. Now, however, I am dying, and I wish to make a clean breast."

"Say on, then!" cried John Marchmont. "Deep villain as thou art, had you no pity or remorse in your hard breast?"

"None—none! I swore to have my revenge! Until you came, Catherine had favoured me; she had led me to believe that I occupied the enviable position of her accepted lover. No doubt, if you had never intruded, she would at this time have been my wife; but you came, and you wrested her from me. Was not that cause enough for revenge?"

"No, certainly not, because intentionally I did you no harm."

"Well, well, intentionally or not, harm was done, and I felt it keenly here—here!"

He struck his breast sharply while he spoke.

"You married her," he continued, "and only a few months ago. But you grew tired of her—you neglected her. When you became a husband, you forgot to be a lover. I watched it all with eyes of jealousy and hate; and I rejoiced within myself, for I felt that the opportunity for my revenge would shortly come. I determined to smite you both.

"At length, as you know well, I made my appearance at your house, on more than one occasion, while you were absent from it.

"I obtained interviews with your wife, whom I found sad and disappointed.

"I tried all my arts upon her, but in vain—in vain.

"At length, becoming plain and unmistakable in my proposals, she scorned me, and commanded me to quit her presence and never enter it again."

"Did she?" said John Marchmont, with a groan. "Then how I have wronged her!"

"You have—you have from first to last. I burned and smarted with mortification and disappointment, but it was not long before I saw the means by which I might still make sure of my revenge.

"Here and there, in this place and that, I dropped those hints respecting my connection with your wife that, as I calculated, shortly reached your ears and inflamed your breast with jealousy.

"You accused her of guilt, and accused her in such a manner that she could tell that you believed not in her innocence, and placed no trust in her fidelity.

"Her proud spirit was hurt, and she would not reply to your accusations.

"You took her silence as a proof of guilt, and ignominiously turned her forth."

"I did—I did," was the reply, given in a broken voice. "I feel now that she will never forgive me. Fiend, it is to you, and you alone that I am indebted for all this woe! What should hinder me from starting forward, as I do now, and trampling out your worthless life?"

"A second thought, I hope," said Dick, calmly, as he grasped him tightly by the arm, "will enable you to restrain yourself, sir, and listen."

The second traveller turned round half-angrily upon Dick.

But then he remembered all at once the service that had been rendered him, and he became to all outward appearances quite calm.

"I swear, then," continued Francis Cross, "that your wife is pure and innocent—as guiltless as she was on the day when you wedded her.

"Every day I was in dread that you would discover the falsity of my accusation, and then my revenge would be turned upon myself.

"Yet I rejoiced at the effects that had already been produced, for I saw you were a broken-hearted, miserable man, and that the remainder of your life would be a curse to you.

"Then you know how strangely we met to-night.

"Your violence terrified me, and I fled.

"You pursued.

"But ere long, as I was carried with such speed along the highway, a thought darted into my mind that, by a stratagem, I might procure your death, and then, perhaps I might be able to induce Catherine to become my wife."

John Marchmont's face was buried in his hands.

Deep sobs came from his breast, and Turpin fancied that tears were slowly forcing their way between his fingers.

He made no reply, but allowed the wounded man to continue his confession.

"Now you know all," continued Francis Cross, writhing about. "I have lived just long enough to tell you I am growing cold, and my heart only beats with slow and laboured pulsations. The last words I shall ever speak are hovering on my lips. Have mercy on me—forgive me! I swear again that the charges I have made are all without foundation! Surely that must be a great satisfaction to you? And when you hear it, let it induce you to forgive me!"

Still John Marchmont neither moved nor spoke, and Dick, after pausing for a little while, and ascertaining beyond all doubt that Francis Cross was really dying, touched him on the shoulder.

"Arouse yourself, sir," he exclaimed, "and utter the words this man, villain as he is, has asked for. The consolation to your heart must be great indeed. He has repented of his crimes. Forgive him!"

"I do forgive him," was the slowly-uttered answer. "He has made the only reparation in his power; but, alas! I feel sure that he will never be able to undo the mischief he has caused!"

Hearing these words, Francis Cross struggled to raise his head from the roadway.

By his manner, he doubtless had something more he wished to say.

But finding that he could not utter it, he had been seized with the idea that if he could raise himself he should be able to speak better.

It was a delusion.

After a few struggles, he gave vent to a gasping cry, and fell back.

For several moments after this there was a profound silence.

Dick was the first to break it.

By the appearance of the sky, he could tell the time was close at hand when it would be necessary for him to set out towards his destination.

On that night, above all others, it behoved him to return in good time.

Therefore, turning to the second traveller, he said:

"Sir, you are to me a perfect stranger, although, among other things to-night, I have learned that your name is John Marchmont. Business calls me away from here. I cannot linger any longer. I leave you with the dead."

"But, sir, you surely will not leave me until——"

"I cannot stay another moment," said Dick; "my business is urgent in the extreme. The chances are all against our meeting again. Farewell!"

"I cannot control you," was the answer, "yet I should be glad if you remained. Before I say farewell, let me thank you for your prompt interference this night, and for all that you have done. But for your courage and generous behaviour I should have been left entirely to the mercy of yonder wretch. He would then have triumphed in the consummation of his terrible revenge. What has passed between us is, no doubt, sufficient to enlighten you as to the cause of enmity between us; I leave you to judge whether he was justified in craving for such a deadly vengeance. I admit that I am much in fault; I confess that, after marriage, my wife was neglected; I confess, as well, that when the accusation was first made, I gave it implicit credence—I believed my wife to be guilty, and since then I have been the most wretched man alive."

"Be rejoiced, then," said Dick, "to find there is the prospect of happier days in store. Now that you feel convinced of your wife's faithfulness, go to her and entreat her pardon—tell her what has passed to-night, and let the whole occurrence be a lesson."

"I will—I will. Once more, farewell, and to the longest day I live I shall be your debtor."

Dick raised his hat and bowed.

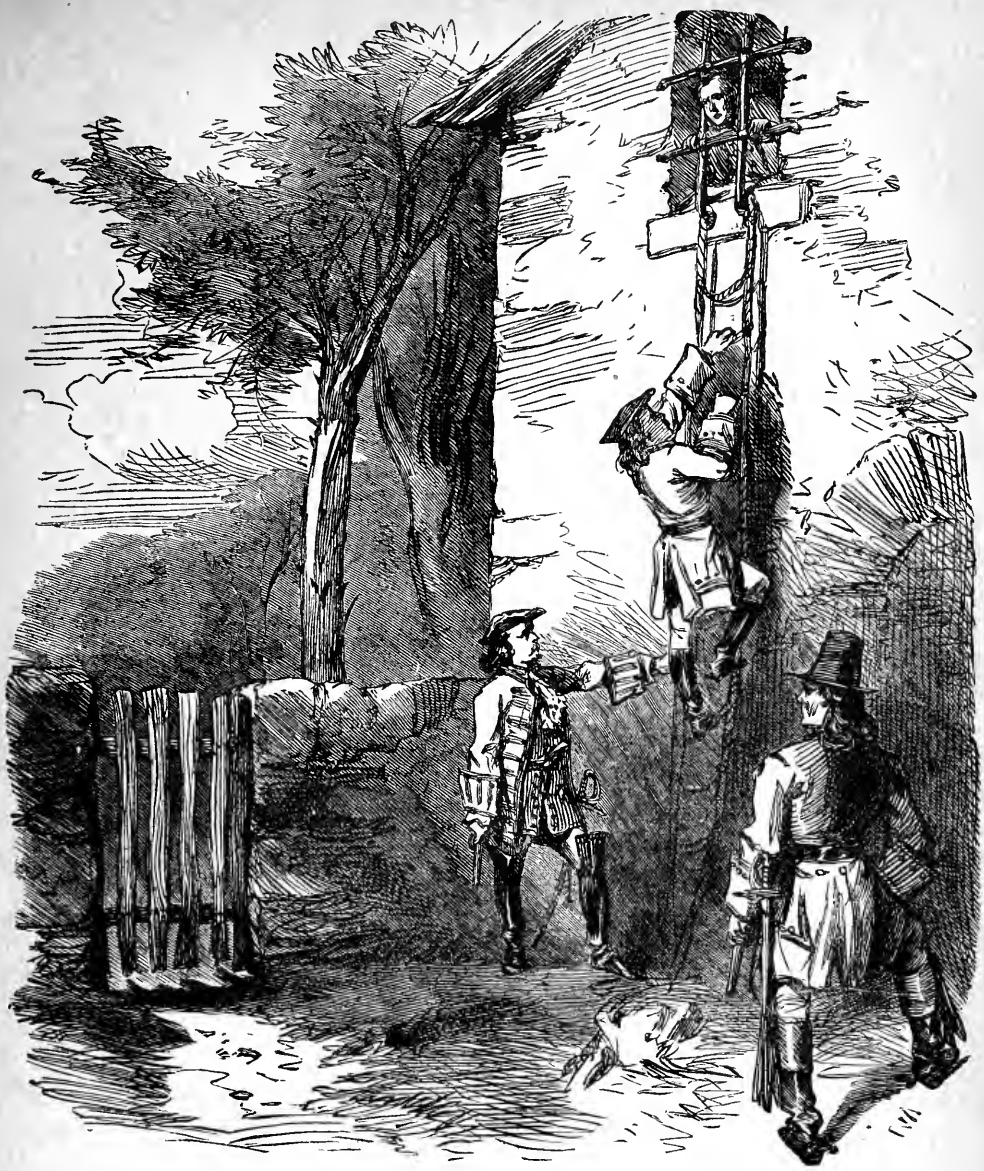
Then, without speaking again, or waiting for a response, he hastened off down the road towards the spot where he had left Black Bess.

He uttered that chirping whistle that she so well understood, and a few bounds placed her by his side.

Springing nimbly to the saddle, he turned her head at once in the direction of Ealing Common.

"I seem fated not to have another profitable adventure," he muttered. "Well, no matter, by pausing as I did I have at least been able to render assistance where it was much needed, and to frustrate a scheme of villany. It has occupied much time—it is later than I believed."

Dick was exceedingly anxious to take up a position somewhere near to the Three Spiders some time before the dawn.



Until he saw the signal that had been agreed upon, he knew that it would be unsafe for him to enter, and if, unluckily, he did not arrive until after the signal had been shown, he would have to remain concealed in some uncomfortable place or other during the remainder of the day.

For one thing, however, Black Bess was easily able to make up for any little delay of this kind.

The gallant creature seemed to understand that she was galloping home, for she put forth her powers of speed in a manner that excited her rider's admiration.

The strange scene that he had last witnessed was provocative of much thought.

But his mind was divided, for the nearer he got to his destination the more anxious did he become to know whether the officers had really left the inn and whether they had made any dangerous discovery.

It was indeed a serious business altogether.

Their suspicions were, beyond a doubt, strongly aroused, and he was in doubt whether Tom Davis would be skilful enough to thoroughly allay them.

At length he pulled up something less than a quarter of a mile from the old inn, and there he sat, patiently watching and waiting.

He looked around him, but neither saw nor heard anything of his companions.

Yet it was quite possible that they were in hiding somewhere close at hand, watching for the signal like himself.

As the time passed on, and he saw nothing, his apprehensions greatly increased, so much so that he almost felt inclined to ride forward at all hazards, and ascertain the worst.

Before he could quite make up his mind to the adoption of this course, however, the intense silence that prevailed was broken by a faint, far-off rushing sound, and at the same instant he saw a rocket ascend into the air, and burst into a thousand glittering fragments.

"All's well!" he ejaculated, with a cry of satisfaction, and he at once commenced to move towards the inn.

Before Black Bess had taken many steps another rocket shot up into the sky, followed shortly afterwards by another.

Feeling that his breast was relieved of a heavy weight, Dick Turpin made still better speed, so that in the space of a very few minutes he had reached the front of the inn, where he saw Tom Davis waiting for him.

"All right, captain!" he cried. "They're gone, and I don't think they will trouble us again!"

CHAPTER DCCXCIV.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN COMMENCE THEIR PERILOUS ENTERPRISE, AND HAVE A NARROW ESCAPE OF DISCOVERY.

It is now time that we turned our attention to the proceedings of the three highwaymen, Claude Duval, Sixteen-String Jack, and Tom King, upon the important errand that they set out

As soon as ever they got clear of the premises belonging to the public-house, they set spurs to their steeds, and made their way, at a rapid rate, towards the singular-looking building.

"Now," said Tom King, "let us agree to one thing, and bear it in mind. The mission we are about to undertake is a most important one. We shall have many difficulties to grapple with, and certainly it will require many hours to effect our purpose; therefore, no matter what occurs, let us agree not to turn aside from our path, but to bend all our energies upon the task we have to perform."

"Agreed—agreed!" cried his two companions. "We will not mix ourselves up with any other adventure to-night!"

"It would be better not," said Tom King, "if only because of our particular undertaking to be watching the front of the inn before daybreak."

This being consented to, they continued to travel at a rather faster pace than before.

Yet they did not go so rapidly as to attract the attention of those persons who saw them.

Nor did they go so fast as to prevent them from holding a conversation with each other, and agreeing to the plan of operations which they should endeavour to carry out.

This conversation, however, it will be quite unnecessary to repeat—it will be sufficient to describe their proceedings upon their arrival.

Both Tom King and Claude Duval had been careful on the preceding night to take accurate notes of the position of the building, and therefore they were able to make their way towards it in an almost direct line.

This was a great saving of time, and before the night was at all far advanced they drew up within a short distance of the entrance gates.

"Now," said Tom, "the first thing to do is to dispose of our horses."

"I think we cannot do better than leave them in the same place as we did last night," said Claude; "then, when they are disposed of, we will climb the wall."

The horses were placed in safety, and although they were allowed the liberty of grazing, yet they were secured to trees in such a manner that they could not stray away.

This was important, for it might be that circumstances would so turn out as to make it necessary for the highwaymen to beat a rapid retreat, in which case it would be imperative to be able to mount their horses quickly.

Of course, knowing what they had to do, they had provided themselves pretty well with tools.

Upon reaching the wall, they listened for a time, to make sure that all was quiet.

Then Claude Duval produced rather a long piece of rope.

At one end of it a piece of iron was secured.

This piece of iron had been rudely bent into the form of a hook.

"I think it will bear," he said—"at any rate, we will make the trial."

Holding the hook with his hand, he flung it upwards.

It went clear over the wall, and they heard it strike with a sharp clinking sound against the bricks on the other side.

Then gently he began to draw the rope towards him.

The hook scraped against the wall, and finally caught firmly in the chevaux de frise.

"There you are!" he cried. "Now then, who goes first?"

"I will," said Tom King, "and you follow me with all speed."

He ascended the rope rapidly as he spoke, holding it in his hands, and placing his feet against the wall.

The ascent was performed in this manner with great rapidity, and with but little strain upon the muscles.

His two comrades followed in the same manner.

Owing to the revolving, projecting spikes, it was a very difficult matter indeed to obtain a standing-place upon the top of the wall.

Yet the highwaymen managed pretty well.

Looking towards the mysterious building, they saw that it was plunged in entire darkness.

Either the windows were furnished with very closely-fitting shutters, or else no lights were burning within.

In either case, however, it seemed that the intruders were in little danger of being seen.

Of course, the sooner they quitted their elevated position the safer and better it would be.

Sixteen-String Jack ascended the rope last, and when he had gained the summit the rope was drawn up and lowered on the other side.

Tom King set the example of descending.

Somehow, he seemed to feel that the enterprise was particularly his own.

But it was principally the interest and curiosity he felt to arrive at an explanation of what he had seen that made him so impatient to take the lead.

The descent was accomplished with the greatest rapidity, and, having touched the ground, all three stood close under the shadow of the wall.

The hour was yet comparatively early.

It was doubtful, although the place looked so dark, whether the inmates had retired to rest.

Such being the case, it was the more important that they should use caution.

In a low whispering voice, Tom King said:

"Yonder is the window where I saw the figure of that girl appear; if we move our positions a little we shall be able to get exactly opposite to it, and yet remain in concealment. I propose that we remain there, and wait a reasonable time and see whether anything takes place to-night."

"Good," said Claude—"I like that plan much."

"But did you not say," asked Sixteen-String Jack, "that after the girl had uttered those shrieks you heard the sound of heavy blows, and of an angry voice?"

"Yes, yes—I did."

"Presuming, then, that she is a prisoner—and there can be no doubt of it—it is quite certain that they have discovered her attempt to solicit aid. Depend upon it, they have taken such measures as will prevent her from repeating the same thing."

There was a strong degree of probability about this assumption.

Certainly, those who had her in custody would endeavour to prevent the repetition of such alarming cries.

Nevertheless, our friends resolved to wait as had been first arranged.

At present it was too early to commence operations in any way, and by waiting they might learn something important.

For fear of their presence being known, they did not even converse in whispers, but remained perfectly silent, crouching down close against the wall.

For a long time the silence remained unbroken.

All at once, however, they heard a faint but sharp sound, like the opening of a door.

They were on the alert instantly, wondering what was going to take place next.

This noise was quickly followed by another, less unmistakable, and which the highwaymen could recognise easily.

It was a heavy, slouching footstep upon the gravel with which the house was surrounded.

"Some one comes!" whispered Tom King. "What can it mean? I am afraid, now, we are too soon, and that we shall be discovered."

"Hush, hush—not another word!" said Claude Duval. "Look there!"

He pointed to one angle of the building as he spoke, and his comrades, looking in that direction, perceived the faint reflection of a light.

In another second it had grown much stronger, and presented a star-like appearance.

It was waved to and fro, causing the light to flash with rather a pretty effect through the obscurity.

The highwaymen could make out that a man, carrying a lantern in his hand, was approaching.

No sooner did they perceive this than they jumped at once to the conclusion that it must be the person whose duty it was to make a round of the premises each night, and see that all was safe.

If the man performed his duty thoroughly and faithfully he would discover not only the intruders but the rope which they had left hanging from the top of the wall in order to facilitate their escape.

This discovery would, of course, produce an immediate alarm, and then they would be foiled completely.

It is true, as they were three to one, they might have pounced upon the man and taken him prisoner.

But then his non-return at the accustomed time would be productive of as much alarm as if he had called out for assistance.

Under these circumstances, there was nothing left for the highwaymen to do but to remain perfectly still in their hiding-place, and trust to good fortune to befriend them.

The man came walking on, flashing the lantern around him on all sides, with the air and manner of one who was going round to ascertain if all was secure and safe.

He came very close to the wall, and once the highwaymen felt sure they were discovered.

But the man passed on, and they breathed again, for so far they were in safety.

They saw that he was an elderly-looking man with round shoulders, and a stooping, slouching carriage, and he shuffled along with his feet like one too lazy to walk.

It may seem strange that he did not perceive the intruders, but the fact was that, night after night for years in succession, he had performed that same duty.

On no occasion had he found anything of the least suspicious or alarming nature, and therefore the vigilance and close scrutiny that he had at first exercised greatly relaxed, until he grew to perform it in a purely mechanical manner.

Therefore, although he flashed the light about him, he did not look in every direction where the beams of the lantern fell.

Nevertheless, although suspecting something of this kind, the highwaymen watched his progress with a very great amount of anxiety.

Some unlucky chance might enable him to see the pendant rope.

But, to their satisfaction, the spot was passed, and then, with easy minds, they watched the old man as he gradually walked all the way round the wall.

Having performed his duty so far, he went up to the house and examined the windows, to see that they were properly fastened.

This was not done negligently, but carefully.

Doubtless he felt that it was by far the most important part of his nightly work.

One by one, the windows and doors were tried, and at length, coming to the door from which he had emerged, he entered, and the sound made by the closing of it reached the ears of the highwaymen distinctly.

They heard even the sound produced by the putting up of the heavy bar that fitted across it, and the drawing of the massive bolts into their sockets.

After that the silence was unbroken.

For a long, long while they continued their silent watch.

Their eyes were chiefly directed upon the window that Tom King had pointed out.

It remained closed like the rest, and they saw no one appear at it.

"Rely upon it," said Claude Duval, "they have removed her to some other part of the building, or else bound her in such a way that she could not repeat the alarm."

"I am afraid it is so," replied Tom King; "but we had better wait a little longer yet; it is no good marring our whole enterprise by precipitation."

"True. I quite agree with you there."

"You will admit, then, that they have not retired long enough to get sound asleep—besides, we have no certain knowledge that they have retired at all."

"True."

The subject was then again dropped.

Nearly an hour elapsed before either spoke again.

It was Sixteen-String Jack who said:

"Time is passing, and I am certain if you mean to have any chance of success at all, you must commence your operations, otherwise we shall have the daylight here before we have half finished."

"That is quite true," said Tom King. "I was about to speak myself. The risk must be run now at all events."

"What shall be the first step?"

"Well, I have been trying to think. As you know, when considering it over, I calculated that we should see this girl again, and that by her means we should be able to get the rope ladder fastened to the window."

"I know that was the arrangement; but now there seems no chance of carrying it out, what is to be done?"

"Let us go closer and look; perhaps we may be able to see something that will aid us."

"Hush—hush! Look! What is that?"

"The girl!" said Tom King, in rather a louder tone of voice than was at all prudent—"she has come once more to the window. All will be well now."

A white figure could now be indistinctly seen through the panes.

"We must be careful to give her warning not to shriek," said Claude, "for if she does she will arouse the people within, and then our chance will be over for to-night."

"True, but leave that to me."

Tom King advanced into the open space between the wall and the house, and, despite the manifest danger of so doing, waved his hat as a signal.

He ran a great risk of being seen by others than the girl.

Almost immediately the window was dashed open, rather violently too, for as it was a latticed casement, the half that was opened went with a crash against the wall.

"Hush—hush!" cried Tom King, in a voice he imagined was just loud enough to reach the person above, and in as assuring a tone as he could. "Your cries for aid have been heard, and we have come to assist you; but, above all things, be silent; if you are not, we shall be sacrificed as well as yourself."

The girl clasped her hands together, and could not restrain a faint cry.

She leaned forward out of the window, and by her manner seemed overcome by joy, and yet much in doubt whether what she heard and saw was real.

This night, unlike the preceding one, was not moonlight.

The moon, however, was above the horizon, but she was hidden by thick clouds.

Through these, however, she shone with a dim, uncertain light.

Yet it served to give a dusky illumination, by the aid of which Tom King looked up and endeavoured to form some idea of the personal appearance of the prisoner.

CHAPTER DCCXCV.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN DISCOVER THE NATURE OF THE MYSTERIOUS BUILDING, AND DETERMINE TO LIBERATE ITS INMATES.

The distance, however, was too great for him to judge accurately, yet he fancied from the general outline that she must be young, and perhaps beautiful.

On the preceding night he had heard her voice, and though it was raised far above its usual pitch, yet he could detect much sweetness in its tones, and this went further towards convincing him that she was young.

Again addressing her, Tom said:

"By chance we heard your cries, and jumped to the conclusion that you were in need of help. Were we right? If so, we have come in order to effect your escape."

"Oh yes—yes," said the prisoner, in low and gentle accents—"help me to escape, free me from this dreadful place, and I shall ever remember you with gratitude. If you wish for wealth, I can promise it to you to almost any amount."

"But why are you here?" asked Tom—"what nature of place is this?"

"I am here by the villany of another," was the response. "Are you not aware that it is a madhouse?"

"A madhouse?"

"Yes, so they call it, though the poor unfortunates within its walls are as sane as I am."

Tom remained silent.

"You do not know what horrors, what barbarities are carried on beneath this roof. I have been a victim to such cruelties that I wonder it has not killed me. By some strange means, however, I have survived, and all the time I kept hoping for better things in the future."

"Wait a moment," said Tom King—"wait a moment in silence and peace, while I hold a conference with my companions."

He moved off as he spoke, and drawing close to Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, he said:

"You heard what she stated a moment ago?—this is a madhouse."

"I half guessed it," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Well, I did not, and therefore the announcement has taken me by surprise. There is one thing we must carefully take into consideration."

"What's that?"

"Whether the young girl above really is or is not mad, for aught we know she may be quite insane, and therefore necessarily confined. How great an injury we should do to her, and possibly to many others, if we allowed her her liberty under the circumstances."

"That is quite right," said Claude; "but when she addressed you, could you detect any signs of madness?"

"No, none; she spoke gently and sensibly enough, but then I don't profess to be a judge."

"Nor I."

"I have often heard," said Sixteen-String Jack, "that people when mad are cunning also, and that they can, when it so pleases them, put on an appearance of complete rationality, which is quickly thrown aside as soon as the end they wish to gain has been achieved."

"I know that also," said Tom King, "and that's what makes me hesitate."

"Look upon it from the other point of view," said Claude Duval. "Suppose that what she says is true, that, by the villany of some other, she has been confined in this place, being all the time in proper possession of her mental faculties?"

"Yes, that's the heaviest doubt of all; but let us decide what to do."

"I am for running the risk," said Claude Duval.

"And I also," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Well then, so am I, therefore be ready, because now we have decided, the more expeditious we are the better."

"Good, here is the twine; you throw it up."

"Yes."

Tom took hold of a ball of twine that was handed to him.

Then advancing to the spot which he had previously occupied, he looked up at the window, and said:

"We are willing to do our best to accomplish your escape, but yet we feel some doubt as to whether——"

"I understand you," interrupted the prisoner, in a voice of the deepest grief—"I understand well what you mean. You, too, are touched with the belief that I may be really mad, but, oh! do not—pray do not believe it! There are times when I have a strange sensation in my brain, and when I think surely my reason is departing, but then again all is calm, and I am well again. Nothing of that was ever felt by me until I came to this horrid place, and it is the terrible associations I have had that have been the cause."

Here she stopped and wept.

"Don't feel vexed that we should have had the doubt," said Tom King; "we doubt no longer, and you may rest content that if you preserve your calmness and summon up your courage you will to-night be perfectly free."

"Do not fill me with false hopes," she exclaimed; "the disappointment will surely drive me mad!"

"Hush—hush! be quiet and hope for the best. If an alarm is given all will be lost."

"I am calm. I will be very still."

"Well, then, our first step will be to mount up to your window. It is barred with iron, is it not?"

"It is; with strong iron bars that my strength will not even serve to shake."

"But a file will make an impression on them," said Tom King, "especially when used by skilful hands. Look, I am holding a ball of twine in my hand. I will throw it at the window, and do you try to catch it, then lower down one end of it, and when it reaches the ground I will secure it to a rope ladder. This you must draw up and fasten to your window in the best way you can."

"I understand—I understand perfectly," said the prisoner, clasping her hands in expectation.

"Stand aside then for an instant," said Tom King, "that I may have a better chance of throwing the ball in"

He was obeyed, and, with considerable accuracy of aim, Tom flung the ball of twine into the room.

A moment elapsed, and then the girl appeared at the window, and began to lower it as she had been directed.

"Stop," said Tom King, "that will do."

The rope ladder was then tied firmly to it.

"Pull up," he then cried—"pull up—all is well."

The ladder was quickly raised, and as soon as it reached the top, the poor girl with busy fingers began to fasten it to the iron bars.

"It is done," she said, at length—"it is done.'

"Are you certain it is secure?"

"Quite.

"Then I will ascend."

The highwaymen had provided themselves with a couple of small stakes that could be driven into the ground in such a manner as to hold the ladder tight, thus making the ascent much easier.

Tom King suited the action to the word, and began to ascend the ladder rapidly.

In less than a moment he had reached the top.

Then he saw that he had not been mistaken in the opinion he had formed respecting the appearance of the prisoner.

She was young and beautiful, and although he could not see her face quite plainly, yet he could tell that it had upon it no stamp or trace of madness.

It was as calm and gentle as an angel's.

"Are you sure you cannot force yourself between these bars?" he asked.

"Oh yes, quite sure, or I should have done it long ago I have tried hard, but failed."

"Yet the removal of one will surely suffice?"

"Oh yes."

"Well, then, I will set to work without delay."

Tom had a very fine steel saw, and with this implement he began to work away upon the bar.

The tool was expressly made for the use to which he was putting it, and, as he fully expected, the bar itself was made of soft iron, into which the saw sank almost as easily as if it had been wood.

"It will be only necessary to saw through in this one place," he said; "when it is divided there I shall be able to seize it and bend it back."

Although he worked with a will, and although he was very skilful in the use of the tool, yet it seemed an endless time before the bar was completely severed.

At last, with an exclamation of satisfaction, he announced that his task was completed.

Seizing the end of the bar, he then put forth the whole of his strength, and gradually bent it back sufficient to allow anyone to pass through.

"Now you are free," said Tom. "Come, I will assist you through the window; then descend, and in ten minutes more we shall be in safety."

But the young girl hesitated, and showed no eagerness to avail herself of this opportunity to escape.

Tom was surprised.

"Why do you pause?" he said—"do you doubt us?"

"No, no—not for one moment."

"What is it, then?"

"Why, I have certain knowledge that in this place there are others as unjustly confined as I am—persons who are no more mad than you and I are. Some have languished here for many and many a year, and might do until the end of their days. It would be extreme selfishness on my part to escape and leave them. Could you not free the others also?"

Nothing could have pleased Tom King so well as this speech.

Nothing could have gone so far towards raising the young girl in his estimation.

Nothing would have more firmly convinced him that she was perfectly sane.

The cunning of insanity, however elaborate, could never reach such a point as that.

It was a speech that came direct from a pure, unselfish heart.

But Tom thought he would try her still further.

"I regret to hear that there are others in this place besides yourself," he said; "yet how to free them I scarcely know. Your safety might certainly be secured, but if we attempted to liberate the others you would probably be prevented from leaving."

"But there is a chance of success," she answered. "Suppose you make the effort. I cannot control you, of course, but if you like to consent I should be glad. Let no thought of the consequences to myself keep you back. It would be base indeed to fly and not make the least attempt to do anything for their good."

"You are a brave, noble-minded girl," said Tom King, in an access of enthusiasm, and seizing her hand and wringing it while he spoke. "What you have just said proves you to be unselfish and generous to a degree that I had before no conception of, and the effect upon me is such, that, come what danger there may, I will save you, and the other unfortunates as well."

The fair prisoner withdrew her hand and burst into a flood of tears, but they were tears of hope and joy, and not of sorrow.

CHAPTER DCCXCVI.

THE HIGHWAYMEN MAKE MR. LARNER A PRISONER.

TOM KING'S two comrades, standing together at the foot of the ladder, could tell that some conversation was going on above.

But only a murmur of voices reached their ears, and indistinct words.

They were rather surprised, therefore, when they saw Tom suddenly draw himself up, and squeeze his body between the iron bars, and enter the chamber.

Up to that moment, they had no idea that he intended to make any such proceeding, and they were at a loss to understand the meaning of it.

But he did not leave them long in suspense, but, thrusting his head out of the window, he said, in a suppressed voice:

"Come up quickly; there's more to do!"

He was obeyed instantly, and in less than a moment all three highwaymen were standing in the room.

A few words from Tom sufficed to explain the whole state of the case to them.

Their resolve was taken immediately.

"By all means let us free them!" cried Claude Duval. "Don't you say so, Jack?"

"With all my heart! But don't you speak so loud, lest we should be overheard, and then our plans would all be upset."

"Good; we will be careful."

Then, turning to the young girl, Tom King said:

"Now, you must give us, as well as you can, all the particulars you are able concerning this place."

"Particulars?"

"Yes; how many persons are we likely to find that we shall have to encounter, and whereabouts are the patients situated?"

The young girl clasped her hands over her face in deep thought.

"There are two doctors," she said, at length,—"if doctors they are—who keep this place, Dr. Templeton and Dr. Wright."

"Well, and how many more?"

"There are their wives, and either two or three keepers. I have never seen more than two."

"And the other patients, where are they?"

"Confined in various rooms, like myself. I will be your guide, as well as my knowledge will permit me. Oh, sirs, do not hesitate to set them at liberty, for what is suffered here no tongue can tell!"

"Are you sure that they are all sane?" said Claude Duval.

"I might say I am quite sure, though the barbarities and indignities of this place are sufficient to produce madness in any brain. I myself have often felt that my reason was going."

"No wonder—no wonder," said Tom King, glancing around the apartment. "We were afraid we should not be able to hold communication with you, as last night I heard you shriek for aid, and was just in time to see you dragged back from the window."

The girl shuddered.

"Yes—yes; that was Larner"

"Who?"

"One of the keepers I told you of; his name is Larner—a villain—a brute—a fiend ten times worse than any of the others!"

"Then to-night," said Tom King, "if I come across him, he shall receive the punishment he deserves."

"Last night," continued the young girl, "he beat me most unmercifully with a whip, and secured me to yonder wretched bed. He believes that I am still lying there, fast bound; but I contrived to undo one of the knots in the rope, and, as you see, I am free."

"Yes," said Tom King. "Keep up your courage, and, in a short time, you will be in full possession of your liberty."

"It will be best not to stand talking here," said Claude Duval; "time is slipping away more quickly than you imagine. Let us commence proceedings at once."

"Yes—yes, by all means," added Sixteen-String Jack.

Tom King advanced towards the door.

He passed his hands rapidly down it, and then, in tones of some surprise, he ejaculated:

"Why, the door is perfectly smooth. I can find no signs of any fastenings upon it."

"They are all on the other side," replied the young girl. "The door itself is of unusual strength, and fits very closely indeed into its frame. On the other side you will find a bar, two bolts, and a heavy lock. I know it by listening."

"Then we have a tough job before us," said Tom, "but, at any rate, we must get the door open, somehow or other."

"Hush—hush!"

"What's the matter?"

The young girl clung tightly to Tom's arm.

"He comes," she said, in tones of terror,—"he comes!"

"Who?"

"Larner."

"You are mistaken. I can hear nothing."

"Yes—yes!" she continued, more excitedly than before. "My ears are sharp; I can always tell long before he comes. Hark! You can hear his footstep now?"

Tom tried to soothe the young girl's agitation, and then all three highwaymen listened intently.

The faint, far-off sound of a clumsy, shuffling footstep could now be heard.

"You hear him now?" said the young girl.

"Yes—yes, I hear him."

"Oh, do not let him touch me—do not—do not! If he finds out what has occurred, he will murder me!"

"Dismiss your fears, my poor girl—dismiss them, pray! While we are by he shall not harm you."

"Hush—hush!" said Claude Duval; "he is close at hand now."

"Yes, he is coming here, I am sure he is coming here!" said the young girl, in a whisper. "He has overheard us!"

"Nothing more likely," said Tom, calmly

"But what shall you do? How shall you act?"

"Be under no apprehension, my good girl; leave all to us. I look upon his approach as about the most convenient thing that could happen."

"Indeed?"

"Yes; he will open the door, and save us the trouble. My comrades," he added, "the moment he enters, seize him, and prevent him from uttering a sound"

"We will; we are in perfect readiness."

The footstep that they heard approaching now stopped in front of the door.

They could hear the jingling of keys, and some one grumbling and cursing in an undertone.

Then the key was turned, with a sharp sudden snap the bar lifted down, and the two bolts withdrawn.

The young girl clung to Tom King more tightly than ever, and trembled excessively. It was only natural that she should be greatly alarmed at the approach of a man who had treated her with so much barbarous cruelty.

Nor is it surprising that at first she should not be able to realise that his power of harming her any longer was at an end.

The door was dashed open by a violent, impatient kick.

Then a stream of light came pouring into the room

"Curse you for a toad," said a harsh, disagreeable voice.—"curse you for a toad. I say! But I'll teach you better than to disturb me night after night in this fashion! I will murder you, you witch, I will! Come on! Where are you?"

The highwaymen then caught sight of a man, whose appearance fully corresponded with his discordant voice and threatening words.

His aspect was repulsive in the extreme, and chiefly so in consequence of the look of settled ferocity that there was upon his ill-favoured visage.

In one hand he carried a lantern, and in the other a long whip, or, rather, a portion of one.

The lash had either been broken or taken off, and only the flexible handle remained.

With it, however, most painful, stinging blows could be given; and whenever he used the weapon, he did not fail to put forth the full strength of his arm.

His eyes must have been rather puzzled by the darkness, for he did not perceive the forms of the highwaymen standing in the room.

They waited until he got fairly over the threshold.

Then Claude Duval, by an adroit movement, slipped behind him, and clasped him tightly round the throat.

So vigorous was the pressure, that the man was only able to gurgle forth an inarticulate sound.

Sixteen-String Jack placed himself in front of him, and thrust the muzzle of a pistol into his half-opened mouth.

"Villain!" he cried, rattling the barrel against his teeth, "your course of villany is run! Move or speak, and you are a dead man!"

In such a man as this, nothing but cowardice could be expected, and, therefore, he no sooner found himself in this position, than he became perfectly still, and if his foes had permitted him, would have whined and howled for mercy, without making the least attempt to release himself.

"Now," said Jack, "we have him secure, just bring the rope this way, and complete the job."

"All right," said Tom King, with some difficulty persuading the young girl to let go his arm, "I will manage it in a moment!"

Tom hastened to the rude-looking bed, on which was a quantity of very strong rope.

With this he first of all tied Mr. Larner very securely by the ankles, then he pinioned his arms tightly behind him, like a man who is going to execution.

Then the remainder he thrust into his mouth like a bit, and tied tightly at the back of his head—so tightly, that the rascal must have suffered extreme pain.

It was not to be expected, however, that the highwaymen would be actuated by any compassionate motives, and they were perfectly heedless as to whether they inflicted a little pain upon him. Indeed, if they did, so much the better; they knew that he fully deserved it.

While the rope was so tight, it was out of the question to utter a sound; in fact, Claude Duval had almost strangled him, and when he released his hold, the wretch fairly gasped for breath.

"That will do," said Claude Duval. "Pick up the lantern, Jack, and I will take his keys. If all the doors are fastened on the outside, they will be of the greatest use to us. We shall be able to enter anywhere without difficulty."

CHAPTER DCCXCVII.

THE HIGHWAYMEN HAVE SOME STARTLING AND PERILOUS ADVENTURES IN THE LUNATIC ASYLUM.

Sixteen-String Jack took up the lantern as he had been desired, and Claude Duval immediately possessed himself of the large bunch of keys that Larner had carried.

They were all as bright as silver, showing that they must have been in continual use.

The young girl still clung to Tom King, thus impeding his actions.

But he did not like to shake her off or use any harshness whatever towards her, for, for ought he knew, her intellect might have been so much on the balance that the least thing would serve to overturn it.

It was only natural that she should look upon Tom as her preserver and deliverer, and as the one who would save her from all future harm.

In his presence—by his side—she felt herself perfectly secure and fearless.

They passed out of the door, and, having crossed the threshold, found themselves in a large square landing-place, at the top of a flight of stairs.

"Wait a moment," said Claude; "we may as well make sure of this gentleman while we are about it; he will be one less to contend with, at any rate."

He closed the door as he spoke, and then, with great rapidity, bolted, barred, and locked it.

"There," he said, "he's safe now. What is to be done next?"

While Claude had been thus occupied, Sixteen-String Jack, by the aid of the lantern, had made a tolerably good examination of the objects that surrounded them.

They saw several doors around, all of them being secured in a manner similar to the one from which they had emerged

"No doubt there are other persons in these rooms," whispered the young girl, in reply to Tom King's question—"at any rate, open the doors and ascertain."

"That is what I quite intend to do," said Claude—"I can see it will be best to open them one after another."

He went towards the next one as he spoke.

Some time elapsed, however, before he found a key that would act upon the lock.

At last he took hold of the right one, and then the other fastenings were rapidly removed.

A faint moaning sound reached his ears the moment the door grated open.

It was as though some one was enduring great suffering and pain.

Claude entered the room at once, or, as it might more properly be called, the dungeon, for it served the purposes of one, although situated above the ground.

Sixteen-String Jack followed with the light, and then they saw, stretched upon a miserable bed, the form of an aged woman—at least, they took her to be aged at the first glance, for her countenance was thin and wrinkled, and her hair, which was long and flowing, as white as silver.

But a second glance was sufficient to show them that it was that kind of age which is produced by extreme suffering.

Upon seeing these strange intruders enter, the poor creature raised herself slowly on one arm.

"You come to torment me," she said—"I know you do! Try your worst—I care not: my miserable life is almost at an end!"

Then she sank back again.

"You mistake," said Claude, speaking as reassuringly as possible. "We are no foes or tormentors of yours, but friends, and have come to set you at liberty! Rise—rise! Be quick and come with us!"

"No, no," was the hysterical reply—"you don't mean this—it is impossible! Alas—alas! I understand it now! I am mad at last—I feared I should be! Oh, my poor brain—how it aches and throbs! Yes, yes—I am mad at last!"

And, uttering short shrieks and sobs of pain, the poor creature writhed about as though enduring great physical agony.

This was a spectacle that literally made the blood boil in the veins of the three highwaymen.

At that moment they felt in their arms the vigour of a hundred men, and longed for the opportunity of inflicting some castigation upon the authors of so foul a wrong.

That they would shortly be confronted with the keepers of the asylum there could be little doubt.

The shrieks uttered by this second patient resounded through the building.

A door was opened and closed suddenly and violently.

Then, above all other sounds, arose the sharp clanging of a bell.

"We are discovered!" said Tom King. "I feared as much!"

The young girl clung to Tom with still greater tightness.

"I am glad of it," said Claude—"I long to have an encounter with them! Let them come on!"

Then, turning round to the poor creature on the bed, he said:

"Discard these foolish fears from your mind; you are no more mad than I am; and understand me clearly: you are now quite safe, and in a short time will be at liberty! Rise, slip on a few articles of clothing as quickly as you can, and follow me; we shall remain just outside!"

The room was left while he thus spoke, and the next door was opened.

And so on with all the rest to the number of four.

In each room they found a female, and undoubtedly they were all perfectly sane, though their feelings had been so preyed upon they could scarcely believe in the reality of what was told them.

By this time hasty footsteps could be heard below.

"Come on," said Claude, "we must descend now! It seems to me there are no other rooms on this upper story. Follow me, all of you, and fear not!"

The first portion of his command was obeyed, but to comply with the latter was impossible.

All the poor patients—if so we may term them—were in a state of the greatest possible dread and agitation.

They had been so long subjected to brute force and violence that they could not in a moment shake off all their terrors and assume a partial boldness of demeanour.

The actions of their deliverers, however, did as much towards restoring their confidence as anything.

Their example had more influence than a thousand words.

It was not without due caution, however, that the highwaymen descended the staircase.

It was angular in construction, and so built that they could not see to the bottom, or form any idea of what was going on upon the landing-place below.

At length a turn brought them in view of the foot of the stairs, and then Claude, stepping back, exclaimed:

"Back—back, all of you, a moment!"

The command was almost given too late.

Scarcely had the words passed his lips than there was a tremendous report that seemed to shake the building to its foundation.

There was a crashing sound, too, which was caused by the bullets from the firearms that had been discharged lodging themselves in the woodwork of the staircase.

"Come on quickly, now," said Claude, "before they can reload!"

He ran down the remaining steps as he spoke, followed by Sixteen-String Jack and Tom King.

Such a cloud of smoke hovered over all things that they had some difficulty in making out by whom they were confronted.

They saw, however, two men, who, although hurriedly dressed, presented the outward semblance of persons in a respectable position of life.

Beyond a doubt they were the two doctors, and the keepers of this infamous place.

Two men—keepers, of course—were with them.

The sudden rush made by Claude and his friends entirely took them by surprise.

They had congratulated themselves that one volley would rid them at once and for ever of their impertinent intruders.

Under these circumstances it was not wonderful that they should, without hesitation, have recourse to such violent measures.

If anyone escaped they knew that their infamous trade would be at an end, and that they would be severely punished.

By the destruction of any intruders, then, they had everything to gain, for the building was so completely isolated that no sound occurring within its walls would be carried to the ears of others.

Finding, however, that they had failed in this attempt, a panic took possession of them, and, without waiting for a blow to be struck, they rushed precipitately down the staircase.

Claude's first impulse was to follow them.

But he restrained himself just in time.

"We must wait a moment," he said. "Doubtless on this floor we shall find other patients, and, let the consequences be what they may, we must not leave them behind us."

"Right," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and I don't think we have much to fear; they are a set of cowards, evidently, and will shrink from calling in the assistance of anyone, even supposing that could be done, but which I very much doubt."

While speaking these words, the two highwaymen had been by no means idle.

They opened the doors of several rooms and peeped within.

But the chambers were vacant.

"There are no more patients here," cried Claude Duval; "they are probably below! Before we venture to liberate them, however, we must make ourselves masters of the situation."

"Come on, then!"

They walked towards the top of the staircase while they spoke, the poor creatures they had liberated following in a dense throng.

Suddenly, to the surprise of all, Tom King uttered an ejaculation, and at the same time raised his pistol and discharged it.

Mingled with the report came a dismal, howling shriek, that was followed by a terrific lumbering, crashing noise.

"What's that?" said Sixteen-String Jack.

"One of the keepers, I fancy," said Tom King, calmly; "I just caught sight of the rascal in time!"

"Where was he?"

"Creeping up the staircase, and in one hand he held a pistol, and I verily believe was just about to pull the trigger; no doubt he thought he should be able to make sure of picking off one of us, but now he is picked off himself! Come, one sharp rush, and we shall be all right!"

"You forget," said Claude Duval, "that by this time they have reloaded their weapons, and the moment we make our appearance round the angle of the staircase they will discharge them."

"Very true; and what's more, this time they will not be so hasty as they were at the first volley; they will wait in order to make quite sure of destroying us."

"In that case, then," said Claude, "what are we to do?"

CHAPTER DCCXCVIII.

THE POSITION OF THE HIGHWAYMEN IN THE ASYLUM BECOMES EXTREMELY CRITICAL.

A very impressive silence for some moments followed these words, during which the poor creatures that had been liberated clasped each other as if for mutual protection, and looked apprehensively in the direction of the staircase.

"I wish I could see what they are about down there," said Tom King. "How uncommonly quiet they are."

"Right," said Sixteen-String Jack—"you may depend they are patiently waiting, knowing that we must make our appearance."

"And I'll tell you another thing," said Claude Duval: "if we linger here too long it will give them the opportunity of arranging their plans still further, and we may find ourselves in a more ticklish position than we are at present."

"If I could only take a peep now at what they were doing," said Tom King, "we should be better able to attack them."

"But don't attempt anything so foolish," said Sixteen-String Jack, restraining his comrade—"the attempt, if made, would be followed by certain death."

"Yet we must know what is going on," said Tom. "Just wait a moment, and I'll try an experiment."

He took off his hat while he spoke, and the significant movement he made at once let his comrades know what it was he intended to do.

Creeping stealthily and silently down a few more stairs, he suddenly projected his felt hat a little way round the angle of the staircase.

He took good care while doing this not to expose even the tips of his fingers, lest a bullet should be sent at what those below might presume to be his head

Not the least notice was taken, however, and, having succeeded so far, Tom gradually bent his head forward until he was able to take a peep down in the passage below.

The sight which met his eyes was rather an alarming one, and a single glance was quite sufficient to content him.

Standing very patiently a few paces from the foot of the stairs were the two doctors and the one remaining keeper.

The one who had been so opportunely shot was lying down unheeded upon the flagstones.

The other three were each provided with long fowling-pieces, the muzzles of which were directed towards the stairs, in order that their aim should be more effectual and accurate.

The ends of the barrels were rested on the backs of some old-fashioned chairs that were usually ranged along one side of the corridor.

A look of intense expectation was upon the countenances of all these three villains.

Doubtless they thought of making short work of those who had penetrated the precincts of the asylum.

They could see Tom's cap plainly enough, though they did not happen to catch sight of the upper part of his face, which was visible just above it.

Tom was at no loss to understand how it was that they did not favour him with a shot.

Their former volley was wasted by a little rashness, and on the present occasion they had resolved not to pull the trigger until all were standing in a dense mass upon the staircase, or in the act of coming down.

Tom King hastily joined his companions, and in a very few words contrived to let them know what was the aspect of affairs beneath.

Their countenances assumed a very serious expression.

But Tom said:

"We must set our brains at work, and devise an expedient."

"What expedient?" asked Claude.

"Why, it is certain that, by some stratagem or other, we must get them to discharge their weapons, and at such a time when they will do us no injury."

"But is not that an impossibility?"

"Well, it does appear so just at present; but can you think of nothing?"

"Yes," said Sixteen-String Jack, "I can. Just see me try, if I fail, things can be no worse than they are just at present."

"But what are you going to do?"

"Watch, and you will see."

Jack took a pistol from his belt, and, in a similar manner to Tom King, slipped down the staircase.

Then, upon coming near to the angle of it, he suddenly put his hand round, and, without aiming his pistol particularly, directed its barrel downwards, so that its contents might reach the hall.

Then he pulled the trigger, and a sharp report followed.

Whether it took effect or not was impossible to tell; but just then there came a stunning report.

"Now," cried Jack, in a voice that rose high above the din—"now, my comrades, quick, and we shall have them."

Sixteen-String Jack's hastily-conceived stratagem had answered much better than he had ever anticipated.

But the men below, tired, it may be, with waiting, imagined that this shot would be followed by a sudden dash down the staircase, and fired accordingly.

They were woefully disappointed.

But before they could recover themselves, or feel sure whether their shots had produced any effect or not, the three highwaymen rushed at full speed down the staircase.

The hall was full of light-blue smoke, making it difficult to see anything.

Yet guided as it seemed by a kind of instinct, they directed their steps towards the spot where the two doctors and the keeper were.

They seized them in a moment, and then a terrible struggle commenced.

The highwaymen knew how much importance was attached to this contest, and therefore they put all their soul and strength into it.

They were better practiced in such encounters than their antagonists, and the tussle was speedily over.

"Now then," said Tom, "some rope, and we shall be troubled with them no further."

"You will find some in my pocket," said Claude Duval.

Rope was produced, and the three prisoners kept perfectly quiet by means of pistols held close to their heads.

Knowing the value of speed, the highwaymen bound them rapidly, and then paused a moment to recover their breath.

The three rascals, finding themselves so thoroughly discomfited, burst out into furious curses.

"What shall we do with them?" said Tom.

"I think we cannot do better than serve them as we served Mr. Larner upstairs; we can do it easily—there's a door yonder."

"So there is."

As quickly as thought almost, the three villains were picked up and carried into the room.

They appeared to be in a great state of terror and alarm, for, of course, they had no precise idea of how Larner had been served upstairs.

That they dreaded something terrible was quite evident.

No sooner were they placed inside the room than the door was closed and fastened.

The highwaymen then looked complacently around them.

They might be said now to be quite masters of the situation.

They had no knowledge of any other persons being on the premises with whom they would be likely to come to a rupture.

"Now," said Tom King, "before we leave we will satisfy ourselves that there are no more unfortunate creatures upon the premises. For my own part I cannot believe that they are all rescued."

"Nor I," said Claude Duval. "You see, they are all females; if there are any males, you may depend upon it they are kept in some stronger place."

"And that would be downstairs underground," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Of course it would."

"Well then, my friends," said Tom King, "let us begin to search at once. I need scarcely remind you we have no time to lose—the quicker we are about it the better."

This was assented to.

In order to make quite sure, they first of all searched the rooms on the ground floor.

As they expected, they found nothing to reward them for their trouble.

The apartments were quite of an ordinary character, some of them being sumptuously furnished.

These appeared to be the more private portions of the dwelling, as other plainly-furnished rooms seemed to be used for the reception of visitors.

Had time been less important and circumstances less urgent, the highwaymen would have felt considerable interest in pausing to examine the different articles these rooms contained.

But they were obliged to content themselves with one hasty glance at the magnificent paintings, rare statuary, and other articles of value that were scattered profusely around.

"There's nothing here," said Claude, "so now we can begin our examination at once."

"But first of all," said Tom, "I have a word or two to say to those poor creatures that we have rescued from a fate surely worse than death."

They passed into the entrance-hall as he spoke.

Near the staircase the patients were all huddled together, not yet having recovered themselves from the effects of what they had seen.

Turning towards them, Tom King said:

"You see that you are all now at perfect liberty and quite free to depart. We have placed you in this condition because we believed that you were improperly confined here, and that you were by no means mad."

"No—no," came a chorus of sobbing voices—"we are not mad—certainly not mad."

"Well, then, perhaps you could tell us whether those

[DICK TURPIN DELIVERS THE MYSTERIOUS LETTER.]

are any other persons, like yourselves, unjustly confined in this place?"

There was a pause for a moment, and then one said:

"I don't think we can answer that question positively, but I believe there are many others."

"That is enough," said Tom, "and now you are free to go wherever you choose. Be under no alarm. If there are any articles in this place belonging to you, go at once and fetch them; then take your departure, and with all speed rejoin your friends."

Loud and incoherent expressions of thanks came from all these poor creatures.

But Tom King cut them short.

It seemed, however, as if they had all left something behind, for by common consent they turned and began to ascend the staircase.

Probably it was in order that they might apparel themselves in a more becoming manner.

No. 166.—BLACK BESS.

CHAPTER DCCXCIX.

THE HIGHWAYMEN BECOME BETTER ACQUAINTED WITH THE SECRETS OF THE LUNATIC ASYLUM.

LEAVING them to follow out their own devices, the highwaymen in good earnest set about discovering the route to the lower regions.

A light was the first thing requisite.

But this was rapidly obtained.

A strong-looking door at the extremity of the entrance-hall attracted their notice, not only because of its appearance, but from the fact that it was the only one remaining that they had not opened.

Going towards it, they found that it was secured only by a latch.

Raising it, they passed through, and found themselves in a small square room, almost destitute of furniture.

PRICE ONE HALFPENNY.

Another door was on the opposite side, and this likewise they opened and passed through.

A flight of steps was then disclosed, and as soon as they reached the top of them a most dismal, terrible, shrieking sound came upon their ears.

Had it not been for the nature of the place, the highwaymen would scarcely have believed that the sound was produced by anything human.

"Quick!" said Tom. "Let us put an end to this state of things as speedily as possible; it is too bad that human beings should be made to suffer such torture."

He hastily descended the steps while he spoke, closely followed by his two comrades.

At the bottom of this staircase they found another strong-looking door, both barred and bolted.

But these fastenings were rapidly undone.

Yet the door did not yield.

It was locked.

But this was not much of an impediment.

Larner's keys were immediately thought of, and they were tried successively until one was found that fitted.

Then with a snap the bolt flew back, leaving the highwaymen at liberty to pass on.

Before them was a long, narrow stone passage, with a low, arched roof.

The atmosphere in it was literally pestiferous, and they had to pause a moment in order to allow the purer air upon the staircase to mingle with it.

While they thus stood, however, such a frightful chorus of shrieks, and groans, and hideous cries arose that they looked at each other with blanched faces.

"Some here must be mad," said Claude Duval. "Persons in their proper senses would never utter such cries as these."

"Well, we shall see in a moment or two," answered Tom; "but how is it possible for persons to exist in such an atmosphere as this at all?"

"That's more than I can tell."

"Here is the first door," exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack. "We will open that, and see what is beyond."

The keys were again used, the proper one found, and then the door yielded.

"Mercy!" shrieked some one, in a frenzied voice—"help—help! Don't come to torment me any more! I—I will do anything you wish me, but leave me in peace, and take me somewhere where I cannot hear those dreadful shrieks—they are driving me frantic!"

Tom King held the light high above his head, and then, by the aid of it, he and his comrades saw in truth a piteous spectacle.

A man of middle age, whose powerful, robust form was bowed, and whose skin hung loosely about him, was seated on a rude stone bench, that seemed to be the only accommodation the room afforded.

Upon seeing strangers, he arose.

The movement was accompanied by the clanging of chains, and for the first time the highwaymen noticed that he was fettered to the wall.

In the look of this man there were no signs of insanity.

His manner now was calm, and cool, and reasonable.

Tears even glistened in his eyes, for although no words had been spoken, he seemed to comprehend that he was about to be set free from the wretched den he occupied.

Tom King was the first to speak.

"Chance," he said, "has brought us to this place, and chance has also made us acquainted with its character, and therefore we have set ourselves the task of freeing those who are improperly confined here."

At this realisation of his expectations, the poor prisoner sank down upon his knees and fairly wept aloud.

"Come, come," said Tom—"be calm, I pray you. We have no time to spare, for there are doubtless many others in the same position as yourself. Tell us by what means you are secured to the wall?"

The prisoner made several ineffectual attempts to reply, and at length said:

"I am chained."

"But is the chain riveted or locked?"

"Locked."

"That will do; the knowledge will spare us much trouble. Now, Claude, out with the keys again. No doubt they will answer for this purpose as well as all the rest."

This was quickly proved, and the falling of the clanking chains was followed by a shout of joy from the prisoner.

"At length," he said, "I am free! This day, alas! I feared would never come, but now it has arrived, and I triumph! Let me tell you that I have held out long against all manner of temptation and brutality. All means have been used to force me to sign a certain document, the effect of which would be to beggar me and mine, but I have refused—refused even up to now, though when you entered my mind was in such a state that, had I been asked, I verily believe I should have consented."

"Be glad, then," said Tom, "that we did not come too late. I need not tell you to make haste and leave this gloomy abode. Follow us. No doubt you will be able to tell us where other prisoners are to be found."

"I will try," was the response, "for I should wish all to be delivered. I firmly believe that there is not one confined here who is really mad, or rather, I should say, who was mad when confined here. I felt that my intellect was going."

"And no wonder."

"No, wonder, sir, as you say; and yet you cannot form the least idea of what I have undergone."

While speaking this, the whole party left the cell.

But ere they had gone many paces another door was reached.

No sooner did they pause before it than a succession of the most awful shrieks and groans burst upon their ears.

Evidently the cries proceeded from the other side of it.

With nervous haste, the key was sought for and found, and the door flung open.

The highwaymen pressed in, but rapidly retreated.

Standing in a frantic attitude, and at the full length of his chain was a wan and haggard object.

His condition was indeed horrible in the extreme, and in his eyes the fire of madness was surely burning.

Foam was upon his lips, and he was struggling violently to release himself from the chains that bound him.

But the fetters were strong and far beyond his power to break, and therefore all his raging was ineffectual; and all the while he thus cried and struggled, his behaviour in all respects resembling that of a wild beast, those awful cries the highwaymen had heard came pealing from his lips.

In vain they tried by gentle words to soothe him—he was deaf.

He was deaf to the sound of their voices, for his fury was already so ungovernable that nothing could increase it.

"We must leave him," said Sixteen-String Jack, in a sad tone of voice. "To set such a one at liberty would be to do no end of damage. Who can tell what acts he might commit in his present state of mind?"

"True—true!" said Tom King. "The risk would be by far too great, and yet it grieves me to leave him here thus."

"It cannot be helped," said Claude Duval. "Come on to the next cell!"

"Is not this a lamentable sight?" said the prisoner they had just freed, and who showed more signs of rationality every moment, as he began to fully realise the fact that he was no longer a prisoner—"is it not enough to draw pity from stones, to think that the wretches who owned this place have brought that poor man to such a state? for I feel certain that when he first came to this place he was no more mad than you are at the present moment."

"It is indeed most infamous," said Tom, "and it will be strange indeed if they escape a just retribution for such atrocity! We have all the principals securely bound prisoners, and we have not yet decided what to do with them."

"If you hand them over to the law little good can be done. What amount of punishment inflicted upon them would compensate for the injury they have done?"

Tom did not answer this question, but slowly left that cell and advanced towards the next.

The dreadful nature of the things he saw, and which no description can convey an adequate idea of, deprived him almost of the faculty of speech.

Upon reaching this third door, a deep silence prevailed, and from this fact they judged that the cell must be untenanted.

Still they resolved to ascertain whether this was so or not, and therefore the door was opened.

The cell into which it opened closely resembled the other two.

Before them was the rude stone bench, to which the prisoners were chained.

On this one a man was sitting.

His hands and arms were hanging idly by his sides, and his head was leaning back against the wall.

Of their entrance he took not the slightest notice, moving neither hand nor foot.

The highwaymen called aloud to him.

But without success.

"Perhaps he is asleep," said Tom King—"sleeping heavily. Bring the light a little closer, and then——"

He checked himself suddenly.

The light had been brought, and, the rays falling upon this third prisoner, showed that he was indeed sleeping; but it was the long sleep of death.

He had expired in that lonely, dismal place with no one near to cheer him and soothe him in his last moments.

Yet, judging by appearances, he had died easily, for his position was that of one who had fallen into a deep and sudden slumber.

Without uttering a single word, Tom King turned slowly round and left this cell.

Here, he felt sure, he could do nothing.

His comrades followed him in the same manner.

The next cell, and the next were empty.

In the two following ones were two men, who were evidently sane enough, although the joy they felt at being thus unexpectedly set free demonstrated itself in a very extravagant and violent manner.

But that they were not mad was perfectly certain.

CHAPTER DCCC.

TOM KING AND HIS COMPANIONS ARE MADE PRISONERS BY THE ESCAPED LUNATIC.

When the transports of the liberated prisoners had somewhat abated, the manner in which they crowded round their deliverers and wrung their hands was truly affecting to witness.

But the highwaymen deprecated all their thanks, and steadily kept in view the object they had before them.

"Show your joy and satisfaction," they said, "by aiding us in this good work. We want all the assistance that you are able to afford us."

They pressed forward willingly, and as door after door was opened, fresh persons were added to their number.

They came at length to one low, narrow door, at the extremity of the passage.

As they approached it they heard furious yells and shrieks, accompanied by a clashing sound.

One of those who had been liberated pressed forward and said:

"There is a dangerous prisoner in that cell. I believe for many and many a long year he has been an inmate of this dreadful place. His tale, although I have not heard much of it, is a mournful one; now, I fear, he is hopelessly—incurably insane."

Upon hearing these words, Tom King paused, and so did his companions.

They were rather in doubt as to whether they should run the risk of opening the door or not.

"He is chained," said the man who had before spoken. "The greatest care is taken to keep him secure. If he once got free he would be the death of the keepers of this asylum."

"Then if that's the case," said Tom, "we will open the door and look at him. I have heard that sudden shocks often restore people to their lost reason, and perhaps when he finds that he is about to be set at liberty at last, he will recover his senses."

"There can be no harm to try," said Claude Duval, and as he spoke he thrust a key into the lock.

No sooner had he done so than the sounds within completely ceased.

All seemed as still as death, and the contrast to the former uproar was really remarkable.

The silence indeed was most impressive, for of all the anxious group who stood around the doorway, not one spoke a word, or drew his breath loudly.

The key which Claude tried was proved to be the wrong one, and he tried several rapidly in succession, but without any result.

Then the one who had already given those few explanations spoke again:

"I believe," he said, "that the poor wretch lives only with one idea before his mind."

"What is that?"

"That the time will come some day when he will be able to revenge himself for all the dreadful injuries that have been inflicted upon him. He is waiting, hoping and looking forward for that day to come; and knowing what his intentions are, and dreading his ferocity, the greatest care is taken every time a visit is paid to him lest he should accomplish some violence then."

These accounts by no means reassured the highwaymen, and but for the hope that some benefit might arise from opening the door they would have left it closed.

In addition to this, a feeling of great curiosity sprang up in their bosoms respecting this man, and they longed to look upon him.

A moment afterwards the right key was found, and then the door was pushed slowly open.

No sooner did it recede upon its hinges than a terrific scream was heard, that seemed to pierce through all their brains.

It was followed by a bound and a rush.

So suddenly did this happen that, for a second or so, all were bewildered.

At last, however, they realised the fact that the insane prisoner had escaped.

"After him—after him!" said Tom King. "Who can say what he will do?"

"I fear it is too late!" said Claude Duval.

"No, no—never too late! Quick—quick!"

Tom King bounded hastily off along the passage in the direction the madman had taken.

The others followed him closely.

But before he could get half way along it a loud clanging noise was heard.

At first they did not think what this could be; but directly afterwards the end of the corridor was reached.

Then the strong door at the bottom of the staircase was discovered to be closed.

There was a rattling of chains on the other side, and then a harsh grating sound, showing that the two bolts had been rapidly thrust into their sockets.

Tap-tap came two faint blows from the other side, and then a triumphant voice asked:

"Are you there—are you there?"

"Yes—yes," cried Tom King, "we are here; but we are your friends!"

This announcement, which it was hoped would be received with calmness, was greeted only by a loud, howling, derisive laugh, after which all was still.

The highwaymen looked at each other for a moment in silence.

The accident—for such it truly was—that had just occurred was one that was likely to be most serious in its consequences.

In his blind rage, the madman would confound friends with foes, as he had already done, and the revenge that was burning in his bosom would be wreaked upon them.

But the one who showed the most alarm was the patient who had already communicated several particulars concerning the lunatic.

"How cunning he is!" he exclaimed. "Depend upon it, by some strange means or other, he has managed to get free from his chains. When he heard us opening the door he must have crouched down, and remained perfectly silent; then, watching his opportunity, sprang out."

"Yes, that's the state of affairs beyond a doubt."

"Well, then, gentlemen, let me entreat you to use what efforts you are able to force open this door. Make al' speed to recapture him, or the mischief he may do in a short time will be incalculable."

"We will try," said Tom King. "But this is an obstacle we did not expect to have to contend against."

He endeavoured to shake the door as he spoke.

But it remained quite secure in its setting.

It was exceedingly strong in its construction, and the madman had, beyond a doubt, carefully secured it.

"Come," said Claude Duval, "we must get it open somehow or other, or else make up our minds to remain here and be starved to death. Let us all help, and surely between us something may be accomplished."

They were but ill-provided with tools for such a task as that which was now before them, yet they all bent their energies willingly to it.

They had a double inducement for exertion, and therefore they laboured in an almost incredible manner.

Yet upwards of twenty minutes elapsed before they could be said to have made the least impression upon the door, and that twenty minutes seemed to them at least four hours.

A slight breach in the masonry which formed the door-post having been made, they continued to work with fresh vigour, and soon considerable progress was made.

At last, to their great joy, the door was flung open.

They rushed up the steps pell-mell, but at the top were again brought to a stop, for that door was also closed.

With cries of vexation and disappointment, they hammered away at this, thinking the noise made would probably bring some of the others to their assistance.

In this hope, however, they were disappointed, and they had to batter it down by their own exertions.

Long before they succeeded in doing this they became aware that smoke was pouring in upon them through every chink or crevice that they made.

A roaring sound, like that which would be produced by flames, was also audible.

"The place is on fire," said Tom King; "and perhaps the flames have taken such a hold upon the building that we shall be unable to leave it alive!"

"Let us hope for better things," said Claude Duval. "There, now we are better off!"

The door at this instant gave way; but the smoke beyond was so dense that they had to recoil before it.

"Crouch down," said Tom, "close to the ground; you will find the air comparatively free from smoke. We had better all keep together; I will lead the way. Crawl after me!"

Tom, sinking on his hands and knees, began to crawl forward.

As he had expected, the air close to the floor was tolerably pure, though scorching hot.

Ere going far, however, an ejaculation escaped his lips.

He paused, and the others gathered quickly around him.

"Look!" he said. "Why, here is the young girl that we rescued! How comes it that she is here?"

"Is she dead?" asked Claude.

"No—no," was Tom's hurried reply—"at least, I hope not; her body is warm. She must have dropped down half suffocated with the smoke!"

"Push on, then!" said Claude. "We can manage to take her with us! Unless we are quick, we shall indeed be consumed!"

But Tom would not suffer anyone else to touch the young girl but himself, and, putting forth his utmost strength, he crawled along, half carrying, half dragging her by the side of him.

In this way the entrance-hall of the asylum was gained.

But here the smoke and heat were ten times greater.

How to escape they scarcely knew.

The smoke was so black and thick that it was an impossibility to see a foot before them, save in one place near the staircase, where the flames were raging furiously, and seeming to shoot up to the very top of the building.

"I will draw a little to one side," said Claude, presently. "If you remember, there were several doors leading into rooms; if we can find one we may be able to make our exit through the window."

This suggestion was too good and too valuable to be lost sight of, and Claude hastily moved in the direction of which he had spoken.

Coming to the door, he raised his arm and opened it; then entered.

Here the flames had not apparently made much progress.

The air was intolerably hot; but free from smoke.

The opening of the door, however, altered at once the appearance of the place.

Everything must have been on the point of breaking out into a blaze, and the current of air that came in was sufficient to cause it at once.

There was a sudden flash all round, and then a crackling of glass, as the panes in the window one by one broke and fell out on to the gravel outside.

The cool night air that came rushing in through these openings was, however, inexpressibly grateful to them, and they made all speed towards the window.

By a last effort of strength, Claude dashed it open, and then the whole party scrambled or rather rolled, on to the hard ground outside the building.

CHAPTER DCCCI.

DOCTOR TEMPLETON IS OVERTAKEN BY A JUST BUT TERRIBLE RETRIBUTION.

THE escape was made only just in time.

Not only were they scorched all over by the intense heat, but their lungs were so full of smoke that they were well-nigh suffocated.

It was wonderful how the cold night air served to restore them, and they drank it in with eager gasps, and seemed to swallow it as though it was some exquisite nectar.

The progress of the flames was so rapid, however, that to remain in that position was dangerous, and therefore, one by one, they rose to their feet.

The young girl Tom had taken special charge of still showed no signs of returning animation—a thing perhaps scarcely to be wondered at, but yet which filled him with apprehension.

His strength would scarcely enable him to raise her in his arms and walk away; but he performed the feat, for he felt a strange unwillingness to resign her to the care of another.

Long tongues of flame had now broke forth from all the windows of the asylum, and from the roof as well.

As the building was large, the blaze was tremendous, and lighted up every object around with startling brilliancy.

But, above the roaring noise which is always audible during a large conflagration, the highwaymen could detect something that sounded like distant shrieks.

The sound induced them all to pause, and Claude said:

"You heard those shrieks? Can any of you tell me where they came from?"

"Listen again," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Perhaps then we may make out."

This advice was followed, and then a cry, loud, clear, and piercing broke upon their ears.

At the same moment, one of the liberated prisoners ejaculated:

"Look there—look there! Oh, this is terrible!"

He pointed as he spoke towards the burning building, from which the screams evidently proceeded.

Then they saw the dusky figure of a man appear upon the blazing, almost red-hot roof.

Desperation was in his every movement, and he continued to shriek madly for aid.

"It's Dr. Templeton!" exclaimed another of the patients, and even as he spoke he shrunk back, for, even under these circumstances, he could not control the fear which the sight of the doctor produced.

Before anyone had time to make another remark, a fresh object of interest presented itself.

Bounding suddenly from somewhere, but from what point was impossible to tell, came another human form.

and this was instantly recognised as being that of the madman who had escaped.

It was not that they were so familiar with his countenance or general appearance—it was his insane, extraordinary actions that proclaimed his identity.

He laughed wildly and discordantly, clapping his hands with fiendish glee, and evidently straining every muscle to overtake Dr. Templeton.

Under the influence of terror, it was wonderful to see what speed the doctor made, and how he scrambled over the sloping roof, imploring aid continually.

But no aid was near.

Surely at that moment he must have felt that there was such a thing as retribution.

Was he not now receiving a due and proper punishment for the enormities and barbarities that had marked the whole of his career?

"Revenge!" shrieked the madman, in almost inarticulate tones—"revenge! I will be revenged upon you! I will tear your heart from your breast! I tell you I will have my revenge!"

And when he spoke these words, his efforts to catch the flying man were redoubled.

The roof of the asylum was irregular in shape, and in the centre there was a kind of belfry, in which hung the bell that had given forth the signal of alarm.

Oddly enough, it was towards this little belfry—if so it may be termed—that the terrified doctor made his way.

Why, no one could tell, for it was impossible that he could escape in that direction.

Probably enough, fear had deprived him of the proper use of his faculties.

It might have been that he was conscious only of one thing, and that was, that he was getting away from his mad pursuer.

All those below stood watching this strange spectacle with breathless interest.

They could do no more than be mere spectators.

Interference was altogether out of the question.

Yet so absorbed were they by what they saw, that it is questionable whether they would have been able to rush forward to the assistance of the doctor even if it had been possible.

At length one of the upright pieces of wood with which the belfry was supported was grasped by the terrified doctor.

Under the influence of intense terror, he pulled himself up higher and higher with a speed and agility that was wonderful to witness.

But when he got a certain height he was compelled to pause.

To climb higher up was impossible.

He made several frantic efforts, but failed.

Then, looking down below, he could see nothing but an immense pit of fire glowing white with intense heat.

At that time the interior of the asylum might have been compared to one huge, roaring furnace, and the belfry to the aperture at the top of it.

The heat that ascended was terrific.

But as yet no flames reached so high.

Despairingly, then, the doctor clung to the piece of timber, and then turned his haggard eyes towards his pursuer.

The exultation of the maniac now was wonderful to see, and manifested itself in a hundred different ways.

With great rapidity, as if he feared even then that his prey would escape him, he went climbing up towards the belfry, though destruction threatened him at every step.

Perceiving his assailant draw closer, the doctor, as a last hope, drew from his pocket a small knife, which he opened hastily, and held in a position to defend himself.

The sight of the knife seemed to infuriate the maniac still more, and with one sudden prodigious bound he reached the doctor.

He clung convulsively to him—so tightly that it was a thousand wonders the doctor was able to withstand the sudden strain.

But finding himself in the grasp of his foe, Dr. Templeton stabbed madly with his knife in all directions.

Yet it could not be perceived that the blows produced the least effect.

Higher and higher rose the maniac, and at last, with a yell of triumph, he seized his adversary by the throat.

Then commenced a furious struggle that was full of horror to look at.

For a moment or two the object of the maniac could not be understood.

But it was quickly perceived that his intention was to push the doctor over the edge of the belfry, and cause him to fall down into the midst of the fire that was raging below.

This was the fate that stared the doctor in the face, and he strove hard to escape from it.

His efforts, however, all went for nothing.

So far as physical strength went, the maniac was by far his superior.

Little by little he felt himself pushed closer and closer and further and further over the dreadful abyss.

He clung frantically to everything that presented the least opportunity for grasping.

But in spite of all he found that he was slowly and surely going.

His shrieks and cries for mercy could now only be indistinctly heard, owing to the tightness with which his foe compressed his neck.

Further and further he went back, so far that the dreadful consciousness was fully before his mind that he could not by any possibility recover his balance—that he must of necessity fall headlong backwards into the flames that were already scorching him with their fierce heat.

It was just then that, unable to maintain his grasp upon the woodwork any longer, the wretched man seized hold, instead, of his opponent.

It seemed as though at this last moment that the lost senses of the maniac returned to him.

At any rate, judging by appearances, he awoke to a sense of his own danger.

He endeavoured to retreat to save himself.

But the doctor, knowing that his own doom was certain, resolved to drag the cause of it down to destruction along with him.

There then ensued a momentary struggle.

It was over almost while one might draw a breath, and then, with a rush, the surgeon and the maniac disappeared, plunging like huge stones into the fire below.

After that the flames shot up with redoubled vigour.

The belfry was instantly set light to, and blazed brilliantly.

Only for a little while, however, for the weight of the bell inside dragged it down.

How long that little group of persons might have stood watching the progress of the flames is hard to say, had not the attention of Claude Duval been attracted by the approach of persons from a distance.

It was rather strange that such a huge conflagration had not brought people to the spot at an earlier moment.

But the fact was, the asylum stood far away from any other human habitations, and was in a lonely, retired portion of the country.

The red reflection in the sky had indeed been witnessed by persons many miles off, who, with what speed they could, had hastened to the scene of destruction.

These were they whom Claude heard, and almost immediately afterwards there came a loud clanging upon the bell.

They had arrived at the gate, and were giving that summons for admission.

It was not likely that any notice would be taken of it, so in a little while the ringing ceased, and a furious banging noise commenced.

The three highwaymen drew closer together, and then Claude exclaimed, in a whisper:

"I'm afraid now we've got ourselves into an awkward fix. How shall we account for our presence here, or how shall we manage to get away unseen?"

"That's more than I can tell you," replied Tom. "The brilliant light of this fire would discover us in a moment if we attempted to scale the wall."

"Yes, yes—I know that."

"Yet," said Sixteen-String Jack, "it is quite certain that we must escape somehow or other; how, I am at a loss to think."

Just then there was a loud and startling crash.

"They have broken down the gates," said Claude Duval. "I should not have thought such a feat possible. Now nothing can save us from discovery."

CHAPTER DUCCII.

THE HIGHWAYMEN SUCCEED IN MAKING GOOD THEIR ESCAPE FROM THE LUNATIC ASYLUM.

"PUT a bold face on the matter," exclaimed Tom King; "that, rely upon it, is the best and only thing we can do."

His words were succeeded by a nasty trampling of footsteps, and soon a large number of persons assembled.

They looked upon the highwaymen and the liberated prisoners with surprise.

"Can you tell us anything about this fire?" said one. "It seems we have come too late to be of service."

"Yes," said Claude Duval, stepping forward; "the fire has got such a hold upon the building that we can do nothing more than stand by and see it burn."

"But who are you, sir?"

"I, sir, and these others," replied Claude Duval, "have by great good luck succeeded in effecting our escape; we have saved our lives, but nothing else beyond."

The appearance of the party gave confirmation to Claude's words.

Their apparel was sadly singed, and their hands and faces blackened by smoke; in fact, so far as the highwaymen were concerned, a total change had taken place in their exterior appearance, and it was this that gave Claude the confidence to stand forward as he did.

"Are there any other persons within the building?" was the next inquiry.

"We fear so—nay, indeed, we may go so far as to say that we are sure of it. It is a melancholy circumstance, but by this time they must have perished, for we had great difficulty in escaping with our lives."

The crowd of persons kept continually augmenting, and the three highwaymen continued gradually to withdraw.

In doing this they had but little difficulty, for all the new-comers were anxious to push themselves into the front rank, and our friends allowed themselves to be thrust aside without offering the least resistance.

When they were nearer to the outskirts, Tom said:

"I think now, comrades, we cannot do better than avail ourselves of the opportunity to slip away."

"I think the same."

"The gates are standing invitingly open," he added, "and we shall be there in no time."

"But how about those persons we have liberated?" said Sixteen-String Jack.

"It does not matter for them," was the answer; "we have got separated from them."

"True, there are none here."

"Well, they will all doubtless be able to return to their friends."

"Of course they will; and therefore we need trouble ourselves no further about them."

"But this girl, what are we to do with her?"

"We can't leave her here, Tom," said Claude, "friendless and unprotected as she is."

"No, no—I could not think of it."

"She seems to me to be quite alone in the world."

"She does," said Tom; "and I would give much if I could learn her history. I feel certain it is full of circumstances of strange interest."

"No doubt—no doubt."

"Shall I tell you what I propose?"

"Yes, certainly."

"I think you will give your consent. It is that we take the girl along with us back to the inn."

Claude and Jack were silent.

"I don't know what the captain would think of it," said the former; "that place, you know, was to be kept quite secret."

"Very true," was the reply; "but then this girl has no idea who we are. I am quite certain she never guesses our profession; she looks upon us only as her liberators, and you may rely upon it that from her at least we have nothing to fear in the way of betrayal."

"Well, Tom, do as you will; at any rate, it is necessary that we should make up our minds quickly, for unless we are very speedy we shall not reach the inn by the time appointed."

"We must contrive to do that, somehow or other, Claude. Quick!—you lead the way, and I will carry this poor girl and follow you. Our horses have had a good rest, and will perform the journey home at a rapid rate"

"Very true, there's that to be said."

At a rapid pace the three highwaymen made their way to the place where their horses had been left.

They found them perfectly safe, and a few moments enabled them to make all preparations and to mount.

They seated themselves firmly in the saddle, Tom King supporting the young girl, in whom he felt a deep interest, in his arms.

One last look was then given at the asylum that had been the scene of so many strange adventures in such a short space of time.

The fury of the conflagration was now much abated; the fire was going out for lack of material to feed upon.

"That's the end," said Tom King. "We can say farewell to that place, I suppose. It seems pretty clear that the two doctors and keepers of that infamous place have perished in its ruins. If they have, I for one shall certainly not regret it."

"Nor I either."

"No more words," said Jack. "I feel certain we cannot make too much speed. Forward, comrades—forward!"

Remembering the particular engagement they had made, this suggestion was at once complied with.

After a hard gallop, they took their way in the direction of the public-house.

The journey, though a long one, was performed without accident, and without the occurrence of any event worthy of mention.

At last, according to preconcerted arrangement, they drew up at some distance from the inn.

Morning had not yet dawned, and they began to look with some impatience and anxiety for the expected signals.

More than once during the ride Tom had fancied that his companion showed signs of returning consciousness, and now he found that he had not been mistaken.

Slowly and heavily her eyes unclosed, and a shudder swept over her whole body.

She recoiled for a moment, feeling herself in the embrace of some one.

But she immediately afterwards grew quite calm again.

Tears sprang to her eyes, and she endeavoured to look around and ascertain what kind of place it was that she was in.

She was soon aware that danger was over.

"Oh, then, you are saved!" she said, in tones of great relief. "I feared you would be destroyed. I tried my best to save you, but my strength failed."

"Tried to save me?" said Tom, in some surprise. "How—in what manner?"

"I knew that you had gone down into the lower portions of the house in order to set the other prisoners at liberty. You, I could tell, did not want to have me with you; yet, after you were out of my sight, the feeling of security I had previously felt departed, and I was impelled to follow in your footsteps."

"And did you so?"

"I did; I reached the top of the flight of stairs, and remained there for some time listening; then I descended and remained at the foot, trembling, and too frightened to advance any further."

"I had no idea of this. What else has happened?"

"I saw that furious man approaching, and by instinct turned and fled. I was fleeter of foot than he, but, then, as you know, he stopped to fasten the doors, and I thought to myself I would draw aside and let him pass, and then undo the doors again and set you at liberty. But after he had closed the door at the top flight of steps he saw me. With an angry cry he rushed at me, and raised his arm in the air. After that I remembered nothing until I opened my eyes and found myself here."

"We are safe," said Tom, "and so are you, though we had no idea that you had been in so much danger. Wait a little while, and all shall be explained."

Exclamations at this moment escaped the lips of Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack.

The reason was that at this moment they perceived the rocket rise up into the air.

Its appearance in the intense darkness was very beautiful.

The young girl watched it with mingled surprise and delight.

Another and another followed, and then Tom King set his steed in motion.

"Whither are you taking me?" she asked, looking searchingly into his countenance.

"To the only place of refuge that I know of," was the answer. "Yet I feel sure you will be safe. You will find there others of your own sex, and you are welcome to remain until you can collect your thoughts sufficiently to know what should be the next step you should take."

"Alas—alas!" cried the young girl, in a plaintive voice, as though these words had brought back to her mind some very painful recollections—"alas—alas!"

Then she burst into a flood of tears of such violence that Tom was alarmed at it.

He judged the best thing he could do was to make all the speed he could, and give her into the charge of Maud and Ellen.

A few minutes served to bring them to the front of the inn, and there was rather a large party waiting them.

"Thank goodness, you are safe!" ejaculated Dick as soon as he perceived them. "I began to grow terribly apprehensive."

"Have you been waiting long, captain?"

"No; I have only just arrived."

"Well, then," said Claude, "I suppose the reason of it is that you took up a position much nearer to the inn than we did. However, you see that we are all quite safe, and have returned with an addition to our numbers."

There was a sudden movement, and Ellen appeared.

She looked keenly and wonderingly at Tom and his companions, and then, with many signs of confusion, drew back again.

"I will explain all about it, captain, in a few moments," said Tom; "but certainly to-night we have not only had some most extraordinary adventures, but we have performed a vast amount of good."

"I rejoice to hear it!"

"Come—come," cried Tom Davis, "indoors, all of you, as quickly as you like; it is not safe to be standing here in this manner. Why, bless us all," he ejaculated, as he caught sight of the three highwaymen, "you look as though you had been drawn through a furnace!"

CHAPTER DCCCIII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS PAY A THIRD VISIT TO THE INN, TO THE GREAT CONSTERNATION OF TOM DAVIS.

CLAUDE DUVAL uttered a few words of hasty explanation to Tom Davis to account for the sad plight they were all in, but the recital of their adventures was reserved for another opportunity.

Of course eager questions were asked respecting the police officers, and the intelligence given was gratifying in the extreme.

That weight seemed to be removed from their breasts altogether.

The young girl, who gave her name as Alice Whately was resigned to the charge of Maud and Ellen, while the highwaymen attended to their steeds.

When that duty was over, a hasty meal was partaken of, and then Dick said:

"We will just sit here and exchange accounts of our proceedings, and then to rest; we cannot do better than sleep while we have the opportunity."

"You speak as though you feared an interruption, Dick."

"No—not at all; but, then, as the officers have troubled us once, they may do so again, and in case of such a thing, let us be prepared."

"Sound policy!" exclaimed Tom King, who thereupon related to Dick the various events which have been set at full length before the reader.

It is unnecessary to give the comments upon this narrative nor upon the one given by Dick Turpin himself.

On all sides, however, the liveliest curiosity and interest were felt in the young girl, who was now thoroughly exhausted and worn down by the fatiguing nature of the scenes through which she had gone.

After such a long period of excitement it was only natural that a reaction should come.

The highwaymen then retired to rest, and the inn was, as usual, left in charge of Tom Davis.

The hours wore on calmly and serenely enough until about mid-day.

A commotion outside then took Ellen to the door of the inn.

A pang of alarm shot through her heart, for she saw a large throng of police officers.

There could be no mistaking their peculiar costume.

What could have brought them again so soon to the lonely inn was a mystery, and Ellen felt dizzy and faint as she asked herself the question.

Her face turned ashy pale, and she had to lean against the doorpost to support herself.

The officers rapidly dismounted, and one advancing, said:

"Well, my lass, you are surprised to see us back again, no doubt, but here we are, you see. Where's the landlord?"

Ellen scarcely knew what reply to make.

But just then, fortunately, Tom Davis appeared behind her.

"Good day to you," said the officer, with a grin—"good day!"

"You're back again early," said Tom Davis, pretending to be vastly pleased at this visit. "How is it?"

"Mum," said the officer, attempting to put on an intelligent look, but signally failing. "You shall know more about it presently."

"Shall all of you stop?" asked Davis. "Because if so——"

"Oh, I know—I know!" interrupted the officer. "You would say you would put the horses in the stable. There's no occasion for the trouble at all. I don't intend to stop, so if you will show my men where to find some hay, we shall do very well."

"All right," said Davis—"you shall have some at once. Will you walk in?"

"Yes, certainly!"

The officer stepped briskly enough into the inn, followed by the whole of his men except one, who was left in charge of the horses.

"Nell," cried Davis, "just attend to these gentlemen for a moment, will you, and I will go and fetch the hay. It will not take me a moment."

While speaking, he bolted out into the yard, and, having reached the stable containing the highwaymen's horses, he hastily turned the key in the lock, and put it in his pocket.

After that he felt easier, and presently returned, bringing with him a quantity of hay.

This was given to the horses, and then, feeling very ill at ease, Tom Davis made his way to the room where the officers were seated.

These continued visits, he felt certain, boded no good to him.

It was ridiculous to suppose that the officers would act in such a manner without they had some motive.

As he passed into the room, Ellen left it.

He had no need to make any sign to her—he was quite certain she would go at once and warn the highwaymen of their danger.

If they kept out of the way, all might be well.

This incident impressed Tom all the more with the importance of having some secret mode by which the inn could be rapidly left, and he mentally determined that this should be set about at the very first opportunity.

The officers, who were for the most part those who had called on the preceding evening, pretended to be quite overjoyed to see him.

The one in command asked him to be seated, and offered him a portion of the ale he was drinking

Tom sipped it, and then put the jug down.

"I can tell you are surprised to see us again," said the chief officer, rubbing his hands slowly together; "but we did enjoy ourselves here last night uncommon, and I won't say that that has nothing to do with our visit this morning."

"Well," said Davis, "I am always very glad to see you whenever you like to honour this inn with your presence, and particularly glad to see you on the present occasion."

"I know you are," said the chief officer—"you speak hearty, as if you meant it."

"I do; but surely you have some business that brings you this way?"

"Well, I have, and I don't mind giving you an inkling of what it is; you may be able to render us a service, and to put some money into your pocket as well."

"Those would be two very agreeable things to do," said Tom Davis. "How am I to proceed?"

"Well, listen."

"I am all attention."

"I needn't tell you then," said the chief officer, "that our chief duty now is to look after those four highwaymen who for so long have made the roads a terror to travellers, and who have thoroughly set at defiance the authority of the country."

Tom nodded, and looked very wise and very interested.

"I allude," said the chief officer sipping his ale, "to Dick Turpin, that's one—Tom King, that's two—Claude Duval, that's three—and Sixteen-String Jack, that's four."

He counted them off upon his fingers while he spoke.

"Yes, I have heard of them all," said Tom Davis.

"Well, you will soon hear no more."

"Indeed!" said Tom, misgivingly, for he fancied the words were uttered with a certain significance of tone and manner.

"Yes," said the chief officer, "I have taken this in hand, and there will soon be an end of them."

"I hope so," said Tom Davis, "with all my heart—it really is not safe to lie in one's bed!"

"Certainly not. But did you ever hear of a police officer named Wriggles?"

"Wriggles—Wriggles," repeated Davis, as if endeavouring to call the name to his memory.

"Yes, you must surely have heard of him—he was the chief officer—a stout man with a purple face."

"I think I can remember," said Tom, at length, "but yet I can't take upon myself to say for certain; but what of him?"

"Well, as I said, he was the chief officer a little while ago, and he tried many a scheme in the hopes of being able to capture these four highwaymen; he even succeeded but the success was only partial."

"How so?" said Davis.

"Why, he caught 'em, but couldn't keep 'em. Now you'll just see the difference between him and me."

"You say was," said Tom Davis. "Is he chief officer no longer?"

"No; he's resigned. When I say resigned, I hope you will understand me properly."

"As how?"

"Why, he had two chances—one was to resign, and the other was to be dismissed, and so he chose the former."

"Oh, indeed!"

"And furious he was, I can tell you. But he had set his mind upon capturing these highwaymen, and tried everything in his power to do it, and I don't believe it was his fault that he failed."

"And, then, perhaps, if I may make so bold as to guess such a thing," said Tom Davis, "you have been appointed in his place?"

"That's it, my Trojan—you've hit the right nail bang on the head this time! You know me now—Chief Police Officer Marshall—my name is Jack Marshall, and let all highwaymen beware!"

He kicked his hat, and looked very ferocious while he spoke.

"D—n me!" he exclaimed, "I'll make them all tremble at my very name, I will—the very pronunciation of my name shall make them all tremble, and their knees knock together so that they will be unable to stand!"

Tom Davis contemplated him with great admiration.

"You'll make your fortune!" he cried. "And if you should capture these highwaymen——"

"If!" shouted Jack Marshall—"if, do you say? Say, instead, when I have captured these highwaymen, for do it I shall, as certainly as I am here!"

"Well, well—it comes much to the same thing; but when it is done, you may depend you'll get a very handsome testimonial presented to you."

"Of course I shall, and be sooperaniated as well. That'll be the time, and it won't be long in coming either!"

"I hope not," said Tom Davis. "I took a liking to you the very first time I saw you. You have such a pleasant countenance and such very agreeable ways. I shall be downright glad to hear of your getting on."

"Give us your hand, Mr. Thomas!" said Marshall. "There, now we are friends, and I'll just put you in for a capital good thing."

"I am much obliged to you."

"Oh, don't mention it! But I may tell you that my express and sole instructions are that I am to devote the whole of my time to the capture of these highwaymen. You see, altogether, there is a reward of about three thousand pounds offered for them—a nice little lump that would be to pick up and divide amongst ten or a dozen, wouldn't it?"

"It would," said Tom Davis, leaning forward in his eager interest.

"I rather believe you! And we will have it, for I have certain information that there is a secret lurking-place where these highwaymen go to if ever they are pursued, and where they remain hidden in the daytime—a very singular secret place, but it's secret no longer, for I know of it. Now, what do you think of that?"

CHAPTER DCCCIV.

THE ECCENTRIC AND INEXPLICABLE BEHAVIOUR OF JACK MARSHALL, THE NEW CHIEF OFFICER, CAUSES TOM DAVIS A GREAT DEAL OF UNEASINESS.

JACK MARSHALL brought his hand down with great force upon the table, so as to give a due emphasis to his words, and as he spoke he looked keenly into the countenance of Tom Davis.

It might be that our old friend changed colour a little upon receipt of this astounding announcement.

If so, who could wonder at it?

But he stood the shock bravely, and when the first surprise was over, he pretended to be very much astonished and gratified at the same time.

"Really," he said, "I had no idea of any such thing."

Jack Marshall only grinned.

He stroked his chin with a complacent air.

"But — but," said Tom, hesitatingly, "perhaps you wouldn't mind giving me a little further information?"

"Oh, no—certainly not—not by any means!"

"Then whereabouts is the lurking-place situated?"

"Eh?"

"I say where is it situated?"

Jack Marshall wagged his head backwards and forwards in a very knowing way, and grinned again.

"That," he said, at length, with great deliberation, "is an important secret—a very important secret."

"I thought you said it was no secret at all?"

"Oh, yes, my friend, if you will permit me to call you my friend."

"Oh, by all means," said Tom Davis, growing more and more uneasy every moment. "I feel much flattered."

The chief officer cocked his hat, and drank some more of the ale.

"Wait a little, Mr. Thomas," he said, "and then you will see! I only ask you to wait a little—that's all!"

"But I say!"

"What?"

"I consider you are rather disappointing."

"Why so?"

"Did you not tell me that you were willing to put me in for a good thing by telling me something about these four highwaymen?"

[TOM KING ARRIVES WITH HIS CHARGE AT THE RESIDENCE OF THE YOUNG BARRISTER.]

"Yes, and I will be as good as my word!"

"Then what was it? I thought you were going to tell me whereabouts this suspected lurking-place was situated."

"Oh, no, no—not at all!" and Jack Marshall laughed heartily, as though he had said something very jocular indeed. "The fact is, my dear friend, becoming more confidential, I don't know myself yet where the lurking-place is situated."

"Oh!" interrupted Tom Davis, sinking back into his chair and uttering a sigh of relief.

"But I know there is one," continued the officer, "and that knowledge will be quickly followed up by my finding out where it is. Of course, the moment I know, I shall be there upon the spot—you might make certain of that!"

"Oh, yes, of course—of course!" said Tom Davis, now speaking quite freely.

"But I shall go about it in a peculiar way," continued the officer—"in my own peculiar way, you see. Now, if I was to go there, after having found it out, I should never be suspected, I am sure. But suppose, now, that it should be at some public-house?"

Tom Davis endeavoured to laugh, but failed.

"Not a very likely place," he managed to say, at length.

"Well, perhaps so—perhaps not—that all depends. But I say, supposing it was? Will you grant it for the sake of argument?"

"Most certainly!"

"Then I should walk in just as I might have walked in here this morning, and I'll be bound to say that no one would guess or suspect my errand."

"You are a very clever fellow!" said Tom Davis. "I don't go behind your back to say it, and I don't want to flatter you, but I utter it as my downright candid sentiment."

"There, now, I know it," said Jack Marshall. "I feel affected—deeply affected! But don't you want to know about this little affair between us?"

"I am most impatient."

"Well, then, in the first place, take this paper."

He fumbled in his pockets, and then produced a packet of folded papers.

One of these he spread out smooth on the table, and then began slowly to read it.

The heading of the bill was startling enough in all conscience, for in large type was displayed "Three thousand pounds reward!"

Then under that was set forth a number of particulars, showing by whom the reward had been offered.

Some by different private persons who had been robbed, and some by the Government, the whole representing the gross amount that was put in such large figures at the top.

Then came a very full and very accurate description of all four highwaymen.

The state of Tom's feelings while he listened to the reading of this bill may perhaps be imagined.

Having finished, Jack Marshall said:

"Now, then, all you have to do is to keep these particulars in your mind, and if any person or persons should enter this house whose appearance agrees with that description, seize upon them at once, and keep them prisoners. You shall then be entitled to the largest share of the reward, only, as I put you up to it, I shall expect you to remember me."

"Oh, of course—of course!" said Tom Davis. "I won't fail to do that!"

"Then, in case you should forget any of it," he added, "I'll stick this bill up—not only for your advantage, but for the advantage of everyone else."

"Oh, don't take the trouble," said Tom. "I'll stick it up when you've gone."

"Oh, it's no trouble—no trouble at all—in fact, it's a real pleasure! There, now! That's just the ticket, isn't it?"

The bill was stuck up over the mantelpiece in such a manner that the large black letters seemed to stare Tom in the face continually.

It made him quite uncomfortable and uneasy to look at it.

Yet what could he do?—how could he protest against what the officer had done without giving rise to suspicions?

"There, now," he said, "on no account suffer that to be removed. You see that several things are necessary before we can claim the whole amount. All four must not only be captured, but they must be lodged in Newgate. Then they must be convicted—not that I suppose there will be any difficulty about that—and then executed at Tyburn. After that the money will be ours."

"Hurrah!" said Tom. "If that's the case, you shall all have such a feast here some night as you never heard of in your lives before!"

"Well," said Jack Marshall, "we've stopped here long enough, I think, so now I am off to look out for the lurking-place. I am on the right scent, I know; and it won't be very long before I find it out!"

"I hope not," said Tom, "though, at the same time, if they would all four be so kind and obliging as to walk in here, I should feel much better satisfied, for I could take them prisoners myself."

"No doubt you would—no doubt! But I don't intend that you should have all the credit to yourself."

From the way in which the police officer now looked about him, Tom Davis began to be dreadfully apprehensive that he would ask to go over the premises and make an inspection of them.

Such a request was just as likely to be made as not, and, if made, he could not refuse it, and then discovery would follow.

He remained, therefore, in the most dreadful state of suspense conceivable.

At a sign from their leader, the police officers all emptied their cups and prepared to leave.

Seeing them inclined to go towards the door, Tom Davis led the way.

"I am very glad you've called," he said. "I can't help thinking a great deal about all you have told me, and as I know one of these highwaymen came here once, why they might take it into their heads to pay me another visit."

"Certainly they might! And I'll tell you another thing, friend Thomas," said the officer, seizing him by the button-hole, and sinking his voice, "it's my deliberate conviction that the highwaymen's lurking-place is not very far from this spot!"

These words were uttered in so peculiar a tone, and with such significance of manner, and were accompanied by such a strange, searching look that Tom Davis felt as uneasy as ever.

Nevertheless, he had presence of mind enough to affect to be astonished at what had just been told him.

The officer nodded, and smiled, and winked his eyes, and made several other manifestations of sagaciousness as he walked along the passage towards the front door of the inn.

Here they emerged, and then a scene of considerable bustle ensued.

In a short time, however, all the officers were mounted, and they, as well as their horses, seemed all the better for the hospitality they had received at the Three Spiders Inn.

"Good-bye, Mr. Thomas!" said Jack Marshall, waving his hand. "I shall call again upon you before long—perhaps when you least expect me; however, I feel sure of being always welcome. Good-bye—good-bye!"

So saying, he waved his hand and trotted off, followed by his troop.

Tom Davis stood near the horse-trough in front of the inn, and watched them down the road.

In a short time they completely disappeared in the cloud of dust that they kicked up behind them, and when he could see them no more our old friend retraced his steps to the inn with a very thoughtful expression upon his face.

"It means no good," he said—"it means no good! That Jack Marshall is by no means such a fool as he pretends to be. He's got something in his head, or he would not act in this singular fashion."

Entering the kitchen, he found the highwaymen and Ellen already there.

They were standing in front of the fireplace, all busily engaged in reading the bill that had just been left.

"There," said Tom Davis, as soon as he saw what they were about, "pull it down—pull it down, I beg, and put it behind the fire; I can't bear to look at it!"

Dick laughed.

"It can do no harm by being there," he said; "let it remain."

"Are you mad, captain?"

"Not at all; but if you remove the bill suspicion will be aroused at once, and therefore, rely upon it, the better policy will be to allow it to remain. There—there, say no more about it, and suffer it to trouble you no more."

Tom Davis flung himself into a chair in anything but a contented manner, and then he ejaculated:

"I tell you what it is, captain, you can take my word for it this kind of life won't last—there now!"

CHAPTER DCCCV.

SOME VERY INTERESTING EVENTS TAKE PLACE AT THE THREE SPIDERS INN.

"Don't be so despondent, Tom," said Dick Turpin. "After all, there may be nothing alarming in all that has taken place."

"Alarming!" echoed the landlord. "You don't know half about it, or you wouldn't say that!"

"Indeed!" said Dick, quickly. "I ought to have asked you before to have given me the particulars. I thought, as the officers had left so quietly, that all was well."

"You shall draw your own conclusions," said Tom Davis. "I will tell you as well as I am able what has passed between us."

Tom was as good as his word.

He exaggerated nothing, but gave a very faithful account of everything that had taken place.

It was not so much in the words themselves that had passed as in the peculiar way with which certain words were uttered, and the significant glances that accompanied them.

"This may be serious after all," said Dick Turpin, when he had concluded "but yet I am inclined to believe that there is no cause for immediate fear."

"I am inclined to think with you, captain," said Claude Duval. "Still, we had better take all this as a warning."

"Decidedly!" said Dick.

"And that brings me round again to my former suggestion," interrupted Tom Davis.

"What was that?"

"Have you forgotten?"

"I don't remember just for the moment to what you allude."

"Well, then, to the construction of some secret mode of leaving the inn."

"Oh, yes—good—very good! That's an excellent idea of yours, and it shall be carried out!"

"Without delay!" said Tom Davis, emphatically.

"Yes, without delay, most certainly. We will commence upon it as soon as ever we have had a little rest."

"We are all agreed to that," said the highwaymen, speaking together; "but we are all thoroughly worn out."

"Of course you are," said Tom Davis; "and I want a bit of a snooze myself."

"Well, then, take it, for, depend upon it, now is as safe a time as any, and Ellen can keep good watch."

"She can, and will apprize us in a moment if anything goes wrong."

"Well, then," cried Dick Turpin, "we may as well, all of us, keep this before our minds; if we do so we shall be all the better able to deliberate upon it. Of course, the first point to be decided is where the passage shall be constructed, and how."

"Just so," said Tom Davis. "I have been turning it over in my mind ever since the idea first occurred to me; I will let you know the result of my thoughts when we meet again."

"Do so—do so."

The highwaymen then, without further ado, separated, for the adventures they had had during the preceding night were of a most fatiguing description.

To this probably may be attributed the coolness with which they received Tom Davis's communication respecting the police officers.

For several hours, then, all remained very silent in the old inn.

Ellen busied herself with the domestic duties, and from time to time went to the front door of the inn and took a searching glance around.

But on all occasions the silence was as intense as any silence in such a place could be.

The trees were rustling, and the birds chirping, but that was all.

It was a most delightful day, and to look around up the beautiful scene—where not another human habitation or trace of man's presence could be seen—would be enough to imagine one's-self upon an uninhabited island.

As it grew towards dusk, the highwaymen, one by one, made their appearance in the old kitchen.

Tom King was the first to descend, and his first inquiry was with respect to Alice Whately, the young girl he had brought with him from the asylum.

He was told that she would descend shortly, her intentions being to thank those who had so generously liberated her.

Tom nodded his head, and then, addressing his companion, said:

"Let this be borne in mind: she at present has had no reason to suppose that we are what we are; she simply looks upon us as strangers, who, having by accident heard her cries for succour, have set her free."

"And you would like her to remain in that ignorance of our profession?" said Dick Turpin.

"Yes, certainly. Why should we acquaint her with it?"

"I see no reason why; do just as you think proper."

At this moment Maud entered, accompanied by the fair stranger.

Short as had been her sojourn at the inn, yet a great improvement had been wrought in her appearance.

Lovely, Tom had from the first thought her, but now she was, in good truth, surpassingly beautiful.

His heart throbbed strangely as she crossed the threshold, and when, upon catching sight of him, she, by a sudden impulse, bounded forward, clasped him by the hands, and poured out her thanks in broken words, he found himself unable to speak or move.

At length, however, he managed to murmur:

"I can speak for myself and my comrades, and say that all we have done has been in a most willing spirit, and now all that we desire is to know where we can take you to a place of safety."

Upon hearing these words, a troubled look came over the fair girl's countenance, and she fixed her eyes upon the ground.

Tom gazed upon her in surprise, and although she could not see this, yet she seemed by some means aware of it, for her agitation visibly increased.

"Sit down," he said—"sit down and regain your composure."

He handed her to a seat while he spoke, and she sat down gladly.

"She has told me a little of her history," said Maud, "and she is in great trouble, and quite undecided how to act, therefore I have persuaded her to tell you all, and be guided entirely by you."

"We will do our best," said Dick Turpin, warmly, and not without some surprise; "and if a strong arm and a willing heart can be of any service, let me assure you that both are at your disposal."

For this offer the young girl again expressed her thanks, and Tom King pressed her to confide her troubles without reserve, assuring her that the confidence should be kept sacred.

"I have persuaded her to this course," said Maud, "because I know that in her present state it will be a great relief to pour out all her heart, and to be guided by the calm judgment of others."

"It is troubling you very greatly," said the young girl, with tears in her eyes; "but you have been so very kind to me, that I know not how it is I hesitate still. If you would only tell me how you should act if in my place, then I should feel more satisfied; for my own part I am quite perplexed."

"Compose yourself," said Dick, "and then begin to tell us calmly. Tom," he added, addressing Davis, "close the door, and take care that we are not interrupted."

Tom King seated himself near the fair stranger—very near indeed, and she seemed by no means annoyed at his behaviour.

Ellen, standing in the background, watched him with a jealous eye.

Unknown almost to herself until that moment, she had looked upon Tom King with the eyes of love, though he had never yet taken a more particular notice of her than the rest.

Now, however, she felt full of anger and vexation.

It was clear that Tom King had neither eyes nor ears for anything else than this young girl, and he waited with the utmost expectation depicted in his features for her to commence her history.

In this respect it might be said that all were alike curious.

After the door was closed there was a complete silence, and the young girl, after one or two attempts, commenced to speak in a wavering, uncertain voice, which gradually grew stronger as she proceeded with her recital.

Every now and then, however, tears would spring up into her eyes, and her voice grow choked and indistinct.

"Until about twelve months ago," she began—"the length of time that I have been confined in that asylum—I have lived at Morton Park, the residence of my father and mother, and the place where I was born.

"Up to my fourteenth year, life to me was nothing but a round of joy and happiness; it was not marked by one extraordinary event—I had never known what sorrow was.

"But at that time I was made rudely and terribly familiar with it.

"My father—who always loved me, and who doated upon me with such rare affection that I have known my mother to be half jealous—was at that time thrown from his horse while riding homeward, and was killed.

"The first intelligence that I received of it was seeing a crowd of people standing round the spot where he had fallen.

"I had expected his return, and, according to my custom, had gone forth to meet him.

"Guessing something was amiss, yet not knowing what, I bounded quickly forward, pushed the throng aside, then looking down, beheld a dreadful sight.

"It was a wonder that I was not then and there deprived of all sensibility, for I had never looked upon death before; yet, stranger as I was to it, there was no mistaking the appearance of my poor father's face—it had upon it an expression that told you at once that he was dead.

"I remember that I cried out frantically with grief, and flung myself upon him.

"We were both carried to the hall, and I was restored to recollection.

"I cannot bear to think of that dreadful time—it was the beginning of all my future troubles.

"Let me say that after the lapse of the usual time my father was interred, and my mother and myself grew more resigned to our sad lot.

"My mother's grief was in good truth most terrible to witness. Its violence so alarmed and shocked me, that I almost forgot grief myself.

"It was long ere she could be soothed and calmed, for, as I had lost the best of fathers, so she had lost the best of husbands."

CHAPTER DCCCVI.

ALICE WHATELY TAKES OUR FRIENDS INTO HER CONFIDENCE.

THE emotions produced by this vivid recallment of the past at this moment completely overcame the young girl, and, burying her face in her hands, she wept bitterly.

But dashing her tears aside as quickly as possible, she resumed, for she could tell by the expression upon the countenances of her auditors that they were most anxious to hear more.

"After my father's death it was indeed a sad and weary life that we led at Morton Park.

"Before her widowhood I had often heard my mother say that no circumstances whatever should induce her to wed again, and after her bereavement she frequently repeated the same words.

"At that time I have no doubt she fully believed what she said.

"And so the time passed on for upwards of two years, we in the meantime dwelling in the strictest seclusion.

"So far, my mother kept her word. She went out nowhere, and those few visitors we had were not of those likely to be suitors for her hand.

"During the third year, however, I noticed several strange things in the behaviour of Mr. Lucas, who, I should have told you, was my father's steward, and had been almost as long as I could remember.

"He was a sleek, fat, oily little man, with a bald head, and small, insignificant features. His eyes, however, being always bright and twinkling, insensibly reminded the beholder of the eyes of a serpent.

"He was always most cringing and fawning—so much so, that he invariably excited my disgust, and I could never bear to accost him; if I saw him at a distance I always made a turn and avoided him.

"He could not have failed to notice my aversion, for his sharp eyes saw everything.

"He took no notice, however, without it was that he became more cringing and fawning than before.

"To my mother he was even more servile, and every time he moved or said 'Yes' it seemed as though he added, 'If you will tread upon me I am quite ready to lie down and let you.'

"But, as I told you, about three years after my poor father's death I began to see a great change in his deportment.

"He held himself more upright than he used to do, and spoke in louder and more commanding tones.

"On one occasion, for some trifling offence, he spoke to me somewhat sharply.

"I resented it, and soon there was a perfect quarrel between us—if so I may term it.

"Weeping with rage and mortification, I sought my mother, and made my complaint to her.

"To my surprise, she took no notice of it, but, on the contrary, reproved me, and told me to behave better to Mr. Lucas in future.

"I was not long in finding out what this meant.

"By some means or other, this steward had gained a great influence over my mother, and at last it was publicly announced that he was about to marry her.

"To me the bare idea of a second marriage was most detestable, and as soon as I heard of it I expressed my feelings with great warmth.

"With more anger in her manner than I had ever before seen her display, my mother ordered me from her room.

"I was all the time inclined to be rebellious, but my rebellion made no difference.

"Before the third year had expired my mother became Mrs. Lucas.

"Then, indeed, did I find that a change had taken place in my condition!

"Mine was no longer the happy life that it had been.

"Mr. Lucas, however, was some time before he could quite throw off the manners of the servant and assume those of the master.

"But as soon as ever he did so the whole household felt the change.

"To my mother he was, on all occasions that I saw, tender and respectful.

"Frequently, however, I observed them in close and earnest consultation, and, from the glances which they now and then cast upon me, I guessed I was the subject of their conferences.

"This gave me no uneasiness, for, since her marriage, my heart had quite turned against my only surviving parent.

"I could not help it—the feeling was one altogether beyond my own control, and she made no attempts to conciliate my affection.

"Moreover, I had other matters occupying my time and my thoughts.

"On one occasion, while visiting the cottage of a poor widow who I was in the habit of befriending, I met with a stranger, a young man, who was qualifying himself for the bar, but who had, by too close application to his studies, so much impaired his health that perfect rest in some quiet country place was stated to be indespensable to his recovery.

"I need not tell you how soon we began to feel an interest in each other, and for a long time the secret was kept from Mr. Lucas.

"I can scarcely tell you why it was, but somehow I always felt an instinctive dread of his becoming acquainted with Norman Spencer, for that was the young lawyer's name.

"Two unhappy events occurred close together.

"The time for his return to London came, and on the self-same day Mr. Lucas discovered our intimacy.

"He said nothing; but in the evening I was sharply reprimanded by my mother.

"I made no reply to what she said, and this incensed her greatly.

"By an easy means that we had arranged, Norman and myself frequently corresponded with each other.

"He was now full of health and vigour, and felt sure of being able in a short time to establish himself in his profession; then I had promised to become his bride."

Although the young girl confessed to all these details of love so freely, yet it was with a downcast look and a flushed cheek.

The expression of Tom King's countenance, however, had changed entirely.

He leaned back in his chair, looking vexed and disappointed.

Without any pause, however, Alice continued:

"My home was now made miserable in the extreme; and I thought the height of my wretchedness was reached when Mr. Lucas produced his nephew, or some one that he called by that title—a young man, pale, thin, and somewhat consumptive-looking, as one might say, with one foot in the grave, for all energy had gone, and his eyes only burned with a feverish light that was painful in the extreme to look upon.

'Against him, in himself, I have not much to say.

"He was weak-minded to a degree, and so wholly under the influence of Mr. Lucas, whose power over him was extraordinary.

"Poor young fellow, he had no will of his own, and scarcely any more brains than permitted him to do just exactly as he was told.

"To my extreme horror and astonishment, I was told that I was to regard this young man as my husband.

"I revolted at the idea, and expressed myself in the strongest terms that I would suffer anything rather than consent.

"Mr. Lucas was furious, but I was firm.

"How they would have acted in the face of my strong opposition and stern obstinacy I know not, but the current of events was altogether changed by the sudden illness of my mother.

"One day she took to her bed, complaining of some trifling indisposition, but she never rose from it again.

"In less than a week she died, and was buried.

"I ought to have told you earlier than this that my father left behind him considerable wealth, in the shape of money and landed property.

"The greater part was settled upon me—indeed, I might say all, with the exception of an annuity of five hundred pounds that was to be made payable to my mother during her life.

"Of course, as soon as she died the annuity died with her, she having no power to dispose of it to another person.

"This was an event which distressed me greatly, for, although of late my mother had treated me so unkindly, yet I could never forget who she was and what I owed her.

"Mr. Lucas, too, seemed quite as much distressed—rather more so, indeed—as I was, though from a totally different cause.

"Evidently things had not gone as he wished for and expected.

"I have never heard what was his exact plan of operations as laid down in his mind, but you may depend he had a deep motive in marrying my mother, for no love for anything but himself could have any hold in his breast.

"I have thought much upon this subject, and the conclusion I have come to is this: that he intended to wed me to this nephew of his, and then, by means best known to himself, get possession of as much of the property as he was able "Subsequent events, I think, will prove that it was my father's wealth that he was seeking for and trying hard to gain.

"The death of my mother before my marriage, and the loss of the annuity he had with her, of course destroyed all his plans.

"I was then just turned seventeen years of age—in fact, in about ten months I should attain my eighteenth year.

"Then, by the terms of my father's will, I was to come into possession of everything.

"I looked forward to this time coming with genuine joy, because then I flattered myself I should be able to get rid of the odious Mr. Lucas at once and for ever.

"That, you may expect, was a most agreeable prospect for me; but after the funeral, when I had seen all that remained of my mother laid by the side of my father, the recollections of the past came crowding thickly upon me, and I contrasted my present life and that which was opening out before me with the happy one that I had previously known.

"My sorrow was sincere and profound. I gave full vent to it, and made no effort to restrain it, but shut myself up in my room, and refused to hold any converse with Mr. Lucas whatever, though he several times importuned me for an interview.

CHAPTER DCCCVII.

ALICE WHATELY FULLY FATHOMS THE VILLANY OF MR. LUCAS.

"ALAS—alas! could I but have known the consequences that would have followed this proceeding on my part, I should have acted in a very different manner.

"But I knew not—dreamt not—what was to come.

"I still persisted in my refusals to see Mr. Lucas, or, indeed, anyone.

"But on one occasion I omitted to secure my door, and this gave my enemy the opportunity he had so long been looking for.

"He came in accompanied by two staid, respectable-looking gentlemen, who, by their apparel, would be taken for physicians, though whether they had any right to such a title I had very serious doubts.

"However, they came, and Mr. Lucas introduced them to me as Doctors Templeton and Wright.

"I was surprised at their visit, and vehemently declared that nothing ailed me

"I was enraged to think that my father's steward—for such I always looked upon him—should have gained his point and dared to enter into my chamber, and therefore I did not speak with that degree of calmness that I ought to have assumed; but I never expected what was coming, and therefore I gave way to a little warmth of temper without restraint.

"The two doctors stood regarding me for some time.

"They asked me several questions, but I drummed my foot impatiently upon the floor, and refused to answer.

"The only words I would use were those which formed a command for them to quit the room at once.

"They shook their heads, and endeavoured to look afflicted and vexed.

"Muttered sentiments of sorrow and compassion fell from their lips—doubtless they were intended for my ear.

"I wondered what there was in my condition to provoke their sympathies, and smiled at the idea.

"They drew Mr. Lucas on one side, however, and whispered to him.

"Then all three left the room, but not until I heard Dr Templeton say:

"'My dear sir, you must disregard your feelings in this matter, and do that which is calculated to produce the most good.'

"I attached no importance to their words at the time, nor, indeed, to their visit, and it is only by repeatedly dwelling upon the past that I have been able to recall it so well to my remembrance.

"Since that time, however, I have had ample opportunities for reflection, and perhaps it has been well for me that I had so much to occupy my thoughts.

"The next thing I noticed was that my waiting-maid no longer appeared, but a dark, sour-faced-looking woman of middle age assumed her duties.

"I indignantly demanded the reason of this change, but she shook her head hypocritically, and in most disagreeable tones desired me to be calm—to compose myself, and on no account to get excited, as that would only make me worse.

"Make me worse!

"The very words set me thinking, and I wondered what on earth could be my complaint when I was not conscious of having anything the matter with me.

"The attendance of this woman became closer and closer, and, as you may imagine, this was most repulsive.

"She was a complete spy upon my actions, and thus I had no chance of keeping up my correspondence with Norman Spencer

"To my mingled astonishment and anger, I discovered that I was now to be kept close prisoner in my room and not allowed to go forth.

"I demanded to know the reason of this conduct, but no answer was vouchsafed to me.

"I demanded an interview with Mr. Lucas, but again no notice was taken.

"This was a state of things that could not last.

"I felt half crazy with anger and mortification, and one night determined to put an end to it.

"It is not my disposition to sit tamely down and submit to anything that may be thrust upon me. I have always rebelled against oppression, and generally with success.

"Watching my opportunity then, I escaped through the window and alighted in safety on the soft ground below.

"There, however, a man was waiting, and before I could properly regain my feet and start to run, he seized hold of me and made a great outcry.

"I struggled to release myself from his grasp, but vainly.

"Hearing his shouts, the servants and Mr. Lucas came to his assistance, and I was led into the house.

"Some time had elapsed since I had seen the domestics, and now I noticed that they all looked at me with pitying eyes, and some of them placed their handkerchiefs to their faces and wept.

"What there was in my appearance to be provocative of so much sorrow I could not for the life of me conceive.

"Their grief, I doubt not, was as sincere as it was demonstrative, though it should exist at all I could not, as I say, make out.

'The manner which Mr. Lucas assumed towards me also vexed me exceedingly.

"He professed to be soothing, and gentle, and kind, and I was forcibly reminded of the resemblance his manner bore to the purring of a cat when just about to take a death spring upon an unsuspecting victim.

"I was led back to my room, and again confined, and this time I allowed my temper entirely to get the better of me, and under its influence I committed a thousand extravagancies, throwing various articles of furniture about in my impotent rage.

"On the next day the two doctors again called, and their appearance so enraged me that I was more violent than I had been on any previous occasion.

The interview did not last long, and to my sincere gratification they soon departed.

"When the evening meal was brought up I felt no liking for food, yet I resolved to partake of it heartily, as I had made up my mind to attempt another escape before morning, although I had so signally failed before.

"You will see by that that my courage was by no means daunted—indeed, I felt something within me urging me to make every effort to escape.

"Greatly to my surprise, I found that, after sitting for a short time, I was unable to rise, and an unaccountable drowsiness spread itself over me, and I in vain endeavoured to resist its influence.

"In a little while my senses completely left me.

"What happened afterwards I can only conjecture.

"When I came to my senses, I found myself beneath the roof of that dreadful place from which you rescued me.

"At first no answer was made to my inquiries. I was told if I would keep quiet and remain peaceable, that no harshness or violence would be used towards me; and my spirits were so broken by what had occurred that, unintentionally, I did just exactly as they wished me.

"I had plenty to occupy my mind, and, although I had seen so little of life and had formed but a poor opinion of the baseness and villany of mankind, yet, ere long, I was able to find a key to the behaviour of Mr. Lucas.

"But this was not until after a little circumstance occurred that I will relate to you.

"One day I was told that Mr. Lucas had called to see me, and I was shown into his room.

"I was glad of this opportunity of seeing him, and upbraided him most bitterly for his conduct towards me.

"He, however, treated all my words with a smile, which was especially aggravating.

"He brought with him a small folded document, that seemed as though it had been written upon parchment.

"'You tell me you are tired of your present confinement,' he said, 'and wish to be released? If so, you have only to sign that paper, and the doors will be opened to you immediately.'

"In my intense desire to recover my liberty, I felt almost inclined to write my name at the foot of this document without glancing at its contents; but, casting my eyes upon it, I saw a few words that enabled me to catch its whole purport.

"It was neither more nor less than a deed of gift from me to Mr. Lucas, bestowing upon him all, or, at any rate, the greater part of, my property.

"Thus, as I tell you, I obtained the key to all his proceedings, and I resolutely refused to sign.

"He took my refusal very quietly, and, folding up the parchment, again placed it in his pocket.

"I was then led out of the room, and placed, not where I had formerly been, but in the chamber where you found me.

"Here the horrible cries that resounded through the building almost drove me distracted, and prevented me from thinking clearly upon my position.

"This, however, was certain: my father's steward had evidently made up his mind to become possessor of all my father's wealth.

'His first step had been to marry my mother; then, if he had succeeded in wedding me to his nephew, he would have had things all his own way, and I, to use a common expression, should have gone to the wall.

"About his precise intentions in this respect I can, however, form no distinct idea—they were foiled, as I told you, by my mother's death.

'Then another idea had entered his plotting brain.

He took advantage of my deep grief and the seclusion in which I kept myself to set abroad the report that my sorrow had been so great, and I had dwelt so much upon my loss, that my mind was affected—that, indeed, I was insane.

"Nothing more false than this could possibly be, yet, no doubt, he was artful enough to set the story afloat in such a manner as to cause it to be believed by all the servants and dependants.

"Unconsciously, I favoured him in all his designs by my anger and violence of manner.

"Then the two doctors—or pretended doctors, perhaps, I ought to say—were summoned, and they, being well paid for their work, would deliver their opinion that I was not in my right mind, and required to be carefully watched, and that if any further symptoms of violence presented themselves it would be necessary to keep me under proper restraint.

"I can easily imagine how they would impose upon all the servants, and how readily what they said would be believed.

"I have thought almost incessantly upon it, until at length I became able to judge in my own mind just how and why everything was done.

"And that, my friends," she said, "concludes my history—that is all I have to tell.

"It is not worth while to dwell upon all the indignities and cruelties I suffered while staying at that asylum: happily they are over, and I trust I shall never experience them again."

CHAPTER DCCCVIII.

OUR FRIENDS ADVISE ALICE WHATELY HOW TO SHAPE HER FUTURE PROCEEDINGS.

THE whole of this narrative was listened to with the greatest amount of interest.

The feeling was shared in by all.

Many strange episodes of human life had from time to time come under their notice, yet never one so full of strange incidents as this.

A silence of several minutes' duration took place after she had ceased speaking, during which, it may be supposed, her auditors were all thinking over the various points of the story.

It was Tom King who was the first to break that silence.

"Now," he said, "as we have heard all, we shall be able to advise; but first of all, you must tell us precisely the nature of your present condition."

"It is this," was the reply: "If I return to Morton Park, Mr. Lucas will, no doubt, devise some other means of getting me into his power, because so long as I am kept in confinement he can enjoy all the revenues proceeding from my estates; but then, if I don't go there, in what direction am I to turn in order to secure my own safety, and to recover possession of that which is lawfully my own?"

There was again a silence.

Something of this kind had been expected.

Tom King glanced at Dick as if asking him to speak.

Turpin took the hint, for he said:

"It unfortunately happens that we are not in a position to assist you in this matter as we ought, and if we were seen in your cause at all we should prejudice it rather than otherwise."

The young girl looked much surprised at this speech.

"Don't wonder at my words," continued Dick—"be content to take them as being simple truth and no more. Your best plan would be to think of your nearest and best friends, and go to them and get them to take up your cause."

The young girl shook her head.

"That's just my difficulty," she said. "Had I possessed any relatives or friends it would not have been necessary for me to trouble you with that long account of my life, but I have none—none."

Her voice failed her as she came to the end of this sentence.

It is, indeed, hard to feel that one is alone in the world—that there is no person to whom to turn for aid or protection.

"But," said Dick, "unless I make a great mistake, you told me something about an acquaintance you had formed with a young barrister. Why not go to him—he is just the one to take up your claims?"

A bright flush of colour came into the girl's cheeks as Turpin spoke, and then, hesitatingly and stammeringly, she rejoined:

"But what would he think of my boldness and forwardness? What would the world think? What would be said about my conduct?"

"I should not trouble myself about that," said Dick; "your object is to secure your own perfect happiness, and you ought not to allow any foolish scruples to prevent you."

"Decidedly not," said Tom King; "and since you have asked for our advice, I will, if you like, give you mine."

Alice raised her eyes to his, but did not speak.

"To-night," continued Tom, "if you will tell me where this young barrister resides, I will take you to him. I will go; he need not know who I am, yet I can accompany you and introduce you to him. I should then give you both another piece of advice."

"And so should I," said Turpin, with a smile. "I can guess easily what it is. Let your first step be to unite yourself in marriage to this young barrister—that is, if you feel inclined to do so. You have passed your eighteenth year, and you will succeed much better in your claims when you have a husband to fight for you. Mr. Lucas will then be completely powerless, because no one will be able to exert any control over you except him."

Lower and lower sank the girl's head while these words were uttered.

The advice that was given, it was plain to see, was far from disagreeable, and yet she seemed to shrink from giving it her cordial approbation.

"Let me, too, join in with that advice," said Maud. "It is of all things the best that you can do; and unless I am much deceived, he will not feel displeased that you should seek him out. I can understand the nature of your feelings," she added; "but do not allow those feelings to mar your future happiness."

"You have saved me," she said, raising her head, "from a fate that was far worse than death, and I have confidence in your powers, and surrender myself to you. I do not believe that you would advise me wrongly; and whatever you tell me is for the best, that I will do."

"Then," said Tom King, "we may look upon it as settled. In an hour or a little more we will start, and I will not leave you again until I know that you are in absolute safety."

This point having been decided, the highwaymen drew aside to consult their own plan.

Tom Davis kept continually fidgeting about, for the behaviour of Jack Marshall seemed more suspicious and dangerous the more he thought about it.

Yet, although he went to the front door a hundred times and looked carefully around, he saw nothing at all calculated to alarm him.

"Of course," said Dick, "you are well aware that I have a particular mission to fulfil to-night, and at all hazards and risks I will keep my appointment."

His companions nodded.

"I have the paper all safe in my possession, and the sooner I can place it in the hands of the mysterious lady the better I shall be pleased, for it will be removing a great temptation from me. Would you believe it, comrades, I can hardly resist unfolding that paper and making myself acquainted with its contents?"

The three other highwaymen and Maud did not say how much they wished he would yield to the temptation.

But they contrived to convey as much by the expression of their countenances.

But Dick had taken a solemn oath to preserve the secret, and those who knew him best felt certain that he would not break his word.

"Here it is," he said, producing it from his pocket. "I ran a great risk in obtaining it, and yet it came into my possession more easily than I had dared to hope. Now, at the earliest moment I will start, and surrender it, and then the whole affair will be over, and in a very short time entirely forgotten."

As to the last, this was rather doubtful.

Tom Davis then approached them, and asked:

"Could you not by any means consent to remain at the inn to-night?"

"It is impossible," said Turpin.

"I hope not," he added; "and perhaps you will change your minds when you have heard what I have to say."

"No, no," said Dick—"we cannot possibly remain!"

"Well, then, I think you will live to regret your departure. Jack Marshall and his officers are, I am convinced, on the watch. They have had their suspicions aroused, and, I believe, have formed a pretty good guess as to the exact state of affairs. Who can say where they are lurking now?"

"It is a pity," said Dick; "but yet our engagements cannot be broken. The risk, great or small, must be run."

Tom sighed heavily.

"This life won't last," he said—"I know it won't last! It's a great deal too pleasant and comfortable! Mark me if my words don't come true!"

"Why anticipate evil?" said Claude Duval. "It is quite enough to meet it when it comes. We will all ride forth to night. The captain and Tom have each their separate engagements to fulfil, and Jack and myself will try our hands on the highway together."

"It's no use reasoning with you, I am aware," said Tom Davis, "though one would have thought that by this time you would have estimated danger properly. At any rate," he concluded, "you will not think of leaving the inn by the ordinary mode?"

"No—no. We are willing enough to give in to you there, and we will take our departure in the same manner as we did last night, and the chances are ten to one that we shall get away unseen."

"Then I should recommend you to return in the same manner," he rejoined, "and not to venture to approach the inn until you have seen the signals."

"And touching those signals," said Dick. "I have been thinking that they are more likely to provoke suspicion than almost anything else; instead of that, I have something else to propose."

"What is it, captain?"

"Why, you know that small window in the roof of the house that looks over the plantation at the back?"

"Yes—yes."

"Well, then, just before daybreak, if all's well, let a light be burning at that window; if we see it we shall approach without fear; if it is not there we shall remain until it is prudent for us to show our faces again."

CHAPTER DCCCIX.

DICK TURPIN DELIVERS THE LETTER TO THE MYSTERIOUS LADY, AND RECEIVES A STRANGE, UNLOOKED-FOR REWARD.

VERY soon after this Tom Davis went to the front door of the inn, and, having carefully looked round about, he returned.

"Now, captain," he said, "above all things, be careful how you cross over to the stable."

"Did you see anyone lurking about?"

"No, captain, all seems quiet and safe enough; yet it is best to be careful."

"By all means. A mistake made on the right side never produces much mischief. I will go first, and the others can follow."

Dick opened the door leading into the yard at the back of the inn, and, having paused on the threshold a moment, crossed over quickly to the stables.

He had the key in his hand, and quickly unlocked the door.

He was greeted immediately by a low, faint neigh of recognition.

"Ah, Bess," he cried, "you are there! Come, lass we have business together to-night!"

A rustling among the straw followed these words, and then guided by his voice, Black Bess placed herself by her master's side.

The saddle and bridle were quickly put on, and then, opening the little door in the stable that we have already described, Dick led her out into the plantation.

As soon as it was practicable, he mounted, and then, turning her head in the direction he wished to go, rode boldly and straightly to his destination.

The night was dark and blusterous—just such a one as a highwayman would like when engaged on any particular expedition, and yet one when few people would care to be abroad.

With the aspect of the weather, then, Dick had nothing to say in the shape of a complaint.

The very boldness and steadiness with which he took his way to the house where he had had his previous interview with the mysterious lady was most striking.

Yet the boldness brought with it a great amount of success.

No one to have seen him then would have judged that a price was placed upon his head.

He was riding along with the greatest coolness and ease.

On the way, however, his thoughts reverted to those last strange adventures of his, from the details of which his attention had been diverted by other exciting incidents.

Greatly did he wonder what could be the nature of the unsealed letter he held in his hand.

Why should that lady be so anxious to recover it, and why should the possession of it by Lord Spindelow give him so great an amount of power over her?

These were questions that were not likely to be answered by speculation only, so Dick was fain to give up the attempt in despair.

On his former visit Dick had taken accurate note of the place, and therefore he felt certain of being able to make his way right without fear or mistake.

Indeed, it was necessary for him to go to a strange place only once, and then he was always able to remember it afterwards.

No sooner did he halt at the gate in the garden wall than it was opened by Rupert, who exclaimed:

"You are here early. I didn't expect you yet, but was on the watch notwithstanding."

"Is the coast clear?" asked Dick.

"Quite clear. Make haste through the gate—you have nothing to apprehend."

Dick obeyed with the utmost promptitude, and when the door was closed behind him he placed Black Bess in the stable with his own hands.

Then, guided by Rupert as before, he made his way to the house through the dark chamber in the entrance-hall, then up the spacious staircase to the door of the room where they had halted on the former occasion.

Rupert knocked gently, and in a moment the door was opened by the lady herself.

Her countenance bore upon it an expression of the utmost eagerness and anxiety, and Dick could tell that since he had seen her last she had suffered greatly from suspense.

"Come in," she said, in a hoarse whisper—"come in—be quick. Rupert," she added, "you may go."

Rupert turned on his heel and descended the staircase, and the lady, in her eagerness, clutched hold of Turpin by the coat-sleeve and drew him into the room.

"No more of this frightful suspense," she said, clasping her hands over her bosom—"it has almost killed me. In a word, tell me whether you have succeeded?"

"If I had not," said Dick, quietly, "I should not be here."

"Then you have the letter?" she ejaculated, with a half shriek.

Dick replied by drawing the document from his pocket.

No sooner did she catch sight of it than, springing forward, she snatched it from his grasp.

Then, with a shrill shriek, that was strangely mingled with hysterical laughter, she fell down at full length upon the carpet.

This was something for which Dick was not prepared, and for a moment or two he hesitated, scarcely knowing how to act.

So fully expected that the shrill cry would attract the attention of the other persons in the house, and he looked expectantly towards the door, thinking to see it open.

But all remained still, so, stooping down, he raised the lady and placed her in the arm-chair that was near.

Although she had thus fallen, she had not lost her consciousness.

The letter about which she had been so solicitous was clutched convulsively in her hands.

It seemed as though she almost pressed her nails through it.

It was the sudden relief from a most agonising state of mind—the abrupt cessation of suspense and dread—that caused her this loss of command over herself.

"Water," she said, faintly—give me some water! I shall be better then!"

She turned her eyes in the direction of a sideboard, upon which Dick saw a variety of decanters, mingled with glasses and silver plate.

He hastened forward to comply with this request.

A large water-bottle caught his eyes, and, pouring some of its contents into a goblet, he hastened again to the lady's side.

She drank the water eagerly, and then said:

"If you only knew—if you could only imagine what relief the possession of this letter is to me—how totally it changes all my prospects and position, you would not wonder at the violence of the emotion I have displayed."

Dick was silent.

"Of course," she said, half in hesitation, "you have kept your oath—you have not sought to become acquainted with the contents of it?"

"I have not," answered Dick, gravely. "It is there just as I received it."

"I believe you—I believe you, for there's truth in the expression of your face and the tones of your voice. Now, then, name your own reward for performing this service. Fear not to ask a large amount! You could not over-value the extent of your service."

"I shall make no demand whatever," was Dick Turpin's quiet answer. "I have performed my promise to the letter, but as for your gold, I want it not."

The lady looked at him in unfeigned surprise.

"Are you, then, so wedded to your dangerous mode of life that you do not wish to quit it? Reflect. I will willingly give you such a sum as will enable you to leave England, and to live in peace and comfort elsewhere."

Dick shook his head.

"I cannot enter into any arguments with you on the subject," he said; "you have heard my determination, and now, if you will permit me, I will say farewell."

"Your behaviour astonishes me beyond all measure," murmured the lady—"it is incomprehensible!"

"It may be so," said Dick. "But the only favour I shall ask of you is permission to begone."

"But I am determined that you shall not leave me without receiving some substantial proof of my gratitude. You tell me that gold is not what you want; then listen."

Dick bowed.

"All these events," she began, "must seem in the highest degree extraordinary and inexplicable to you. What you have learned, however, is but one small portion of a tremendous secret, that, if known, would produce greater consequences than ever you could imagine. But enough—I cannot tell you what could be performed by the bare production of the letter that you have given me so readily. Yet," she added, "the time may come when all this that seems so strange now will be rendered perfectly clear—when, if this adventure shall have slipped your memory, it shall be suddenly recalled with great force; but, at any rate, under all circumstances I will be your friend to the very utmost extent of my ability. I have more power even now than you may imagine—a power greater than is possessed by——"

She checked herself abruptly, and by the confusion she exhibited, it was evident that she had been betrayed into going too far in her remarks.

"Here," she said, "take this; it is a small locket, and I shall always know it again—keep it, preserve it somewhere; on no account part with it. When you are some time in the extremity of danger—when you are in fear of your very life—then take that locket, and press upon the spring; it will open, and then you will know what to do—your life will be saved, your liberty restored. Take it—take it; you are welcome to it, and I trust the time may come when you may prove its powers."

Despite a certain amount of unwillingness that Dick displayed, she pressed the trinket into his hand, and closed his fingers over it.

CHAPTER DCCCX.

RUPERT PLAYS A TREACHEROUS PART, AND DICK TURPIN DISCOVERS IN THE MYSTERIOUS LADY A REAL FRIEND.

PERCEIVING how much in earnest the mysterious lady was, and how anxious she appeared that he should accept from her some token in recognition of the great service he had performed, he resolved to change his behaviour, and to receive the gift without any show of churlishness.

"I take this willingly," he said; "and if it has such virtues as you state, it will indeed be the best and most serviceable thing that you can possibly bestow."

"Keep it, then—keep it; you will find that I have not exaggerated its power in the least. Keep it in some place of security, yet always about your person. On no account part with it; and, as I said before, when you find yourself in a position of the most imminent danger, draw it forth, and you will be saved."

Dick was not a little curious to know what it was that this locket contained, and it required a considerable amount of credulity in order to believe that what the lady said was true.

Yet her earnestness of manner almost enforced credence, and so again expressing his thanks, he placed it safely in an inner pocket.

No. 168. PRICE ONE HALFPENNY.

No. 169 will be Published next Monday.

"Now," she said, "if you are anxious to leave me, you are quite at liberty to do so. First of all, however, I would press you to partake of a glass of wine."

"One glass be it then," said Turpin, "for I don't wish to linger, and I have a particular appointment."

The lady poured out the wine herself, and then going to the bell, rang it sharply.

In obedience to the summons, Rupert appeared upon the threshold.

Dick glanced at him carelessly.

But yet in an instant his attention was awakened.

His keen eyes detected something strange in Rupert's manner.

He seemed flurried and out of breath, and as it making efforts to regain his ordinary composure.

To conceal these manifestations of agitation, probably, he bowed low three or four times, and stood in a semi-circular attitude, waiting for the commands of his mistress.

But it was Dick who spoke:

"Show me out, Rupert; I am anxious to leave with all speed."

"Very good! Oh, certainly!" he answered. "This way, if you please."

"Once more farewell," said the lady, gazing after Turpin with looks expressive of gratitude—"once more farewell! I wish that you had suffered me to recompense you for what you have done after my own inclination."

Dick merely made a gesture of dissent, and, murmuring the word "Farewell," he followed Rupert from the room.

Dick's suspicions were aroused, although they had but slight foundation.

He apprehended danger from some source, yet what he could not tell.

He drew a long breath of relief, however, upon finding himself free from the mansion in which he had had such strange adventures.

"Then you have performed this important service?" said Rupert.

"Unquestionably I have," was the laconic reply.

"And been rewarded?"

"Yes, too."

"I expected as much; the affair is more important than perhaps you imagine."

"Are you acquainted with the particulars of it?"

"Only partially—only partially."

"Does your mistress take you into her confidence?"

"Sometimes, and at others I find out what I can."

"Indeed!" said Dick. "You are very candid, and——"

Just at this moment there came a shrill whistle, and Turpin found his arm clutched tightly by Rupert, as though he was astonished at the sound.

The whistle was quickly followed by many footsteps, and in the twinkling of an eye Dick found himself surrounded by a large party of police officers.

He did not wait for them to make any aggressive demonstration, or for them to call upon him to surrender.

In an instant the whole truth flashed in upon his mind.

Rupert, finding that Turpin had performed the service his mistress required of him, had called together the police officers, intending to avail himself of the fact as far as he could.

It would be easy for them to say that he had no control over what was taking place—that the capture had been made without his knowledge.

He would then not only be well paid by his mistress, and have been bribed by the highwayman as well, but would also receive his share of the large reward.

The manner in which he clung to Turpin's arm conclusively showed this.

But Dick shook him off.

All this took place in one single instant.

The whistle was blown, the officers appeared, and then Dick, suddenly putting forth the whole of his strength, seized hold of Rupert and swung him fairly round and then let go.

He came with great violence against the forms of several police officers, some of whom fell, while others could not help staggering back a pace.

Rupert fell stunned and breathless to the ground.

Then Dick wondered what he should do.

He could not stop to think.

The moment he took for reflection might cost him his life.

He had noticed, however, that the officers had come from the direction of the stables, and therefore, without any reasoning upon the subject, he concluded that they had already taken prisoner his mare, Black Bess.

To run in that direction would only be to court fresh danger.

The gate leading from the yard was probably well secured.

There was then only one way that he could turn, and knowing this, he started off at the top of his speed towards the mansion he had just left.

Several pistols were fired at his retreating form, but all apparently without effect.

With a rapidity of motion that was wonderful, he passed through the door, closed it behind him, and then secured it by shooting a couple of bolts into their sockets and turning the key in the lock.

How to act further was the next consideration.

He knew the way to the front door, and might manage to pass through it and gain the street unknown to the officers.

But there was a great risk about this, for some, in anticipation of his resistance, might be watching for him in the street outside.

Dick's resolve was quickly taken.

It was to throw himself upon the protection of the lady, who was so anxious a short time since to display her gratitude.

Up the spacious staircase, then, he bounded, taking several steps at each stride.

Then hastening forward, he burst without any ceremony whatever into the room where she was sitting.

Noting his hurried manner and his pale face, she started to her feet, and asked eagerly what was amiss.

"Rupert," he ejaculated, almost breathlessly—"the villain has betrayed me to the police officers. Did you not hear their shots?"

"Betrayed you? Impossible!"

"It is true. The officers will appear in another moment to search for me. I have flown back to you in order that you may prove your gratitude. Conceal me somewhere—in some place where you can feel certain they will not find me."

The lady hesitated for a moment, and then, recovering her self-possession, she said:

"I will conceal you, and effectually, too."

"Be quick then, lady," said Dick, "for, hark! you can hear them now hammering at the door below."

"I can—I can. Follow me with all speed."

The lady led the way into the adjoining apartment, and passed from that into another.

This was a small, plainly-furnished room, containing for the most part curiosities from all parts of the globe.

On one side of this little room there was what appeared to be a very strong iron door.

Its size was rather less than ordinary.

It was high enough to allow a person of average height to pass through it not stooping.

But it was disproportionately narrow.

The only fastening visible consisted of a large brass knob.

Towards this door the lady walked with a resolute step, Dick Turpin following closely behind her.

From a richly ornamented purse she carried she drew forth a key.

Then touching a spring upon a portion of the door, a small piece of iron slipped aside, disclosing a key-hole.

One turn in the lock was sufficient to unfasten the door.

"Take hold of that knob," she said, "and pull it towards you. The door is heavy, and rather beyond my strength."

Dick obeyed, marvelling greatly why such a place as this should be constructed, and whether it would afford him an effectual hiding-place from his pursuers.

His speculations were cut short by the lady, who said:

"No doubt you are wondering at what you see. To set your mind at rest, I will tell you that this is what we call the strong room. It contains all the most valuable things I possess—deeds, plate, jewels, and such-like. I trust to you not to remove any of them, and I will answer with my life that you are safe."

"You may depend upon me," said Dick. "I would on no account deprive you of anything."

"Be quick, then, and close the door. I can hear the officers have gained admittance."

Dick stepped into the strong room, as it was called, though it was nothing more than a recess in the wall, having no window to light it.

He pulled the door behind him, and the lady pressed it close.

There was a sharp clicking sound, and then Dick, to all intents and purposes, was a prisoner—a prisoner in a very close, confined, and disagreeable place, one from which he could not possibly escape.

He breathed with difficulty, for there seemed to be but little air within the place.

He leaned up against the door, feeling more uneasy and apprehensive every moment.

CHAPTER DCCCXI.

THE MYSTERIOUS LADY FINDS DICK TURPIN AN UNCOMFORTABLE BUT EFFECTUAL HIDING-PLACE.

Up to this time it had not occurred to Dick Turpin to question the good faith of the mysterious lady.

One reason was perhaps that he had had no opportunity for thought.

Now that he was still, his thoughts were beginning to grow active.

The more he reflected, the more uncomfortable he felt.

Indeed, he felt half inclined to make some desperate effort to free himself from his hiding-place.

Was it not likely in the extreme, he asked himself, that this lady should be acquainted with all Rupert's intentions?

He might even have acted by her orders.

This was supposing a great amount of ingratitude to exist.

But Dick knew that people readily forgot obligations that were conferred upon them.

In such a case as this, he had taken the worst step he possibly could.

He had, in fact, simply allowed himself to be confined in a place from which he could not liberate himself, while the lady who had made him secure would have no more to do but to summon the police officers and tell them so.

If he was right in these suspicions, Dick determined that he would sell his life dearly.

If the officers thought to make an easy prey when the door was opened, they would be much mistaken.

He would rush out and fight them all, and die rather than yield.

He listened, however, and all was very still.

Time enough had elapsed to have enabled the lady, if she had been so inclined, to bring the officers to that spot.

To all appearances she had not done so.

Dick pressed his ear close against the door, and endeavoured to make out if he could hear what was going on upon the other side of it.

In this he failed, for not even a murmur reached his ears.

Respiration continued to grow more and more difficult.

The fact had been overlooked that there was no means by which air could gain admittance to that room after the door was closed; and unless it was quickly opened again, the highwayman would surely die of suffocation.

Leaving Dick for a few moments in this most uncomfortable situation, we will revert to the proceedings of the police officers.

Turpin wronged the lady when he thought that she had acted treacherously towards him.

The betrayal was on Rupert's part alone.

Of course he was well aware of the highwayman's identity, and he was also fully cognizant of the large reward that was offered for his apprehension.

He had ascertained what night the service he had undertaken for his mistress would be performed, and, as usual, he would ride away.

What a fine opportunity was this to communicate with the police officers, and have him captured just as he was about leaving the premises.

Rupert thought it could be so managed that no one would be aware he had had a hand in it.

He resolved upon trying this experiment, and therefore called in the aid of those police officers who had come upon the previous occasion.

He secreted them near the door leading into the stables, and told them to watch there until he returned holding some one by the arm, adding that that some one would be Dick Turpin, the highwayman.

The officers gladly enough consented to wait, and remained in a state of the greatest suspense and excitement for upwards of an hour.

Then, in the manner we have described, Dick Turpin came forward.

Luckily, his suspicions had been roused; otherwise he would have fallen an easy prey.

Rupert had been so roughly handled by Dick Turpin that he lay upon the ground, never moving hand or foot.

The other officers, caring nothing for him, finding that their shots were ineffectual, commenced an immediate pursuit.

But the door was closed and fastened, and too strong to be beaten down easily.

The manner they hammered away upon it, however, was well calculated to attract the attention of all the domestics, and consequently in a short time several hurried to the door in a body, wondering what could be the matter.

"Be quick," said the chief officer—"take possession of all the means of exit from the house while we search it over! You needn't trouble yourselves about the front, because, as you know, that is well watched."

"And the stable," said one—"had not that better be watched also?"

"Yes, by all means. On no account let him gain possession of his mare."

The officers separated themselves rapidly according to the directions of their superior, and the remainder, forming themselves into a compact body, commenced a rigid search of the building.

They began at the bottom, and, having searched it thoroughly without success, ascended the staircase.

At the top they saw the mistress of the mansion, who regarded them with well-assumed surprise.

"What does all this mean?" she inquired, angrily. "Why are you here? Explain this violence and disturbance!"

"Very sorry, my lady," said the senior officer, who somehow seemed compelled to be respectful, "but Dick Turpin, the highwayman, has taken refuge in this house, and we must search it until we find him!"

"Dick Turpin? Ridiculous! You have made some absurd mistake!"

The officer shook his head.

"No, no, ma-am—nothing of the kind! There's not no mistake about it! I saw him with my very own eyes!"

The lady smiled incredulously.

"I see you are officers of police," she said, "and I know that I dare not refuse you permission to search all over this house, so you can begin at once; and the sooner your task is completed the better. I can assure you it will be without result."

"Oh, he's hiding somewhere," said the officer, "and he could easily do that without your knowledge at all."

"Well, it may be so; and if you will follow me I will take you into all the rooms in succession, and you can satisfy yourselves that he is not in any of them."

This was consented to, and the lady led them into the apartment from which she had just emerged.

This was ransacked with great rapidity, but of course without any result.

The same may be said of the next and the next.

The officers were beginning to grow doubtful and discouraged.

"He must be in the house somewhere," said the one in command, speaking as much with the view of reassuring himself as his men. "I saw him enter myself; and if he had left by the front we should have heard of it immediately, so here he must be, that's clear."

At this moment they passed into the small room we have already described.

A glance was sufficient to enable them to come to the conclusion that the highwayman was not hiding there.

The chief officer walked up to the iron door, and knocked upon it with his knuckles.

"What's that?" he said—"what's that?"

"I suppose there is no harm in telling you," was the lady's response, "though I prefer such things should be kept a secret. Surely you do not imagine the man you speak of is hidden there. It is the strong room, where all the deeds relating to my family are kept, and also where the plate and jewels are stowed away. It is always kept securely locked as you see now, and, for protection's sake, the key is deposited in an iron safe at the banker's."

The officer ran his fingers rapidly over the door, and endeavoured to shake it.

In vain, however, for it fitted closely into its setting.

"It is a strong door," he said—"a very strong door; and yet, if you had possessed the key, I should have preferred looking inside it. However, as you have not, we must do without."

The officers certainly never for one moment thought it in the least degree probable that Dick Turpin had concealed himself in such a place as that—in fact, the feat was to all appearance impossible.

The search was then continued with great vigour.

Higher and higher the officers went until the top of the house was reached, and yet no signs of the highwayman could they see.

They even went out upon the roofs.

But here all was calm and quiet, and the men who were stationed outside declared that they had kept a careful watch, and that no one had left the premises in that direction.

The chief officer was puzzled.

How to act in such a case as this he knew not, for he was not able to find even the slightest trace that the highwayman had ever entered the building at all.

Nevertheless, he resolved to make a good search, and to leave no corner unexamined.

For this purpose he began in the attics, and searched them again, and continued to search until he reached the landing on the first floor again.

"Well," he cried, "this passes my comprehension. I have heard before a strange tale told of how a party of people saw a friend of theirs enter a house by the front door, but he never came out again, and the closest search even failed to discover where he had gone."

"Then," said the lady, "they must have been deceived, like yourself. I felt quite certain you were making a mistake when you said you had seen Dick Turpin enter here. Surely he would never have such audacity?"

"Oh, but he would," said the chief officer—"he would. He's hiding himself somewhere, though where it can be I am at a loss to think. However, I sha'n't be put off easily, as he will find!"

Muttering these and other indistinct threats, the officer finished his second search of the mansion, of course without achieving any better result than at first.

Going to the front door, he opened it, and found upon its threshold two of his men.

"You are sure he has not gone this way?"

"Quite sure."

"And you have heard no noise?"

"None."

"Well, then, keep a closer look-out than ever. He must be very close at hand, I feel convinced, so we will go to the back and watch there."

With these words the officer closed the front door again, and made his way back to the stables, cursing and foaming over the failure he had met with when he considered success to be quite certain.

Rupert was still lying on the ground

His head had been severely injured by his fall, and although not unconscious, he was yet unable either to speak or to rise.

CHAPTER DCCCXII.

DICK TURPIN IS RELEASED FROM THE STRONG ROOM JUST IN TIME, AND BLACK BESS SUCCEEDS IN GETTING THE BETTER OF THE POLICE OFFICERS.

No sooner had the mysterious lady made quite certain that the whole of the officers had left the mansion than she hastened with all speed to the strong room in which she had hid the highwayman.

All at once she had remembered that it was so constructed that no air could enter it, and she was justly afraid that he would die of suffocation if allowed to remain there for any length of time.

With trembling fingers, then—having first of all secured the door of communication—she pressed upon the spring and thrust the key into the iron door.

It turned with more than usual difficulty in its wards, taking, in fact, nearly all her strength.

Then, seizing hold of the brass knob, she pulled it towards her.

But in this respect she had no occasion to put forth her strength.

Suddenly the door was pushed open with great swiftness, and, with a rushing sound, the body of Dick Turpin fell forward with great violence on the floor.

A shriek of alarm issued from her lips.

Her worst forebodings, she feared, were fully realised.

And yet it seemed strange that after such a short time he should have perished.

A second thought told her that he was more likely in a fainting fit, owing to the want of air, and that, if left to himself, he would rapidly recover.

In this she found herself perfectly right.

Dick Turpin made several gasping efforts to breathe, then struggled as if with some antagonist, and finally opened his eyes.

His brain at first was in a perfect whirl, and he could not recollect what had happened, nor comprehend where he was.

But, with a rush, remembrance came back to him, and he sprang to his feet and looked around him anxiously.

"Fear nothing," said the lady, in tones of great relief, "all is well now—quite well; I was afraid I had left you there too long."

"I must have fainted," said Dick, "and yet I knew it not; my senses must have left me slowly and gradually. But the officers, where are they?"

"They have searched the house thoroughly from the bottom to the top—from top to bottom. They are, of course, much mystified by your extraordinary disappearance, as they saw you enter with their own eyes; however, they have now all left."

"But not for good, I suppose?"

"I fear not—in fact, I may say I know for certain that a great number are watching in the yard, and the remainder in the street outside."

Turpin looked anxious and undecided.

"How, then, am I to act?" he said, thoughtfully.

"Nay, that I leave for you to decide. But hush! what disturbance is that?—what has happened?"

A tremendous uproar could now be heard in the yard below, and, as if animated by one impulse, Dick and the lady hastened to the window that commanded a view of it.

"Keep back," she cried—"keep back—you may be seen! Ah, look there—what can be the meaning of that?"

The lady was considerably puzzled at what she saw.

But we may as well make the reader at once acquainted with the exact facts of the case.

The officers, having regained the back yard, held a consultation as to what they should do.

The prevalent opinion among them was that the highwayman was concealed somewhere in the house without the knowledge of its inmates, they thought, but yet in some place where he could set detection at defiance.

In this case it was clear that all they had to do was to remain patiently on the watch.

Some time or other he must come forth, and as soon as he appeared they would be able to pounce upon him and capture him.

After much disputing, this was the plan of proceedings agreed to.

"But," said one, "Black Bess is in the stable here: had we not better make sure of her while we have the chance?"

"How make sure of her?"

"Why, seize her, and take her away to some place where we know Dick Turpin could not possibly find her. Without Black Bess he would be nothing, and we should be able to make him our prisoner with all the ease in the world."

"I like the idea very much," said the chief officer, "for he might be able, by some means or other, to regain possession of her, in which case he would doubtless give us a great deal of trouble. But I have heard some curious tales about this Black Bess. I for one should not care about handling her."

"Pooh—pooh!" said the one who had spoken. "I have heard the tales you mention, and don't care that about 'em!"

He snapped his fingers contemptuously as he spoke

"I know a thing or two about horses," he said—"I rather believe I know what a horse can do, and what he can't, and if I don't lead this Black Bess out of the stable as quietly as a lamb, why, call me a Dutchman!"

"I should not wonder," said another officer, addressing the one in command. "Larkins is just the chap for a horse—he's a regular tamer!"

"Well, if you can get hold of her, all well and good," said the chief; "you have my full permission to make the attempt."

"Very good," was the reply, "that's all that I require."

With these words on his lips, the police officer entered the stable.

A dim light was burning there, and by its aid he could see several horses standing in the stalls.

Among them, however, there was only one that was black, and her jetty, glossy coat proclaimed at once that it was the highwayman's steed.

"There she is," cried Larkins, delightedly, "and she's a regular beauty, she is, and no mistake! Woa, now! Gently—gently!"

His comrades watched with the greatest anxiety.

Speaking soothingly all the time, this police officer managed to walk by the side of Black Bess up to the manger.

Then, placing his hand upon her neck, he patted and stroked it for some time.

Black Bess stood perfectly quiet, and apparently by no means displeased with these caresses.

By degrees, the officer moved his right hand, until he had hold of her forelock, while he still continued holding her with the other.

At last he determined to make the effort to lead her forth, for she was quieter than he had ever imagined.

This partial success that he had met with rendered him quite exultant, and in a very triumphant tone of voice he exclaimed:

"There, now, what did I tell you? Why, it's the easiest thing in the world! Come on, my beauty, this way!"

Black Bess suffered herself to be turned round, and, without offering the faintest show of resistance, in another moment Larkins had got her out into the yard.

"There," he said, "now, what did I tell you? Just fetch me a halter, one of you, and then we shall have her secure!"

"I should have put it on in the stable had I been you," said the chief officer.

"Oh, it's all right, bless you—do you think I don't know how to manage a horse? You see, a lamb could not be quieter than she is!"

One of the officers ran into the stable, and quickly returned with a halter.

"Now, then," cried Larkins, "slip it gently over her head! There, now——"

His speech was brought to an abrupt and unexpected termination.

Black Bess had allowed the officers to proceed so far, but would not allow them to go any further.

No sooner did she catch sight of the halter than a remarkable change took place in her manner.

With one sudden toss of her head, she forced herself from the grasp of Larkins, who the next moment found himself sprawling on the ground.

Black Bess flung out with her feet on all sides in the most desperate and dangerous manner, so that in the twinkling of an eye the crowd of officers around her was dispersed.

This was the noise that Turpin and the lady had heard, and which brought them to the window.

Dick Turpin's feelings may perhaps be imagined upon finding his bonny mare in such a dangerous position.

Yet, how could he help her?

He could do nothing, and could only hope that she would make the fullest use of the instinct which he knew she possessed so ample a share of.

Several of the officers had been very seriously injured by her feet, and she still continued to plunge about in the same fashion.

"It's a mad horse," cried Larkins, recovering himself so far as to be able to sit up—"it's a mad horse! Shoot it, somebody—shoot it, it's mad! Who's got a pistol?"

"I have," said the chief officer. "Here goes!"

Whether the excitement, or some other cause, had rendered his aim unsteady we know not.

Certain it is, however, the bullet with which his pistol was charged went far from the mark.

Black Bess heard the sound with fresh terror, and galloped furiously round and round the yard.

The walls apparently were much too high for her to overleap.

With a curse, the chief officer threw down his pistol, and immediately drew another.

This time he took a more careful aim at the flying horse.

But he was again doomed to disappointment, for the weapon only flashed in the pan without any report.

It was just at this moment that Black Bess, having galloped round the yard for about the dozenth time, stopped suddenly before that portion of the wall in which the door was situated.

The height was considerable—so great that it seemed impossible for any horse to clear such an obstacle.

But, crouching down almost like a greyhound would have done, she gave a sudden spring, and, to the astonishment of all, just cleared the wall, though she scraped the top slightly with her hind feet.

In another instant she had disappeared.

CHAPTER DCCCXIII.

THE MYSTERIOUS LADY INDUCES ONE OF THE POLICE OFFICERS TO FACILITATE DICK TURPIN'S ESCAPE.

Several shots were fired as Black Bess disappeared over the wall.

But it was not very likely that any of them would produce the least effect.

Turpin was so overcome at this unexpected incident that he fairly reeled with emotion.

Such a heavy load had been removed from his mind that he now felt as if he could regard his own danger with extreme indifference.

Black Bess was now gone, and, having once had such a start as that, would, as a matter of course, escape in safety.

Some accident might befall her; but the probability was that she would return direct to the inn.

"I have cause to be thankful for that," said Turpin. "Now my foes can do what they like—I care not."

The fury of the officers was something ludicrous to witness.

They raved, and stamped, and swore most fearfully.

"A swift horse," cried the one in command—"get a swift horse and ride off in pursuit!"

"It's no good," said one—"it's no good!"

"I tell you it is! Obey my commands this instant!"

"Why, the horse is not foaled yet that could outrun Black Bess."

"I know that, fool—dolt—idiot that you are! Can you not tell that you are wasting most precious moments? A swift horse, I say—quick—quick!"

"What is it you want?"

"Want? Why, what a numbskull you must be not to think of it yourself! Black Bess will now gallop straight off to that secret hiding-place of the highwaymen that we are so anxious to find. If you will follow her quickly we shall find it out, and that will be worth a thousand pounds to us at least."

This was a thought that had not occurred to the police officers.

But no sooner was it suggested to them than there was a perfect rush to see who could be the first to seize a horse and mount.

The consequence was that they greatly impeded each other, and much time was lost before a horse was got ready to mount.

Then the gate was opened, and a couple of officers dashed out.

But they found, when they had gone a little way, that they could see no signs of the highwayman's steed, nor could they meet with anyone who had perceived which way she had gone.

They pulled up their horses, and listened.

But all around them was perfectly silent.

Her hoof-beats could not be distinguished.

"We're done," said one—"done as brown as a hammer! Was ever such luck known before!"

"What had we better do, mate?" said the other officer.

"Well that's just what I was wondering. If we ride back, we shall have no end of abuse heaped upon us. Let us gallop off. We can pretend then that we pursued Black Bess as far as we were able."

"I think we had better do that, for I don't think they will capture Dick Turpin any more than they captured Black Bess."

"Capture him? No, nothing of the kind, and if we keep on, why, chance may take us the way we wish to go."

This being settled, the two officers started off at a smart pace.

It was a ridiculous proceeding on their part, inasmuch as it weakened their own force considerably.

They might have known that the services of all would be wanted to assist in the capture of Turpin.

"Now," said Dick, addressing his preserver, "I must get out of this house somehow or other."

The lady shook her head.

"I fear it is impossible," she said. "You know how closely it is watched at the back, and there are many other officers in the street, while, I believe, another has been left upon the roofs to take care that you do not escape in that direction."

"But I cannot remain here," said Dick. "It is imperative that I escape by some means or other."

"It is; and a thought has just struck me as to the means by which that escape may be accomplished. Listen to me."

"I am all attention."

"It will require the exercise of some boldness and coolness upon your part, but I know that you possess both those qualities to perfection."

"But what is your plan?"

"It is, by means of some things that I have, to disguise you effectually, and, when so disguised, we will walk out of the front door into the street together."

"Excellent!" said Turpin. "But the officers—if they have searched this house so thoroughly as you say they have—will they not be suspicious at once upon seeing some one come forth who was invisible during the time the search continued?"

"No, I think not. I took particular notice of all that was going on, and I found that it was the officers from the back of the house who conducted the search. Those in front have never crossed the threshold at all, and therefore it is impossible for them to tell who is in the house and who is not."

"Then," said Turpin, "if that's the case, I feel certain I shall escape."

"It is very probable, especially if we can take advantage of the present moment, when their attention is so fixed upon the escape of Black Bess."

"It will be."

"Wait here, then, where you are for a moment, while I will hasten off and fetch the things that I require."

The lady was absent only a few moments, and when she returned a considerable alteration had been effected in her appearance.

She had put on a very large cloak of a kind then very much in vogue, and on her head she wore a very small, coquettish-looking hat.

Over her arm she carried a closely-fitting cloak, and in her hand something that Dick could not make out at first, but which almost immediately afterwards he saw was a wig of white hair.

The coat was of a very different cut and colour, and very differently ornamented to the one he was in the habit of wearing, and the merely putting it on would make a very great change in his appearance, for these were the times when differences in costume were much more marked than they are at the present day.

Dick hastily pulled off his own coat and flung it into a corner, and put on the one that had been brought to him.

The wig was rather a more difficult matter, but with a little trouble he managed to tuck all his own hair underneath it.

Then he put on a hat with a low crown and a broad brim, which had the effect of altering the expression of his countenance wonderfully.

"Cut off your moustache," said the lady. "It will be much better. The disguise will then be perfect."

She handed him a pair of scissors while she spoke, and Dick, after a moment's hesitation, complied with her request.

"There," she said, "that's much better! It would never have done to see you with your hair one colour and your moustache another. Now take this gold-headed cane, and, as you walk, lean heavily upon it. I, in turn, will lean upon your arm, and I believe the chances are a thousand to one that we shall pass out without exciting suspicion."

Dick thought so too, but determined to be prepared for any accident.

The lady soon drew over her face a very thick veil, which effectually concealed her features.

Then, taking hold of Turpin's arm, she leaned somewhat heavily upon it.

And thus they walked together to the door.

Passing through the suite of apartments and descending the staircase, they came to the front door.

Here a footman was waiting, who looked not a little astonished at what he saw.

"Open the door, Charles," said his mistress. "You may expect me back in about an hour."

The tones of her voice could not be mistaken, so, although his brain was full of many strange thoughts, the footman obeyed her commands, and opened the door.

On the threshold stood a couple of police officers, and instinctively Dick grasped his stick a little tighter.

"I shall be back in two hours at the most," said the lady, in a loud tone of voice, on purpose that the officers should hear her.

"Very well, my lady," said the footman, respectfully, and closed the door.

The officers looked at each other rather bewildered, and wondered how they should act.

The lady, upon reaching the pavement, seemed no less irresolute, and, beckoning at length to one of the officers, she said:

"I suppose you are watching there in case you should see anything of Dick Turpin?"

The police officer had heard the footman say "My lady," and he was accordingly respectful.

"We air," he said, with great emphasis—"them's our orders."

The lady laughed.

"It is really a strange thing," she said, "but I would willingly stake my life that he is not in the house. It's a mistake altogether. But I wish to go with this friend of mine for a little distance, and want a hackney-coach. Would you be kind enough to call one? Surely your comrade will be enough to watch?"

The officer hesitated.

But only for about half a moment.

While waiting at the door, he had seen many hackney-coaches pass by, and he thought it would be a pity to lose the opportunity of earning a reward, for, of course, he would not remain unpaid for his service.

Giving a nod to his companion, he ran hastily down the street until he came to the next corner.

Then he waved his arm in the air, and uttered a shout.

"Coach—coach!" he said. "Make haste!"

CHAPTER DCCCXIV.

DICK TURPIN FINDS THAT THE POLICE OFFICERS KEEP VERY PERTINACIOUSLY UPON HIS TRACK.

A LUMBERING sound succeeded, and then soon afterwards a hackney-coach came rolling round the corner.

Dick and the mysterious lady walked towards it, both of them scarcely able to control their laughter when they saw what the officer was doing.

When the coach stopped, the officer opened the door with great alacrity, and stood with the handle in his hand, waiting for them to enter.

Dick was almost afraid of this man's scrutiny.

But he played his part to great perfection, and with the utmost courtesy handed the lady into the coach.

He followed, and the officer, closing the door, said:

"Where to, my lady?"

This question had evidently been expected, for, in ready tones, she replied:

"To St. James's Palace—quickly!"

She placed a piece of silver in the officer's hand as she spoke, and he was so overcome by the directions that had been given him that he was scarcely able to stand upright, he bowed so repeatedly.

"To St. James's Palace," he said, to the jarvey—"quick!"

Off rolled the clumsy vehicle, and the officer stood in a reflective attitude.

"What's that you've just done!" said a voice, and, turning round, he saw the chief officer, who had made his way from the back to the front of the house.

"Oh, nothing, sir—nothing at all particular!"

"You're a fool!" was the angry reply. "Who got into the hackney-coach?"

"The lady of the mansion, sir."

"Was she alone?"

"No—an old gentleman was with her."

The officer swore fearfully.

"It was Dick Turpin, I'll swear!" he said. "There was no old gentleman in the house—I'll take my oath to that, for I searched in every corner! We're diddled again! No, no—not exactly! If I lose sight of the coach it's odd to me!"

So saying, he set off at a smart run.

The hackney-coach could be seen in the distance, for the street was a long and straight one.

The officer managed to diminish the distance between him and it very considerably, and, having done so, he slightly relaxed his endeavours.

He was afraid to go too near, lest he should excite the suspicions of those within.

"I will have him!" he muttered, in a determined voice—"I will have him, if it costs me my life! But I know I shall succeed, and then I shall pocket the whole of the reward for myself! The fools I have got with me will then look foolish, I'm thinking!"

A fresh idea at this moment occurred to the officer, for he ran onwards at a greatly-increased rate.

The fact was, he all at once thought that if he could manage to reach the back of the coach unseen he might hang on, and so ride with it without fatiguing himself by running, so that when the time came he should have plenty of strength and energy to accomplish his intentions.

This was a feat by no means difficult of accomplishment.

It was impossible to detect his footsteps while the lumbering, and whirling, and rattling of the hackney-coach was sounding in their ears, and therefore, panting, breathless, and excited, the officer at last clutched hold of the back of the vehicle.

To perch himself up then was a comparatively easy matter, and having done so, he wiped the perspiration from his brow.

The officer fondly flattered himself that he had not been seen by the occupants of the coach.

But in this particular he was greatly mistaken.

The vehicle happened to be furnished, like most of its class, with a small oval-shaped pane of glass at the back, which could at pleasure be covered by a cushion.

This cushion Dick anxiously removed as soon as the coach started, and looked down the street.

It was well he took this precaution, for before long he saw the officer running hastily along.

More than this he did not wait to see, but at once covered the cushion over the glass, lest he should himself be observed, and in a few words acquainted his companion with this fresh danger.

"I had thought of that," she said, "and I will tell you how you can deceive him easily."

Dick regarded her with admiration.

"In the first place," she said, "we must change a part of our dresses. You see I have on a dark-coloured dress; well, here, rolled up under my cloak, is another just like it. Take off your coat, and hat, and wig, and put on this dress, my cloak, and hat, and draw the veil down close over your countenance—you will then be taken for me."

Dick comprehended the plan instantly.

Yet he hesitated to avail himself of it.

"No—no," he said. "I cannot consent to letting you run into such peril—you know not what would be the consequences of discovery."

"Fear nothing on my account," said the lady, with a light laugh. "I care nothing for such consequences as those. I can afford to laugh at them. Do not hesitate or scruple to do as I tell you, and never doubt again that a woman can be grateful for an important service rendered her."

"You have proved your gratitude," said Dick—"in fact, the service you have done this night for me outweighs the one I have performed for you."

"Never mind that question—quickly slip on these things."

Dick hastily divested himself of his hat, coat, and wig, and, not without a little joking and laughing, assumed the feminine garment that was held out to him.

It was by no means a good fit, yet in the darkness it would no doubt do very well.

The lady's cloak was next thrown over his shoulders, then her hat put on, and the fall drawn down.

It was then impossible to distinguish his features, except that his eyes could be seen sparkling with more than usual brightness.

The lady then put on the tight-fitting coat that Dick had just discarded.

She put on the wig also, and the hat, and the disguise was really wonderful.

"Now," she said, "whenever you like I will stop the coach, and I must leave you to your own devices. The officer behind us will imagine that I have got out, and will fall into the natural mistake of supposing that I am you, and therefore will follow the coach, while you can discard this clothing at the first opportunity."

"But when this trick is discovered," said Dick—"that is what I tremble for."

"Then do not be alarmed; leave me to my resources as I shall leave you, and I'll warrant I succeed."

"I have not much fear, judging by what you have already done to-night."

"Will you have the coach stopped now?"

"Yes, when I have again expressed my thanks."

"No, I will not listen to them; it is from me the thanks are due; or, if it pleases you better, we will consider the obligation mutual. There, that will do."

She pulled the check-string as she spoke, and the coachman stopped at once.

They were in a quiet, ill-lighted street.

The lady placed her hand upon the handle of the coach door and turned it.

Then Dick stepped forth.

Neither ventured to speak, lest the tones of their voices should be recognised.

It now most unfortunately happened that this police officer behind the coach, finding it was about to stop, had alighted, and by the most wonderful chance in the world, met with one of his fraternity.

"Here," he said, "stand with me in this shadow, and be ready to assist me."

They watched, and then saw Dick Turpin alight.

"Why, it's the lady who has got down, eh?" the officer.

"So it is."

The faint sound of their voices reached Dick's ears.

He wondered what he should do to escape.

A bold thought then occurred to him, and without pausing to consider much about it, he advanced with an easy and confident step towards the front door of the house opposite which the hackney-coach had stopped.

In the meanwhile, the vehicle itself was set in motion The officer now was considerably puzzled.

But he believed he jumped to the correct conclusion.

That was, that the lady had so far aided Turpin in his escape, and had taken this the first opportunity of leaving him.

The idea that they had changed dresses did not occur to him, yet he felt some kind of a doubt upon his mind, for he said to the officer he had so unexpectedly met with:

"Just keep an eye on that lady there, and watch where she goes, and let me know all about it. You understand? I can't stay longer, for time is precious."

He darted off down the street as he spoke, and Dick had the satisfaction of seeing him go.

Dick knocked boldly at the door of this house, because he saw a red light burning, denoting that it was the residence of a surgeon.

His summons was quickly attended to, and he entered the house just as the officer ran by after the hackney-coach.

On the door was a brass plate, and Dick made out the name to be Markham.

The door was answered by a rather sleepy-looking female servant, who inquired what was wanted.

"Does Dr. Markham live here," Dick asked, stepping across the threshold.

"He does."

"Is he at home?"

"Yes."

"Then tell him I wish to speak to him for a moment. I will stay here for your reply."

The girl retired, leaving Turpin in the passage.

"Now," he said, "if it was not for that confounded officer outside I would make a bolt and be off at once; but there were two of them, I feel certain—I heard their voices. Confound it, what shall I do, and what shall I say to Dr. Markham when I meet him?"

CHAPTER DCCCXV.

DICK TURPIN CREATES NO SLIGHT AMOUNT OF CONSTERNATION IN TWO HOUSEHOLDS.

Just while Dick Turpin was asking himself these questions, his eye happened to fall upon some dusky objects that were revealed by the dim sputtering light of the candle that had been left by the servant girl upon the hall-table.

These dusky objects were hanging close to the wall, and upon examination they proved to be a coat and a three-cornered felt hat.

In a moment, Dick made up his mind what to do.

He listened.

But could hear nothing of the doctor approaching.

Then, as quick as thought, he tore off the feminine apparel he had on, exchanging it for the coat and hat.

He rolled all the lot up into a bundle.

A complete metamorphosis had now taken place, and the question now remained to him, should he stay where he was and enjoy the bewilderment of the servant, or should he endeavour to make his way out of the house unseen?

As there appeared to be yet time, he decided upon the latter course.

He was in hopes of finding that the house had a separate back entrance, and was about to seek it, when he was startled by the appearance of a light at no great distance.

There was only one way now in which he could retreat, and that was by ascending the staircase, and accordingly he availed himself of it, bounding up three or four steps at a time.

The stairs were well carpeted, so that in his ascent he made scarcely any noise.

He paused upon the first landing.

"Eh! what?" he heard a voice say in the passage below, which he conjectured must belong to Dr. Markham—"what, a patient—where has she gone? Here, Mary Ann, you hussy, what do you mean?"

Dick did not wait to listen to any more.

He left the doctor and the servant to explain the mystery as well as they were able.

He still carried the bundle of feminine apparel, his determination being to dispose of it as soon as he found a convenient opportunity of so doing.

Another flight of stairs commenced from the first landing, and Dick ascended these.

"I will make my way out on to the roof," he muttered. "That, after all, will be the easiest and most effectual plan. I shall then quite get rid of my pertinacious foes."

He was of necessity compelled to be very careful.

But the house was silent, and he could hear quite distinctly Dr. Markham and Mary Ann wrangling together in the passage.

His hope was that he should find one of the attics unoccupied.

He knew that very often the topmost room in a house was used only for the storage of lumber, and boxes, and such-like.

Pausing at length before a small, ruinely-fitting door, he stood hesitating whether to raise the latch or not.

This state of indecision quickly passed away, and with all the secrecy he was master of, he slowly raised the latch, then pushed the door open to the extent of about a couple of inches.

He found at once that the attic was plunged in darkness.

Placing his ear close to the edge of the door, he listened with great intentness.

But no sound resembling the regular breathing of a sleeper reached him, and therefore he concluded that the room was empty.

Boldly pushing open the door, he crossed the threshold.

Before him he could see distinctly enough the small latticed window.

He advanced towards it slowly, for although the place was dark, yet there came enough light through the window to enable him to see that it was piled up with a miscellaneous assortment of objects.

The window was reached without an alarm being given.

He opened it, and in another moment was on the tiles.

He crept forward with as much rapidity as the nature of the place would allow of; and having in this way passed over the roofs of about half a dozen houses, he paused, for he found himself at the corner of a street that branched off from the main one.

Further progress in that direction was impossible, and so he resolved to carry out his original intention of entering by one of the attic windows, and getting out.

The present, however, was a very favourable opportunity of disposing of the bundle of clothes, and he looked about him for a good place of concealment.

He could think of nothing better than a chimney.

So, crawling up the tiles, he stood upon the ridge of the roof, and was then able to place his hand upon the top of the chimney.

He had to use some degree of force to thrust the bundle down it, but he pushed it out of sight, and was content.

"There," he said; "it won't be long before that's found, but I shall be far enough away by that time. There'll be a smoke, too, in somebody's house when the fire is lighted in the morning, I shouldn't wonder."

Returning to the attic window, he remained for some time on the outside of it, listening, and wondering whether to attempt to effect an entrance or not.

While he was yet undecided, he suddenly caught sight of a flash of light.

He drew back at once, yet not so far as to prevent him from seeing that the door leading into the attic he was about to enter was thrown open, and a man carrying a candle crossed the threshold.

He was a thin, pale, sickly-looking fellow, and his countenance, now that the candle-light shone upon it, looked the colour of dirty white wax.

The candle was in his left hand, and in his right was a bundle loosely tied up.

He seemed in a great state of dread and alarm, and Dick noticed that his hand trembled excessively when he deposited the bundle on the wretched little bed in one corner.

Then, seating himself upon it, and placing the candle by his side, this man drew forth his handkerchief, and wiped his face.

A being looking more ill at ease it was scarcely possible to find.

[DISCOVERY OF THE SKELETON IN THE VAULT.]

No doubt he could have assumed a different demeanour had he liked to disguise his own feelings; but just then the man thought that no eye was upon him, and that there was no necessity for hypocrisy.

Dick continued to watch his movements with great interest, for although he had come up into the attic, which was furnished as a sleeping-chamber, yet he showed no signs of being about to retire to rest—in fact, judging by the look of the bed, it would seem as though this man had got up, dressed himself, and then descended the stairs for the purpose of fetching the bundle.

Having removed the perspiration from his face, he again put his hand into his pocket, and drew forth another object, which the next moment Dick perceived was a knife.

He opened it quickly, and then it could be seen that the blade was very bright, and of about six or eight inches in length.

This knife, open as it was, the man placed in the [illegible] of his apparel, and, as he did so, a look of great ferocity overspread his disagreeable-looking countenance.

His lips moved slightly, as though he was muttering something to himself.

Then slowly rising to his feet, he took the candle and walked towards the door again.

But he trembled so excessively in every limb that he could scarcely put one leg before the other.

He was evidently using the greatest of caution, treading all the time on tiptoe.

No sooner did he leave the attic than Dick Turpin approached the window.

He drew his own conclusions from what he had just seen, and as he opened the attic window he muttered

"It seems to me very probable that not only shall I make my escape by entering this house, but render one of its inmates a service as well."

Price One Halfpenny.

He stepped lightly on to the little dressing-table underneath the window as he spoke, and from thence on to the floor.

Half a dozen strides then took him to the door, and, looking down the staircase, he could perceive the glimmering of the light below him.

These stairs were not carpeted, however, and as he had his heavy riding-boots on, it was rather difficult for Dick to descend with any degree of silence, yet by treading on his toes he managed admirably.

On the next flight he found a carpet, and felt more reassured.

Leaning over the bannisters, he could now see the form of the man below him.

With one hand he was shading the light of the candle, while he made a long pause between every step.

His countenance now looked more diabolical than ever, although it could be seen that he was suffering much from the agonies of fear and suspense.

On the first floor he came to a halt, and Dick paused upon the staircase about half a dozen steps from the bottom.

His body was effectually hidden by the angle of the staircase, though by leaning forward he could watch all the man's movements with the greatest ease.

The silence that prevailed in that house was something terrible, and it seemed to oppress the man Dick was watching greatly.

But he moved towards one of the doors opening from the landing, and then, with trembling fingers, raised the latch.

The door opened slowly, yielding to his touch, and by the manner in which it was done, Dick came to the conclusion that this was not the first time he had gained admittance to that chamber.

Crossing the threshold, the man closed the door behind him, and was lost to view.

But Disk almost with one bound sprang down the remainder of the staircase.

Then hastily opening the door, he rushed into the room, and was just in time to hear a loud shriek and to see the man standing by the side of the bed with his arm uplifted and with the knife glittering in his hand.

CHAPTER DCCCXVI.

DICK TURPIN RETURNS TO THE INN, AND FAILS TO PERCEIVE THE SIGNAL-LIGHT.

THE would-be murderer's face was turned towards the door, which, to his horror, had been flung open.

The blow he was about to deliver was arrested—his arm was suspended in the air.

Without an instant's pause, Dick seized the man firmly by the back of his neck and his wrist.

"Wretch," he cried, "you are foiled, and only just in time!"

A loud shriek was again heard, and something white rolled out from the other side of the bed.

Dick turned his face in that direction, and caught sight of a very wonderful-looking night-cap.

"Murder," said a voice—"it's murder! Oh, police—police! Where's the police?"

She made a frantic dash into an adjoining room that appeared to be a dressing-room.

Then flinging the window open, she renewed her cries.

A little aged man raised himself in the bed, looking not a little confused and bewildered at these strange events.

"Here," said Dick—"here is the assassin! Seize him—hold him tightly while I go for assistance. He is harmless now."

He wrested the knife from the man's trembling fingers while he spoke, and the man whose life he had fully intended to take seized him with a clutch that it would be quite useless to think of shaking off.

Dick then hastily left the room and sped down the stairs.

"Confound that woman!" he ejaculated. "What a dreadful uproar she's creating! All the neighbourhood will be roused, and I shall be seized. However, I can't leave this house too quickly—that's certain."

He reached the front door in an inconceivable short space of time, and, unfastening it, flung it open and darted forth.

But quite unexpectedly he met with an obstacle.

No sooner had he crossed the threshold than he found himself clasped tightly by some one.

"Not so fast, my fine fellow!" said a voice. "So it's you, is it? It's no good struggling and kicking—I have you!"

Dick then found that he had been so unfortunate as to run plump into the arms of a police officer, doubtless the one who had been set to watch a little lower down the street, and he had come there in consequence of the woman's cries.

"Fool!" said Dick, struggling to release himself, "you make a mistake; the culprit is upstairs, and, if you are not quick, will escape!"

"Oh, d—n you!" said the officer, who only held Dick all the tighter.

Hasty footsteps could now be heard approaching from various directions, and Dick was justly apprehensive that he should be overpowered by numbers.

It is true he could easily have cleared himself from the charge that was now made against him, but then there was the fearful risk that he might be recognised.

Therefore, summoning up all his energies, he struggled with the officer, and with a sudden wrench succeeded in releasing himself.

So violent was the disengagement, that the officer went spinning round and round until, in some mysterious way, his legs got entangled with one another, and he fell headlong into the gutter.

Dick darted round the corner and was out of sight in an instant.

Some of those persons who were approaching gave him the chase, but they quickly abandoned it.

Dick had seen enough of that quarter of the town, and so he troubled himself no further to ascertain what complexion affairs would assume.

His thoughts in a moment reverted to the loss of his bonny mare Black Bess.

She had escaped, he felt quite certain, but whether she was wounded or not he was by no means so certain.

The question was, where should he find her?

Strangely enough the idea did not at first occur to him that the most natural and likely thing for her to do would be to make her way at full speed to the inn.

But after a moment's reflection he felt sure that this was what she had done.

"I hope none of the officers have followed her," he said, "or we shall find ourselves in a serious fix. I am most certain she has gone, however, and the best thing I can do is to make my way back with what speed I can."

Dick looked about him, and, by the aspect of the sky, began to be apprehensive that he could not possibly return at the appointed time.

"I will take a hackney-coach as far as I can," he muttered, "and then walk the remainder of the distance; but I fear there is no chance of my arriving there before daybreak; and yet if Black Bess returns riderless, who can tell what they may do—what danger may be incurred from anxiety on my account?"

Dick was thinking more of Maud than anyone else just then, and for her sake he was extremely anxious to get back, as he well knew what a dreadful state of alarm and dread she would be in until she saw him once again.

Luckily a hackney-coach happened to roll by at this moment, and Dick entered it without delay, telling the man to drive him as far along the Oxford Road as he thought proper.

It was really quite a wonder that this vehicle happened to have a couple of tolerably good horses harnessed to it, and the consequence was that Dick made much better progress than he anticipated.

Yet the darkness seemed gradually to be rolling away and before he had got half-way to his destination the new day had fairly dawned.

Seeing this, Dick was almost in despair.

But it was impossible to urge the horses faster.

He continued to ride until within quite a short distance of Ealing Common.

Then he alighted, and gave the coachman such a liberal fare as actually to extort words of thankfulness from his lips.

Striking off across the fields, Dick made his way by the nearest possible route to the little plantation at the back of the inn.

Already it was fairly daylight, and from time to time he cast many anxious glances around him.

It was tolerably certain that Jack Marshall and his officers were somewhere in the neighbourhood, and therefore very necessary that he should use all circumspection.

By crossing the fields, however, and keeping close to the hedges, he managed to remain out of sight.

Without accident he reached at last the little plantation, and plunged into its depths with a feeling of great relief, for he felt confident no officers had watched his movements.

The plantation, though dense, was small, and therefore a walk that only lasted a few minutes served to take him to the back of the stable.

He approached with great cautiousness, stopping every few paces to listen.

Presently, reaching a place where he could just obtain a view of the inn, he looked very anxiously at the window at which the signal was to appear.

From that distance, and in the daylight, it was no easy matter to discover whether the candle was burning there or not.

He shaded his eyes with his hands, and looked long and earnestly.

He came at last to the conclusion that the signal had gone.

Not knowing what had happened, and fearing, from the events that had recently occurred, that some disaster had befallen his friends, Dick crept closer and closer to the little door at the back of the stable, feeling very undecided as to what he should do next.

A peaceful calm was all around him.

To this he attached but little significance, as it might be after all only a calmness of a deceptive character.

CHAPTER DCCCXVII.

TOM KING ARRIVES WITH HIS CHARGE AT THE RESIDENCE OF THE YOUNG BARRISTER.

"I AM ready now—quite ready," said Tom King, on the same evening, to Alice Whately. "You will come now, and I will in a short time place you under the care of one who, I hope, will always act the part of a true protector to you."

"I am ready, too," said the young girl, quickly, and in tones of gladness.

But immediately afterwards her feelings underwent a change, and tears sparkled in her eyes.

She had to bid farewell to those who had so greatly befriended her—to the only persons, indeed, who had turned a sympathising ear to her sad story.

She had been so long accustomed to the rigours and cruelties of people at the asylum that kindness now seemed to melt her heart at once.

After all, the lesson, though a very hard one, could not be without producing beneficial results.

Henceforth she would always know the value of happiness.

Like good health, those only can appreciate it who have lost it.

Some little delay therefore took place before she could tear herself away from these new acquaintances, and yet who, owing to the strange circumstances under which they had been brought together, seemed to have as much claim upon her as the oldest friends.

"You must excuse the mode of transit," said Tom King, apologising with a sickly smile; "but the fact is, it is the only one at our disposal; and there is this advantage connected with it, that you will quickly reach your destination."

"Make no excuses, pray," said the young girl, earnestly; "to you indeed, above all the rest, do I feel myself most indebted."

She clasped his hands tightly in her own while she spoke.

Tom King was too overcome by emotion to say anything further, and believing that the parting, if prolonged, would only be the more painful, he took the opportunity to lead her away from the inn.

Tom Davis was playing the part of scout. His watchful eyes fixed upon the proceedings of the officers, and they did not venture to go forth until he had assured them that the coast was clear, and that it was perfectly safe to do so.

Then, with as much rapidity as possible, they sought the stable, led out the horse, and mounted.

Tom King placed the young girl on the saddle behind him in such a manner that she could hold herself securely on by clasping him round the waist, while, at the same time, it left his hands free to guide the horse, or be prepared for any emergency that might arise.

He urged his horse at once into a gallop, and the rapid strokes of the animal's hoofs upon the road made conversation almost an impossibility.

And it was designedly that this was done, for Tom was in no humour to speak.

It was easy for anyone to see that his spirits were very much depressed—there was a weariness in all his tones and movements.

And so, almost in perfect silence, the journey to London was performed.

Tom King drew his hat down closely over his features, and, by great good fortune, escaped either an encounter with the officers or the attention of anyone.

Upon gaining London, Tom King, of course, began to look about him more warily.

But he saw nothing to excite his alarm.

He then asked something that he had hitherto forgotten, and that was the address of the young barrister.

"I cannot give it to you," said the young girl, "but I can direct you to it. It is one of those streets not far from the Temple, that leads from the Strand down to the river Thames. The house is old-fashioned and curiously built; it cannot be mistaken for any other—at least, I have been told so, and I have a sketch of it, so that I should not fail to know it again."

With this assurance Tom King was content, and once turned his horse's head towards the Strand—not then, as now, a busy, bustling thoroughfare, but one in which the houses lay few and far between.

"That's the street," said the young girl at length, and Tom King immediately turned down it.

"Go slowly," she said, "and I will point out the house."

It was reached in a few moments.

It was built at the lower end of the street—that is to say, nearest to the river.

Upon gazing upon it, the breast of the young girl was filled with emotion.

Slowly Tom descended from his steed, and assisted her also to alight.

But Alice clung to him, half in tears and half in sobs.

"I cannot go to him—indeed I cannot," she faltered—"it seems so very, very strange! Now that the last moment has come my courage fails me!"

It was no easy task for Tom to speak words of consolation and encouragement under these circumstances; but he tried his best.

"It is but natural that you should think thus," he replied; "I fully expected it. But I suppose Mr. Spencer does not live in this house by himself?"

"Oh, no, no," was the reply—"he only occupies two rooms here!"

"Then there must be a landlady—the woman of the house. Have you ever heard him speak of her?"

"Oh, yes, often—often! Mrs. Weaver. Norman told me of her, and always spoke in terms of the highest praise."

"That will do, then," said Tom King, quite suddenly; "we shall get over the difficulty now."

"In what way?" she asked, timidly. "What shall you do?"

"You will see. We will knock at the door, and ask for this Mrs. Weaver. You shall remain with her for a short time to recover your self-possession, while I——"

"Well, what will you do?"

"I will ascend to Mr. Spencer's room and prepare him for your unexpected arrival."

Even now the young girl trembled and shrank back.

But Tom overcame her diffidence by taking hold of her hand and drawing it beneath his arm.

In this way he led her close to the door of the house, and then knocked sharply for admission.

The hour was rather a late one, and therefore some moments elapsed before the summons was regarded.

Then the door was opened, and there appeared upon the threshold a tall, portly woman, with silvery hair and a pleasant countenance.

In tones which harmonised well with her appearance she inquired their business.

"I believe," said Tom, "that a young barrister named Spencer resides here?"

"Yes, sir, you are quite right—Mr. Norman Spencer. He——"

"This young lady," interrupted Tom, "is a particular and dear friend of his. He little expects her appearance now, and therefore I wish to prepare him for the visit. Will you, then, take charge of her while I make my way to Mr. Spencer's room?"

But tears started to the good woman's eyes, and she seemed scarcely less agitated than Norman himself might have been.

"Why, bless and save us, is it really so? Yes, it—you must be——"

"Yes," said Tom, "you will quickly come to an understanding with each other; and, as time is precious, in the meanwhile kindly inform me how I shall find my way to Mr. Spencer's room."

'Ascend the staircase," said Mrs. Weaver—"that lamp will enable you to see your way. Knock at the first door you come to on your right hand."

"On the first floor?"

"Yes."

This was enough.

Without another word, Tom strode hurriedly along the passage, and ascended the stairs.

Coming quickly to the door that had been described to him, he knocked softly at it with his knuckles.

A pleasant, cheery voice immediately cried:

"Come in!"

Tom opened the door and entered, as requested.

The apartment was only dimly lighted.

On the table a lamp was burning; but it was covered with a very large, conical-shaped shade, that cut off almost all the rays of light that would have been dispersed about the room, and reflected them upon the table.

Yet, although the room appeared to be in semi-obscurity, Tom was able to make out that its walls were lined with books, and that the table was loaded with papers.

He saw, too, the form of a young man of noble and commanding beauty, but whose stooping shoulders and pallid face showed too close an application to study.

Upon Tom's entrance, he rose to his feet, and looked inquiringly at his visitor.

"I am a stranger to you," said Tom, bowing stiffly and speaking in cold and measured accents, "yet I am not aware that that will matter. I am merely a messenger, and yet the bearer of most important tidings."

"Indeed, sir! You speak mysteriously."

"I do not wish to keep up any mystery, believe me, and yet I don't wish to come direct to my subject."

"Perhaps it would be better," said the barrister, who seemed either not pleased with the appearance of his visitor, or angry at having been disturbed from his studies.

"Well, then," Tom said, "tell me whether you remember the name of Whately? Oh, you start! It is of one who bears that name that I come to speak."

"What—oh, what is it?" said the young man, pressing his hands tightly over his heart—"what—oh, what is it? Do not keep me any longer in suspense! Tell me—do tell me! If——"

"Prepare yourself for a great shock," said Tom; "but the tidings I bear are those of joy and not sorrow."

"Is it—is it——" gasped the young man; but he was unable to finish his sentence.

"It is of Alice Whately that I am about to speak," said Tom.

He was interrupted with a sharp cry, and the young barrister sank back into his chair.

"Let me implore you," he cried, "to tell me all you have to communicate of Alice Whately in as few words as you can! She disappeared most mysteriously more than twelve months ago, and, although I have used every effort, I have never been able to find her since."

CHAPTER DCCCXVIII.

TOM KING HAS AN INTERESTING INTERVIEW WITH NORMAN SPENCER.

Tom King at this moment drew a chair up to the table and seated himself in it in such a position that he was able to look keenly into the countenance of the young man before him.

"Before I satisfy you," he continued, "let me know in what relation you stood to Miss Alice Whately?"

The pale cheek of the student flushed slightly as he answered:

"Chance threw us into each other's society. We learned to love each other, and she promised to be my wife. There you have in a few words everything."

Tom nodded.

"I had understood such was the case; but explain how it was when you learned that she had disappeared that you did not discover her whereabouts?"

"That's a long story to begin," he said. "Before I tell you, answer me one or two questions."

"Well, say on."

"Have you seen Miss Alice Whately?"

"Yes."

"Recently?"

"Yes."

"Don't be so laconic—have some pity; you see how dreadfully this agitates me. I did not know I was so weak."

He leaned his head upon his hands as he spoke.

"Is she well?" he continued.

"I can say yes to that also. And now tell me, if you will, how it was you learned of her disappearance?"

"Well, then," said the young man, hesitatingly, "you must know that the attachment between myself and Miss Alice Whately was, to call things by their right names, a clandestine one—neither her mother nor her father-in-law knew anything about it."

"So I believe," said Tom King.

"Well, then, we had agreed to keep it secret for some time longer yet, owing to my position, I was struggling hard for a livelihood; now I am literally overwhelmed with business, and I may, without egotism or vanity, confess that, by great good fortune, I now occupy a prominent position in my profession."

"I rejoice to hear it," said Tom King; "but I fear you have purchased it at a high price."

"How so?"

"By the loss of your health and bodily vigour."

"I have kept at it too closely, I am well aware of that; but I did it in order that I might drown thought. It is only by keeping myself constantly employed that I have been enabled to retain my calmness in the least."

"I don't wonder at it. And now to the point again."

"I see, you are determined to hear all. Well, then, when I parted with Miss Whately it was agreed upon between us that we should continue a correspondence with each other. After a time, however, all letters ceased, and, although I wrote repeatedly, I could get no reply.

"This was just about the time of Mrs. Whately's death, or, to speak more correctly, just after it.

"Wondering at such strange conduct, I went at last to Morton Park, which, as you may be aware, was a residence of the Whately's.

"I sent in my name, and was ushered into the presence of Mr. Lucas.

"I thought that he regarded me with an expression of mingled suspicion and hatred. I requested to see Miss Whately, and he inquired, in a calm voice, what was my business.

"I said that concerned her alone.

"'Well, then,' he replied, 'I have to inform you of something that I thought you knew already. Most unfortunately, Miss Whately has taken her mother's death very deeply to heart—in fact, her sorrow was beyond expression, and now, I grieve to say, her intellects are tottering under the shock.'

"This was dreadful news indeed. Mr. Lucas continued to speak in these calm, placid tones.

"'I thought it best to be explicit,' he said. 'Her condition has given me the greatest uneasiness, and I have already called in the most celebrated physicians to see her. They all shook their heads, and fear the case is hopeless. They made many inquiries as to whether insanity had ever been known before in her family, but I was unable to give the information.'

"'Insanity!' I exclaimed. 'Surely you do not mean to tell me that Miss Whately is really mad?'

"'It grieves me deeply to say such is indeed the case,' he replied, 'and the physicians are unanimous in saying that the only chance she has of recovering lies in complete quiet and seclusion. As time wears on, she may then overcome this terrible malady—at any rate, it is the only thing that offers even the ghost of a chance. So you see that, let your business be what it may, it is impossible for you to see her.'

"I was so stunned and bewildered by this intelligence that I can scarcely remember the remainder of the interview.

"For once my usual presence of mind deserted me—I was overcome with anguish.

"Alice a maniac! The very thought was horrible in the extreme; but as I pondered over the whole affair, I began to think that it was not altogether unreasonable or unlikely that she should sorrow so deeply, and that it should have such an effect upon her delicate, sensitive frame.

"But then I considered that it was but temporary, and in a very short time all trace of the attack would disappear.

"In this hope I indulged for some time. Mr. Lucas informed me that it was necessary to confine her to her own chamber. She was only led forth at stated intervals, and then no one was allowed to see her.

"I contented myself with continually inquiring after her, and thought that, as the physicians had prescribed it, all was for the best, yet I clung to the hope that if she could but have seen me it would have gone far towards restoring her scattered senses.

"Would indeed that I had been resolute, but I allowed the chance to pass by.

"The accounts I continually received were favourable in the extreme, until, all at once, I was completely prostrated by the unanticipated intelligence that her madness had taken a most violent and dangerous form, and that it had become no longer practicable or safe to keep her at Morton Park, and that, under the advice of the physicians, she had been removed to a private lunatic asylum, where her disease had been well studied and was thoroughly understood, and where she would have a better chance of recovery than elsewhere.

"Can you, sir," said the young barrister, with deep feeling—"can you imagine what were my sensations upon receipt of this news?

"I was like a madman myself, and committed a thousand acts of extravagance.

"I remember Mr. Lucas saying to me:

"'I trust, sir, that as I have treated you confidentially you will keep this affair as great a secret as you can. It would indeed be most unfortunate for Alice should any report of her actual condition gain circulation. I shall give out that she is travelling on the Continent, and hope continually for her restoration to her senses, otherwise it might materially interfere with her prospects in life.'

"Reluctantly I promised to keep secret, and so we separated.

"Then it seems that Mr. Lucas had a quarrel with one of the servants—one who, to a certain extent, he had taken into his confidence.

"The fellow presumed upon his knowledge, and determined to try what power he had over his master.

"Mr. Lucas indignantly turned him forth.

"With this fact I was not made acquainted until afterwards.

"The man sought me out, and came to me, saying:

"'Mr. Spencer, you have been fearfully imposed upon by my master, Mr. Lucas. Oh, poor dear Miss Alice—poor dear Miss Alice!'

"'What is it?' I exclaimed, in great excitement—'what is it you are telling me?'

"'It is given out that she is mad,' continued the man, 'but it is nothing of the kind! I have certain knowledge that the whole is an infamous plot on Mr. Lucas's part, in order to get the whole of the property into his own hands! He has either had her made away with or shut up in some lonely, out-of-the-way place, where she cannot escape, and where no one can get to her!'

"'Impossible!' I exclaimed. 'You are traducing your master! What motive could he have had for such conduct?'

"'The love of gain, sir,' he replied. 'He married Mrs. Whately for her money, and then was bitterly disappointed to discover afterwards that everything belonged to Alice except an annuity, which died with her mother. Now, you see, as the heiress is out of the way, he comes in for everything. He pretends to hold it in trust, but he uses everything as though entirely his own; and if you try, you can easily obtain confirmation of my words.'

"I promised to inquire into so serious a matter, and the first thing I elucidated by my inquiries was that he had quarrelled with his master, and had been discharged, therefore I ceased to attach any importance to his communication, believing it to be made out of malice only.

"And from that time to this I have never been able to see Alice, and scarcely to hear of her.

"I have been to Mr. Lucas twice or thrice. He always has received me with the greatest urbanity, and always seemed deeply affected whenever the name of Alice was mentioned.

"One day I called and found he was engaged.

"To my surprise, however, he came out to see me, and said:

"'I am aware how deep an interest you feel in my daughter's unfortunate condition; and just at the present time a couple of physicians happen to be present who have just seen her, and who will give you their impartial opinion respecting her case.'

"I was anxious in the extreme to see these two physicians, and was introduced to a couple of plainly-dressed, gentlemanly-looking men.

"In a few words, Mr. Lucas made them acquainted with who I was, and requested them to speak respecting Alice before me as they would if I was not present.

CHAPTER DCCCXIX.

TOM KING BIDS NORMAN SPENCER AND ALICE FAREWELL.

"THE physicians smiled, and looked very serious. The senior one spoke:

"'We—that is, Dr. Templeton and myself—much regret what we have to say; but the fact is, Miss Whately's case has taken an unfavourable turn, and it may be requisite to keep her for a considerable time longer under restraint. She is in receipt of every care and attention, and, if recovery is possible, rest assured it will take place. By Mr. Lucas's request, we are giving the case almost our exclusive attention.'

"I bowed, but could not speak, for my throat swelled up and ached just then as it does now."

The young barrister was silent for a moment or two, and then he resumed:

"In short, however, the physicians gave me to understand that her lunacy was very serious, and probably would continue during her life.

"You can scarcely imagine what a shock this gave me; I verily believe that her death would not have caused me so great a pang.

"I had no more to say, and so I left, and that is all that has happened since.

"I have mourned for her as I should mourn for one who had departed this life.

"But now you say you have seen her, and that she is well."

"She is well," said Tom King; "but you must expect to see a great alteration in her appearance. Still, I believe her heart to be wholly and entirely yours, and one object of my visit was to ascertain whether your affections for her had undergone any change."

"Change?" echoed the young man, excitedly. "They can never change! Why do you find me at this midnight hour poring over these documents when, I assure you, there is not the least necessity for me to perform this labour myself? Why do you find me the shadow of what I once was? It is because my grief at her loss has been consuming me."

"Then, in that case," said Tom, cautiously, "with a fortune, or without, you would be equally ready to make her your bride?"

"Without—without!" said the young man. "It is herself, not her wealth, that I love; and now there is no necessity, for, by my industry, I am in receipt of a very large income indeed!"

"Then," said Tom King, "prepare yourself for a surprise."

Mr. Spencer regarded him fixedly.

"The story," Tom began, "that was told you by that servant was the truth. Miss Whately was never mad—no more mad than you and I are at this present moment; the whole was a base and hideous plot upon Mr. Lucas's part, and his object was to obtain the whole of her estates. He paid the keepers of the so-called lunatic asylum very largely, and they, being won over to his interests, kept Miss Whately a wretched prisoner there, declaring, on their honour as physicians, that she was insane."

The young man bounded to his feet with a wild cry thrilling from his lips.

"What is this you tell me? A plot—a falsehood? Not insane? Oh, how egregiously I have been duped!"

"You have indeed," said Tom. "I wonder that, with a man of your penetration, Mr. Lucas could have succeeded so easily; but, then, with admirable skill, he chose the surest means of hoodwinking you."

"That's it—that's it! And yet I have been greatly to blame. I shall never forgive myself!"

"Sit down a little while," said Tom, "and recover your composure; there is no need whatever for this excitement. I am happy to say that Miss Whately's danger is over."

"Then she is free?"

"She is."

"How, then, has she recovered her liberty?"

"I, by the aid of two friends of mine, took the law into my own hands and liberated her."

"Then, sir, let me pour out my heartfelt thanks to you, and while I do so I cannot help envying you what you have done—it should have been performed by myself, and by no other."

"That's a natural feeling," said Tom; "but be content that she is at last restored to you."

"Restored to me?"

"Yes. I, having set her free, requested her to tell her history, in order that I might advise her how to act, for she was in dire perplexity, as to return to Mr. Lucas's would have been injudicious in the extreme, and, naturally, she shrank from seeking you out."

"But she should have come to me at once!" he cried, enthusiastically.

"But supposing in the meantime you had changed," said Tom—"and such things have been known ere now—what a pang it would have cost her had she visited you then."

"It would—it would."

"And," he continued, "except you, she has not a single relative in the wide world—she is wholly dependent upon you, and I trust that you will never betray her confidence."

"Never—never."

"As you are a lawyer," said Tom King, "it would be presumptuous on my part were I to attempt to advise you how to act in this matter. Of course you know what legal forms should be gone through; yet, as a friend, I would give you a little advice. Let your first step be to make Alice your wife; you will then have full control over her; and after that, commence your proceedings against Mr. Lucas, and have him well punished for his atrocious crime."

"I will—I will. But I can't think of him now—at least, not until I have seen Alice."

"You shall see her," said Tom King. "I will call her."

He went to the door as he spoke.

But Mr. Spencer followed closely in his steps.

Tom had not to raise his voice to a very high pitch to make Alice hear him.

She was standing on the landing outside.

In a moment she was clasped in her lover's arms.

Tom felt that it would be wrong for him to be the spectator of such a meeting as that was, and therefore, unperceived, he stole away, and silently crept down the staircase.

In the hall below he met Mrs. Weaver.

"You understand the position of that young couple upstairs," he said. "Take Miss Whately under your protection until to-morrow, and then, at the earliest hour, she will be married to Mr. Spencer."

At this moment Tom heard a voice calling upon him, but he made no reply.

Steps could be heard descending the staircase.

It was the young barrister descending. Perhaps Alice was coming too.

No doubt their intention was to pour out their thanks over again.

The parting, Tom felt, could not but be painful in the extreme—at least, to him, and therefore he wished to avoid it as far as possible.

Disregarding the young man's approach, and brushing past Mrs. Weaver, he reached the front door and opened it.

With one bound, he crossed the pavement, and placed himself by the side of his steed.

Ere he could mount, however, he was rapidly seized by a powerful hand, and a voice cried:

"Help—help—help, all of you! A highwayman—a highwayman! A hundred pounds reward!"

Tom wheeled round suddenly, and by an effort of strength endeavoured to free himself from the detaining grasp.

But the hold was too firmly taken.

His adversary was a tall and exceedingly muscular man.

It was just at this moment that Mr. Spencer appeared on the doorway.

Seeing Tom assaulted, and struggling in the hands of some one, he at once joined in the struggle, of course taking Tom's part, for then he knew not who he was.

With one well-planted and vigorously-dealt blow the young barrister laid the police officer prostrate.

Yet, in gasping tones, the man cried out:

"A highwayman—a highwayman! A hundred pounds reward! Seize him—seize him! It's Tom King, the highwayman!"

The loud cries that he had uttered had reached the ears of many persons.

The neighbourhood showed symptoms of being aroused.

The sound of hurrying footsteps could be heard.

Tom King turned round to the young man who had just rendered him this essential service.

"I must thank you for what you have done," he said, "and yet I bitterly regret it."

"Regret it?—why?"

"Because you have laid yourself open to a serious charge, if this man chooses to bring it against you, for what he says is true. I confess that I am Tom King, the highwayman."

The barrister fairly staggered back in his great surprise.

He could scarcely believe the words that had just fallen upon his ears.

"You—you," he said—"you a highwayman? Impossible!"

"It is true," said Tom, "and I say it without boasting; but, without me and my comrades, Alice would still be languishing a prisoner in the miserable cell at the asylum."

"Quick, then, my good friend," said the young barrister, "for so you have shown yourself to be to me. No matter what you may have been to anyone else, I know you not as a highwayman. You have never played a highwayman's part to me, and therefore I say look to your own safety, and I will assist you to the best of my power."

"No—no!" said Tom King. "I am against all the world, and all the world is against me. It's long odds, but the struggle has been a hard and a long one, and is not over yet. Leave me to fight out my own battle, and do not give me cause for regret by mixing yourself up with me—it might cause your ruin. Farewell!"

With these words, Tom King sprang upon his horse's back, and wheeled round suddenly.

Several people had collected, wondering what was the matter.

But before they could make up their minds how to act,

Tom plunged his spurs deeply into his horse's flanks, and set off at a furious gallop.

In a few moments he was out of sight.

But it was not until London was left behind that he drew rein.

Could anyone have gazed into his countenance, it would have been seen that its expression was unusually sad.

All his vivacity was gone.

He did not seem even to have energy enough left to control his steed.

Gradually it slackened its speed, and, guided by its own instinct alone, turned its head homewards.

Some time elapsed before Tom found this out, and when he made the discovery he murmured:

"Well—well, perhaps it's best so. To-night I don't feel in the humour for an adventure. I could not enter into one with the least spirit, therefore the consequences might be fatal to me. And yet what matters it? Well—well, I will cling to life yet."

So saying, he slightly accelerated his horse's motion, and, some hours before he was expected, arrived in the plantation at the back of the Three Spiders Inn.

CHAPTER DCCCXX.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL MEET WITH AN ECCENTRIC TRAVELLER ON THE WINDSOR ROAD.

It was on the same night that Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, according to arrangement, also left the inn with the intention of trying their fortunes on the high-road.

Turpin and Tom King, they knew, had both taken the road to London, so that it left them free to choose three others.

There was the road leading to Windsor, and which generally was pretty well travelled, and, after a short discussion, the two highwaymen agreed that they would take this direction.

Accordingly they made their way down to the river-side, and crossed over at the nearest point.

The road was then straight before them.

"It is such a long while," said Claude Duval, "since we have done anything on this road, and the chances are ten to one against our meeting with any of our old foes; they will think we are not sufficiently audacious to venture on this highway, which properly enough may be called the royal road."

"Well, I suppose it may," replied Jack, "for the King and the rest of them often travel along it. I hope we shall only be so lucky as to meet with a good booty."

"So do I. Adventures I have had in plenty, and now should be very glad to come across something of a more profitable description."

"I am just in the same humour, so it's likely we shall get on very well. How much further do you intend to go before you pull up?"

"Oh, some distance further yet! I think we cannot go too far away from Ealing."

"I am quite convinced of that," was the reply, "and if you had agreed to stop here, I should have urged you to proceed further."

A feeling of the greatest unanimity therefore prevailed between the two.

They trotted on rapidly, but Sixteen-String Jack seemed to take no pleasure in sustaining a conversation.

He would drop off into a surly, taciturn mood, and more than once Claude had to repeat his questions before he could obtain attention.

"What is it that troubles you, and makes you so absent-minded, Jack?" he said, at length. "If you continue in this humour, I am afraid that it will be but a light booty we shall carry back to-night."

"Very likely," said Jack, giving himself a good shake, as though he should thereby relieve himself of the fit of depression that had to all appearances come over him.

"But you have not told me what it is," said Claude. "Why not tell me the cause of your uneasiness?"

"Well, I don't mind if I do, Claude. We have been old pals for a long time, and ought to be able to confer together."

"Quite right. Now, then, as to the cause of your trouble. Is it about the police officers?"

"Oh, no—not at all, and I had not thought of them."

"What is it, then?"

"The shadow."

"Oh!"

After uttering this exclamation, Claude subsided into silence.

"It's that which baffles and bewilders me," continued Sixteen-String Jack. "Try as I will, I can come to no reasonable conjecture concerning it, and I am afraid that you cannot assist me."

"I cannot. The mystery is to me quite as inexplicable as to you."

"Yet surely some day it will be cleared up?"

"Possibly," said Claude. "I should be glad to know just a little more about it than I do. It is no pleasant thing to think about."

"You are right enough there, and, strive as I will, I cannot divert my thoughts from it long together. I wonder if there is any truth in the general belief that the appearance of anything of this kind forebodes misfortune."

"No, no—I should think not. For my own part, I should try to arrive at a rational solution of it."

"So should I."

"And I'll tell you what it is, Jack—to-morrow night, so far as I can see, we shall all be together at the inn. We can arrange to stop, and perchance the shadow may appear. If it does——"

"Well, if it does?"

"Why, Jack, we will follow it. We will try, first of all, to make out where it comes from; and, if we cannot do that, we will follow it, and endeavour to see where it goes to."

"Agreed!" said Jack. "It would have been tried before this but for the important affairs we have had in hand."

"I know that. Has it been seen again?"

"Not that I know of. Tom Davis has not mentioned the subject."

"It is indeed most singular," said Claude, musingly. "There was no object in the room which could throw a shadow at all resembling that, and if there was, how could it move along as it evidently did?"

"That is what passes my comprehension," said Sixteen-String Jack. "and——"

Claude suddenly interrupted him.

"Hark!" he said. "Some one comes."

Jack checked his steed in a moment, and listened.

They could then hear some one coming along the road towards them.

His horse was only going at an easy rate, and the rider was amusing himself by singing snatches of various popular ballads.

"We will try him," said Claude. "He seems to me as much like one of the court gallants as anybody. If he is, we will strip him of all his fine feathers."

"We will. Get your pistols ready, then, and as soon as he is abreast with us ride out."

The highwaymen took up their quarters, and remained motionless as statues.

The traveller, doubtless little suspecting that anyone was lying in wait for him, came trotting along in the same easy style, continuing to burst out every now and then into the fragments of a song.

He soon came near enough for the ambushed highwaymen to catch sight of him, and then they saw that he was attired in a very fashionable costume indeed.

Immediately after this they rode out, and, presenting their pistols at him, bade him deliver.

At the same time, Claude, by a skilful movement of the rein, stopped his horse.

The traveller seemed by no means disconcerted by the encounter—in fact, he must have been amused rather than otherwise, for he placed his hands to his side and laughed heartily.

"What do you say, gentlemen—deliver? Aha! that's good, upon my word—it's the best joke I've had to-night. Deliver! pray what shall I deliver to you?"

"Your money, jewels, watch—any valuables you may have about you," said Claude, sternly. "We are not in the humour to be trifled with, and if you are merry we are not."

"Good again," said the traveller. "You are welcome to all you can find about me. Aha! that's the joke. You see, I've been in rather good company to-night—the best of company, and to prove it, why, you see, they have stripped me of everything I've got. Well, what's it matter? Hartshorn is a very good fellow, and I'll maintain it against everybody; but if I play cards in his house again, or rattle a dice box, may I be skinned!"

"All this is nothing to us," said Claude Duval. "Once more, will you give us what you have, or will you compel us to take it? We shall be rather rough about it, you may depend."

"Oh, take it—take it," said the stranger, good-humouredly; "you are heartily welcome to all you can find. I said that before, didn't I? If not, I meant it—that's all the same. Didn't you understand me? We've had a little play to-night, and, by gad! I kept losing and losing till they won everything I had got, and took some notes as well. Aha! But what does it signify to me? But I'm plucked this time.

"Oh, heedless youth, beware,
For gambling is a snare.
If you play——"

"Stop your singing," said Claude. "I've heard enough of it."

"You're complimentary!"

"Oh no, not at all; but will you give me your word of honour as a gentleman that what you say is true?"

"Of course I will."

"Then we are to understand that you have been playing and have emptied your pockets, and that is why you take your meeting with us so easy?"

"Precisely, my good fellow—you've hit the right nail on the head this time, if you never accomplished that feat in your life before. And after this little explanation, suppose we bid adieu to each other? Good-night! Aha! It's a joke!"

So saying, this rather eccentric individual touched his horse with the spur and set off at a canter.

Our two friends made no attempt whatever to hinder his departure.

"Well, I hope we are not to take that for a sample of the kind of luck we are going to meet with to-night," said Claude Duval.

"So do I," replied Jack, "though it's rather an odd affair. How coolly he took it, to be sure!"

"Very coolly indeed! It is pretty certain that what money he has lost will not inconvenience him in the least."

"Oh yes, that's tolerably certain, and I only feel sorry that he should have been deprived of it by a lot of gamblers. I daresay, if the truth was known, he was robbed of it."

"Likely enough. But never mind, he's passed; let us forget him. Forward, once more. Perhaps if we get farther on along the road we shall meet with something better worth our while."

"That's very likely," was the reply, "and I only hope we shall."

CHAPTER DCCCXXI.

THE HIGHWAYMEN TURN THE ACCIDENT TO THE STAGE-COACH TO SOME ADVANTAGE.

A MILE or so more of roadway was passed over at a swinging rate, and then the highwaymen once again slackened speed.

Yet on this particular night the high-road appeared to be unusually deserted.

One traveller was all they had yet met with.

It was clear that the highwaymen had chosen an unfortunate night for an expedition in this locality.

Time was wearing on apace, and they were already a long distance from Ealing, so that if they had an adventure at all it was necessary that it should come quickly.

Suddenly passing round a bend in the road, Sixteen-String Jack uttered an exclamation.

One came at the same time from the lips of his companion.

They stopped abruptly.

Some distance off down the road they could see a light flash about in a very singular manner.

It moved from side to side, up and down, in a fashion very much resembling a will-o'-the-wisp.

As they stood thus and listened, the highwaymen fancied that the sound of voices was borne to their ears as though some persons were in great distress or trouble about something.

In a moment afterwards this sound became less equivocal, and Claude Duval exclaimed:

"There's been an accident, Jack—that's what's the matter. Let us ride forward and render what assistance we can."

Sixteen-String Jack's only reply was to set his horse in motion.

As they drew nearer they perceived that they had arrived at the right conclusion.

But they paused and approached cautiously.

Lying in the roadway in one huge mass was some very large vehicle.

And now they could hear oaths, and shouts, and cries coming most likely from people who had been hurt.

The light which they had caught sight of, and which at first had puzzled them so much, came from one of the lamps that had been detached from the vehicle, and was held aloft in the air by a man, though why he was doing this they could not quite make out.

"Come on, Claude," said Jack, "all's well for us. I do believe it's the stage-coach that's fallen."

The highwaymen drew still closer, and the sound of their horses' hoofs evidently reached the scene of the disaster, for many voices were upraised for help.

"Let us put a bold face on the matter," said Claude, and then he replied to the call that was made upon him.

Directly afterwards the scene of the accident was reached.

Their conjecture was verified.

It was indeed the stage coach, with its heavy load of luggage and passengers, that had, owing to some mistake or other, got broadside upon the road.

"Render what assistance you can," said Jack—"do your best to be civil; we shall make a profit out of this adventure, I'll warrant."

Claude fully understood what his companion meant, and dismounted from his horse.

He was immediately greeted with loud vociferations.

"Oh! open the door—open the door—unfasten it! Be quick, I say! Oh, help—help, I am suffocated—I am dying! Don't fight and struggle so! Help—help!"

These and a hundred other similar cries proceeding from the interior of the vehicle saluted the ears of the highwaymen.

"We will do the best we can," Claude answered, in a cheerful voice. "Have a little patience, and all will be well."

He advanced to the coach door while he spoke.

Those passengers who had been seated on the roof had met with serious injuries.

For the most part they were lying down insensible upon the road.

Those who were not, had been so much bruised and shaken as to be incapable of motion just at present.

By far the greater number were in the coach, however, which was actually lying down on its side with two of its wheels elevated in the air.

The horses were fighting and struggling furiously, not only injuring themselves but threatening to inflict still further damage upon the coach and its occupants.

It was then that Claude made out what was the meaning of the waving light he had seen.

It was the guard, who had taken one of the lamps from the side of the coach, and was holding it aloft in various positions for the benefit of the coachman, who was attempting the very difficult task of unharnessing the horses.

He could not get the light to suit him, and kept bawling out for some fresh movement to be made.

Under these circumstances, the passengers inside were quite neglected.

One or two selfish wretches, desiring only to escape themselves, and careless of what became of others, struggled and fought furiously to get through the narrow aperture, instead of putting out their hands and opening the door wide, as they might have done had they retained a little coolness and presence of mind.

One of those fellows had got half-way through the window of the coach, and was unable to get further.

He was kicking most desperately with his feet and as the inside of the coach was crowded, he inflicted much injury every time.

Claude understood this at a glance, and with that promptitude of thought and action which his adventurous life had conferred on him, he seized hold of him by the collar of his coat, and with one sudden effort of strength dragged him completely out, then flung him into a stagnant ditch by the side of the road.

He uttered a dismal yell, which, however, was suddenly cut short, probably by some of the filthy green vegetation on the surface of the water getting into his mouth.

Being thus disposed of, Claude took no further notice of him, but, with a wrench, turned the handle, and flung open the door of the stage-coach.

"One at a time, if you please, and give the ladies the precedence!" he cried. "It's all right—the worst is over, and there is nothing to fear now, if you will only be quiet! Whatever damage is done, you alone will be to blame for! Now, ma'am, let me assist you."

Claude took hold of a female dressed in deep black, and lifted her easily out into the road.

Another and another followed, and then a couple of the opposite sex appeared.

Claude allowed them to scramble out for themselves. That was all the inside of the coach contained.

In the meanwhile, Sixteen-String Jack had turned his attention to those passengers who had been seated on the roof.

A little water dashed into their faces, quickly, had the effect of restoring them all to consciousness.

The coachman, too, had, with great skill and address, succeeded in his undertaking.

The harness was unentangled, and the horses were once more standing on their feet, though trembling in every limb from fright.

"Curse me," he growled, "if this isn't a pretty go! I wonder whoever heard of the like? Curse the man who made that off hind wheel, say I!"

"I hope," said Claude, addressing those he had rescued, "that you have not suffered any great injury from this accident! It might have been much worse than it is—much worse; but now, you see, all's well."

"Oh dear me!" said one of them. "Whatever shall we do? How will the journey be finished?"

"That I don't know," said Claude Duval. "I leave you to settle that among yourselves; but there's one little thing to which I beg to request your attention."

They all looked at him curiously.

"You must not forget the service I have just performed. Unluckily, I am not rich enough to work for nothing. Here is my hat—hand it round amongst you, and put into it your purses, watches, rings, or whatever you may have with you. Be quick, and save me the trouble of taking them from you."

"A highwayman!" they screamed, in dismayed chorus.

"Just so," was the reply; "and my name is Claude Duval, so you will know that I shall stand no trifling. Here, take my hat at once, one of you!"

The mention of his name produced a visible commotion among the travellers, and one cried out:

"Bradshaw—Bradshaw! Where's Mr. Bradshaw? What's become of him, I wonder?"

"Who's Bradshaw?" asked Claude. "Nobody that concerns me, I daresay. Go on, and make haste, and don't trouble yourselves any further about him."

"But," said another voice, "he said if any highwaymen stopped the coach, he'd show us what he would do. He had no money of his own, but undertook to protect that of everybody else. Where is he? Oh, there he is!"

It would seem that Bradshaw was the name of the individual that Claude had so unceremoniously cast into the ditch, and now, covered all over with green slime, and spitting and spluttering at a great rate, he crawled out of the ditch, and marched defiantly up to Claude.

"Then you're Bradshaw?" the highwayman said, coolly. "Quite fiery by night, I see. You want a little more of the cooling medicine. There, now! I hope you will be better next time."

Thereupon, much to the astonishment of everybody, and Mr. Bradshaw in particular, Claude seized him again, and, with what appeared to be an easy exercise of strength, flung him plump into the ditch again.

The splash he made was prodigious, and the odour arising from the disturbed water rather overpowering.

"Now," said Claude, "as he is disposed of, perhaps you will attend to my little application."

"I'll declare it's too bad!" said another. "First of all we are upset on the road, then a pretence is made of helping us, and we are robbed after all. It's what I call adding insult to injury!"

"So do I," said another voice. "And it's my firm belief that this was no accident. It was all done on purpose. Oh, you rascal! I only wish I had firearms with me, and then we should soon see the case altered, but, unfortunately, I am without them!"

"Don't let that be a source of inconvenience or regret to you," said Claude; "I should be sorry if such a trifle as that interfered with your intentions. Here, rather than you should go without, I will accommodate you. Take that pistol. Now, then, just let us see what it is you mean to do."

CHAPTER DCCCXXII.

CLAUDE DUVAL TAKES THE CONCEIT OUT OF THE SWAGGERING TRAVELLER.

The swaggering attitude and manner which the traveller had displayed suddenly disappeared, and instead of availing himself of the weapon that had just been offered, he shrank back and endeavoured to conceal himself behind the forms of his fellow-travellers.

There was of course a general laugh at his expense, in which Claude joined.

Raising the pistol slowly in the air, he pulled the trigger, and a stunning report followed.

The red flash caused by the explosion of the powder looked quite alarming, and all the female travellers uttered a loud shriek of dismay.

Claude returned the pistol to his pocket, and produced another, which he cocked with great deliberation.

"There," he said, "I just wanted to know whether my firearms were in proper order or not. Here's another—the twin brother of the one I have just put away. But I hope you will not be so foolish as to refuse to do as I ask you."

Something was put into his hat immediately.

As he had fully expected, the discharge of the pistol quite put an end to the irresolution of the travellers.

Many and various articles of value were quickly deposited in the hat, and as soon as he saw that it was full, and perceived that each person in the party had contributed something, Claude exclaimed:

"There, that will do. I will not trouble you for the other things that you may have. Thank you. I shall leave you now to continue your journey in the manner that may be most agreeable to yourselves."

He rapidly transferred the contents of his hat to his pockets.

During this time, Sixteen-String Jack had been similarly engaged.

The outside passengers who had received so much of his attention were in no small degree astonished upon finding that they were required to pay, and that very handsomely, for the civility that had been shown them.

But Jack was inexorable, and soon showed by his stern manner that he fully meant every word that he said.

Consequently they all hastily complied with his demands.

He bade them farewell with somewhat similar words to those that Claude Duval had made use of.

Then, going to the place where he had left his horse, he mounted him.

He was only just in time, for from the meadows on the west side of the road could be heard a confused noise of shouting.

The next moment there was a crashing sound, and a party of officers at once very unexpectedly made their appearance upon the scene of action.

They had been at some little distance off on a road that ran almost parallel with the highway, when, hearing the report of Claude's pistol and judging something to be amiss, they had made all speed they could in the direction from which the sound had come.

But they arrived just a little too late.

No sooner did they appear than Mr. Bradshaw, still dripping with water and covered with duckweed, which clung most pertinaciously to his apparel, screamed out, in an excited tone of voice:

"Claude Duval—it's Claude Duval; he's robbed us and thrown me in the ditch! There he goes—there, on that tall brown horse! Can't you see him? Make haste, or he will be out of sight!"

"See him?—where?" asked the officer, anxiously.

"There—over the hedge yonder; he has left the road, and is flying over the meadows at full gallop!"

"After him," said the chief—"after him! I can't see him yet, but no doubt we shall all in a minute or two!"

The people had to scramble out of the way of the officers' horses in the best way they were able.

In another instant they were left to themselves on the high-road.

With them, of course, we have no more to do.

Our attention must be given to the highwaymen.

Although the officers had appeared so quickly, yet our friends, by speediness of movement, had managed to obtain a pretty good start.

Although Mr. Bradshaw had said that he could see them flying over the meadows, it is very questionable whether he could, for the night was dark, and, having once cleared the hedge, they were quickly out of sight.

While flying at this headlong rate, Claude took care to bend in the direction of Ealing, although no one could possibly have guessed that that was his destination.

"We will get home, Jack," he cried, "as soon as we can."

"The sooner the better," was the reply.

"So I think. There will be a tremendous uproar over this affair, and we shall have to be quiet for a day or two at the least."

"We shall; and it will give us the opportunity for constructing the secret passage."

"It will; and it is highly necessary, I am sure, that that should be done."

Not for some time did they draw rein, and when they did, it was upon the summit of rather a steep hill.

From this they could obtain a tolerably extensive view of the country around them.

Of course, all objects looked confused and indistinct in the darkness.

Yet a deep silence reigned all around, for there was not even so much as a breath of wind to stir the topmost branches of the trees.

Sounds under such circumstances and in such a position could be audible when at a great distance, and although the highwaymen stretched their well-practiced ears to the utmost, yet they failed to hear anything like the clatter of their pursuers' horses' hoofs.

"All's well," said Claude; "and though it may be expedient to get back to the inn as quickly as possible, there is no need to go at this headlong speed."

"None whatever; go more gently; we shall be back in plenty of time."

"We shall. What sort of a booty have you obtained?"

"An excellent one."

"And so have I. To-night will make up for our recent disappointments. Aha! take it altogether, it has been a capital joke!"

"Capital!"

The highwaymen laughed, and altogether were in as good spirits and as light-hearted as though they were not in the least trouble or danger in the world.

At quite a comfortable, easy rate they took their way back to the Three Spiders Inn, and reached the plantation without difficulty.

Pressing through it, they halted not far from the back of the stable, and looked anxiously for the signal light.

It was not there, and while they were speculating upon this, and wondering what it could mean, they saw the candle suddenly placed in the window.

"It's all right," Claude cried. "I suppose Tom thought it was not worth while to display the signal earlier. I think we may congratulate ourselves upon being first back; it will give us an opportunity of counting over our booty."

"So it will. As everything is all right, let us advance."

The door at the back of the stable was quickly opened, and the highwaymen led their horses through.

Having first attended to their wants and made them perfectly comfortable, they ventured to make their way to the back of the inn.

They raised the latch, and Tom Davis appeared.

He was not a little surprised to see them back so early.

"What," he exclaimed, "is it possible—back already? Nothing has happened, I hope?"

"Nothing at all disagreeable," was the cheerful response, "but quite the reverse. We managed unexpectedly to lay hold of a good booty, and so resolved to come here with it without any delay."

"And a very wise determination too, that's all I can say about it. It is much better to return early than to wait almost till daybreak, as you have always done hitherto."

CHAPTER DCCCXXIII.

BLACK BESS ARRIVES RIDERLESS AT THE THREE SPIDERS INN.

"HARK," said Claude Duval—"hark! do you hear that? What can be the meaning of it? Who is approaching at such an hour as this?"

"It seems unusual," replied Tom Davis, his cheek paling with alarm. "And hark again—what a strange cry that was!"

Claude and Sixteen-String Jack scarcely stayed to listen, but, hastily rushing out of the kitchen, made their way to the front of the inn, for it was from there that the sounds that so startled them had come.

The door was rapidly unfastened, and as soon as it was flung open and they looked out, loud cries of dread came from their lips, alarming all who were in the building.

Everyone was on the alert instantly.

And then, above all other sounds, came a strange, whining, moaning cry.

By intuition, as it seemed, all felt that some dire calamity had occurred—some accident of more than usual fearfulness.

The impulse of all was to rush to the front of the inn and ascertain exactly what the evil was.

Maud and Ellen, however, were so overcome with sickening suspense that at first they could not move.

Then, summoning all their energies by a terrible effort, they followed in the footsteps of the rest.

The sight that had called forth those cries from the lips of Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval, was well calculated to appal them.

Riderless, with her mane seeming to stand half erect, and with her flanks one mass of foam, with her eyeballs wildly glaring, and her nostrils widely dilated, they beheld Black Bess standing in the roadway.

As soon as she caught sight of them, that mournful sound was uttered—a cry that will at times escape the lips of a horse, when the animal is labouring under excessive alarm or pain.

It seemed most unmistakably a cry requesting aid and immediate succour—at least, so the highwaymen and Tom Davis interpreted it.

Their consternation cannot be described, and scarcely imagined.

So stunned and overcome were they at the first, that they could only gaze blankly into each other's countenance and murmur:

"The captain—where is he? What has happened?"

A piercing shriek at this moment awoke all the echoes of the night, and caused Black Bess to start, and she seemed, by her manner, half-inclined to rush off again.

It was from Maud's lips that that piercing shriek had come.

She had caught sight of Black Bess, and that was enough—it was a confirmation of her worst fears, and, without pausing to think more or make another movement to ascertain if possible the extent of the calamity, she threw up her arms and fainted.

She was assisted into the house by Ellen and Mrs. Davis, who were scarcely less terrified at what they saw.

"Good heavens!" said Tom Davis, at length. "Can what I see be really true, or am I in a dream?"

"It is no dream," said Claude, in a voice choked by grief—"it is no delusion."

"No," said Sixteen-String Jack, "we may at once make up our minds to the worst. Never in life would Dick part with Black Bess, and so you may depend he is no more."

"Oh, if she could but speak and tell us what had happened!" said Tom Davis. "As it is, we are filled with a thousand terrible conjectures. Woa, mare," he continued—"woa, lass—that's it—quietly now—quietly."

He placed his hand upon her neck, patting and stroking her.

Black Bess responded to the caress by another of those doleful cries.

"What is it then," said Davis, soothingly, and endeavouring to reassure her—"what is it? Ah, what! A light—a light!" he broke in, quickly—"bring me a light! Why, what's this?"

He held up his hand as he spoke.

"Blood?" said Sixteen-String Jack, interrogatively.

"Yes, it's blood, and sticky—yes, yes, that's blood."

"Then the worst has indeed happened. Who can say where his remains are now? He has been shot, probably while in pursuit, and Black Bess, like a faithful dog, has come to tell us the sad fate of her master."

After that, the highwaymen and Tom Davis seemed as though paralysed.

But after a time they recovered themselves sufficiently to procure a light.

Then, by the aid of it, they saw that there was blood upon the neck and mane of Black Bess.

There was blood also dyeing the flaps of the saddle, and the reins were broken and hanging loosely upon her neck.

"Yes, this is confirmation," said Tom Davis. "The best and truest friend is gone. What shall we do now without him? and who shall venture to console Maud for her loss?"

"It is dreadful," said Claude Duval—"by far too dreadful for speech. But come, we can do nothing here—in fact, we are only running a serious risk by remaining in the road. Lead Black Bess round to the stable, and in the meanwhile we will carefully remove all spots of blood from the road, if there are any; otherwise we may be tracked."

"And then," said Tom Davis, scarcely able to speak—"then we must consider what is to be done, though I fear there is no chance of being able to render the captain any service now."

To these desponding words no response was given, but the suggestions made were carried out.

Black Bess was led back to the stable, and by the light they carried the ground where she stood was carefully examined.

But they failed to find a single spot of blood upon the road.

"No—no—all's well; there's nothing to excite suspicion," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Now, then, to enter the inn and confer with Davis. Under such circumstances what can be done? Would that Tom King had arrived."

"He will be here shortly, I have no doubt," was the reply. "Come—come, we are better and safer indoors than out."

"What matters now, for safety indoors and outdoors now is all the same. We've lost the captain, and we may as well have lost ourselves."

His comrade could think of no words of consolation to offer.

He could not ask him to look upon the brighter side of things.

Entering the inn, they found that Maud had recovered from her swoon, and was now in a state of excitement that was awful to witness.

She was, in fact, delirious.

In the wildest terms she demanded to be taken to Black Bess, and had this wish been acceded to, there is no knowing what turn her frenzy might have taken next.

Gently and firmly, however, she was restrained, and the best face was put upon matters that they could think of.

"Do not give way to despair all at once," said Sixteen-String Jack, with quivering lips; "he has met with many a mishap before now and got out of it gallantly. Very likely we shall see him shortly—wounded perhaps, but yet not dead."

"Yes, yes—dead!" shrieked Maud. "I am sure he is dead! I feel it—I know it! I am as certain as I should be if I saw him now! But where is Black Bess? Let me go to her! Why do you deny me that trifling favour?"

"It is best not," said Tom Davis, who was thinking of the stains of blood.

"You have some reason for your refusal!" she cried—"you know something that, by a mistaken kindness, you are keeping from me! Do so no longer, I implore you, but let me know what it is!"

It was indeed a difficult part that our friends had to play.

They had to control their own overwhelming grief, while they calmed Maud by uttering suppositions which they believed to be wholly without foundation.

And in this manner one miserable hour passed.

The senses of all were stretched to the utmost.

They were expecting to hear some other sound.

At last a footstep in the yard attracted their attention.

They turned round, and before they could make another movement the door was opened and Tom King appeared.

His face was ghastly white, and had upon it an expression of great grief and sadness.

But he started and uttered an ejaculation of amazement when he saw the attitudes of those around him.

"Dick—Dick!" shrieked Maud, imploringly, and rushing towards him while she spoke. "Where is he—have you seen him, Tom? Your friend—your true old friend—have you seen him? Do you know anything of him?"

"Know anything of him?" said Tom—"what do you mean? Speak quickly, one of you, and explain all this—speak, I say!"

The terrible confession had then to be made, and all could see how severe a blow this was to Tom.

At first he was incredulous, and then demanded a light.

"Let me go with you!" shrieked Maud—"do let me go with you—do let me go!"

"It's best not," said Tom Davis, and while he spoke he contrived to glance at Tom significantly, so that he understood there was some reason why it would not be well for Maud to pay a visit to Black Bess.

"No," he said, "we will wait a little while and see what happens. I do not, after all, despair of seeing him return safe and sound."

"You say those words with your lips, Tom," said Maud, "not with your heart; you think they will console me and lighten my grief, but you make a mistake—quite a mistake!"

Tom was silent, for he could not deny the allegation.

It then seemed as though they could do nothing but sit and gaze with speechless sorrow into each other's countenances, seeking in vain for some dim and distant ray of hope, yet seeing none.

CHAPTER DCCCXXIV

MAUD ELUDES THE VIGILANCE OF HER FRIENDS, AND SUCCEEDS IN ENTERING THE STABLE.

Tom King, of course, had entered the stable by the little door we have so often described, having first seen the signal in the window above.

The interior of the stable was profoundly dark, but yet he was familiar enough with it to be able to close the door after him, and to place his horse in one of the stalls.

Consequently he failed to notice that Black Bess was there as well as the horses belonging to Claude and Sixteen-String Jack.

This was how it was that he was anxious for a light, in order to go and satisfy some of his doubts by an inspection of her.

"I shall not despair," said Tom Davis, though the tone of his voice gave the lie to his words—"I shall not despair until day fairly dawns. I have great hopes we shall see him return before then, or receive some message from him. If we do not, it will then be time enough to give way to grief and anticipate the worst."

Another hour, more weary and wretched than the first, slowly dragged away, second after second, each one almost being counted by the anxious, pale-faced group.

Tom Davis took an opportunity of drawing Tom King on one side, and whispering to him his reasons for keeping Maud from the stable.

"It is only natural," he added, "that you should both want to go, and there is no reason why you should not; but you must watch an opportunity to slip away unperceived, and I will take care that Maud does not follow you."

Tom expressed his thanks by a nod.

"Now, Davis," he said, "have a good look all round the premises, and tell me whether you can see or hear anything of him."

By this time it was beginning to grow light.

In the east the faint grey light of early dawn could be distinctly seen.

The air was cold and damp.

Davis shivered when he got outside.

"I knew this life was too pleasant to last," he muttered. "I had a presentiment that something would happen, yet in my worst forebodings I never expected anything so bad as this."

He made a perfect circuit of the house.

But he saw no trace of Turpin's presence.

He walked down the lane as far as the moss-grown finger-post at the corner, and then looked out.

Still he saw no one.

Then, returning by another route, he entered the plantation, and made his way through it in a devious, zigzag manner, until the stable door was reached.

Here, too, he saw nothing of the captain, and he had every reason for coming to the conclusion that he had not arrived.

"It is as I feared," he murmured. "He is dead, or else lying at the point of death. If it was all over with him, I do believe that I should be more content; but if he is so far gone as only to have life enough left in him to comprehend the nature of his position, it will be terrible indeed."

He entered the stable while he spoke, and, going up to Black Bess, began to look at her.

By the daylight he saw something that he had not noticed previously, so, hastening into the house, he obtained a large jug of hot water.

He was questioned eagerly upon his entrance.

But, as we know, he could impart no information.

Giving a glance to show that he wished to be left alone, he returned to the stable, and with the water begun to bathe Black Bess's neck and mane.

In doing this, he discovered that the blood that had caused him so much alarm had proceeded not, as he thought, from the veins of her rider, but from a slight scratch in her own neck.

It looked as though a bullet had just caught it, ploughing up the skin, and yet dividing the vein in its progress.

"You have had a dreadfully narrow escape, old lass," he said—"dreadfully narrow! A little bit lower down, and you would not have come back to tell the tale."

When she had been well washed and bathed, Black Bess no longer presented such a terrible appearance as she had done.

The wound was seen to be slight, and, with the exception of it, she was in her usual condition.

Tom then returned to the house.

He found only sad, grave-looking faces waiting for him.

Day had fairly come at last.

The sun had risen, and the only slender hope to which they had clung with the desperation that a drowning man clutches at a straw to save himself, was gone.

Dick Turpin had not made his appearance, so that the only inference was that he was dead or a prisoner.

The latter they scarcely judged likely, as they had over and over again heard him express his intention so positively to die rather than to yield to his foes.

Maud's grief now became less demonstrative than it had been.

She appeared to be settling down into the dreary stupor of blank despair—that fearful species of apathy which distresses the beholder more than the most violent demonstration of sorrow.

With her hands clasped over her knees, and with her head bent down, and her eyes fixed upon vacancy, she remained by the fireside, to all outward appearances paying no attention to what was said, and entirely oblivious of all that was going on around her.

Perceiving this, Tom Davis drew the highwaymen apart, bidding his wife and daughter to keep a strict eye upon Maud, and on no account to allow her to go towards the stable.

They, however, were by no means so observant in their watch as Tom himself had been.

An opportunity came when Maud was left alone, and she instantly availed herself of it.

The room was only left for a second, and they thought she might be altogether unconscious of their departure.

But instead of that, with a faint smile of triumph, she sprang to her feet, and darted through the back door and across the yard with the velocity of an arrow.

The stable door was fastened—not very securely, perhaps, and yet by means of a padlock and staples.

Desperation lent her a strength which she could never otherwise have possessed.

Seizing hold of the padlock, she, by one desperate effort, so far loosened one of the staples that she was able to pull it out afterwards.

Then, with a glow of satisfaction, she ran in, and sought the stall in which Black Bess was standing.

The sagacious creature knew her instantly, and uttered a faint cry of recognition

To Maud's ears it seemed as though there was something inexpressibly mournful in the sound.

She looked, but now the highwayman's steed presented quite her ordinary appearance, and the wound made by the bullet was such a mere scratch that even Maud thought nothing of it.

For one reason, it was concealed by her long, flowing mane.

Maud had fully brought her heart to believe that Dick was lost to her for ever—that she should never see him again, and therefore, under these circumstances, it was only natural that she should cling to Black Bess with a singular affection.

"If you could but speak," she said, unconsciously making use of Tom Davis's words—"if you could but give me some account of what has happened, the most dreadful knowledge could not be so bad as this uncertainty, when my imagination runs at full riot! Speak—speak! Can you not tell me where he is?"

Judging by the movements of Black Bess, it might almost have been believed that she comprehended the words that had been just addressed to her, and was making an effort to speak.

She raised her head, she arched her neck, and pawed the ground with one of her fore feet, while her eye assumed a brightness that was remarkable when compared with its former dulness.

Her ears were projected straight before her.

But the reason of this alteration was not ascribable to anything that Maud had said.

The noble creature's finer senses were cognisant of something of which Maud was ignorant.

Still, she looked at Black Bess with painful interest, wondering what such a sudden alteration could portend.

She had lived long enough near her to understand by her manner when it was she testified her joy.

And now the signs she made were evidently those of gladness.

She raised her head, and neighed loud, long, and shrilly.

But a widely different sound to that which she had made when she paused in front of the inn a few hours before.

It might be more compared to a joyful shout than to aught else.

Scarcely had the sound died away than there was the sound of a hasty footstep close at hand.

Then a voice said:

"Woa, Bess, my lass! Gently—gently! Woa, now—I'm here!"

As the last words were uttered, the stable door flew open, and Dick Turpin, hale and hearty, stepped across the threshold.

CHAPTER DCCCXXV.

DICK TURPIN, TO THE GREAT JOY OF HIS COMRADES, COMES BACK SAFE AND SOUND.

MAUD did not swoon now, nor faint, nor cry.

She did not move, but stood, clutching Black Bess by the mane, as still as though, by some magic process, she had been transformed to stone.

Yet those tones she heard—that voice—that form were those of Dick Turpin—unmistakably Dick Turpin.

Impossible as it seemed, he had come back safe and sound, and apparently unhurt.

Yet, had her life depended on it, Maud could not have stirred from that position, although she longed from the very bottom of her heart to spring forward and clasp him round the neck, and let her head fall upon his breast.

Yet she was unable to move a limb.

She could only gaze upon him in speechless surprise.

To Turpin her manner was most extraordinary.

The thought did not just then occur to him that, Black Bess having returned riderless, his friends would jump to the conclusion that he had been killed.

"Why, Maud—Maud," he exclaimed, springing forward, "what ails you?—what's the meaning of all this? Why, you are cold—cold as ice! Speak—speak! Don't look at me so strangely!"

Fortunately, at this moment a gush of tears came to Maud's relief.

She wept plentifully, and, in a voice broken by sobs, contrived to give him some idea of the real state of the case.

But before she could finish her incoherent narrative—before he could soothe and compose her somewhat, the stable was suddenly entered by Tom Davis and three more highwaymen.

The consternation exhibited on the landlord's countenance was really amusing in the extreme.

He first of all stopped short, and then staggered slowly back, with his arms outstretched, and with his eyes seeming to start out from his head.

"A ghost!" he cried—"a ghost! It is his ghost!

She has gone there, and now his ghost has appeared to her!"

The highwaymen behind scarcely knew what to think, they were so overcome by surprise.

Then, in those ringing, cheerful tones that were always so pleasant to listen to, and yet which never sounded so delightful as they did then, Dick Turpin exclaimed:

"A ghost—a ghost? Why, what are you talking of? I am no ghost, but here in flesh and blood! Are you bewitched?"

These words broke the spell, and all four rushed pell-mell into the stable, calling upon Ellen and Mrs. Davis as they did so.

But they were so firmly persuaded that Dick Turpin was dead—had so reconciled themselves to that dreadful idea, that they could scarcely believe him when he spoke, but crowded round him, and took hold of his hands and arms.

"Are you not hurt—not wounded in the least?" they asked, in great surprise.

"Unhurt?—yes. I don't think I have even a scratch; or, if I am, it is a scratch indeed, and I know not of it. But why is this alarm? Explain it to me, for at present, believe me, I am much bewildered."

But just then was not the time for explanations.

His comrades could do nothing but crowd around him, and testify in a thousand different ways how overjoyed they were to find that their dreadful fears were baseless.

"I have had some strange adventures," said Dick, "and some narrow escapes; yet none so narrow as Black Bess. I hope and trust that she is unhurt."

"Yes; don't alarm yourself about that, captain," said Tom Davis; "there's no necessity, I can assure you. She is just scratched, it is true; but so slightly that it is not worthy of a thought."

"Then all's well," said Turpin; "and now tell me what all this means."

"Into the house first," said Tom Davis—"into the house; we are better there than here, I think. Don't venture to cross the yard till I have seen all's well, for the police officers are lurking about perpetually, and if you are once seen, it will be a case."

"Right, Tom," said Turpin. "You cannot be too careful."

In a couple of minutes afterwards Davis returned to the stable door, telling them that the coast was clear.

They hastened across the yard into the inn.

Weeping, sobbing, and smiling through her tears, and clinging so tightly to him, that it seemed as though she would never let him go again, Maud accompanied her husband, who listened with great interest to the communication that his comrades had to make to him.

"I can understand now the cause of your alarm," he said. "It was natural enough; and yet, out of this circumstance I can derive some amount of pleasure; it serves to tell me how much I am thought of by all of you."

"You are," said Tom King; "and you ought to know it. When you are gone, we shall be gone too, you may rely upon that."

"Come, come, let us have no gloomy forebodings now; there ought to be nothing else but joy and happiness all through the day. I am glad to see you here all safe, and to learn that the officers have not been troubling you again."

"But much is owing to the perseverance of friend Davis here," said Tom King; "and I hope in a short time their suspicions will be allayed. If so, then this will be the safest place in all the world for us."

"It will indeed."

"But before we go further, Dick, we must have your adventures during the past night. We cannot rest until we hear them—so begin at once."

Turpin, knowing that it would be useless to refuse, complied at once, and all listened with the most breathless interest to his recital.

But Maud heard the whole narrative with terror.

She nestled closer and closer to him, and when he finished, whispered:

"When—oh, when, if for my sake only, will you give up all these terrible dangers? Even during this past night you have had a dozen escapes of your life."

"I know it," said Dick, "and, being so, what does it matter? I am safe still. It is in such dangers as these that I exult—I am in my element."

Maud shook her head.

"I tremble to think of what may come in the future," she said.

"Never fear it. Let us to-day be as happy as we can. First of all, we will try and get some rest, for I am sure that we all need it."

"I can speak for myself," said Tom, "but I shall just go into the bar and take a snooze in the easy-chair—that will put me as right as right can be; and don't forget that to-night we have something most important for discussion."

"What," asked Dick, his thoughts reverting to something else, "has it appeared again?"

"Appeared again?" echoed Tom Davis, rather mystified. "Oh! you mean the shadow. No, we have not seen that since."

"What were you speaking of, then?"

"The secret passage. Don't put off a consideration of that. Surely you can see that that is most important; and if we decide upon it, let it be begun at once, and completed before you venture forth again."

"We will talk about that," said Dick.

"I shall side with Tom Davis," cried Claude Duval. "I am fully impressed with the importance of his suggestions; and besides, the little adventure we have had to-night, and which I will relate to you this evening, will make it necessary for us to keep rather close, and, under such circumstances, why not turn the time to good account?"

"I see no reason why," said Turpin, "and I think we are all unanimous in our opinion that a secret mode of leaving this house is highly necessary."

"Yes, yes—quite unanimous."

"That's all right, then."

"And don't forget, too," said Sixteen-String Jack, "that there is another matter on hand—you have already alluded to it."

"The shadow?"

"Yes. You remember our arrangement—it was felt that we could not watch for it until to-night. Let us, then, all assemble in the kitchen, and watch for its appearance; then, wherever it may go—should it appear—we will follow it, and endeavour to unravel this dark mystery. If we can, it will be a great satisfaction to everyone, and will remove a great amount of uncertainty and uncomfortable feeling."

"With all my heart," said Dick Turpin—"let us have it cleared up if we can. I have been thinking much about it, and my inclination exactly suits with yours."

It was with this understanding that the highwaymen parted.

The remainder of the day was passed over in silence and in peace.

Jack Marshall and his officers must have been elsewhere, for Tom Davis could not see the ghost of one of them.

At this he felt rejoiced, for it made him hope he had got off upon a false scent.

It was not until just as it was beginning to grow dusk that the highwaymen one by one appeared in the huge, comfortable kitchen, and seated themselves round the blazing hearth.

Then the shutters were closed, the door fastened, and all made secure.

CHAPTER DCCCXXVI.

OUR FRIENDS ENDEAVOUR TO FOLLOW THE SHADOW ON THE WALL.

It would be difficult to imagine a more comfortable scene than this presented.

They fully believed that at that time they were as nearly as possible in a state of absolute security.

And yet, in spite of the feeling of satisfaction that this could not but impart, they one and all glanced continuously about them, with an uneasy sensation in their minds.

Such an appearance as they had already witnessed was one well calculated to annoy and oppress them.

To exist in a house with such a mystery hanging over it was almost impossible.

"You may depend," said Tom Davis, stirring up the fire, "that the reason why this house remained closed so long, and why we were able to purchase it so cheaply was simply in consequence of this visitation."

"It is very likely," said Dick, "though no hint was dropped to you at the time, I suppose?'

"No—not a word was said upon such a subject. Doubtless they thought that if half a word was spoken, they would lose their customer."

"And very likely too," said Sixteen-String Jack, "for it's quite the reverse of being pleasant to remain while something is going on around you which entirely baffles your comprehension."

"But," said Dick, "you forget."

"Forget what?"

"Why, our purpose. It is true we have been baffled as yet, but on the present occasion we have great hopes of being able to succeed in unravelling this mystery."

"So we have—so we have."

And Sixteen-String Jack glanced up at the clock while he spoke.

"It has caused us no harm at present," continued Dick, "and I don't think it reasonable that we should feel any apprehensions concerning it. What is it, after all, but a shadow on the wall? And even if we can't make out what causes it, we shall soon grow used to such an appearance."

"But that would be by no means satisfactory," said Tom King. "I have great hopes that if we are so lucky as to see it again to-night, we shall be able to follow wherever it goes."

"We will try to do so," said Dick; "and so that we may be prepared, let the lanterns be lighted, so that we shall be in perfect readiness in all respects."

This order was obeyed, and then quite a deep silence came over the whole group.

They sat still in the chairs, with their eyes for the most part fixed upon the fire.

Yet every now and then they would be turned towards the wall.

The night was rough and blusterous, and at frequent intervals they could hear the wind dash with extreme violence against the panes.

The gust would be succeeded by a heavy splash of rain.

It was certainly no night to be abroad, and it made them all draw closer up to the fire and appreciate more fully the comforts they then enjoyed.

As time passed on and the hour approached when the visitation had before been made, the silence was, if anything, more intense.

The wind lulled a little, and the rain fell gently against the window.

Suddenly all started.

That strange, deep sigh which, whenever they had heard it before, had sent such a peculiar thrill through every pulse of their bodies, again made itself heard, seeming, as before, to emanate from no particular spot, but to spread itself all over the apartment, and fill up every corner of it.

There was a sudden movement, and all their faces were turned with eager watchfulness towards the dark corner from which the shadow had on the previous occasion appeared to emerge.

Their watching was soon rewarded for, with a slow and gliding movement the shadow made its appearance, blurred and indistinct at first, but gradually settling down into a greater sharpness of outline than had been the case before.

Perhaps this was caused by the increased amount of illumination in the room; but, be the cause what it may, there could be no longer the least doubt that the shadow was that of a female.

The head could be seen, and even the delicately-formed features.

But the garments seemed long and flowing.

The little object, whatever it might be, was still pressed to her breast.

But of this no idea could be formed from its shape, for it was no more than an undistinguishable mass.

Gradually—gradually the shadow glided on; and so intently did all watch it, that they forgot to rise from their seats and be in readiness to follow it from the room.

Dick was the first to recover himself.

He started quickly to his feet, and grasped his lantern.

"Now, my friends," he exclaimed, "follow me—keep close behind me, and use your eyes to the best advantage to take notice where the shadow goes. It would be vexatious in the extreme if we lost sight of it as we did before."

The shadow now remained quite stationary, and again there came the heavy, deep-drawn sigh.

After that, the motion was resumed, and Dick walked slowly forward in the direction of the door.

"Draw your sword," said Claude Duval, in a whisper, perceiving that Dick had omitted to do so.

"For what reason?" was the answer. "Do you think it would avail me anything against a shadow? No—put up your weapons; there is, I am convinced, no necessity for a show of violence."

But although Dick spoke thus and chose to go unarmed, his comrades were of a different opinion.

It was better, they thought, to be prepared.

It will be recollected that on the preceding occasion the door had been left open a little way, and, upon reaching it, the shadow had appeared to glide out into the passage beyond.

Now, however, the door was shut close and fastened, and our friends all wondered what course the shadow would now take.

It did not pause again until getting quite opposite the door, so that the shadow actually fell upon the woodwork.

Then, while they gazed, it gradually became less and less distinct, appearing to lose its outlines by degrees and to diffuse itself all over the surface of the door.

Then, while they gazed, it vanished entirely.

The firelight shone clearly and distinctly on the curious old-fashioned panels, revealing every line.

No portion was obscured by the faintest shadow.

The appearance was exactly that of the singular apparition having vanished completely through the doorway.

Dick did not speak, but made a sign for all the rest to keep close behind him.

Maud clung tightly to his arm.

She felt she was in absolute safety, let him go where he might.

The door was quickly opened, and upon crossing the threshold the lanterns were raised, so that the light should be thrown around in every direction.

At first, nothing but the bare walls met their view.

But a moment afterwards, with a cry of satisfaction, Sixteen-String Jack said:

"Look—look—there it goes yender: very faint—very indistinct, but it's gliding towards the bar!"

Now that he pointed the shadow out there could be no doubt about its presence, nor about the course that it was taking.

Our friends all hastened onward.

They did not positively see the shadow enter the bar, yet they felt sure that it had done so, and did not hesitate to make their way into it themselves.

Then again they looked all around them.

But the walls were perfectly clear.

"I fear we've lost sight of it again," said Dick. "Ah! did you hear that?"

The sigh was again heard.

"It came from there!" cried Sixteen-String Jack.

And while he spoke he hastened towards the door, and attempted to open it.

But it was locked.

"The key, Davis," he cried—"where is the key?"

"Here it is," was the response.

The key was produced and hastily fitted into the lock, when Turpin asked:

"But where does that door lead to?"

"To the cellars," said Tom Davis; "and such cellars as they are, I'm sure you never saw; they are like so many vaults, and I have never yet been able to find the end of them."

By the time he had spoken, the door was thrown wide upon its hinges by Sixteen-String Jack, who cried:

"Now, then, a light, quickly—make haste!"

All hurried forward, and the united beams of all the lanterns were thrown down the dark, damp-looking flight of steps that was exposed to view.

"There," cried Sixteen-String Jack, again, excitedly —"there—there it goes! Can you not see it?"

"Yes," was the simultaneous answer—"yes; there it is, descending!"

Jack happened to be first, and so, of course, he kept the lead

The steps were only about twelve in number, so that the bottom was quickly reached.

They then found themselves in a large-sized vault or cellar, the walls of which were dark with damp and age, and therefore it was no easy matter to distinguish the shadow upon them.

But they did see it, and followed it easily from that vault to the next and into the next.

From this last, however, they could perceive no means of egress, so that they reasonably calculated upon making a discovery at last.

But to their disappointment the shadow only glided to a certain portion of the wall and then remained there stationary.

Our friends stopped too.

And then for the last time they heard the sigh, after which the apparition vanished entirely, leaving not the faintest trace behind it to show that such a thing had ever been.

CHAPTER DCCCXXVII.

THE HIGHWAYMEN FOLLOW THE SHADOW TO THE VAULTS, AND DISCOVER THE BRICKED-UP DOORWAY.

For some time they all looked rather blankly at each other at this unexpected termination of the adventure, and then Dick asked:

"Is this to be the end? Is this all we are to find out? It seems to me that there is no other mode of leaving this vault than that by which we entered it—is there Davis?"

"Not that I know of," was the reply.

"But the shadow appeared to dissolve into the wall as it did into the door above," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Perhaps it means that we are still to follow it. Bring the light closer and let us look."

The light was brought.

But Jack took it himself, and, holding it close to the brickwork, examined carefully all about the spot where the shadow had been seen last.

Then an exclamation escaped his lips.

"Yes," he cried. "I feel certain of it now. Look here, all of you, and tell me whether there is not the appearance of a door having been here at some time or other, and afterwards bricked up? Look at the arch in the brickwork—I think that is confirmation."

All pressed round him eagerly, and from the appearance which the wall presented it was tolerably certain that his conjecture was correct.

Many years must have elapsed since any of the bricks could have been laid, for there was no perceptible difference in their colour—at least, none that could be detected at first.

But afterwards, by a close scrutiny, they were able to make out that a portion about the size of a door was somewhat lighter than those around.

"Beyond a doubt," said Dick Turpin, "that's some exit from this cellar which, for some cause or other, has been bricked up, and now the question is, shall we endeavour to open the passage?"

"Yes, yes—by all means!" was the unanimous reply.

Dick smiled, for the answer was just what he had expected.

"Then tools must be fetched," he exclaimed; "and I don't know where we shall find any suitable."

"But I do," said Tom Davis. "I've been thinking a great deal about that proposition of mine"

"For the secret passage?"

"Yes; and to be in readiness for it, I have obtained the requisite implements; and now you see they will just come in useful. Wait a moment, and I will fetch them from the adjoining cellar."

He departed, and returned, bringing with him a pickaxe, and spade, and mattock.

"Those will do," cried Jack. "Lend me this, and you will quickly see a breach."

He took hold of the mattock and used it with hearty goodwill, so that before long he was able to dislodge a couple of bricks.

After that, further progress was easy enough, for, owing to the dampness of the place, the mortar had become very soft, or probably had never in the first instance hardened.

As soon as a small opening had been made, the light was called for, so as to see whether, after all, they were right or wrong.

It was then discovered that just beyond the brickwork was a wooden door, so that now there was no longer any room for doubt.

Under these circumstances, they worked with great vigour to remove all the bricks, and having done so, they then perceived a rather strong-looking door before them.

"There was some urgent reason for bricking up that opening in such a manner," cried Dick Turpin, "and what that reason was we shall very probably discover."

They tried the door, and found that it was fast.

Probably it was locked.

One blow with the pickaxe, however, caused it to recede upon its hinges, for the damp had long since made the fastenings insecure.

Jack rapidly crossed the threshold.

But almost immediately his lamp went out.

"Come back, Jack," cried the captain. "You must not enter yet—the vault is full of foul air."

Jack managed to stagger back again into the outer vault.

He was gasping painfully for breath.

"I was too precipitate," he exclaimed. "I ought to have known that—that——"

Here a violent fit of coughing seized him, which had the effect of dispelling the foul air from his lungs.

But so insufferable was the odour that came from the closed-up vault, that the whole party was compelled to retreat slowly before it.

And it was not until some considerable time had elapsed that they again ventured to approach.

By this time the comparatively pure air in the other vaults had rushed in and taken the place of that which would have been fatal to human life, and, beyond a certain oppressiveness and clamminess of the atmosphere, there was nothing to complain of.

As may be expected, it was with the very greatest amount of curiosity that our friends gazed about them, for they were exceedingly anxious to make themselves familiar with the appearance of the place that had been closed up from human view for so many years as this evidently had.

But beyond bare black walls, slippery with moisture and glittering in some parts from nitric exhalations, there was nothing of a singular character to be seen.

And although the lanterns were raised up on high, so that the light from them fell upon every portion of the walls, they no longer saw anything of the mysterious shadow.

It was pretty clear that from this inner vault there was no mode of exit; and this might be guessed by the bench or sill that had been built all around it.

The intense darkness and silence in this place made speech appear to be a matter of difficulty, and when Turpin addressed his comrades, he instinctively sank his voice to a whisper.

"There's nothing here," he said—"nothing whatever, that I can see."

"It appears not," said Jack. "Where can the shadow be now."

He was answered by a sigh, and he gave a quick start, for it almost seemed as though the sound had proceeded from the very spot on which he stood.

He turned round quickly, and almost stumbled.

"What's that?" he exclaimed; and even as he asked the question, he directed the beams of the lantern to the ground.

Then they all saw that it was a depression in the general level of the floor of the vault that caused him so nearly to miss his footing.

The flooring was composed of dark-coloured bricks, showing every sign of great age; and just in one part near the centre they seemed, from some cause or other, to have sunk into the soil.

This was the only unusual thing they could perceive

[DICK TURPIN AWAITS THE APPROACH OF THE SOLITARY TRAVELLER.]

in all the place, and, after a little hesitation, Sixteen-String Jack said:

"Perhaps now the solution of all that we have seen is to be found beneath the spot where I was standing; at any rate, let us try, it cannot much signify."

"But what would you do?"

"Dig," was the answer, "and hope for a discovery."

No word of dissent was raised, only an anxious look of expectation seemed to settle upon every countenance.

"The pickaxe!" cried Jack. "Hold my lantern, one of you, and we will soon see what lies under here."

The pickaxe was brought, and, throwing off his coat, Sixteen-String Jack began to work in good earnest.

The bricks were rapidly dug up, for they were so loosely embedded in the soil that they offered no resistance at all to the point of the pickaxe.

The ground beneath them was also soft, and Jack found that the task of digging it out with the spade was by no means so laborious as he had expected.

CHAPTER DCCCXXVIII.

THE HIGHWAYMEN MEET WITH A SUDDEN AND UNLOOKED-FOR INTERRUPTION.

In a little time the hole was quite knee-deep.

And then Jack suddenly felt his spade strike against some harder substance than earth.

He paused at once, and his companions, guessing that the discovery was now about to be made, directed the beams of the lantern into it.

Jack stooped, and, scraping away a small portion of the soil, unearthed a skull.

He picked it up instantly, and held it aloft in the view of his comrades.

A deep silence fell upon all.

There was not one who cared to make a remark.

It was Dick Turpin, however, who eventually broke the silence, for he said:

"Be careful now how you use the spade, Jack. There is no need that I can see of disturbing the poor remains that evidently lie there."

"None in the least," said Sixteen-String Jack, and, as he spoke, he stepped carefully on one side, and carried out the captain's instructions.

As they fully expected, the entire skeleton of a human being was disclosed.

Near it, however, was another, and a single glance was sufficient to show it was that of a young child.

"Here are the evidences of a frightful tragedy," said Sixteen-String Jack. "We can tell now what it was the shadow carried in its arms—we might have guessed it."

"True," answered Claude; "but the idea never once occurred to me. Now that we have made this discovery, however, in what way are we to act respecting it?"

"That question is more readily asked than answered," said Dick Turpin. "I must confess I am not in a position to reply. It is tolerably certain, I think, that we can do nothing but replace the skull, and fill in the earth again."

"Nothing more," said Tom King, slowly.

"But—but——" said Tom Davis, stammeringly.

"But what?" asked Turpin.

"Is it not probable that the reason we are troubled with this visitation is that the remains lie in such a grave as this? You know what is always said——"

"Yes, yes—I know!" said Dick. "But it seems to me that we can do nothing else but put up with the infliction. It is but a shadow, after all, and can have no connection with us; and should it continue to appear, beyond a doubt we shall quickly get used to it."

"It is an unsatisfactory termination to the whole adventure," said Sixteen-String Jack, as he slowly shovelled in the earth again. "I should like to have some further particulars of this double crime. Depend upon it, it was basely and treacherously performed."

"Enough," said Turpin. "Be quick and finish your task, for I confess I am heartily sick of this place. Let us get into the upper air."

"With all my heart," said Jack. "We can't find out any more, I firmly believe."

The remaining shovelfuls were hastily filled into the grave, the bricks replaced as well as they were able, and then the whole party took their way to the room above.

An unusual depression, however, was visible in the manner and appearance of all of them.

Strive as they would, they could not divest themselves of the superstitious idea that this strange, unaccountable appearance boded some great evil to them.

They had lived so long in a state of comparative peace and security, that they now began, very justly, to dread that stormier times were coming.

Neither of the four highwaymen, however, were of the right disposition to give way much to sensations of this kind.

They tried their best to combat successfully with them.

Tom Davis, however, was most despondent of all.

The fact was, he had the image of Jack Marshall and his officers continually before him.

He knew the man to be as great a blunderer as ever donned a red waistcoat, but yet, if he continued his visits, some discovery must eventually be made.

More with the view of turning the conversation and changing the current of their thoughts than for any other reason, Dick turned round, and, addressing his comrades, said:

"Well, now, as some hours are before us, let us take into consideration the project suggested by Davis—I mean the secret passage by which, if necessary, we could leave this building."

"I rather think," said Claude Duval, "that we are all of one way of thinking in this matter—we all believe in the necessity and importance of such a thing, and therefore the sooner it is set about and accomplished the better."

"Yes, decidedly the better," said Tom Davis. "You will all of you feel more content when the thing is actually done."

"Then, if that's the case," said Claude Duval, "the best thing we can do, I suppose, is to commence it at once."

"I wish you would," added Davis, earnestly.

"Not to-night," exclaimed Turpin, drawing a long breath. "I have had enough of these underground passages certainly! We will not begin to-night; but yet we will take an early opportunity."

"Say to-morrow," urged Claude. "We might get a few hours' sleep now during the remainder of the night, and in the morning commence our labours."

"Agreed," said Dick.

"And don't leave them," said Davis, "until you have finished them."

Turpin smiled.

"It will be best so," said Sixteen-String Jack, "for you may depend upon it our adventure on the Windsor Road will make a great commotion."

"And mine in London, too, I suppose," said Dick.

"Well, then," said Tom King, "are we all agreed? Because, if so——"

He was interrupted by a loud and furious knocking at the front door.

Davis started up from his chair, and then sank back into it again.

"There," he cried—"there—I told you the shadow had not appeared for nothing! The officers are at the door! Now what is to be done?"

"They may not be officers," said Dick; "but yet it will be best to act as if they were."

A scene of great excitement and commotion now ensued, for they were all in a state of great anxiety to know what steps could be taken.

As usual, however, Dick promptly came to a determination.

Taking hold of Maud, he exclaimed:

"Follow me to the stable, all of you!"

"No—no," said Tom Davis, quickly. "Surely you are mad! The officers are at the door, and of course others are posted round the building to watch it!"

"It may be so," said Turpin, "or they may not be officers at all—at any rate, I will run the risk of crossing the yard. We shall be better there along with our horses than we possibly could be anywhere beneath this roof."

The knocking was continued with great vehemence.

"How vexatious!" cried Tom Davis. "If now the secret passage was only made, how easy it would be to secrete you all and allow the officers to satisfy their scruples by searching all over the premises."

"If they are officers," Dick cried, "let them do so now; we shall not be in it, and they will find nothing of a suspicious character! Come—quickly; and you, Davis, open the door, and make what excuse you can for keeping them waiting."

Dick hastily opened the back door as he spoke, and darted across to the door of the stable.

His companions followed him, and in the briefest possible space of time they were all standing in safety in the stable.

In the meanwhile, Tom Davis, as he had been directed, went to the front door, and make a great show of unbarring and unbolting it.

In spite of what had been said to him, he could not help feeling great misgivings.

"Open—open!" cried a voice. "Open in the King's name!"

These words were enough to let Tom know that his conjectures were verified.

They were indeed officers who were clamouring for admission.

Just as the words were spoken, however, he flung the door wide open, and, in a tumultuous throng, a troop of officers rushed in.

"Good gracious!" said Tom Davis, in well-acted surprise. "What on earth is the matter? What has happened?"

"Oh, it's all right!" said a voice.

"Is that you, Mr. Marshall?" said Tom, with a great show of delight and respect—"is it indeed you? What an unexpected visit!"

"Yes, very unexpected, and very important, too," was the reply. "Come inside, I have a few words to say to you."

Not knowing what to think, Davis ushered the officers into the room where the highwaymen had so lately been sitting.

He fancied they all looked about them with a suspicious air.

He had but little time left him for speculation, however, for Jack Marshall, edging up to him, placed his hand on his shoulder, and said:

"I must have a few words in private with you. Can you take me to another room?"

"Yes—certainly," was the response, though Tom could not control a slight tremor of his limbs—"yes, certainly!" he repeated. "But—but——"

"What?"

"Don't your men want something to drink? I don't mind making them welcome if you will allow me."

"Oh, certainly! My lads," he cried, turning to the officers, "our worthy friend, the landlord here, says he is anxious to find you something to drink all round!"

Loud applause followed this intimation, and Tom Davis, licking his lips nervously, said, as calmly as he could:

"What would you like to take, gentlemen?"

Ale was unanimously called for, so he gave orders for Ellen to supply it.

"Now then, as that is over," said Jack Marshall, "just come with me. I won't detain you long, for I have not many words to say, yet when you hear them you will allow that they are very important indeed."

"I am ready," said the landlord, with the air of one going to an execution. "Step this way, Mr. Marshall, if you please."

CHAPTER DCCCXXIX.

IN WHICH JACK MARSHALL ENDEAVOURS TO PERSUADE TOM DAVIS TO BETRAY THE HIGHWAYMEN.

Tom Davis led Jack Marshall into the bar, and then the chief police-officer, placing his hand familiarly upon his shoulder, said:

"As I told you before, I have something important to communicate, and I hope you will give the matter your entire consideration."

"I will," said Tom Davis—"you may depend upon that."

"I thought you would. Well, I confess I have taken a great liking to you—you have treated me in a very straightforward, comfortable way. If you will remember, I promised to do you a good turn, and now the time has come."

"I am very glad to hear that," was Tom's reply.

He made a very wry face as he spoke.

"Well, then," said the chief officer, drawing closer to him, and sinking his voice to an impressive whisper, "I have been informed by very creditable authority that the four highwaymen we were speaking about have been in this house, and, in fact, are at the present time concealed in it."

Tom gasped for breath, and then said:

"Impossible! Surely, Mr. Marshall, you do not place any belief in such a report? It must have been set going by some enemy of mine."

"Well, I won't say as to that," replied Jack Marshall; "but you see I am here, and I have got a good many of my men to back me up in all I do. I considered it was quite probable that these highwaymen might have shown their faces here, and that you had induced them to stay, intending to communicate with me, and so obtain the reward."

Tom shook his head.

"No," he replied, "you are quite on the wrong scent there, Mr. Marshall; I know nothing of the men you want. I give you my word of honour that they are nowhere in this building; if they are, you are welcome to make me a prisoner at once."

"I don't want to do anything of the kind; but, at the same time, don't you be over-reaching. If you have them here, or know where to find them, don't trust entirely to yourself to make them prisoners, and so obtain the whole reward—be content to allow me a share of it."

"I wish I had the chance of earning it," said Tom, over whose whole body a cold perspiration had started out.

He distrusted Jack Marshall excessively.

He could not bring himself to believe that the man was so stupid as by his actions he appeared to be.

He concluded rather that it was only a behaviour assumed to conceal his cunning.

"Look here, Thomas," he said, "be reasonable; if the men are in the house concealed, just say so, and we will take them prisoners at once. Don't be afraid of trusting me; you shall have your full share of the reward."

"You are altogether mistaken," said Tom Davis—"altogether mistaken. I tell you again, they are not here, and I know nothing whatever about them!"

"Refresh your memory a little," said the chief officer—"be quite sure before you speak."

"I am quite sure!" said Davis, feeling more and more uneasy.

What might have been the tactics of Jack Marshall we cannot determine.

It might have been that he had some hope of inducing Tom Davis to betray his friends.

If he had indulged in any such idea, the reader knows full well that he could not have entertained a more fallacious one.

It is quite certain, however, that he looked somewhat disappointed after Tom Davis had spoken.

And then, in a different tone of voice, he exclaimed:

"Well, such being the case, perhaps you will not refuse to allow me to search all over the place."

"You know very well," Tom replied, "that I have not the power to refuse you, even if I wished to do so. Search, and welcome; you will find nothing, I give you my word, so you may as well save yourself the trouble."

"I cannot save myself the trouble, even if I felt inclined after the information that has been given me. I must, if only as a matter of form, search this place thoroughly from roof-top to cellar."

"Then you had better begin at once," said Tom Davis, "and the sooner you get it over the better. I can tell you what will be the end of it, however."

"What?"

"I shall give up this mode of life altogether. Thank goodness, I am independent of it. I will not keep an inn to be continually suspected by the police of harbouring improper persons. No—no. I will give it up, and then, perhaps, you will discover that you have lost a good friend."

"Tut—tut!" said Jack Marshall. "What need is there for us to be bad friends? we ought to be on the very best of terms with each other, because we can be mutually useful—don't you see that?"

"No, I do not," said Tom Davis, sharply. "And just let me know whether you intend to search the house or not?"

"I do; I am compelled by duty."

"Very well, then; all I can say is that you have had the last morsel of information that I shall ever give you. If you can't take my word there had better be an end to all communication between us. Now I have done, and begin as soon as you like."

"Oh, that's your tone, is it?" said Jack Marshall. "Well, then, I don't scruple to say that I have my own suspicions of you, and very strong they are, too. I have tried fair means with you, and would have put you in the way of a good thing, but you refused, so you have only yourself to blame for the consequences. I shall look closely, and, depend upon it, if I find one suspicious thing, sufficient to warrant me in doing so, I will haul you off to Newgate at once!"

"You're welcome," said Tom, seating himself in a chair with an air of dogged resolution—"you are quite welcome! You can search from now to the middle of next week for aught I care!"

"Don't you obstruct us in our duty," said Jack Marshall, shaking his finger—"don't you obstruct us!"

"I don't intend."

"Well, then, I call upon you, as a good man and true, to assist us. Come along; you shall accompany me into every room I enter!"

"All right," said Tom, "don't put yourself about, I beg. I have got one comfort left still."

"And what is that?"

"Why, you won't have the opportunity of searching here again; I will leave at once! To think I should have lived to my age, and then to be suspected at the last!"

Tom Davis pretended to be very indignant indeed, and performed his part with tolerable credit.

How far Jack Marshall was deceived by it, who can say?

At any rate, he did not abandon his intentions of searching the house thoroughly.

Accordingly he called his men around him.

By this time they had finished their ale, so they obeyed his command with great promptitude.

With very good generalship, he stationed them in various positions on the ground floor, so as to be able to keep a good watch.

Then, attended by half a dozen, and accompanied by Tom Davis, he made his way to the top of the house.

"I like to begin at the beginning," he said, "and work my way downwards. We shall soon find out now who is right and who is wrong."

The reader need scarcely be told that all this time Tom Davis was in a state of very great trepidation.

It is true he felt quite relieved about the presence of the highwaymen themselves.

He knew they could not be found, no matter how rigid the search was.

But he recollected that the officers had made their appearance at a most unexpected moment, and he indulged in the very natural fear that some article of apparel might have been left about that would at once proclaim that the highwaymen had been there at some time or other.

Jack Marshall went up in the attic, and satisfied himself by a glance that there was no one hiding there.

He also looked up at the ceiling, and found that there were no means of communication with the roof.

"Jenkins," he said, addressing one of the men, "you stop here in this attic until I call you down. If you see anything of a suspicious character, create an immediate alarm."

"All right, sir," said the officer, and the remainder descended the steep flight of stairs.

The other rooms were next examined.

The house was old and straggling, and contained more apartments than anyone would have guessed by looking at its exterior.

It would be tedious to follow the officers into every room; let it suffice to say that all were searched, of course without finding a vestige of those they sought.

To Tom's great relief, he found that the highwaymen had been very careful not to leave anything about that would be likely to betray them.

The officers then again descended to the ground-floor.

But Jack Marshall did not look quite so much disappointed as Tom Davis fancied he would.

"Well," he said, "we've searched the house—that ceremony has been gone through, and I am bound to say there is nothing suspicious to be seen."

"You might have taken my word for that."

"So I might; but you must recollect we have not quite finished yet."

"Indeed! How so?"

"Why, there are the cellars, to be sure—let us look what you have down there."

Of course, Davis did not at all relish the idea of the officers paying a visit to this place.

But he knew full well he could not refuse, and any hesitation upon his part would very likely be productive of serious results.

He was thinking, however, of the skeleton that was lying there, and wondered whether the officers would be curious enough to unearth it.

If they did, then came the all important question, what influence would it have upon himself?

Would he not find himself in a very awkward and dangerous position indeed?

It seemed like it, and Tom Davis set his teeth hard, and determined to put the best face on the matter he could.

CHAPTER DCCCXXX.

THE POLICE OFFICERS DISCOVER THE SKELETON IN THE VAULT, AND EFFECT AN ENTRANCE INTO THE STABLE WHERE THE HIGHWAYMEN AND THEIR HORSES ARE CONCEALED.

STILL taking the precaution to leave plenty of men posted about, Jack Marshall descended into the cellar accompanied by the remainder.

Tom Davis's uneasiness did not escape his notice, and therefore it was only reasonable he should look forward to making some discovery down beneath the surface.

At any rate, he resolved to keep his eyes wide open to everything, and above all, to observe every movement that the landlord made.

Nothing of an unusual character, however, was met with in any of the cellars until the place was reached where the highwaymen had broken down the wall such a short time before.

How much Davis regretted that they had performed this act!

After all, it had resulted in nothing, and had the wall remained in its original condition he would have had nothing to apprehend.

It was useless to think thus about anything that was passed, and he knew it.

Jack Marshall looked at the pile of bricks and mortar on the floor with genuine surprise, and, turning to Tom Davis, said:

"I can see you have been making some alterations here—what is it you intend?"

"Oh, nothing—nothing," said Davis—"it is entirely my business, so continue your search."

"We will, you may depend upon it. Now then, this way with the lights."

The officers quickly spread themselves over the cellar, and as a matter of necessity, they perceived the spot where the flooring had been disturbed.

It was quite evident to a casual eye that this disturbance had been effected very recently, and Jack Marshall pressed his hat firmly on his head, believing that he was on the right scent at last.

"Hullo!" he cried; "what have we here—more alterations? Why, what on earth does this signify?"

"Nothing particular," said Tom Davis. "I intend—"

He stopped abruptly.

"Intend what?"

"I suppose I had better make a clean breast of it?" he continued.

"I should think so."

"Well, then, in half a dozen words, the fact is, I noticed first of all that that place yonder appeared as though it was a doorway bricked up, and out of sheer curiosity I resolved to try. You see the result. Then I noticed that the bricks were displaced here, and that the ground had sunk, so I dug it up, and what do you think I found?"

"A treasure?"

"No—a skeleton."

"A skeleton?" repeated Jack Marshall, in surprise.

"Yes; I scarcely ventured to move it, and having ascertained what was there, covered the earth over it again, for I scarcely knew how to proceed in the matter. It is evident it must have lain there many, many years; but, however, if you like to satisfy yourselves, here are the tools—set to work.

Jack Marshall reflected a moment, and then instructed his men to dig up the ground.

This was an easily-accomplished task, for the earth was very soft, and, in the space of a few minutes, the poor murdered remains were again exposed to view.

"Oh, yes, there's a skeleton, sure enough; and a very serious thing it is for you, I can assure you — very serious."

"Is it, indeed?"

"It is."

"But what am I to do in such an affair? The fact is, I intended to ask your advice on the subject, for I only made the discovery a few hours ago."

"Well," said Jack Marshall, "my duty is plain and clear before me."

"What is it?"

"Why, I must have this affair fully investigated. In the first place, the bones must be all dug up and put in proper order, then they must be examined by a medical man, a jury called, and a verdict found. How that may affect you I don't know."

"It can't affect me very seriously, I should think," said Tom Davis, "for, as you are well aware, I have not lived in this house very long, and anyone could tell by a glance at these remains, that many years must have elapsed since they were buried."

"Well, I don't intend for to give an opinion in that matter," said Jack Marshall, "but I know my duty."

"Well," said Tom Davis, with a sigh, "if it is to be so, it must; but it is a very unpleasant thing for me, and I wish we could arrange it somehow."

"It is impossible. Why, bless you, we shall all get our expenses, and that will amount to a trifle, I'll warrant."

And Jack Marshall nodded his head in a very knowing way.

Tom Davis was in despair.

This was calamity upon calamity.

He might be able to clear himself of any suspicion of having had a hand in the murder; but then the bringing of a jury to that house would be disastrous in the extreme to the highwaymen; and if the officers continued to float about as they undoubtedly would, and if one or two were left in possession to watch the remains as the law required, how was he to act?

The prospect before him was so bewildering and disagreeable that Tom Davis could not bear to look upon it.

After a little time, the officers all returned to the bar again, and Jack Marshall securely fastened the door leading to the cellars, and placed a great seal upon it.

"There," he said, "it's more than anyone's life is worth to meddle with that now."

Tom was in hopes that this discovery would not be altogether evil.

He trusted that it might so change the current of the officers' thoughts as to prevent them from continuing their search any further.

If this was so, he felt that he could almost reconcile himself to all that had taken place.

He reckoned without his host, however, for Jack Marshall, with a pertinacity for which he was remarkable, said:

"We must not forget our original intentions—we must finish our search."

"I thought you had finished it?" said Tom.

"Well, so we have, as far as the house is concerned; but when I have been calling here, I have noticed what extensive outbuildings you have, and, in order that I may state positively that I have searched the premises thoroughly, I must have a look there as well."

Tom Davis was quite helpless.

He could not refuse—the officers would do just exactly what they thought proper.

He was in such a dreadful state of excitement, however, that it attracted the notice of all the officers, and it was lucky the skeleton had been discovered, as they would be able to attribute it to that.

Tom only hoped, however, that the highwaymen had left the stable, and taken their horses with them.

But he very much doubted whether they would do so.

He did not forget the little door at the back, through which they could easily gain the plantation, and he could only indulge in the hope—faint as it was—that they had passed through it already, in order to make themselves safe.

Without any delay Jack Marshall opened the back door of the inn, and, followed by his men, crossed the yard, and began to search it and the various sheds built around it in a very systematic fashion indeed.

He was quite right when he said what a many outbuildings belonged to the inn, for it really took them a considerable space of time to search them all.

Tom hoped that the highwaymen would hear them, and have time to make their escape.

At last all paused in front of the stable, and Jack Marshall, addressing Tom Davis, said:

"What place is that?"

"Why, the stable."

"Is it?"

"Yes; do you want to search there?"

"Oh, certainly!"

"Wait a moment, then, and I will find the key."

Tom pretended to search in his pocket for the key, as he knew that every moment that elapsed before the opening of the door was of the greatest importance.

"Key?" ejaculated Jack Marshall, almost immediately. "What are you talking about? Why, can't you see the door is unlocked already?"

"Why, so it is," said Tom, "and there's the key sticking in the lock! I wondered where on earth it could be! But I recollect now, I forgot to lock it. To tell you the truth, I have been so flustered about that discovery down in the cellar that I can hardly tell whether I am standing on my head or my heels."

Jack Marshall said nothing, but, advancing to the door, kicked it open with his foot, and entered suddenly.

In his hand he carried a dark lantern, and he flashed the light of it rapidly around him.

CHAPTER DCCCXXXI.

JACK MARSHALL AND HIS OFFICERS BRING THEIR SEARCH TO AN END, AND TOM DAVIS MAKES A PROPOSITION.

For a few moments we will revert to the proceedings of the highwaymen.

After the door of the stable was closed a feeling of the deepest thankfulness came over them.

Comparatively speaking they were safe.

"I am glad we ran the risk," said Dick. "Rely upon it, if the officers had seen us they would have made known their presence ere now."

"Yes, there can be no doubt about that. But, having accomplished so much, what are we to do next?"

"I should be able to decide," replied Turpin, "if I knew whether those who knocked for admission were police-officers or not.'

"What should you do?"

"Why, open the door and pass out into the plantation beyond, taking our horses with us; then, let what would happen, we should be prepared, and if it came to a push, a rapid flight would save us."

"But how are we to ascertain?"

"We can't; we must wait a minute or two and listen."

Wait they accordingly did.

But they were unable to learn anything that was taking place inside the inn.

From the length of time that elapsed, they afterwards concluded that the visit must be one from the police-officers, for had it been any chance stranger, either Tom Davis or Ellen would have come to the stable door, to let them know that all was well.

"It is best to be on the safe side," Dick said. "Get the door open, and lead the horses out; we will remain here until the last moment."

This was done, and, with beating hearts, they waited to see what would happen next.

The long stay of the officers in the inn puzzled them exceedingly.

In all their speculations, they never happened to think that they might have discovered the skeleton.

At length, however, the back door of the inn was opened, and they not only heard the police-officers, but caught sight of them also.

"Quick—quick!" cried Turpin. "Retreat—retreat! We have time yet, and all will be well!"

They passed through the door quickly; but Tom King said:

"Will it be wise to leave the place thus? The officers will come in here, and, seeing the door, will open it, and perhaps may discover us in the plantation."

"We must run that risk; we can't conceal the door. Quick, Tom—through the door as quickly as you can."

But Tom paused and listened, and quickly found that the officers were searching the other sheds.

"I have a few moments left," he said. "Wait where you are, and leave the rest to me."

There was no time to explain what he intended to do any further; but, to the surprise of his comrades, he closed the little door and then bolted it.

Close by, he was aware, was a quantity of new straw, and this he resolved to move from its present position, and so arrange it as to conceal the doorway.

The task was a tremendous one, but he set to work with wonderful energy, and accomplished it long before the officers reached the stable door.

It now became necessary for him either to find some excellent hiding place, or else to rejoin his comrades.

He determined to attempt to do the latter, and, having an idea of the inside, hastily ascended the steps leading to the loft above.

It was just as he did so that the brief conversation between Tom Davis and Jack Marshall took place respecting the key.

There was a faint, dim light in the loft coming from the circular opening looking into the yard, and by the aid of this illumination, feeble as it was, Tom was able to see around him.

Without hesitation, he stepped on tiptoe to one corner of the loft, going to that side of it which was next to the plantation.

Above his head, and within easy reach of his hands, was the roof, and this was composed only of rude tiles.

The building was old, and it did not seem that any pains had been taken to keep the roof in good repair, so that Tom was able to draw one or two tiles aside, and so leave an opening just about large enough for him to squeeze through.

By the time he had achieved this, however, the officers had fairly begun their search in the stable below.

Passing out quickly, he paused on the roof, and, as gently as he could, replaced the tiles he had disturbed.

Luckily the wind was blowing rather fiercely, and, as it dashed the trees in the plantation to and fro, caused such a rushing noise as to drown the slight sound he made in his operations.

This much done, he slipped down to the ground, which was only a few feet below him.

He now considered he was quite safe, and his comrades as well, and hastened to rejoin them.

He found them, as he considered, in rather dangerous proximity to the little door, and advised them to move further away.

They obeyed, and selected one of the densest parts of the plantation, determined to wait patiently there until disturbed by the officers.

It was certainly much better that the door should have been closed and bolted on the inner side, and the straw heaped up before it, because it would not then appear as if anyone had passed through it, and Tom, now that he had succeeded, considered that the achievement of such a feat was well worthy of the risk that it entailed.

When Jack Marshall flashed the light of his lantern around he saw nothing at all peculiar in the stable.

There was a rather powerful odour of horses, but nothing more.

It should be mentioned that besides the horses used by the highwaymen, there was another belonging to Tom Davis, which he used upon those occasions when he had to fetch different articles that were required.

"There doesn't appear to be anybody here," growled Jack Marshall; "but at any rate, we'll have a look! Hullo!" he ejaculated, upon seeing the straw, "what a heap you've got there, to be sure! Why, fifty men might be hidden behind it! Just poke about it a little, will you?"

This was the only place in the stable that offered the least chance of concealment.

So, with one accord, the officers rushed to the heap of straw, and began scattering it in all directions.

They found no highwaymen beneath it, but they discovered the little door.

"What's that?" cried Jack Marshall, immediately.

"A door!" was the response.

"What a singular place for one to be put. Where can it lead? Why, I never met with such a strange place as this in my life before!"

"It leads to nowhere in particular," replied Tom Davis, and speaking in a loud tone of voice, so that in case the highwaymen should be on the other side of it they would receive warning to remove. "It opens into a plantation or coppice, that lies at the back here; but I never found occasion to make use of it, and I am at a loss to think why it should have been put there."

"Well, we will see," said Jack Marshall. "Open it, will you?"

"It's bolted!" said the officer.

"Well, what if it is? Open it, can't you?"

The bolt was rusty and difficult to draw back; but, with a squeak, it yielded to the strength of the police-officer.

The door was then pulled open, and a rush of cold air came in.

"There's the plantation!" said Tom. "You see I have not deceived you in the least."

The officers all passed out, and, although they looked scrutinizingly around them, they failed to see any signs of the highwaymen.

Jack Marshall looked down upon the ground, thinking perhaps to discover footmarks.

But if such was his hope, he was disappointed, for the leaves had been blown off the trees in large quantities, and lay very thickly upon the ground.

These left no trace of any persons having passed that way, and Tom Davis noticed it with a sigh of the greatest relief.

Jack Marshall saw nothing to warrant him in searching the plantation, of the extent of which he was quite ignorant.

So he turned back into the stable, determined to finish his search of the premises.

But as to the result of this search he was by no means sanguine.

Nevertheless he persevered until his task was quite completed.

Then, with a very crest-fallen air, he re-entered the inn.

During these proceedings, Tom Davis had managed to find an opportunity for a little calm thought, and quickly made up his mind what he should do in the present juncture of affairs.

Therefore he had summoned Ellen to his side, and had whispered to her a few directions.

She nodded, and left him immediately.

When the search was over, Tom Davis invited the officers to enter the kitchen, and, as a matter of course, they willingly complied.

No sooner had they crossed the threshold, however, than a most savoury odour assailed their nostrils, and they one and all looked inquisitively towards the fire-place.

"I've had a little bit of a snack got ready," said Tom Davis, "if you don't mind partaking of it. I see no reason why we should not continue to be good friends. I am willing to forgive and forget. My great failing is, I never can bear anything to anyone."

The scent of the preparing viands had a very mollifying effect upon Jack Marshall and his followers.

So the former held out his hand and said:

"I bear no malice, not a bit, and you might have felt sure of as much by the manner in which I have behaved. I can assure you it is true that I was told to search in this place for the highwaymen, and duty compelled me to do it, however unpleasant it might be. Excuse me for saying that I thought for a moment you were not sincere, but now I find you told the truth, and I shall make my report accordingly."

This was a very great speech—rather too gracious, Tom thought.

He would have preferred that the officers should have shown rather more vexation at their disappointment.

However, the only thing he could do was, in a manner of speaking, to float with the tide, and do all he could to keep on good terms with his troublesome customers.

He ordered more ale to be brought, and they drank to one another's good healths with evident relish.

Then the supper was placed upon the table.

A very substantial supper it was too, and the officers paid full justice to it.

They vowed and declared that the landlord was a hearty good fellow, and a pattern to all the rest of his fraternity.

Tom plied them well with ale, and when he imagined they were ripe enough for the proposition he had to make, he rose to his feet and prepared to utter it.

The chief officer, seeing him in this position, at once called for order and silence.

But the officers by this time had drunk just enough ale to make them rather uproarious, and so, amidst a slight confusion, Tom began:

"I have a few words to say, gentlemen, and the subject is very important. I should have preferred not to trouble you with it at all, but I am compelled to do so, and all I can request is that you will listen to me patiently for a few minutes."

"Hear, hear!" muttered Jack Marshall, and the officers all banged the table with their cups approvingly.

Thus encouraged, Tom Davis went on.

"I believe we are all good friends," he said. "I'm sure I have nothing but feelings of friendship and affection for all of you, and I hope the feeling is a mutual one."

"Hear! hear!—it is—it is!" said a chorus of voices.

"I rejoice to hear it," said Tom Davis, "for that gives me confidence to proceed. And now, gentlemen, if you please, I will come at once to the point and begin my communication."

CHAPTER DCCCXXXII.

JACK MARSHALL AND HIS OFFICERS APPEAR TO BE ON THE BEST OF TERMS WITH TOM DAVIS.

CONSIDERABLE curiosity was visible upon the countenances of all the police officers, and Jack Marshall, leaning his elbows on the end of the table, shut one eye and prepared to listen with great attention to what the landlord had to say.

"Gentlemen," commenced Tom, "as you may guess, the subject I am alluding to is that disagreeable discovery down below."

"The skeleton?"

"Just so. You were kind enough to tell me what it was you intended to do in the matter, and I have no doubt it was only what would be considered your proper duty; but while carrying it out I would have you to think a little about me. You can easily tell that it will have a very damaging effect upon me and my house. When it comes to be known that such a thing has been found in the cellar, in fact, I shall be obliged to shut up the place altogether and leave it."

"No—no!" murmured many voices.

"But I shall be compelled to do so," replied Tom, firmly. "Luckily, I have money enough of my own to be quite independent of the business, but this place just suits me—it is exactly the kind of life I like, and although I have only been here a short time, yet it is quite long enough for me to have fallen in love with it altogether, and it would grieve me very much if I was compelled to leave."

"But what are we to do?"

"That's what I'm coming to," said Tom Davis. "I would just have you put yourself in my place for a few moments, and consider how you would like things to be. I may say that if I left, you would all lose a very good friend, for let me repeat, I shall always be very glad to see you whenever you like to come."

Great applause interrupted Tom at this point, and, wiping the perspiration from his face, he endeavoured to continue, calmly.

This, however, as may be easily imagined, was a most difficult matter.

The point that he was urging now was a most vital one, and if the officers did not fall into his views, the consequences to himself and the highwaymen would be very disagreeable and disastrous indeed.

In fact, discovery could scarcely fail to take place, and altogether so much attention would be directed towards the inn, that it would be no longer a safe place of refuge.

Surely, then, it was worth an effort to attempt to avert such a calamity as this, and Tom Davis firmly believed that he had taken the right course.

He had got the officers into a very pleasant, complaisant mood.

He had supplied them well with eatables and drinkables, and, in spite of his difficult position, had won the good opinion of all of them.

Yet now that the crisis had come he hesitated.

All would depend upon just how his proposition was taken.

It cost him a great effort to continue.

"I have to ask this of you," he said, boldly—"it is to let the matter alone and say nothing more about it; behave just as you would if the discovery had never taken place. It does not need proof that I can have had nothing to do with the murder, if murder it is, and from the appearance of the remains it is equally certain that so many years have elapsed that there is but the very faintest hope of discovering the perpetrators of the crime. Let me ask you, then, to keep this a secret, and in return for it you will at all times be welcome to the best of everything my house affords, no matter what time you come or how often. I won't urge it any further, but just weigh that in your minds. If you determine to carry this matter forward you may get a little in the way of expenses, but I solemnly declare that I will shut up the inn and retire into private life. I might ask you to grant me this as a favour, but I will owe a favour to no man, so now I wait for your reply."

Tom Davis sat down, and a rather ominous silence followed his words.

He had, after all, but very slight hopes of success.

What, then, was his surprise when Jack Marshall, apparently after a brief deliberation with himself, rose to his feet and replied:

"I feel strongly inclined to say yes to your proposal, for I question, after all, whether it will turn out much good to any of us; but if we do agree you must promise secrecy as well."

"Oh, never fear for that," replied Tom.

"I mean you must never let it be known that we have hushed up such an affair; if you do we should be covered with disgrace."

"You may depend upon my silence," said Tom; "and let me take this opportunity of offering you my deepest and most heartfelt thanks for having so kindly consented to my proposition."

This was quite a bold stroke, for it will be perceived that Jack Marshall had not positively given his consent.

But Tom judged that his mind was just confused enough not to feel quite certain whether he had or not.

It was a great relief to him, however, when he heard the chief officer say:

"Well, then, my lads, you all hear this, and you know the terms? We say nothing about that disagreeable affair down below—we do not breathe a word of it to anyone, and, in return, our excellent friend the landlord here will make us welcome whenever we like to come."

"Yes, that's it!" said Tom Davis, emphatically.

"Agreed—agreed!" cried the officers, unanimously, for it had been many and many a day since they had fared so well as they had then, and they naturally looked forward to a perpetual succession of such feasts.

Altogether, the majority of them thought they had done a very good thing indeed.

Whether Jack Marshall thought so, or whether he had some other scheme in his cunning brain, time alone can unfold.

Tom Davis called for spirits of all descriptions, and plentiful supplies of hot water and sugar.

Very liberally, he requested the officers to help themselves, and they were by no means backward in doing so.

The manner in which the glasses were filled and emptied was something surprising to witness.

But Tom noticed with satisfaction that in this process the officers took hold of the bottle that came next to their hand, and consequently partook in succession of various kinds of spirits.

None knew better than the landlord that the effect of this would be speedy intoxication.

And such proved in a short time to be the case.

Before another half-hour was over, they were all sitting drunk and incapable in their chairs.

Tom Davis rose unperceived from the table, and, going up to Ellen, whispered in her ears, telling her to remain and keep a strict and most observant watch upon the movements of the officers, and if any of them moved or attempted to leave the room, she was to scream out as if frightened.

This having been arranged, Tom Davis hastily made his way to the stable, and, opening the door leading into the plantation, uttered a low whistle, to which the highwaymen immediately responded.

In a few moments they were all around him, and, as briefly as he could, he made them aware of all that had taken place, and the actual state of affairs.

They congratulated him warmly upon the cleverness he had displayed.

"Capital!" said Turpin. "Not only have you got us out of all this trouble, but you have also got the officers partly in your power as well; and the mere fact of their paying frequent visits to the inn will do more towards diverting the suspicion of others from it than anything else."

"Yes—yes!" said Tom. "No doubt it will all turn out for the best, though I like to keep those gentlemen at a safe distance."

"So do I. But make haste and return."

"I will. I am off now. You remain here until I come again and let you know that all is safe. I feel pretty certain that the officers, as soon as they wake up from their drunken slumber, will have a parting glass, and ride away."

"Be quick, then, and rejoin them, for fear your absence should be noted."

It was Dick Turpin who said this, and Tom Davis, without another word, retraced his steps to the inn.

Upon entering, however, he did not perceive that there was any cause for apprehension.

The officers were, to all appearances, slumbering profoundly.

Tom Davis seated himself in a chair, and closed his eyes.

He did not altogether go to sleep, but dozed, feeling sure that the least movement that was made would arouse him.

It was not, however, until day had fairly dawned that the officers showed any signs of recovering their consciousness, and it was Jack Marshall who was the first to awake.

He looked at his men half angrily.

But then recollecting what had occurred, set to work to wake them.

This was a difficult process.

But it was at last accomplished.

Tom Davis brought in another large supply of ale, to which the officers amply paid their respects, and prepared to leave.

But Tom again reverted to the understanding that was made between them, and, to his extreme satisfaction, it was ratified.

"All right, old boy!" said Jack Marshall, slapping him on the back—"it's an understood arrangement. Mum on all sides, and you will find that, after all, it won't be a very bad thing for you. Recollect that I am now chief, and, for the future, I will stand your friend."

Tom was delighted to find Jack Marshall in such a mood, and was profuse in his thanks.

Accordingly he gave them every attention, and it was just as the sun was beginning to warm the earth with his first rays, that they all slowly took their departure down the lane, feeling rather queer and confused about their head-pieces as yet.

Tom Davis watched them out of sight, and made sure that none had remained behind.

He was not inclined to trust Jack Marshall too far, although he had spoken and behaved in such a friendly way.

It would have been very awkward for an officer to have concealed himself upon the premises, so Tom made a thorough search.

The result was that no one was found, and, feeling tolerably sure that all would be well for the next few hours, he went out into the stable, and summoned the highwaymen.

They all gladly enough obeyed his signal, for the air was chill, and the plantation had proved a most disagreeable place to pass the night in.

CHAPTER DCCCXXXIII.

THE SECRET PASSAGE IS CONSTRUCTED, AND DICK TURPIN SETS OUT UPON A PARTICULAR EXPEDITION.

THE highwaymen could all perceive that, in spite of the success he had met with, Tom Davis yet looked anxious and alarmed.

His eyes roved about incessantly, and he seemed, by his manner, as though he half expected to catch sight of an officer every moment.

Dick and his comrades, however, were unfeignedly rejoiced at the turn affairs had taken, speaking in no measured terms of Jack Marshall's obtusity.

But Tom Davis shook his head.

"He is a cunning one," he answered—"a very cunning one! Depend upon it, he has a deeper motive than we are aware of for all his proceedings, although they seem so absurd."

"I am not of that opinion," said Dick. "I think him quite incapable to fulfil the office he holds."

"Well, time will show," was Tom Davis's answer. "There is no good in anticipating evil. All I hope is, that he will keep his word respecting the discovery of the skeleton in the vault."

"Yes, that is important."

"Very; but if you were to ask me what was the interpretation I place upon Jack Marshall's conduct, I should say that he has a suspicion you come here at times, and he is anxious to capture you all at one moment; it would then be an achievement for him to boast of."

Dick laughed at the idea.

"It would be more difficult than he thinks it is."

"No doubt," said Tom; "but let me entreat you all to be most careful in your movements. Rely upon it, he will keep the closest watch all round this inn; and unfortunately, now he is aware that there is a means of communication between the stable and the plantation at the back."

"Well, he does," said Turpin; "but, after all, I see no great cause for alarm. If we can manage to outwit him as we have done hitherto, these frequent visits of the police to this house, will do much towards removing the suspicion that we are here."

"That was my own view," said Davis. "But now, once more, and for the last time, let me ask you to set about constructing a secret passage. Let what has happened to-night be a warning."

"We shall," said Dick. "We will commence it now at once."

Upon hearing this determination, Tom Davis brightened up wonderfully, and set to work to collect the necessary materials.

"You have a long job before you," he said, "and a great deal of hard work; but if you persevere, you will accomplish it."

No more was said upon the subject.

But the highwaymen all descended to the cellar, and, with the aid of the implements that Tom Davis had already in readiness, commenced their very arduous labour.

It took them but a short time to decide as to the manner in which the secret passage should be constructed. It should first reach from the cellars to the stable, and from the stable to some point in the plantation.

Such being the case, of course the cellar was chosen that was nearest to the stable, and Tom Davis, marking out a small space on the brickwork, said:

"If you will make it there, I can always contrive to keep it covered over by this large cask."

This was agreed to immediately.

The spot selected by Tom Davis was in the brick sill surrounding the cellars upon which the barrels rested.

There was one large hogshead, and the space upon which this stood when placed on end was quite large enough to enable them to construct such a place as they required.

A kind of pit was sunk first, and the labour in excavation was much lighter than they had expected, for the ground was loose and soft.

When a sufficient depth had been obtained, a regular passage was commenced, somewhat rudely arched, it is true, but yet well enough to answer their purpose.

In order to keep the earth above from falling in, it was necessary to fix upright posts at short distances, across the tops of which flat pieces of wood were laid.

But of this kind of material there was an abundant supply at the back of the inn.

And so the work went on bravely.

After the first hour, they took the labour in turns, the others resting while two worked.

And in this manner they were able to keep at it incessantly.

Considering that they were inexperienced in the use of the tools, and in the construction of such places, the progress they made by nightfall was really surprising to witness.

Fatigued by their exertions, they lay down to rest, but renewed their work at an early hour on the succeeding day.

A means of communication was made with the stable, so constructed that the horses could be readily taken up and down.

The opening above was in a remote corner of the building, and could be covered over by straw or any other material.

Tom proposed that a large corn-bin should be placed at this spot.

The excavation of the passage itself was carried on with renewed zeal and activity, nor did they attempt to cease until they had burrowed about two hundred yards beneath the plantation.

They then found themselves at the side of a somewhat steep declivity that was so thickly overgrown with gorse and other prickly shrubs that it was quite impossible to perceive the ground.

As it was doubtful whether they would require to make frequent use of this passage, the greatest care was taken not to disturb these bushes any more than could be helped, so that the appearance of the place should not undergo any alteration.

This was easily managed, and the delight of the highwaymen and Tom Davis upon the completion of their scheme was intense in the highest degree.

They now considered that they could bid defiance to all the police-officers in the land.

It was impossible for them to enter the inn so quickly as to prevent them availing themselves of the secret passage.

Then the horses could be readily brought down, and almost before the inn was searched they would be making their way through the plantation.

But although they worked with the greatest diligence, not losing a single hour, the construction of the passage occupied them more than a week, during which interval they neither saw nor heard anything of Jack Marshall and his officers.

All were much exhausted, for the labour was such as they were unfamiliar with.

Now that the excitement that had actuated them had passed away they felt the reaction severely.

Nevertheless, it was only a few evenings afterwards that the highwaymen began to show by various signs that they were quite tired of staying in the inn.

They longed once more to have a daring, spirit-stirring adventure on the highway.

Tom King, Claude, and Sixteen-String Jack boldly announced their intention of setting out as soon as ever darkness really commenced, and Dick Turpin declared that he would not be left behind.

In vain Maud endeavoured to persuade him to remain—in vain Tom Davis urged him not to take Black Bess out of the stable at present, as the hurt she had received turned out of a more dangerous character than they had at first believed.

Dick, however, upon an inspection of it, declared that it was well enough, and that a good gallop would do his mare more good than remaining in the stable.

Finding they were quite bent upon their purpose, Tom Davis said:

"At least, you will wait a little while until I have gone on a reconnoitring expedition round the inn. If the officers see me, there will be nothing surprising in my taking an evening's stroll, and I will not return here until I have ascertained that there are none of them within half a mile of the place."

Maud and Ellen so begged that this precaution should be taken, that the highwaymen consented, and Tom Davis set out.

During his absence, however, they got their horses in readiness for the road.

The saddles were put on, and indeed every part of the trappings cleaned over and over again.

But still Tom Davis did not return.

Their patience at length became quite exhausted, and just as they were about to start and leave him to return when he liked, he made his appearance.

It only needed a glance at his countenance to let them know that the coast was clear.

With great haste they mounted their steeds and rode off one by one, allowing an interval to elapse between the departure of each.

Dick was the last to go, and Maud and Tom Davis kept close to him.

"It is quite uncertain," Turpin said, "whether I return to-night or not. I may be compelled by circumstances to go a long way from the inn, and it might be dangerous in the extreme for me to attempt to return by daybreak; so that if I am not here by the time you can see the first streak of light in the eastern horizon, don't expect me; it will be safer for me to remain where I am. Be under no apprehensions whatever on my account until I return, and I only mention this as an additional precaution for safety."

Maud clung closer to Dick, for she guessed by his words that he had some dangerous expedition in view with which he had not thought proper to make her acquainted.

Tom Davies also held a similar opinion, but after Dick's reasons—so excellent as they were—he could not urge him to return the same night.

The last farewell having been spoken, Dick tore himself away.

Then going slowly through the plantation, he emerged into a narrow lane.

The night was clear and calm, but piercing cold—just such a night as would brace up the nerves of anyone.

Dick drew in long breaths of the cool air.

He was so accustomed to remaining only beneath the sky, that the least confinement was irksome to him.

The blood circulated more quickly through his veins than it had done for several days past, and, humming a tune as though no care or trouble rested on his heart, he allowed the reins to fall gently on the neck of his bonny steed.

With a short neigh that sounded almost like a cry of gladness, Black Bess started off at a swift gallop.

The road was clear before them, and firm beneath her feet.

There was no obstacle to be in dread of, and Dick Turpin surrendered himself to the excitement of a wild and furious gallop.

Away they went, rushing onwards at a speed that would have dismayed any ordinary traveller, and accomplishing it without meeting with the slightest injury.

At length, when Dick considered he was far enough away from the inn, he gradually tightened the reins until he brought Black Bess to a standstill.

"Ah!" he said, after listening a moment, "some one comes! This is lucky indeed!"

He plunged his hand into his pocket as he spoke, and produced his pistols, the priming of which he carefully examined.

CHAPTER DCCCXXXIV.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN HAS TWO NARROW ESCAPES OF HIS LIFE.

THE sharp, rattling sound produced by some light vehicle rolling rapidly along the road came distinctly to Turpin's ears.

A brief inspection showed him that his pistols were in admirable order, and so, drawing close to the side of the road, he waited patiently for the traveller or travellers to make their appearance.

He was not long kept in suspense, though the night was so dark that he could not see the approaching vehicle until it was within a few yards of him.

Then he perceived that it was a light gig with huge yellow wheels, drawn by a powerful white horse.

In it was seated only one man, who appeared to be well wrapped up against the cold.

Dick started out suddenly, and, in those quick, sharp tones which he had always found so effective, he commanded the traveller to stand and deliver.

So unexpectedly did he make his appearance that the traveller was quite taken aback.

On the mere impulse of the moment, as it seemed, he jerked the reins, and the horse, like a well-trained animal, suddenly came to a standstill.

Dick presented his pistol.

"Now," he said, "be quick and choose: your money or your life! Don't force me to take both of them!"

The reins dropped from the traveller's fingers, and Dick, with great promptitude took hold of them himself, so that there was little fear the traveller would put his horse in motion.

"I have nothing," he said. "You don't think I am such a fool as to travel about with a lot of money in my pockets. No, no—I know a trick worth two of that!"

"Your money!" said Dick. "I must and will have it! But don't force me to search your pockets, or you will find the operation a most unpleasant one. Mind you, I am not to be trifled with!"

"Well, you shall have what little I carry with me," replied the traveller, and as he spoke he began slowly to unbutton his overcoat.

Dick kept a close eye upon every one of his movements.

Plunging his hand into his breast pocket, the traveller said:

"There, that's what I carry about me. How do you like it?"

With great suddenness he produced a pistol, and, aiming rapidly at the highwayman, he pulled the trigger.

But Dick's movements were rapid in the extreme.

The barrel of the pistol was all at once knocked upwards.

The finger of the traveller was on the trigger, and he could not prevent himself from pulling it.

There was a flash and a loud report.

"Now," said Dick, coolly, "if you have another firearm about you, just produce it, and let us have that fired off as well; then, perhaps, we can proceed to business."

The traveller evidently was not a little abashed at Dick Turpin's extraordinary coolness.

"I owe you a shot," Dick said; "and although I am inclined to be generous, yet I promise you I shall return it unless you quickly hand over your purse, whether it contains much or little!"

The traveller saw that he was completely at the highwayman's mercy, so, with a grin, he unbuttoned his undercoat and produced a tolerably-sized leather bag.

"There," he said—"take it. I haven't another pistol, or I wouldn't give it up without a struggle. I'm a d—d fool for carrying the money by night, yet how I am to help it I can't tell at all."

Dick Turpin almost snatched the bag out of the traveller's hand, and then chuckled as he found how heavy it was.

"If this is gold," he cried, "it will be a prize indeed; and if silver, the amount will not be despised!"

"Let me go," said the traveller. "I thought to have made a good day's work to-morrow with that money, but now you have prevented me. Let me go!"

"With all my heart!" said Dick. "Here are the reins. Drive on. Never grieve, man, over a little money. It will do me quite as much good as it would you."

"That's a poor consolation," the traveller growled, and, raising his whip, he dealt his horse a savage cut with it.

The animal started off at a wonderful rate.

Dick looked after him with a smile.

Then, placing the bag of gold securely in his pocket, he listened again.

But all was still.

"This looks like making a good night of it," he muttered, half aloud and half to himself. "We'll ride on gently, Bess, and wait for some one to overtake us."

This resolution Dick carried out.

But the speed at which he went, although a gentle one, was such that there was little likelihood of any-one overtaking him.

At frequent intervals he would pause and listen.

But on each occasion the silence was profound.

"It is almost too late now, I fear, to meet with anyone, yet there is no hurry—I have the whole of the night before me."

How far Dick might have gone along the road he had only a vague idea; but when it was growing towards morning he stopped once more.

No other traveller had presented himself.

"A bad road," he said—"a bad road. I've a good mind now that I will desert it."

He went on at a walk a little distance further until he came to a spot where a cross-country road intersected the highway.

In the centre of the open space formed by the junction of these roads was a tall finger-post, which, being freshly painted white, gleamed out a conspicuous object in the darkness.

"Surely," he thought, "if I remain here a little time I shall meet with some one. I have four roads now at my command."

Yet he listened in vain, until, suddenly, with a glad cry, he exclaimed:

"Yes, some one comes at last. Hurrah!"

He turned off down the cross-road on his right hand, for he knew full well the traveller was as yet at a considerable distance, and the spot where he had taken up his station near the finger-post was not at all adapted for waylaying him.

The traveller, whoever he might be, was approaching on horseback, and at an easy rate.

Dick journeyed on to meet him until he came to a spot where, on one side of the road, was a huge rock that had been half cut away when the road was made.

This mass of stone of course cast a deep shadow on the roadway, and in this shadow Dick concealed himself.

Tramp—tramp! he could hear the horseman slowly approaching him, and he wondered why he should be journeying at such an easy rate.

Dick had his pistols all in readiness, and as soon as the traveller entered the shadow of the rock, he rode forth.

"Hold!" he said. "Pull up for your life!"

The stranger obeyed, and, in the calmest possible tone of voice, asked:

"Well, what's the matter? Why do you stop me?"

"I must trouble you for your purse, watch, rings, and such-like," said Dick. "It's not worth while to make any fuss about them; they can be of no moment to you, for I see by your attire you are a gentleman."

"But if I am, that's no reason why I should submit to be robbed without raising a finger in my defence. I will see you d—d before I surrender one farthing!"

"You will alter your mind, I feel certain," said Dick, and he cocked his pistol while he spoke.

The sharp, clicking sound sent an uneasy thrill through the traveller's whole frame.

"I need scarcely tell you I am a desperate man," said Dick, "and that I am determined to obtain my ends. Save all further trouble, I beg; hand over your valuables, and you shall depart in peace."

"I will not," was the reply; "you shall not have on farthing without a struggle for it! Come on, I am ready!"

"You are mad."

"Not at all! Come on, I say! If you want any money you must take it!"

"Then," said Dick, "just hear my determination. You see this pistol? it's an excellent weapon and carefully loaded by myself. I will count three, and if, when I have done so, you refuse to hand your purse quietly, why, your death will be on your own head."

The traveller was silent, and after a slight pause, Dick said:

"One!"

Still the traveller sat motionless.

"Two!"

"Hark!" cried the traveller, so suddenly, that it made even Dick Turpin start—"what's that above us? Look—look!"

He raised his arm suddenly as he spoke, as if to point upwards.

The manner in which he spoke was well calculated to throw anyone off his guard.

Even Dick was deceived by it, and instinctively he glanced upwards.

But as he did so he heard a loud report, that was accompanied by a red flash lighting up the surrounding scenery.

Something whistled so closely past his head that for a moment he staggered and reeled, not quite certain whether he had been hit or not.

A triumphant laugh rung in his ears, and the stranger said:

"Now, I hope you are settled! Aha! it serves you right!"

There was a rush, a clatter of a horse's hoofs, and the stranger was gone.

Dick placed his hand to the side of his face and felt it carefully.

"No—no," he muttered, "I am not hurt. That must have been a close shave indeed! Confound the fellow's treachery—it was base in the extreme; it was as though I had fired after counting two! But he shall not escape," he added, in a louder voice—"he shall not escape! I will have every article of value that he carries with him. Perhaps he shall take away something from me as a memento of this adventure! Now, Bess, lass, forward!"

Dick was much incensed by this act of treachery, which was so near costing him his life.

It was indeed a wonder that, at such a short distance, the bullet could have missed him at all.

But the fact was, the traveller knew he was doing a base and dangerous action, and felt the necessity of being extra quick in all his movements.

Then it was only natural that he should be slightly agitated while making such an attempt as this, or some other cause had rendered his hand unsteady, his aim imperfect.

Luckily, however, Dick had escaped from the bullet.

He had sustained no injury whatever.

But when Black Bess, in obedience to his command, started off at full gallop along the cross road, the sound of horses' feet in advance had almost died away.

"Who would have thought that he could have made such speed?" Dick thought. "And if he had such a good horse as that under him, why was he coming along so quietly when I heard him first?"

CHAPTER DCCCXXXV.

THE HUNTSMEN MATCH WHITE STAR AGAINST BLACK BESS FOR FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS, AND DICK TURPIN FINDS HIMSELF IN A SITUATION OF GREAT PERIL.

The traveller's manner was certainly peculiar, and well calculated to give rise to perplexing speculations.

One thing, however, above all others was quite certain, and that was, the horse he rode was of no common quality.

The speed it now made was something truly prodigious.

Black Bess, however, with her long, stretching gallop, rapidly gained upon him, and each moment Dick could hear the sound of the traveller's horse's hoofs more and more distinctly.

Yet so good a start had he obtained, and so excellent was the speed he made, that a considerable time elapsed before Dick was anywhere near him.

The night was now almost gone, and it seemed to be struggling with the coming day.

Each moment, however, the light grew brighter and brighter, and distant objects came more clearly into view.

Turning round in the saddle, the traveller saw Dick coming on at a tremendous pace behind him, and, after one hasty glance, struck his horse savagely with the spurs.

The noble creature flew off at a vastly accellerated rate, and Dick had the mortification of finding that he would have to pursue him some distance further before he overtook him.

"Upon my life," he cried, "it's a rare steed — Black Bess has never been so well matched! But come what will, I will overtake him!"

Considering that morning was coming on with such rapid strides, it was a very perilous thing for Dick to be thus riding across the country.

But his blood was up, and, in the excitement, he forgot all caution.

Of one thing, however, he was well aware, and that was he was a considerable distance from London.

Every moment now the distance between Black Bess and the traveller's steed decreased.

Dick noticed it with delight, and continued to urge his mare forwards.

The road lay straight before them as far as the eye could reach.

It was a smooth, well-kept road, too, so that the horses were able to put forth their best powers.

Finding that his pursuer was so greatly gaining upon him, the traveller continued to spur his own steed.

With but slight effect, however, for the animal was now growing insensible to the pain.

The sun rose and saw the chase going on as vigorously as ever, except that Dick Turpin now was something less than half a mile behind the traveller.

Suddenly, to Dick's surprise, he unclasped the large cloak he wore, and that had hitherto concealed the greater part of his apparel.

Perhaps he fancied that it interfered with his movements, or else the rapid motion had rendered its heat unbearable.

At any rate, off the cloak came, and then Dick understood at a glance how it was that Black Bess had had such a hard ride.

The stranger was attired in full hunting costume, with velvet cap, a bright scarlet coat, leather trousers, and short black riding boots.

Beneath him was a capital hunter—one of the best racers in the country, in fact.

But the animal was now greatly distressed.

Dick could perceive that, although so far in the rear, while Black Bess was still galloping on, apparently without showing the least signs of fatigue, and yet Dick thought she did not on this occasion put forth her speed so well as she had done many times before.

But perhaps this was only a fancy, caused by his inability to overtake the stranger.

Nearer and nearer the horses drew together, and Dick, with an angry feeling in his heart, clutched the butt of a pistol tightly.

It was no wonder that he should be greatly exasperated by such a treacherous, cowardly attempt having been made upon his life, and at that moment he longed more for revenge than he ever had done in all his life before.

When he came up with the traveller the encounter would, beyond a doubt, be a formidable one.

All at once, though, the stranger disappeared round a bend in the road.

Dick was vexed that he should have got out of sight even for a moment, and urged Black Bess to still greater exertion.

To his intense wonder, however, upon sweeping round the curve in the road, he perceived that the traveller had stopped.

He was surrounded by a party of about a dozen gentlemen, all similarly attired to himself, and who, beyond a doubt, were out so early in the morning for a hunt.

The stranger was gesticulating violently, and doubtless saying something in a very loud tone of voice to his companions.

Dick was so surprised at what he saw that for about the space of a moment he was undecided how to act.

Then he began gently to rein in Black Bess.

The turn affairs had taken was quite an unexpected one, and while checking his mare, he continued to think how he should act.

He yet burned to avenge the injury he had received, yet while the traveller was surrounded by so many of those who were doubtless his own personal friends, it would be madness to attempt anything against him.

This was galling in the extreme.

Still watching their movements, Dick saw the stranger pointing towards him with his arm.

His companions looked in the direction to which he pointed.

Judging by their actions, Dick came to the conclusion that the stranger was urging them to begin an immediate pursuit.

But this proposal on his part did not seem to be very much relished.

The probability was, the gentlemen having come out for a settled purpose, did not wish to be turned aside from it.

But the traveller continued his exhortations.

When within a hundred yards of them, Dick Turpin pulled up, and remained quietly waiting in the middle of the road.

He could now hear them speaking quite plainly, though they were too far off for him to distinguish the words.

One uttered louder than the rest would occasionally float through the still morning air to his ears, but that was all.

The stranger must have been some person of distinction, for great attention was paid to all he said by his companions, and they seemed to hesitate about giving a positive refusal.

With a boldness that perhaps no one else would have displayed, Dick walked Black Bess still closer to those whom he felt justified in calling his foes.

He continued, indeed, until he was able to overhear their conversation.

And then he halted.

This action created a great deal of astonishment among the huntsmen.

But the stranger said:

"I tell you, Sir George, that it is Dick Turpin! Why, look at the animal under him—with half an eye you can recognise it as Black Bess, and if it had not been, I wonder what other horse in the world could have eclipsed Diamond here, and I assure you that, when I fortunately encountered you, she was almost knocked up!"

"I really do believe that it is Black Bess," said another voice—"I really do. I've heard all about her, and, 'pon honour, I do feel inclined to match my little White Star against her."

"Do—do, Sir George!" cried the stranger, emphatically. "I'll bet you five hundred pounds that you can't overtake Black Bess in a gallop!"

"Done!" said Sir George. "You are all here witnesses to the bet! Come on, I'll win the race first, and then we will oblige Sir Marmaduke by capturing the highwayman!"

"Well — well — agreed!" said a chorus of voices. "Now—now—start at once!"

"Wait a moment," said the stranger; "Diamond, here, is done for. Which of you does not feel much inclined to join in the race—who will change horses with me for a few minutes?"

"I will," said a voice. "I like hunting a fox, or anything else on four legs; but d—n me if I like turning police officer, and hunting a man! Here you are, Sir Marmaduke, take my horse and welcome."

An elderly gentleman with long white hair descended from his steed as he spoke.

The huntsman who had been named Sir Marmaduke alighted also from his foaming, panting horse, and speedily took possession of that belonging to his friend.

It was a noble creature, of more than ordinary height, and apparently possessing great powers of speed and endurance.

Sir Marmaduke's eyes quite flashed with joy and anticipated triumph.

"Now, Sir George," he cried, "I am ready. Five hundred pounds that you don't overtake her!"

Hearing these words, Turpin took off his hat and made a low bow.

"Gentlemen," he said, "you have not thought proper to ask me whether I was willing to join in this race or not. But no matter, I am in the humour to show you a little of my mare's mettle; so when you are ready say the word, and come on."

"Ready!" said Sir George, and he touched his horse lightly on the flank as he spoke.

Dick turned Black Bess sharply round, and made her overleap the rather stiff hedge at the side of the road.

He judged he should be safer going across the open country than by keeping to the high road.

With a loud shout Sir George followed him, and at his heels came the remaining huntsmen.

The old gentleman who had been left behind shook his head slowly to and fro.

Then, leisurely mounting the horse that had been left him in exchange, he rode gently off in an opposite direction.

It was plain that for him, at least, the race possessed neither charm nor interest.

The hedge by the side of the road was cleared by all the horses without difficulty, and as soon as the soft green turf was beneath their feet, the race might be said to have commenced.

CHAPTER DCCCXXXVI.

THE RACE BETWEEN BLACK BESS AND WHITE STAR MEETS WITH AN UNEXPECTED TERMINATION.

Dick Turpin as yet had no occasion to use either whip or spur to urge Black Bess forward.

When he slackened rein she bounded forward gallantly, and from the style in which she commenced it seemed pretty clear that she would win the race, and that Sir George would consequently lose his bet.

The superiority of White Star over the other horses was very speedily manifested.

Sir George kept the lead in admirable style.

The others came on in a straggling line behind him.

Only second, however, was Sir Marmaduke, who, full of bitterness and hatred, determined if possible to overtake the highwayman and capture him.

Dick on his part was by no means sorry to know his foe was following him; he was longing for vengeance, and hoped that the opportunity of satisfying it would speedily arrive.

A ploughed field was reached, and as the ground had only recently been turned up, this tried the horses severely.

Dick fancied with alarm that, while crossing it, Black Bess flagged a little as though from weakness.

Surely, however, this must have been fancy, he thought.

Although Black Bess had behaved so gallantly on that night, he knew well that the full extent of her powers had not been reached, and that she was competent to do much more.

Unfortunately, in the excitement of recent events he forgot all about the injury Black Bess had received, and from which she had not yet recovered.

The wound in the neck that had been produced by the pistol bullet was not quite so slight as had been at first imagined, for one of the small branching veins had been severed.

The place, nevertheless, had partially healed over, and being out of sight in consequence of her long silken mane falling over it, Dick forgot at the time all about it.

In those cheering, animated tones that he so generally employed when speaking to his matchless steed, and which he knew produced a more powerful effect upon her than could the sharpest application of the spur, he said:

"Come, Bess, my lass—come! Forward! On—on! For your credit as well as for mine, you must not lose this race. Cheerly, now—cheerly—the ground will be better soon! Bear up, old lass—bear up!"

It was really possible to see how the gallant creature summoned up all her energies in response to her master's urgings.

Like one who is determined to make one tremendous effort to succeed, she bounded on, and the next moment the ploughed field was left behind.

With prudent forethought, Sir Marmaduke checked his horse as soon as he found that a ploughed field was before him.

He knew that in a general way, there was a beaten path around, close under the hedges, and along this he proceeded.

The distance was great, yet the speed he was enabled to make in consequence of the firmer nature of the ground, more than made up for the loss of time occasioned.

When the next hedge was leaped, he came close to his friend, Sir George, indeed.

Raising his voice, he cried to him:

"Another five hundred on the race, if you are willing! I will bet now five hundred more that I obtain the lead, and will keep it!"

"Done!" cried Sir George, readily, as if the affair was not of the slightest moment, and while he uttered the word he loosened the reins still more.

He had been nursing his horse across the ploughed field, being unwilling to distress it too much.

Now that turf was again beneath its feet, it was enabled once more to put forth its prodigious power of speed.

The race was truly a most exciting one, and the huntsmen soon caught the enthusiasm of it.

They found indeed that, in comparison with hunting a fox, the excitement was tremendous.

It would have been a strange spectacle had there been any eye to behold it.

But the fact was, at that early hour, and in that sparsely-populated part of the country, there were no living beings abroad.

After leaving the ploughed field, Black Bess shot ahead of her pursuers in a manner that delighted her master beyond all measure, and she continued to increase the distance between them until a long stretch of rising ground was reached.

Here she again flagged.

This time so perceptibly that Dick could not avoid noticing it, and a sharp pang shot through his breast.

What could be the meaning of such an occurrence as this—an occurrence that had never before happened?

Hitherto she had distanced all pursuers with the greatest ease.

Could it be really possible that his mare, which he believed peerless, had at last met with her match?

It would seem so, and, half angry that such should be the case, he touched her for the first time with the spur.

She snorted, as if in great pain.

But again seeming to draw all her muscles together she set forward at full speed.

But the rising ground was trying in the extreme—almost as much so as the ploughed field; and long before she gained its summit, Dick found that, in spite of all his efforts and his urgings, the huntsmen were gaining upon him.

A cold perspiration started out upon his brow

What was to be done?

If he pressed Black Bess onward by means of the spur, she might carry him clear of all pursuit, but yet be so disabled as to be a long time in recovering; perhaps she would never again be the same.

A whirl of thoughts passed through his brain.

He placed his right hand to his forehead, and pressed it tightly.

He was endeavouring to think.

All at once he started, and a groan escaped his lips.

With great abruptness he pulled the rein and stopped Black Bess just before the summit of the hill was reached.

He dismounted with equal haste, and going towards her head, groaned again.

The reason may be guessed.

His eye had all at once fallen upon the stain of blood.

He recollected then the wound she had received, and felt sure that the violent exertion had caused it to break out afresh.

It was scarcely necessary for him to raise the mane in order to satisfy himself of this terrible fact.

The blood was pouring forth in alarming quantities, and it was no wonder that Black Bess should have flagged.

The wonder is indeed that she should have withstood the loss of blood for so long, and that Dick had not perceived it earlier.

He glanced behind him, and saw the huntsmen pushing forward with redoubled speed, especially Sir Marmaduke, who had now obtained the lead.

What to do in the present crisis of affairs Dick scarcely knew.

To ride Black Bess any further would have been cruelty in the extreme—such cruelty as he, above all others, could never be guilty of.

"Would I had known it earlier!" he said, in tones of bitter reproach. "But no matter—even if I save you at the price of my own life, you shall escape. Without you I should be nothing. You shall at least have a chance of making your escape, and I will shift for myself as best I can."

These words more passed through Turpin's mind than escaped his lips.

But at the same time he plunged his hand into his pocket and drew forth a pocket-book.

Hastily opening it at random, he saw a blank page.

His eye also caught sight of a pencil.

Drawing it out rapidly, he wrote, in a straggling hand, upon the blank page of the pocket-book the words:

"All's well. Fear not for me. Back soon."

He had no time to write another word.

Folding down several leaves at that part, he closed the book, and, by means of a little strap that was used generally for carrying a riding-cloak, he strapped it to the saddle.

Then pulling off his long cravat, he placed it round the neck of his gallant steed, and tied it as tightly as his strength and hurry would permit.

All this that has taken us so many words to describe in reality occurred in the briefest conceivable space of time.

But by the time Dick had got so far the huntsmen were almost upon him.

Patting his mare upon the neck, and placing his mouth close to her ear, he cried:

"Home, Bess—home! Make haste back, old girl, and you will be attended to. Quick—quick, I say! Home—home!"

She tossed her head quickly and neighed.

Dick clapped his hands, and she bounded off at a swift gallop.

Having thus, as he believed, secured the safety of his steed, Dick turned his attention to his own very perilous position.

How was he to escape capture?

To attempt to fly would be ridiculous. The huntsmen would overtake him before he could get fifty yards.

He was compelled, then, by necessity to get a bold front on the matter.

Turning round, with an assumption of as much calmness as he could call up, he folded his arms over his breast, and stood quite still, waiting for his pursuers to come up.

Sir Marmaduke was first, and when he saw the highwayman upon the ground he uttered a loud shout of triumph.

Mercilessly he plunged his spurs into his horse's flanks, impatient to come up with him.

Sir George was not far behind, and the remaining huntsmen not above two hundred yards in the rear.

All of them were filled with surprise at what they witnessed, and marvelled greatly at the highwayman's conduct.

But Dick stood quite calmly, waiting for them to arrive.

As he noted their rich garb, and remembered that two of them, at least, were baronets, he began to think more hopefully upon his position.

"They are gentlemen," he muttered. "I have done no harm to any of them except Sir Marmaduke, and unless I mistake their natures very greatly, they will not take the office of police officer upon themselves. No—no; I feel that with them I shall be safe, and that all will be well."

CHAPTER DCCCXXXVII.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN SURRENDERS HIMSELF A PRISONER.

This was a very frail hope indeed, and Dick might have known that he would be making a mistake if he trusted anything to the generosity of others.

He forgot just then that his hand was raised against all men, and that all men, in consequence, had their hands raised towards him.

Even when he saw Sir Marmaduke coming on so hastily and with such a vindictive expression on his face, he felt less assured than he had done a moment previously.

"Villain," cried the baronet, "surrender at once! You have reached the end of your rope, my fine fellow! Sir George," he added, "help me to secure this man!"

"Not I," was the answer—"I am off in pursuit."

"Sir George," said Dick, calmly, addressing him, "pull up your horse a moment, I request you—do not continue the race. My mare I discovered to be badly wounded, and that's why I alighted. You have lost the wager, it is true; but if you like I will pay the forfeit."

There was a laugh at this, and Sir George, checking his steed, said:

"Upon my word, you take this very coolly and easily indeed—more easily than I could in such a ticklish position as yourself: but I suppose I must consider that I have won the race?"

"Yes, yes—by all means. Sir George, Black Bess, for the first time in her life, has met with her match; I acknowledge it freely!"

By this time the other huntsmen arrived, and Sir Marmaduke was just about to address them, when Sir George said:

"But can it be really true that you are Dick Turpin, the highwayman, and that you stand there so calmly and quietly as you do when you know that so heavy a price is set upon your head?"

Dick bowed.

"It is quite true, sir," he said—"true, every word of it. As for my calmness, perhaps that comes from an undue share of conrage, or perhaps it is because I have grown more careless about the officers, who have tried so often and yet failed to capture me."

"My friends," cried Sir Marmaduke, "I call upon you to assist me in securing this man. He is a highwayman, and has not only robbed me, but attempted my life."

"No," cried Dick, "that is wrong. It was you who, like a cowardly assassin, tried to throw me off my guard, and to shoot me down like a dog."

"Insolent villain!" cried Sir Marmaduke, furiously, and he half carried his hand to his sword by his side.

Dick perceived the movement, and at the same moment drew his own weapon.

"Sir Marmaduke," he cried, "in the presence of all these, your friends and acquaintances, I stigmatize you as a coward—a villain—a would-be assassin—and if you wish to disprove my words, you must do so at the sword's-point."

The baronet turned very white, and fairly shook with rage.

"The sword's-point indeed! Ridiculous!" he cried, as soon as he could command his voice. "Do you think I would debase myself by descending to be your equal?"

"The debasement would be on my side," returned Turpin, fiercely, "for I never was an assassin yet, either in thought or deed, and never shall be!"

"I have no more to say," cried Sir Marmaduke, controlling himself with a great effort. "I command you to surrender yourself to me; and if you refuse, the consequence of such refusal will be on your own head! Dead or alive, I will make you my prisoner!"

He descended from the saddle as he spoke.

"Come on, then," said Dick. "You are free to take me if you are willing. I shall not surrender, but shall resist to the utmost of my power!"

"But you forget," cried the baronet, "I am a justice of the peace, and for this county. You know it as well," he added, addressing the others; "and in the name of his Majesty the King I call upon you to assist me in capturing this notorious offender! By his own admission he is Dick Turpin, the highwayman, and you know that a reward has long been hanging over his head!"

"It has, we know," replied the huntsmen; "but we are not police officers."

"No; but you, I hope, are subjects of the King, like myself, and therefore I again call upon you for assistance. If you refuse to give it, rest assured that I will set aside all feelings of friendship and acquaintance, and denounce you to the authorities. You will then find yourselves in anything but a comfortable predicament!"

This, as they all knew, was no idle threat, and they were also well aware that when his passion was aroused, Sir Marmaduke was a most vindictive man, and would not hesitate to carry out his threats to the very letter.

When he perceived them whispering, and that they no longer firmly refused his demand as they had done, the baronet took heart and continued:

"I include you, Sir George," he said, "among the rest; and let me ask you to set these others a good example. Things have been carried to too great a pitch, and, as you must be aware, the law is no respector of persons, and you would be punished as severely for aiding and abetting a felon as anyone else."

Sir George was silent.

"Come," said Sir Marmaduke, "do you consent or refuse? In either case I shall then know what to do."

"The man has done me no harm," replied Sir George. "I don't know that he is Dick Turpin, and therefore cannot see why I should run the risk of capturing him."

"But I am a magistrate, sir," returned the other; "you know that—the chief magistrate in the county. Nor need I remind you that I am the representative of the King, and that you are bound to aid me to the utmost of your power in carrying out the law."

"Sir Marmaduke," said Dick, "if you want me, why not take me without troubling these gentlemen, who I can see, are unwilling to mix themselves up in the affair? Here I am, and there you stand. Here is my sword; draw yours, and let the conflict decide the point. I owe you one for your attempt upon my life. Now, then, let us square accounts and come to a settlement."

A murmur of applause came from the huntsmen.

They could not be blind to Turpin's boldness and great courage, nor could they avoid giving expression to their admiration.

"Bravo! Sir Marmaduke," cried Sir George, "you hear what he says—take him."

"Never," was the answer. "I will not peril my life in so unequal a contest. Again I call upon you for your aid, and I call upon you for the last time, for I solemnly swear by everything that we hold sacred if you refuse again I will forget friendship and prosecute you all to the utmost!"

Great irresolution could now be seen upon the countenances of all, even including that of Sir George.

The threat was one they could not afford to despise, for its consequences would not only be felt by themselves but by their families.

Yet the great admiration they had for Dick's courage made them hold back.

At length Sir George exclaimed, addressing himself to Turpin:

"You hear what has just been said, and comprehend our position. If we assist in making you a prisoner we shall all perform our parts unwillingly. You will have an undoubted right to struggle for your life; but, at the same time, if you injure any of us, you will be doing a great wrong. What is to be done?"

"I care not," said Dick. "Liberty I cannot and will not part with. I will give up my life first! Persuade Sir Marmaduke to encounter me alone."

"But he refuses."

"Yes, he does refuse," yelled the baronet; "and I want to know whether you refuse also?"

"You know full well we dare not refuse," said Sir George, "because, from your known character, we feel that we shall meet with no mercy at your hands, although you have called us individually your friends. If you force us to comply with this demand, bear this in mind—for we can threaten as well as you—henceforth we will not recognise you in any public or private assemblage, but wherever we meet you will treat you with the scorn and contempt you deserve!"

"Be it so; I care not so long as I carry my point, though I hope a little reflection will bring you to your senses. Now, then, upon him—seize him!"

"You see how we are situated," said Sir George, again addressing Turpin. "Let me give you a few words of advice, and be assured that they are dictated solely from a desire to promote your welfare."

Dick bowed.

"Surrender calmly and quietly; that is as unavoidable on your part as ours. The odds are so great that your capture must result in the end, and, moreover, you would inflict an injuiry upon those who wish you well, and who would get you out of this scrape if they could, and therefore let me again advise you to surrender quietly."

Sir George accompanied these words with a look so significant that Dick felt sure that he had some deep and particular motive for so speaking.

The question was—should he trust a perfect stranger so far as to take his advice in an affair of such vital interest as this?

A moment's consideration decided.

"Sir George," said Turpin, "I will take your advice, and, without any resistance, freely and willingly surrender myself to you a prisoner."

CHAPTER DCCCXXXVIII.

CLAUDE DUVAL IS PURSUED BY THE POLICE OFFICERS ON THE ST. ALBANS ROAD, AND HIS HORSE UNFORTUNATELY FALLS DEAD LAME.

In order to preserve something like a chronological order of events, it is necessary now that we leave Dick Turpin for awhile, although we do so reluctantly, since he is in a situation of so much peril.

But on that night when he had such a narrow escape of his life from the pistol of Sir Marmaduke, other events were occurring to his comrades full of interest and excitement.

Those events, however, will be passed over as rapidly as possible, in order that we may come back to Dick's proceedings.

It was not long, then, after his departure that, according to arrangement, his three comrades one by one departed from the inn, each taking different directions.

Claude Duval was so fortunate as to get away quite unperceived.

Tom Davis had been careful in reconnoitring, and Claude, although he looked vigilantly from right to left, saw nothing of Jack Marshall or any other police officers.

After what had taken place on the Windsor Road such a short time before, Claude judged it would be wise to select some other locality, and accordingly he turned his horse's head northwards, making his way in the direction of St. Albans.

While leisurely trotting along, however, he fancied he perceived something like a dusky figure flit across the roadway and disappear immediately in the hedge on the left-hand side of the way.

He could not be quite sure that this had actually taken place.

Yet, being in doubt, it behoved him to be careful, for such an occurrence as that ought not to be passed over.

Anything unusual or strange signified to him danger, and so he resolved to be upon his guard accordingly.

"The boldest way is best," he muttered, and as he spoke he touched his horse with the spur, and caused him to gallop forward at great speed.

On he went for a distance of about thirty yards.

Then he heard a wild, screaming voice exclaim:

"That's him—that's him! Shoot him! Shoot now, or you will be too late!"

Claude, at the first word, plunged the spurs deeply into his horse's flanks, causing him to make a tremendous leap forward, one that would have unhorsed any but a practised rider.

Claude, however, maintained his seat, and well it was he had the presence of mind to act as he did, for the silence of the night was broken in upon by a rattling discharge of firearms.

The bullets, however, were all behind him.

He had escaped without a scratch.

His breast burned with indignation upon finding that such an attack had been made upon him; and then, the next moment, he shuddered, for he thought how easily he might have fallen a victim to such a treacherous plan.

"I see how it is," he muttered, between his teeth; "the officers, finding that all chance of capturing us by what I may call fair means to be quite useless, have decided on this bloodthirsty course. This comes of offering a reward the same whether a prisoner is taken alive or dead."

As may be guessed, Claude was much agitated by this occurrence, for he could not help pondering upon the chance circumstance that had saved him, and thinking how near he had been to death.

Unconsciously he allowed his horse to decrease its speed, but all at once he was aroused by the shock of horses' hoofs on the road behind him.

Turning round, he glanced back, and in the dusky gloom perceived a dark, black mass of officers approaching him at the greatest speed their horses could accomplish.

"They are determined," he thought, "but yet it is strange to me if I fall into their power. On—on!"

He spurred his horse while he spoke, and the animal made gallant progress.

Soon the officers were distanced, but yet they kept hard upon the track.

Had it been a little lighter, they would have been in sight.

Now that he was getting further and further from his pursuers, however, Claude's apprehensions vanished, and he was just beginning to congratulate himself, when, with great suddenness, his horse fell dead lame, and proceeded only at a limping pace.

Full of dismay at this unexpected calamity, he pulled up abruptly, and sprang to the ground.

He lifted the horse's hoof, expecting that the lameness had been caused by picking up a stone.

But no, it was nothing of the sort—at least, there was no stone wedged into the hoof.

"A sprain," he said—"yes, it must be a sprain. How unfortunate! What am I to do now?"

He shaded his eyes with his hands, and looked with a piercing gaze all around him.

In the meanwhile, the officers came on with undiminished speed, and more than made up for the distance that Claude had managed to gain.

How he was to shake them off again seemed to be a mystery.

For once, he found himself entirely at fault.

Yet, with an air of determination, he cried:

"Come what will, they shall not capture me!"

He sprang into the saddle as he spoke.

Much as he might regret urging his horse forward while in such a condition, he was forced to it by circumstances.

Vigorously applying the spurs, therefore, he compelled the poor creature to break again into a gallop.

Still it was a very poor attempt, and Claude thought that if the officers were only listening with attentive ears they would be able to distinguish the difference in the sound and learn what had occurred.

Suddenly, in the distance, and apparently in the very middle of the road, he perceived something white and gleaming.

Another second and he discovered it was a huge finger-post set up at a spot where another road crossed the one which he was travelling.

"That gives me a little chance," he thought; "if I can get there in time to take a turn, they may be in doubt which way I have gone."

Before coming to the finger-post he had resolved to take the turn on his left, by which means he would be getting nearer to Ealing than he would had he turned in the opposite direction.

As he neared this point, Claude perceived that there was a high brick wall—so high that, although mounted on his steed, he could not see over it.

From its appearance, he guessed that it surrounded some gentleman's domain.

He noticed this, we might almost say, without being conscious that he did so.

It was afterwards that he recollected.

Coming to the corner, he turned round swiftly, and again spurring his poor steed, made better progress.

After going rather less than a quarter of a mile, however, his horse again stopped, and was scarcely able to proceed even at a slow walk.

This was worse than he had expected, and something very much like despair took possession of his breast.

How he was to shake off his pursuers now he had not the remotest idea.

Still his horse continued to walk on, almost, as it appeared, upon three legs, for the lame one it scarcely touched upon the ground at all.

It was at this juncture that the police officers arrived at the cross roads.

"I fear it is all over," murmured Claude, despondingly, half aloud and half to himself. "They are close here, and I have no escape—none. Ah!"

He uttered an ejaculation.

Just as he reached this point in his ruminations, he arrived opposite some large entrance-gates in the wall we have mentioned, and which, from their massive appearance, evidently formed the principal mode of entering the grounds.

What so surprised him, however, was, that no sooner did he arrive at the spot we have mentioned than a small wicket in the large gates was thrown open, and a man hastily emerged.

Dark as it was, Claude could perceive that he was of great age.

His form was shrunk and bowed, and his hair, long and white, fell flutteringly upon his shoulders.

In a weak, tremulous voice, he spoke, and, while speaking he drew close to Claude's horse and placed his hand upon the rein.

"Thank Heaven!" he exclaimed—"thank Heaven that you have returned now, Master Jack, although I am afraid it is too late. Yes, yes, too late. But do not despair—do not Follow me with all speed—every moment is of importance now. Don't ask me a question; I can't stay for explanation—I will tell you as we go towards the house. Come—come!"

So saying, this singular old man, grasping Claude's horse by the bridle, led him towards the door through which he had just passed.

As for Claude himself, he was so surprised and bewildered by the suddenness of the whole occurrence, that before he had time to decide how he should act he found that he had actually been led through the gates, and the little doorway was closed behind him.

That he was the victim of some mistake—that the old man—either through infirmity of age or some other cause—had taken him for another person, was quite evident.

That mistake had most unquestionably saved Claude's life.

The real point was now how far he should allow this deception to proceed.

Should he at once undeceive the old man and trust to his generosity, or should he endeavour to put off the moment of discovery as long as possible?

He decided upon the latter course.

Perhaps what led him to do so was the trampling of the officers' horses, which now reached his ears with great distinctness.

But he listened to the sounds with tolerable complacency, for he had noticed that the old man had well secured the gates behind him and he was perfectly certain that none of the officers had seen him enter.

The entrance gates of a mansion would be such an unlikely place for him to enter, that the officers in all probability would ride past, not thinking for a moment had sought refuge there.

[CLAUDE DUVAL'S PECULIAR ADVENTURE.]

CHAPTER DCCCXXXIX.

CLAUDE DUVAL IS IN TIME TO PREVENT THE PERPETRATION OF A FOUL WRONG.

THAT such a mistake as the one we have just described should take place is not at all wonderful, for by the old man's manner it seemed as though he had been for hours expecting the approach of some one, and seeing Claude, as it appeared, about to stop at the gates, he jumped immediately to the conclusion that the person he expected had arrived.

This was the solution Claude himself put upon it, and as he did so, this difficulty arose in his mind:

The failing eyesight of the old man might have disabled him from distinguishing a stranger from the person he expected; but the voice would be another matter.

When Claude spoke, would not the deception be at once discovered?

"Oh, Master Jack," he continued, addressing him, and walking on by the side of his steed, "I have been watching and waiting for you so long—watching and waiting until I have grown quite weary, and when I heard you approach my joy was so great that at first I could not move! Oh, it is time that you came back to your own! If you only knew how much your father regrets his harsh treatment of you, you would forgive him. He, too, longs for you; but the dark spirit is at work, and——You understand, Master Jack?"

Claude made a murmuring sound, which he hoped would be significative of assent.

The old man took it so, and continued with the garrulity of old age:

"Your cousin is there; he is with him now in his bedroom, sitting at the side of his dying bed. He does not know that my eyes have been upon him, but they have—they have! He has been importuning your father to sign a will that will revoke the one he has already made, and alienate all this fine property from you and bequeath it to him. But your father has held out till now, though he is weak, very weak, and his ear is still poisoned by that false tale which your bad cousin fabricated."

Still Claude was silent, and the old man, turning to him, said:

"Why, how quiet you are, Master Jack! You don't say a single word. But I don't wonder at your silence—I can account for it. Your heart must be heavy indeed. In a day or two, though, you will be able to tell me all that has occurred, and to glad my poor heart. And how is Miss Ellen now, and the little one? You see I call her Miss Ellen still, although I ought not to do so; but the familiar name came to my tongue's-end before I was aware of it."

"They are well—very well," returned Claude, purposely speaking as huskily as he could, so that it should be hard to recognise the exact tones of his voice. "But my heart is indeed heavy," he continued, "and you must not ask me many questions to-night."

He waited with considerable anxiety to see what would be the result of this speech.

If he could pass muster on this first occasion, he would have good hopes of being able to sustain the deception sufficiently long for him to secure his own safety.

He noticed with some misgiving, however, that the old man started, and turned his eyes inquiringly upon him.

"Why, Master Jack," he cried, "how strangely you speak—how your voice has altered!"

"Has it?" returned Claude, with greater confidence. "Perhaps it has, and so have I changed in my appearance, if you could but see me. It is very many years now since we met, if you will recollect."

This was a bold assertion, but, fortunately, Claude's guess was tolerably correct.

"Yes," was the answer, "to you it may appear many years, yet to me, who have lived on this earth so much longer than you have, it seems a mere nothing. But parting is over now, I hope."

"I hope so too."

"It will be a glad day when you take possession here. The people will regret your father's death, but they will rejoice when they find your cousin is not heir, for he is universally detested."

Claude was again silent, for he could not tell exactly what to say, and, having been successful so far in his guesses, he was unwilling to run the risk of discovery.

"The sympathies of all are with you," continued the old man, "and with Miss Ellen. They are all sorry for Miss Ellen, and while they blame your father for his harshness, yet they cannot help pitying him for being so led away by Ralph Davids."

"I am glad of that," Claude ventured to remark.

"Well, now, dear Master Jack, just tell me what you intend to do. Will you not walk in boldly, and, in spite of all obstacles, make your way to your father's chamber? He will be glad indeed to see you, and your scheming cousin will be quite discomfited."

Claude reflected.

"No," he said, at length. "If you could get me into the house quietly, I should prefer it."

"Why so?"

"Because then you could lead me, perhaps, by some unfrequented route to the chamber where my cousin is. I should like to witness what takes place with my own eyes."

"Then you shall do so," was the answer; "and perhaps it will be better so. You know the way, Master Jack, as well as I do."

"Yes, yes; but I will leave my horse, and then you can accompany me. I am so agitated and troubled to-night that I feel as though I must have you with me."

The old man seemed very pleased and grateful for this speech.

"If you wish your arrival kept a secret, we will fasten your horse to this tree, and then creep slowly towards the house."

"Just so," returned Claude, and while he spoke he slipped from the saddle

His horse was secured to a tree, and then, with cautious footsteps, he followed his strange guide across the lawn.

On his way, he reflected a little on the singular position in which chance had placed him.

For the present he had no doubt that he was perfectly safe.

The officers might search for him as long as they liked—they would never find him.

It was impossible, however, for Claude not to feel grateful to the old man, who had so unintentionally befriended him, and, from what he had heard, he could easily surmise that without some active interference a great wrong would be perpetrated.

That active interference he resolved to make.

He had no longer to trouble himself about his own position. He should be able to direct all his energies to the one object before him.

These were the reflections that occupied his mind as he followed the old man to the house.

He was careful then to keep in the rear, for he had not the remotest notion of where he was going.

In a few minutes afterwards, the old man paused.

Claude wished that he could learn his name, so as to address him by it.

But it was scarcely likely that he should hear it pronounced, although the old man might consider it singular that he should never call him by it.

Opening a little side door in the mansion, he passed through, and stood aside for Claude to enter.

He crossed the threshold quickly.

The door was closed behind him, and he found himself in perfect darkness.

"Take my hand, Master Jack," cried the old man. "There, that will do—I can lead you now. I do believe that I am more familiar with this old place than you are, for I could find my way anywhere about it in the dark."

"Yes, yes—don't trust to me in the least," murmured Claude. "I feel so completely overcome that I am not capable of taking the lead in anything."

Slowly, so as to avoid making any sound that would discover their presence, the old man advanced.

A flight of stairs was descended, a long corridor traversed, and then there was a pause.

"This is the door of the dressing-room," exclaimed the old man. "If I could manage to open that quietly, and we entered, we should be able to see and hear almost everything, for the inner door is nearly always ajar."

"Good!" said Claude. "Listen first—then try."

The old man listened, and then gently opened the door.

A feeble light appeared beyond.

Every care had been taken to prevent any unpleasant sound reaching the ears of the rich invalid.

The hinges of the door had been oiled on this account, and therefore the old man was able to push it open in perfect silence.

A hasty glance showed him that the dressing-room was vacant.

Claude looked eagerly over his shoulder.

Just before them was another door, standing partly open—the door evidently that communicated with the bed-chamber.

In this a light was burning, and those rays that streamed through the doorway served to light up the dressing-room to some extent—sufficient, at any rate, to enable Claude and his guide to avoid coming in contact with any article of furniture.

Breathlessly, and on tiptoe, they stole to this door—then paused and peeped in.

A spacious, handsomely-furnished bed-chamber was disclosed, filled with rare and costly articles.

Upon these, however, Claude's eyes did not rest for a second.

All his attention was immediately concentrated upon the two sole occupants of the room.

CHAPTER DCCCXL.

IN WHICH IT TURNS OUT THAT THE MISTAKE WAS A MOST FORTUNATE OCCURRENCE FOR ALL PARTIES.

One was a man apparently about thirty years of age, though he might have been older.

His hair had a reddish tinge, and his face, which was flat and dull-looking, was disfigured by an immense number of freckles.

In his small, twinkling, ferret-looking eyes, however, was visible a peculiar expression—one of mingled rage and triumph.

He was standing by the side of the bed, on which, propped up into a sitting position by many pillows was the invalid.

This was a man old and emaciated.

His face wore already the hues of death, and on his forehead perspiration clustered in large drops.

Lying before him on the bed was a sheet of paper, upon which a few words were written.

The old man held a pen in his trembling fingers.

"Sign," said the young man, somewhat sternly—"sign, ere it is too late!"

"I cannot—I cannot!"

"But I say you must! Would you leave all that you have to one who has treated you with so much contumely, and has brought upon your honoured name nothing but the deepest disgrace? I say, would you, after all, reward him for his conduct?"

"No, no! Give me the pen—give me the pen! I will sign!"

"You have it in your hand."

"Oh, have I? Yes—I see—here it is—I had forgotten. Now, where is the paper?"

"Lying before you. Can you not see it? Be quick, or it will be too late!"

With a manifest effort, the old man put his pen upon the paper.

He made a few scratches, and then, with a long-drawn breath, fell back apparently dead.

A shout of rage burst from the young man's lips upon the occurrence of this accident.

"Curse him!" he cried, with savage vehemence. "Curse the old rascal—how I hate him! One moment more would have done the business, and now, after years of successful scheming, I find myself baffled at the last moment. But it shall not be so—it shall not be so!"

Quick as thought, this young man picked up the pen, and, after glancing hastily around him, wrote something on the paper.

"There," he said, "that's well done—much better than he could have done it himself. I have practised signing his name too often for anyone to be able to say this is a forgery. My story will be believed. He, I know, has publicly given it out that he would disinherit his son and make all over to me. I will say that, finding death coming upon him suddenly, he requested me to draw up this memorandum, and had then only just time to sign it before he expired. It will hold good—ten to one that it holds good."

"A nice article," was Claude's thought, and at the same time he determined that his villany should be baulked.

But just at that moment there came a loud uproar from the lower part of the house.

Voices could be heard raised to an angry pitch, which were followed by the trampling of footsteps and the sound of heavy blows.

Immediately after that, footsteps could be heard upon the staircase.

There was a crash—the door that led direct from the corridor into the bed-chamber was dashed open, and Claude perceived a young man enter, who at a first glance bore a somewhat remarkable resemblance to himself—so great, indeed, that he did not wonder at the mistake the old man had made.

Evidently this was the heir returned just at the right moment.

With a cry of amazement, the old man rushed forward.

As for the cousin, Ralph Davids, he stood like a transformed to stone.

Following closely in the footsteps of the heir came two elderly gentlemen, one of whom went direct to the bed.

With a great effort at self-control, Ralph Davids drew himself up to his full height, and determined to put a bold face on the matter.

"What means this insolent, unwarrantable intrusion?" he demanded. "Begone! I command you all to leave not only this room, but this building! I am master here now, and will be obeyed!"

"Villain!" cried the heir—"villain! I have heard the whole story of your detestable arts, and you shall not escape the punishment so justly your due!"

He rushed forward while he spoke, and no doubt would have inflicted some summary punishment upon his cousin, had not one of the gentlemen who accompanied him held him back, though it was with great difficulty that he restrained him.

Ralph Davids retreated to the other side of the bed, where he felt that, at any rate, he was at a safe distance from the intruders.

Then he held aloft the paper.

"Look here," he said. "Read this. You see his lordship now lies dead—he has just breathed his last—not until, however, he had performed what he considered was an act of justice and of duty. That bold, bad man," he continued, pointing to the heir, "you know has been a lifelong sorrow to his deceased parent. You know, as well, that his lordship has avowed over and over again his intention of disinheriting him, yet lacked the courage to take the necessary step. Finding himself suddenly grow worse—knowing, in fact, that the hand of death was resting on his head—he commanded me to write the few lines that you now see; then, seizing a pen, signed his name at the foot. Scarcely had he done so, than he expired. Look, here is the signature!"

He pointed to it triumphantly while he spoke.

"I will read this document," he continued, in tones of the utmost excitement—"I will read it! Listen

"'I, Lord John Robert Venners, finding myself on my deathbed, hereby revoke all other wills that I have made, and bequeath the whole of my possessions, personal and real, to Ralph Davids.

"'(Signed) VENNERS.'

"Now are you satisfied?" the cousin added. "You may say that this deed is without its witnesses, but I will try the law upon this point. I can bring a score of persons who know his lordship's firmly-expressed determination, and then we shall see who obtains the victory."

"We shall see," said the son of Lord Venners, speaking in sorrowful tones; "but I shall bring forward, as well, my witnesses, who will prove that you deluded my poor father by a tale that had no foundation whatever in fact, but which was hatched up entirely in your own villanous, scheming brain."

"I care not!" cried the other. "I am here, for the present, sole master, and I command you all to quit this dwelling! If you refuse, I will have you expelled by main force."

"The deed had witnesses, although they have not signed their names!" said a voice.

There was a universal start, and Ralph Davids uttered a yell of dismay.

At the same instant, Claude Duval stepped forward from the dressing-room.

"I am one of the witnesses," he cried, "and I can give a plain, straightforward account of all!"

"No, no, my good fellow," said Ralph Davids. "You mistake—you mistake! Say nothing—all will be well!"

He accompanied these words with significant gestures, all of which were employed for the purpose of informing Claude that if he kept silent he would be well rewarded.

But he did not know our old friend, or he would never have made any such attempt.

"What I saw," Claude continued, "was this: His lordship was pressed and threatened to sign that paper; but the natural feelings that he had for his own son had exercised their due force, and he hesitated. At last he changed his intention, and seized the pen. He made a few erratic scratches with it, and then fell back, convulsed by death."

The greatest astonishment followed this declaration, and the old man, raising his voice, said:

"Yes, I am witness too. Heaven be thanked that I made so great a mistake!"

"Go on!" said one of the gentlemen who had followed his lordship's son into the room.

"After that," said Claude, pointing to Ralph Davids, "I heard that man mutter something expressive of his determination not to lose this property. I saw him take a pen, and place that signature at the foot of the document, while, at the same time, he stated he had practised that signature many a time before."

"Seize him!" cried one of the gentlemen—"seize him! He shall be arrested on this charge!"

Ralph Davids turned round, and faced his opponents.

All traces of colour had vanished from his cheeks, and the numerous freckles on his countenance looked strangely hideous from their contrast to its ghastliness.

"Beware!" he said, producing a knife from his pocket—"beware, I say! I am a desperate man!"

"Secure him!" was the cry, and there was a general rush.

But Ralph Davids was too quick for them.

With one tremendous bound he reached the window, and dashed headlong through it.

Outside was a balcony, and on this he alighted in safety.

He turned for a moment to shake his clenched fist, then leaping over the parapet, disappeared in the darkness.

"Let him go," said a voice—"let him go—we can capture him at any time! The condition of his lordship here demands our entire attention. We shall soon know the truth of this matter."

One of those who had entered with his lordship's son was the physician, and ever since his entrance he had been bending down over the bed.

"His lordship is not dead," he said, in a voice of great excitement, "though I grieve to say life is only just fluttering at his heart. It is impossible to save him, but yet, I think he will be able to recover sufficiently to tell the truth of this affair."

He applied a small bottle to the nostrils of the dying nobleman, the effects of which seemed magical.

In a moment he reared himself upright in the bed, and glared around him with a haggard, frenzied expression.

"Father!" cried the young man—"father—father, they tell me you are dying, but oh, while you have breath left, tell me that you forgive me!"

CHAPTER DCCCXLI.

IN WHICH RALPH DAVIDS MEETS WITH A COMPLETE DISCOMFITURE.

THERE was a deep and touching silence as, while the young man spoke these words, he threw himself on his knees at the bedside of his father, who gasped for breath, and seemed as though he wished above all things to speak.

But utterance was denied him.

Receiving no answer to his appeal, the son continued:

"Father—father, say that you forgive me ere you die! Do not let me live with such a cloud resting upon my future life as your unforgiveness would be! Speak—speak! My cause of offence was slight, and many things, I know, have been misrepresented to you by interested persons. For all these things I have suffered most severely. Had time permitted it Ellen would have accompanied me, bringing her boy; but let me carry to them the assurance of your forgiveness and reconciliation."

"I do forgive you, my poor boy," the old man gasped forth at length—"I do forgive you! Oh, what I have suffered during the past few moments no tongue can tell! When I fell back upon the bed I was not dead, but all power of motion had abandoned me. Of everything that was going on around I was perfectly conscious. I saw the perfidious wretch in whom I so trusted forge my signature to that detestable document, and then indulge in the expression of his triumph. Thank Heaven I have recovered my speech again, so that I can set this matter right. That deed I proclaim nothing, and the will I long since made at the wish of Mr. Miller, there, I hereby decree to express my last wishes."

The young man was much overcome by this declaration, and poured forth his thanks ardently.

Gradually the hand which he pressed between his own grew senseless and chill, and at length the aged man closed his eyes in death, with a smile upon his lips.

Claude now endeavoured to withdraw, hoping to succeed in doing so without exciting observation.

In this, however, he was disappointed, for the young man, rising suddenly to his feet, grasped him by the hand, and inquired who he was and what had brought him there at that particular junoture.

"I am a perfect stranger to you all," was his answer, "and what I have done I have performed freely and willingly. As it happens, what I have witnessed now signifies nothing. Accident alone brought me here, and I am glad that I arrived at so opportune a moment. If you will permit me, I will now say farewell."

"No, no—we cannot suffer you to depart thus—I will not, indeed! You must oblige me by accepting some slight token in recognition of the service you have rendered."

Claude bowed.

"It would be churlish to refuse," he answered; "yet if you would allow me to depart, for I have pressing business that requires immediate attention."

"I will not keep you," was the answer. "This way—come with me!"

The young man led Claude from the apartment, and, as he did so, he requested to be made acquainted with more of the particulars of the extraordinary and fortunate mistake that had been made.

Claude readily complied, concealing nothing save his own identity.

As they descended the grand staircase, a succession of heavy blows came upon the front door.

Claude stopped abruptly, and involuntarily his companion followed his example.

The door was opened, and no sooner did it fall back upon its hinges, than a throng of police officers poured in.

Foremost amongst them was a man with disordered apparel and of frenzied air.

He waved his arms aloft, and the slight foam upon his lips showed how tremendous was the excitement under which he laboured.

"This way!" he cried—"this way!"

Then, with a yell, he continued:

"Look! There he is—there he is! You see him, all! Now judge whether I have told you truly or not! Is not that man yonder Claude Duval, the highwayman?"

"It is!" cried one of the police officers, stepping forward, and presenting a pistol. "Claude Duval, surrender yourself to me peaceably or I fire."

No words could possibly express the amount of surprise and consternation visible upon the countenance of the young man.

Never in his wildest dreams could he have imagined that the man who had been of such service to him was a highwayman.

Quick as thought, however, Claude turned round, and bounded up the staircase.

An angle quickly hid him from the view of the police officers.

The young man followed, and, with trembling lips, said:

"Can it be true—is it possible that you are the notorious Claude Duval?"

"It is not only possible but true. Farewell, my lord—if such be your title—leave me now to shift for myself."

"Never—never! Do you imagine I could be guilty of such an amount of ingratitude? No! Follow me! At all risks, I will secure your safety."

Before Claude could refuse, he felt himself seized by the arm, and dragged into a room, the door of which was quickly closed behind him.

"Now," said his guide, "follow me! Quick—quick!"

Claude needed no incentive to make speed.

He was aware that his position was critical in the extreme.

That the young man was perfectly ready and willing to befriend him there could, however, be no doubt, and Claude felt that he could not possibly do better than resign himself entirely to his care.

With great rapidity, many rooms were crossed, until a flight of stairs was reached, down which they hurried.

A corridor was traversed, and they paused before another door.

The young man placed his hand upon the knob and entered.

Claude then found himself in a spacious library, the walls of which in every part were lined with books, which reached from the floor up to the lofty, carved oak ceiling.

A kind of studious gloom overspread the whole place, and there was an intense and peculiar silence also.

Without pausing, the young man advanced to one particular part of the room.

Then, seizing what appeared to be an upright support to the shelving, he drew it towards him, disclosing, to Claude's great surprise, a good-sized recess behind it.

"Now, in there!" he said. "Quick—quick! And don't move on any account, until I come to release you."

Claude darted in, and the shelves were pushed back.

Then all was silence and darkness.

So rapidly had all this taken place that he could not as yet precisely comprehend the nature of the hiding-place he was in, nor form any idea of its likelihood to escape discovery should search be made.

Encouraged by the profound silence, however, he stretched out his hands before him, expecting that they would encounter the front edges of the books.

Such, however, was not the case.

A smooth piece of woodwork was before him.

Then he comprehended at once the nature of his hiding-place, and felt a great amount of confidence in it, so cleverly was it constructed, and so likely to escape detection.

One portion of the shelves were fixed, not close up against the walls as the others, but fitted into a kind of box, so constructed that when the books were placed in, the whole had the appearance of a door.

It was opened easily, but by means of a secret spring, unlikely to be discovered.

The officers — supposing that they searched that particular apartment—might take down every book and scrutinise the shelving, and yet discover nothing.

A long time elapsed.

But Claude heard nothing whatever of the officers or anyone else.

The silence, indeed, was most oppressive.

How it was that a visit had not been paid to the library he could not conceive.

The explanation, however, was simple.

The woodwork at the back of the books was lined with many thicknesses of felt, which, in their turn, were covered with another panel, so that all sound was effectually shut out.

Nothing save the greatest uproar could have penetrated to Claude's ears while he remained there.

Slowly the time passed, and wearisomely too.

It seemed an age, indeed, before his friend returned.

At length the cleverly-constructed secret door was thrown open, and Claude once more was permitted to step forth.

"All's well," were the first words that fell upon his ears, "though I had much difficulty in getting rid of the officers."

"Have they really gone?"

"I think they have; but in a few words I will tell you what has happened. Ralph Davids—my cousin, as he calls himself, though I don't recognise the relationship—I have handed over to their custody on a charge of forgery, and, by a heavy bribe, I have induced the officers to give up their search for you."

"This is indeed generous," cried Claude—"it is indeed making an ample recompense for all that I have done! I only hope the officers will not play us false."

"I don't think it. However, if you will follow my advice you will remain here till nightfall. It is now quite light, and if the officers are anywhere at hand you will be seen. Under cover of the darkness you would stand a good chance of escaping."

Claude was profuse in his thanks, and his protector said:

"Here you are quite welcome to stay; no one will interrupt you. As for myself, I have some important affairs to attend to; but when night sets in you may depend upon seeing me again."

With these words, he took his departure, and Claude sank down in one of the huge chairs near the fireplace.

Here he remained until day was gone.

He watched, with great anxiety and pleasure, the gradual gloom that came stealing over the vast apartment, which at length deepened into the darkness of night.

Still the young man came not, nor did he make his appearance until the old-fashioned clock fixed upon one of the turrets of the building proclaimed the hour of twelve.

He entered hastily.

"Come," he said, "all's well—you will have no difficulty in making your escape! This way—this way! I find your own horse is lame, so I have had one of my own brought out; accept it as in some degree a recognition of the important service you have done me."

CHAPTER DCCCXLII.

CLAUDE DUVAL RETURNS TO THE INN, AND RECEIVES UNEXPECTED INTELLIGENCE.

"You are too generous—too good!" returned Claude. "The accident was quite as much to my own advantage as yours, and you may imagine my situation was a most perilous one."

"Well, now I think you may venture to consider that, for to-night, your perils are over. From all that I can learn, the officers have most certainly taken their departure."

Claude was led towards the back portion of the mansion, partly because this was the nearest to the stables, and partly because he was not so likely to be noticed while leaving at this point.

A matchless steed had been brought out, and Claude's eyes lighted up with genuine pleasure as soon as they fell upon it, and he renewed his thanks.

Springing quickly to the saddle, the last farewells were uttered, and, directed by his preserver, Claude left the premises.

The night was yet comparatively young, and when he found himself thus in safety and free from the officers, Claude began to debate within himself whether he should endeavour to find a profitable adventure.

His speculations on this subject were, however, suddenly cut short, for, from round a clump of trees, at no great distance off, a party of police officers appeared.

"There he is," cried one—"there he is! You can see him now quite plain! I told you if we waited it would turn out all right! Now, then, forward, and as soon as you get within range, shoot him down!"

Claude heard this inhuman order, and his bosom burned with bitterness.

But he could do nothing except disappoint the officers of their prey.

Accordingly, he gave his newly-acquired steed the impulse forward, and he observed with considerable anxiety and interest the speed he made.

The result was far beyond his utmost expectations, and caused his heart to bound with pleasure.

At a long, sweeping gallop, which seemed to be the creature's natural pace, and to be performed without the slightest exertion, the horse stretched over the soft turf, and quickly left the heavily-mounted police officers behind.

In vain they plied both whip and spur to their jaded horses.

In a very brief space of time indeed, they had the great mortification to discover that the highwayman had got out of sight, and that there was no chance of again overtaking him.

That little incident served to bring Claude to a decision.

He determined to make his way, in as direct a line as possible, to the inn.

It was with some difficulty that he calmed down his steed, for the animal, having once been put upon its mettle, was by no means easy to control.

At length, just about two hours before daylight, Claude entered the plantation.

Looking up, he perceived the signal that had been agreed upon, showing all was well.

Accordingly, he entered the stable without hesitation.

Crossing over, he entered the building, and was received with a cry of welcome.

Tom King was present, and so was Sixteen String Jack, and Tom Davis, with Maud and Ellen.

"You are both safe, I see," were Claude's first words. "But the captain—where is he?"

"Not back yet," was the reply, "though we are expecting him each moment. Had he returned, I should have tried my luck again to-night with Jack."

"But," exclaimed Claude, "morning is drawing on apace; it is strange he has not made his appearance before this!"

"We have heard from him," said Tom Davis.

"Heard from him? How?"

"Why, early yesterday morning, to our great consternation and alarm, Black Bess came galloping up to the front door."

"What, again?"

"Yes, and without the captain. I must say that it gave me such a turn that for a short time I was not able to move a limb. Darting forward, however, I first of all discovered that Black Bess was dripping wet from head to foot."

"And could you find nothing of the captain?"

"No, nothing but this pocket-book, which was strapped to the saddle; and here, look—on one of the leaves you can find scrawled these words:

"'All's well—fear not for me. Back soon.'"

The pocket-book was handed to Claude, who examined it with very great attention.

"Well," he ejaculated, at length, "this indeed passes my comprehension! What on earth could have induced him to send Black Bess in this manner? He must be aware that she is almost as well known as himself, and that it was almost, if not quite, as dangerous for her to arrive here by herself as it would be for him to ride up to the door by daylight."

"That was my thought," said Davis.

"But you spoke about her being wet—what was the meaning of that?"

"I can only guess," was the reply. "When I took her into the stable I found that the wound in her neck had been bleeding afresh, and I suppose that, in order to allay the pain, she had jumped into some stream."

"It is singular indeed," said Claude, musingly. "What construction do you put upon it?"

These last words were addressed, not to Tom Davis, but to the two highwaymen—Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack.

Claude observed in a moment that they fidgeted about and looked uneasy, as though they wished to say something, and yet, from some cause or other, held back.

Just then, while Claude was wondering more and more at the singular aspect affairs were assuming, his eye happened to rest upon Maud's countenance.

It was as white as ashes.

Even her very lips were white, and her eyes were burning with a strange, peculiar light.

Before he could speak again, Tom King said, with a manifest effort:

"Never mind the captain just now, Claude; suppose you make us acquainted with your adventures. Where have you passed the day?"

"That will do another time," said Claude. "I cannot trouble myself with thinking about that."

"Well," said Tom King, hurriedly, and with the same air of restraint, "since you will not speak, I must perforce give you an account of my adventures; ten to one, by the time I have concluded the captain will make his appearance."

"Do you really think that?" exclaimed Maud, in a trembling voice, and clasping her hands beseechingly together—"do you indeed think that?"

"I do, or else why should he have sent back that message? Rely upon it, wherever the captain may be he is well able to take care of himself."

Then, without pausing, Tom King began an account of his own adventures.

He seemed anxious to fill up the conversation, and to allow no one else the opportunity of speaking.

The fact was, he wished to prevent any discussion taking place upon the subject of the captain's non-appearance.

Yet all could tell by his manner that he was very ill at ease.

"I got safely away," he began, "though I confess I was rather troubled about Jack Marshall and his men."

"However, I saw nothing of them, and made my way with all speed to the Oxford Road, for I confess I have a greater fancy for that highway than any other.

"The reason is, I suppose, that I have never to look far for an adventure in that direction.

"And so it turned out in the present instance.

"Scarcely had I gone a hundred yards when I heard the sound of a vehicle approaching.

"By the sound I could tell in a moment that it was of a heavy description, though I was at a loss to make up my mind as to exactly what kind of vehicle it was.

"In the meanwhile I made all my preparations, and having carefully primed my pistols, I looked up and saw lights flashing close at hand.

"Then directly afterwards I made out the shape of a large, lumbering, old-fashioned carriage drawn by a couple of white horses.

"In spite of its heavy appearance and ponderous wheels, the vehicle rolled along at a very rapid rate, and, indeed, no wonder, for the coachman as he sat on the box flogged the horses incessantly in order to keep them up to the top of their speed.

"It was clear that whoever was inside was for some reason or other in a very great hurry indeed, and anxious to reach some point as quickly as possible.

"It was not likely, though, that I could allow that to interfere with me, so I at once rode out and commanded the coachman to stop.

"Whether he tried to rein-in the horses or not I can scarcely say; it would have been impossible to check them all at once.

"Under these circumstances I tried our old expedient of firing a pistol over his head.

"On the present occasion it was quite successful.

"With a cry of terror he pulled up.

"Threatening him with instant death if he moved, I made my way to the door of the carriage.

"No sooner did I reach it than the window was let down from within.

"I then caught sight of the form of a very old lady, and so much did her appearance impress me that I must give you a brief description of her.

"She was neatly yet richly and elegantly dressed; her face, though old and somewhat withered, yet was a most pleasing one, chiefly because of the unmistakable air of benevolence that it wore.

"One could tell that she was all kindness and affection—one of those good creatures that are occasionally met with.

"But her face was very pale, and her eyes filled with tears. Her voice was husky with emotion, and yet she endeavoured to assume an air of sternness, perhaps in the hope that she might conceal it.

"'Sir, sir—whoever you are,' she exclaimed, 'let me entreat you to depart—let me proceed! Do not hinder me a moment, for, alas! every second is most precious to me, or rather to one I hold far dearer than my life! Sir—sir, if you are not dead to every human kindly feeling, let me implore you to allow me to pass—do not detain me a moment longer! If you will, I will make you any promise you desire!'

"I confess, comrades, that I was deeply touched by her manner—so deeply, indeed, that at first I could not reply.

"Raising my hat, however, I said:

"'You are quite free to pass. I much regret that I have hindered you. I should be glad to render some atonement for it. My life is one of adventure—you know my calling—and I pursue it more for the love I have for adventure than any other cause. If you need a strong arm and a willing heart to assist you, speak—you have only to say the word, and you will find both at your service.'

CHAPTER DCCCXLIII.

IN WHICH TOM KING CONTINUES THE RECITAL OF HIS INTERESTING ADVENTURES.

"'The old lady looked at me wistfully, and, clasping her hands together, leaned forward eagerly.

"'You can trust me,' I said, guessing what was passing through her mind—'you can trust me in all things.'

"'Then I will put faith in you,' she exclaimed, with sudden energy, 'and if you betray me or deceive me, I will never believe in anyone again.'

"'You have nothing to fear,' I said. 'I am always on the side of right against might, and unless I am greatly mistaken, you are suffering from the infliction of some great wrong.'

"'It is true, sir; but unfortunately it will take some time for me to tell you all, and every moment is so precious.'

"'It can easily be managed,' I said, 'and without any loss of time.'

"'How so?'

"'Why, with your permission I will secure my horse to the back part of this vehicle, and your man can continue to drive you to your destination; then, if you will permit me to share the carriage with you, the explanation can be given as we proceed.'

"'It is a good thought!' she exclaimed; 'be it so, and oh, be quick, though I feel better now already!'

"I hastily carried out the intention I had expressed

"My horse was securely fastened, and I entered the carriage, and the coachman was ordered to proceed.

"Away we went at a rattling pace, and the old lady commenced by saying:

"'I must first put you in possession of a few names, and then the narrative will be easier.

"'In the first place, my name is Charlotte Chadwick. I am a widow, and have been for many years, and in all the wide world I have only two relatives. One is my dear niece Lillian, my deceased brother's only child.

"'By his will I was appointed one of her guardians; her other guardian is my step-brother, William Aldis, a man I do not hesitate to stigmatise as a villain and a scoundrel.

"'But you shall hear,' she continued. 'My poor brother before his death placed every confidence in this William Aldis, and at that time none of us knew his real character, nor believed him guilty of so much baseness as he has since exhibited.

"'Such being the case, then, he was left chief guardian of Lillian, and up to the time of her majority he was to hold all her property, real and personal, as trustee.

"'For my own part, all I had to do was to bring up the deal girl and see to her education.

"'Without vanity, I may say that I have performed my task properly and conscientiously.

"'We were always together—Lillian and I—for we were mutually fond of each other.

"'We saw but little of William Aldis, who punctually at the proper intervals sent us the instalments of the money as directed by my brother's will.

"'And so matters went on peaceably enough until Lillian reached her nineteenth year.

"'For a long time past she had been beloved by and engaged to a young officer in the army, who is now at the present time most unfortunately absent from England, though I am every day in expectation of his return.

"'Long ere this, Lillian would have been his wife had not William Aldis most positively and emphatically refused to sanction any such alliance.

"'He would give no reason for his refusal, and he was firm and obstinate.

"'As guardian, he had this power over his ward until she should attain her majority, and Lillian, whose respect for her father's memory amounts to veneration, never once thought of acting in defiance of the man who had been left to watch over her.

"'And so Lieutenant Russell proceeded on the foreign service alone, though he had fondly hoped to take dear Lillian with him.

"'I believe it would have broken my heart to have parted with her, but yet I should never have sacrificed her happiness to my own.

"'It was not long after this that, for the first time in his life, William Aldis became a frequent visitor at our residence.

"'Day after day he was there, and at first I was pleased and flattered by his visits.

"'I soon discovered, however, that he had an ulterior object in view.

"'That was, to make Lillian his wife.

"'His first overtures were made to me.

"'I answered that I thought he had no chance in the prosecution of his suit, since Lillian had pledged herself to the lieutenant, and I knew her character too well to believe that she would prove false to her plighted word.

"'He scowled angrily, and asked me to use my influence.

"'But this I positively declined. I said:

"'"The field is open, and if you can induce her to be your wife, why, do so."

"'I regretted having said this much, for he then began a complete persecution of my niece.

"'It was in vain she assured him that her heart was irrevocably another's—that she could never listen to any other suit.

"'He tried kind words at first, then appealed to her feelings and revived her father's memory, and, failing, descended to common threats.

"'In my own mind I formed a pretty good idea of the exact state of affairs, and trembled for the future of my poor girl.

"'Had she shown any signs of weakness—had she not been so steadfastly true to her absent lover—I should have entreated her to turn a deaf ear to her guardian's suit.

"'It would then have been necessary for me to give her a reason for such a wish, and that reason would simply have been this:

"'"I believe that he has unjustly and improperly appropriated and made use of a great deal of your wealth—more than he can possibly replace; and so he seeks, by a union with you, to patch up his delinquencies."

"'That, I have no doubt, is the actual state of affairs; subsequent events have gone far to strengthen such an opinion.

"'But, as I said, there was no need for anything of this kind; Lillian was as firm as could be wished.

"'And so things have gone on up to the present time, or, more correctly speaking, up to the day before yesterday, when I received a letter from an old friend of mine, who lives in a distant county, requesting me to pay her a visit with all speed, on a matter of great importance.

"'I, of course, complied, and wished to take Lillian with me; but she was unwell, and, moreover, in constant expectation of hearing from or either seeing her affianced husband, and I could not persuade her to leave London.

"'Alas—alas that I left her!

"'When I arrived at my destination I found the greatest surprise was manifested at my arrival.

"'The letter was produced, and it was declared to be a forgery.

"'At first I knew not what to think, and wondered why anyone could have been so unfeeling as to play such a hoax on a person of my age, for travelling to me is a serious matter.

"'Then, all at once, I felt, like a flash, that it meant some danger to Lillian, and, in spite of my fatigue, I hastily commenced a return journey, though I was laughed at for doing so.

"'On my arrival, I found that my worst fears were confirmed.

"'Soon after my departure, William Aldis had requested to see me, and on learning I was absent, had obtained an interview with Lillian.

"'What passed between them I know not; but by some means he induced her to leave the house and enter his carriage, which was waiting at the door.

"'And from that time to this I have seen nothing of her.'

"'But,' I interrupted, 'I presume you have obtained some clue, or else why are you taking your present course?'

"'I have a clue—a very slight one. I am told that he is likely to be found at a place at no great distance, in a very secluded situation, which he has lately purchased, and had fitted up in a most expensive style.

"'It is there that I am going—it is there that I expect to find Lillian. So great has been my agitation that I have lost my usual coolness.

"'Trembling with dread of I know not what, I started off at once by myself, without bringing anyone with me, and feeling quite at a loss to know how I should act upon my arrival, supposing I should find my Lillian there.'

"'I may be excused,' I said, 'if I look upon our chance meeting as a fortunate one. Should your suspicions prove correct I will undertake, at all risks, to wrest this girl from him, and I trust that our aid and interference will not come too late.'

"'And I too—and I too!' said the old lady, tears again rolling down her cheeks. 'Oh, he is a bad and desperate man! And, being in this extremity, who can say what baseness he may not be guilty of? Who can say what will be the end of this terrible affair?'

"'Let us hope for the best,' I said. 'Put some faith in the firmness which, you say, your niece has ever shown towards him—that is all we can do at present, and I do hope and trust that all will yet be well.'

CHAPTER DCCCXLIV.

IN WHICH TOM KING BRINGS THE NARRATIVE OF HIS ADVENTURES TO A CONCLUSION.

"At this moment the carriage stopped with quite a sudden jerk, and the old lady immediately put her head out of the window to ascertain the cause.

"'Here we are, mum,' said the coachman—'leastwise, as near as I can tell.'

"'Yes, yes,' was the reply—'this is the place, I feel certain'

"'Allow me,' I said, and looking forth, I perceived what was evidently the boundary-wall of a small, pretty-looking residence, the top of which I could just see.

"'Do you see the gates, Samuel?' she asked.

"'No, mum.'

"'Drive on, then.'

"'Stay!' I exclaimed. 'The circumstances under which we are paying our visit are peculiar. It will be better by far not to draw up to the main entrance. What we shall accomplish to-night will be done by stratagem and skill more than by main force. With your permission, we will alight just here.'

"'I am quite ready to resign myself into your hands,' she answered; then, smiling, she continued: 'This does indeed seem a strange night of adventure. Who would have believed that I should have taken you, a perfect stranger, into my confidence in this affair?'

"'I only trust,' I replied, 'that you will have no occasion to regret having done so.'

"With these words, I handed her from the carriage, and, going closer to the boundary-wall, began to make an inspection of it, with a view of finding a means of passing it.

"In a little while I came to a small door, that was, however, strongly fastened.

"I succeeded in climbing the wall; but as my companion could not follow me by that route, I dropped on the other side and unfastened the door, which was secured only by a couple of rusty bolts.

"This door I just closed behind us, without fastening it, and as I did so, I said:

"'We will now take particular notice of the position of this doorway, for, in case events should make it necessary, we shall then know which way to turn in order to make our escape speedily.'

"'But,' she inquired, 'how do you intend to act?'

"'That is a question I can hardly reply to,' I said; 'I shall suffer myself to be guided entirely by circumstances. Come with me. We will, first of all, look all round the premises.'

"She was quite willing, as she said, to resign herself into my hands and allow me to take the lead.

"Stealthily, then, I approached the house and gave a rapid glance at its exterior.

"In this there was nothing whatever remarkable, although it looked a very charming, beautiful place indeed.

"The windows next engaged my attention.

"I could see none that were illuminated until I turned the angle of one wing, and then I saw several.

"One was on the ground floor, and towards that I crept at once, a consciousness within me that if I could take a peep through it I should see something well worth looking at.

"In a moment or so the window was reached, and making a sign to my companion to preserve as much silence as she possibly could, I raised my head and ventured to peep in.

"Curtains were drawn across the window yet not so closely as to shut out all view of the interior of the apartment.

"Looking in, I perceived standing on the opposite side of the table a young girl, who by her appearance I immediately guessed to be Lillian.

"If any confirmation was required, I had it in the manner in which the old lady clasped her hands together as soon as she caught sight of her.

"Lillian, then—for so I may as well call her—was standing in an attitude of defiance; her eyes were flashing fire; her slim, lithe form was drawn up to its full height; and stern, angry words were issuing from her lips, though, owing to the closeness with which the casement fitted, I could not overhear a single word.

"In one hand she held a knife, that she had evidently hastily snatched up from the table.

"It was raised threateningly above her head.

"Standing on the other side of the table was a man.

"His face was hidden from me, and I could make out but little of his appearance.

"Yet I knew well enough that this was the guardian that had been described to me.

"I waited to see no more, but, grasping the old lady by the hand, led her away for a few steps.

"'You saw all that?' I said. 'I suppose I am correct in believing those two persons to be your niece Lillian and her guardian William Aldis?'

"'Yes—yes!' she exclaimed, in a voice tremulous with agitation. 'Save her—save my poor girl—save her while there is yet time!'

"'Be under no apprehension,' I answered, assuringly. 'I merely wished to appeal to you for a little advice.'

"'No, no—act entirely as you think proper.'

"'Unfortunately, I cannot. You know my position—I cannot interfere in a case of this kind as others would.'

"'I do not understand you.'

"'Frankly, then, I mean this: After what has occurred, it will be manifestly your best course to give this William Aldis into custody, to answer, first of all, for carrying off your niece—for forcibly detaining her against her will; and then, if necessary, you can prosecute him if he has made use of any of her wealth.'

"'Yes, yes—I understand; but yet I would rather be free from him altogether.'

"'No doubt you would; but you must consider your niece's interests in this affair. You can understand now—can you not?—that it will be impossible for me to call in the police officers; if I did, I also should be made a prisoner; but,' I continued, 'I will enter that room—I will overpower him and make him a prisoner—I will secure him as well as I am able, and after that you must find some means of communicating with the police.'

"The old lady seemed to hesitate; but just then a loud shriek arose.

"It was followed by a tremendous crash.

"I turned round, and saw instantly what had happened.

"Exasperated or terrified at something her villanous guardian had either said or done, Lillian had made one bold spring across the room, and dashed herself through the casement.

"A fierce and angry shout succeeded, and then William Aldis dashed through the broken window.

"But before he could approach the trembling, affrighted girl, I placed myself before him, sword in hand.

"'Back,' I exclaimed—'back! Your villany has been discovered and frustrated just in time!'

"Such a yell as William Aldis then gave utterance to, I think I have never heard in all my life before.

"With all the insensate fury of a madman, he drew his sword from its sheath, and commenced a wild attack upon me.

"I was not a moment in ascertaining that I was far superior to him in fence, and before he well knew what had happened, his sword was seat whirling across the garden.

"Meanwhile, Lillian had discovered her aunt, and was clasped tightly in her arms, sobbing and weeping now that the danger was over.

"I followed up the advantage I had gained, and seizing the rascal by the throat, flashed my sword before his eyes.

"'Yield,' I cried—'yield this moment! I am a desperate man, and if you refuse, will immediately put you to death!"

[DICK TURPIN SURRENDERS HIMSELF A PRISONER.]

He trembled and shook with fear.

"The man was an arrant coward, as, indeed, anyone might have expected from his conduct.

"Most unquestionably he feared death, and so submitted to me completely, becoming as helpless as anyone well could.

"Accordingly I dragged him back through the window into the room, and forced him to sit down in a chair, and then, by means of the strong cord belonging to the curtains, I bound him there in such a manner that I felt sure he could not set himself at liberty.

"It struck me as being rather strange that I should have met with no opposition from any other persons about the place; but, as we afterwards discovered, there was only one domestic, and that was an old woman, deaf and nearly blind, so from her there was nothing to apprehend.

"'Now,' I said, addressing the old lady, 'your niece is restored to you safe and unhurt I hope. William Aldis is a prisoner, and it will be your own fault if he escapes. Farewell, then, for my service is over, and I have business of my own to attend to. As I pass through the gate I will tell the coachman to drive off at once for a body of police officers; the rest will then be perfectly easy. Farewell to you both!'

"'But, aunt,' I heard Lilian cry, 'who is this—who is it that has so befriended me, and why does he leave without giving me the opportunity of thanking him?'

"I turned at once, although I had gone several paces.

"'It may seem churlish on my part,' I exclaimed. 'but the fact is there may be great danger to me if I linger longer here. As to who I am, don't let it matter, suffice it to say I am your friend.'

"'But who—who?' she asked.

"'Yes, your name,' added her aunt. 'I am only a woman, yet some day, if I know who you are, I may be able to render you a service.'

"I hesitated a moment, then exclaimed:

"'My name, since you must know it, is Tom King—Tom King, the highwayman!'

"With these words on my lips I turned round again, and, with rapid strides, made my way to the little door.

"According to my expressed intention, there I found the coachman waiting, and I immediately sent him off for the police officers.

"Mounting my own steed, I turned his face homewards.

"Somehow, whenever I have an adventure of this kind, it casts a singular gloom over me—a gloom that I cannot shake off.

"I was in no humour for another adventure, no matter of what kind, and therefore it so happened that I arrived here much earlier than Tom Davis expected.

"It was a profitless excursion altogether, but I think Sixteen-String Jack has a different account to give."

With these words Tom King ceased, and Claude Duval would very willingly have put off Sixteen-String Jack's narration till another time, and confined himself to a consideration of the captain's probable position.

But as for Sixteen-String Jack himself, he seemed to the full as desirous of preventing the conversation from dwelling on that topic as Tom King was.

Therefore, with an air of restraint, and yet with an affectation of joviality that could not but be noticed by all, he commenced as follows:—

CHAPTER DCCCXLV.

THE HIGHWAYMEN HEAR SUDDEN AND UNEXPECTED TIDINGS OF THE CAPTAIN.

"It's a string of adventures I have had!" commenced Jack, "and so be prepared to listen. In the first place I made my way to the North Road, partly because we have not visited it for a long time, and partly because I was tired of adventures without any booty attached to them, and I knew very well that was the place to look for what I wanted.

"A good gallop across the country quickly brought me there, and I reined in my steed in order to rest him a little, and also that I might listen whether any traveller was approaching.

"Scarcely had I assumed this position than I heard some one coming on at a regular jog trot. The pace almost told me the character not only of the horse but his rider.

"'A grazier, I'll warrant!' I muttered to myself.

"My mind was made up at once as to how I should proceed. I drew back into the shadow of the hedge so as to allow him to pass me, while I ascertained how far my surmises were correct.

"I found them completely verified. He was a stout man mounted on a cob as stout as himself. His attire was old and greasy.

"He was so intent upon urging his horse forward that he did not perceive me, and I waited for him to get a little distance ahead.

"Then emerging from my place of concealment, I followed at a pace only a little faster than his own, but yet of course one that could not fail to enable me to overtake him.

"Ere long I caught sight of his bulky figure in advance, and in a few minutes afterwards placed myself beside him,

"I was intent upon having some fun at his expense, so I accosted him with the utmost respect.

"At the same time I plunged my hand into my pocket and drew out about a dozen guineas, and as I did so I said:

"'This proceeding no doubt fills you with surprise, for, to the best of my belief, we are perfect strangers to each other, but we appear to be journeying in the same direction, and therefore I should be eternally obliged if you would take charge of this gold.'

"He stared at me in blank amazement, as well he might.

"Perhaps he thought I was a little mad, but I continued:

"'The request seems a strange one, but let me inform you, a little way behind us are three or four very ill-favoured-looking rogues—highwaymen, I should say, if appearances are anything to go by. I was heartily glad to avoid them, but they are following, and I have no doubt they intend to rob me.'

"The grazier seemed rather alarmed, so I hastened to reassure him.

"'Mind you,' I said, 'I don't think for a moment that they will attempt to rob you—it is me they will look after, because, judging by my outward looks, they will conclude that I carry the most money about me. So therefore I beg you will take charge of this, the bulk of my wealth, so that if the rascals search me they will find nothing to reward them for their pains.'

"While thus speaking, I thrust my hand into my pocket and drew forth about a dozen guineas.

"I held them towards the grazier, and renewed my request that he would take charge of them.

"I can assure you he looked very much astonished indeed—in fact, his countenance was quite a picture.

"It was hardly likely, however, that he would distrust me on this account.

"I asked him to take charge of my money, which was a widely different thing to asking him to let me take care of his for him.

"Yet it was rather unwillingly that he took hold of the coin, and then he exclaimed:

"'Well, it's a very strange notion this indeed. I don't mind obliging you. I have passed these highwaymen before to-day, and have always got off well.'

"'I am glad to hear it,' I answered, 'and I hope if those rascals behind do ride up that you will keep the money safe.'

"'Oh, never fear—never fear! And I'll tell you why I seemed rather unwilling to grant your request; it was because I shall have to let you into a secret that I wished to keep locked up in my own breast.'

"'What may that secret be?' I asked.

"'Why, just this: you will have to know where I carry my money, and that's what no one else knows except myself.'

"'You may depend that, out of gratitude merely, I shall keep your secret,' I answered. 'Pray put my money where it will be safe, for unless I make a great mistake, I can hear some one on the road behind us.'

"The old fellow looked quite alarmed, and said, hastily:

"'Well, if I must tell you, I keep it tied up in the tail of my shirt. Let me ask you if a highwayman would ever think of looking for it there?'

"'Never,' I answered, emphatically—'it's the last place I should have thought of.'

"'Well,' he said, 'I shall make some large purchases to-day, and so I have got a good round sum with me, and mostly in bank-notes.'

"With much pulling and tugging, the old fellow got out the tail of his shirt, and I found that he had not been joking, for tied up in it very securely was something that looked very much like guineas and bank-notes.

"I could scarcely control my laughter, because I knew what was coming.

"He chuckled again and again about his cleverness.

"'I will put yours in a separate place,' he said, 'if you don't mind.'

"'Oh, I am quite agreeable,' was my reply; 'and if you like I will hold my money the while.'

"Still unsuspectingly enough, he gave me back my dozen guineas, and I slipped them instantly into my pocket.

"As quick as thought I drew out my sword.

"'Now, my good friend,' said I, 'as there is an end to all good things, so there is a conclusion to this joke. I have found out your secret, so just decide which I shall take, your money or your life, for I am determined to have one or the other!'

"The grazier seemed quite panic-struck, and his eyes and mouth opened to a most alarming extent.

"'Oh, sir,' he said, 'have mercy—have mercy!'

"'Oh, yes,' I replied, 'I am quite inclined to be merciful. I want nothing but that little supply of cash which you ought to have been robbed of long ago; and beware how you deceive a highwayman again!'

"The old fellow must have noticed that I was rather off my guard, for all at once, when I least expected it, he dug one of the spurs into his horse's flank, and made the animal bound along at a rate I should never have believed him capable of accomplishing.

"I uttered a cry of rage, and then set forward in pursuit, thought my anger quickly changed to mirth when I saw the grazier making vain and frantic attempts to stuff the tail of his shirt in again.

"In a few moments I was level with him, and resolved to have no more delay.

"I seized hold of the booty, and with one stroke of the sword cut the tail of his shirt off completely, and here it is."

Despite the anxiety that all felt, it was impossible to repress a hearty laugh, and for several moments the roof of the old kitchen fairly rang again.

Jack held aloft his trophy with great glee.

Then, untying it, disclosed a good round sum in notes and gold, as the farmer had said.

"Bother these things," he cried, alluding to the bank-notes, "they are almost useless to me. I have a good mind to carry them about me, and should I ever meet him again I will give him a chance of buying them back at a reasonable rate."

There was another laugh at this, but Sixteen-String Jack took it quite seriously.

Then Claude, imagining the right moment had come, took advantage of a pause in the conversation to speak.

"Well now," he cried, "all the adventures have been told; there are no signs of the captain at present, and I think we ought not to put off any longer a discussion upon where he is likely to be."

Just then he saw Maud turn pale, and fall back half fainting in her chair.

"I think," said Tom Davis, rather gruffly, "that you are alarming yourself without due cause. Give the captain time, and I will be bound he appears. What do you think he sent that note for? He meant us to remain quite easy until he appeared. Just wait a moment and I will read it to you again."

"Oh, I know all about that." said Claude, impatiently, "only such a long time has elapsed I think it strange he has not appeared."

"Let us give him till daybreak, at any rate," said Tom Davis—"ten to one if he would think of coming back before then, if he had the opportunity."

"Then you have not long to give him," returned Claude, "for in an hour, or even less, it will be quite daylight; the dawn must be now almost here."

A deep silence followed these words—a pause that seemed to have something very ominous about it.

Maud was slowly recovering herself, and the others, with averted eyes, were each waiting for some one to speak first.

But the silence endured and remained like a spell.

Then Claude rose, and, going to the window, let down the shutter.

As he did so, a clear grey light came pouring into the kitchen.

"It is already daybreak," he said. "Behold! Where is he now?"

Again there was a silence.

But this time it was broken in upon by a most discordant, unmelodious sound—one that made them all start, and one that actually caused the blood to rush back to their hearts with a sickening sensation.

"Goodness gracious!" exclaimed Tom Davis, as he sprang up from his chair and then sank down again—"goodness gracious, wha 's that?"

CHAPTER DCCCXLVI.

THE HIGHWAYMEN OBTAIN SOME UNEXPECTED INTELLIGENCE AS TO DICK TURPIN'S WHEREABOUTS FROM THE ITINERANT NEWSVENDOR.

THE hideous sound came again.

This time, however, they were more prepared for it than they were upon the previous occasion, and therefore were able to form a better idea of how it was produced.

"It's a horn," cried Tom Davis, as he rushed towards the front of the house—"it's a horn, or a trumpet, or something of that kind. What on earth does it mean?"

His movement was immediately followed by the rest, and in an incredibly short space of time the kitchen was vacated.

"Be careful how you show yourselves," cried Tom, who, even in this moment of excitement, had not forgotten his caution.

The highwaymen shrank back.

"You have a look first, Tom," they cried, "and let us know what it is."

Opening the door, he looked out.

But at this moment there came another blast, louder and more discordant than the former ones.

Then a cracked, wheezy voice was heard to say:

"Most important—important—important!"

Then followed another blast.

"It is a man," cried Tom Davis—"an old man with a long, battered tin horn. What on earth does he mean by kicking up all that uproar?"

"Here you have it, good people," continued the same strange voice—"here you have it; all the particulars from the beginning to the end, and most extraordinary they are. Here you have 'em—here you have 'em, and the price no more than a penny!"

He blew the horn again.

"I can't make it out," cried Tom Davis; "he is a most extraordinary-looking individual, and he is carrying a packet of papers in his hand; they must be about some important event that has just occurred."

"Get him inside," suggested Claude Duval, "and give him something to drink; that will stop his noise."

Before this advice could be acted upon, all heard distinctly the following words.

Strive as they would, not one could move until the man paused to blow his horn, which he made a point of doing at every full stop in his discourse.

"Here you have it," he cried, "the important and unparalleled details of the capture of the notorious highwayman, Dick Turpin, who surrendered himself prisoner yesterday, and now lies in the prison of Newgate awaiting the order for his execution; and only one penny."

The sound of the tin horn drowned the stifled shriek that burst from the lips of Maud, and without another sound she sank perfectly insensible.

Mrs. Davis and Ellen at once gave her their whole attention, leaving the highwaymen to themselves.

"Just what I feared," was Claude Duval's comment.

"We all guessed it," said Tom King, "only we did not want to say a word about it before Maud. Let us get that rascal in and get all the details we can from him."

"All right," said Tom Davis. "Just step on one side and leave it to me. On no account permit yourselves to be seen, because it is very likely he has been furnished with a description of all."

Upon this caution the highwaymen all withdrew, and Tom Davis going to the front of the inn, saw that the man had moved a little way.

But he bawled after him, and the man, turning round, hastened towards the inn at full speed.

He detached a paper from his bundle, evidently expecting that Tom Davis was about to be a purchaser.

"What's that you are saying?" he asked.

"It's about Dick Turpin, the highwayman," was the reply, given in a more natural tone of voice; "he was captured yesterday and taken to Newgate."

"Was he indeed? Well, come in and have a draught of ale, and let us know all the particulars. I'll have one of your papers as well, for, though I'm no scholar myself, there may be others who would like to read it."

"All right my friend," said the itinerant newsvendor. "I'll tell you all the particulars, and that'll save you the trouble of reading."

"Come, then—come in."

The man willingly followed Davis into the kitchen, where he sat down.

A jug of ale that one would think would take him some time to drink was placed before him.

Then Tom eagerly questioned him for information.

"Well, you see," replied the man, "it happened in this wise: Dick Turpin was overtaken and captured by a party of huntsmen, and now, as I have told you, is a prisoner in Newgate."

"And so he ought to be," said Tom Davis. "I have been expecting to hear this for a long time, and I am only afraid the news is too good to be true."

"Well, and so am I, and that's a fact. You see, these printers they get hold of any lie or idle tale and print it; they get an ounce of fact and plaster it over with a pound of lies at once."

"You have had some experience that way, then?"

"I have, I believe you; but that's neither here nor there."

Tom Davis began to breathe a little more freely.

"Well, then," he exclaimed, "you know positively of your own knowledge that Dick Turpin is really inside Newgate at the present time?"

"No, that I don't. All I can say is what is printed on this paper, which is just to the effect that I have told you. At any rate, it seems there was a thousand pounds reward offered for his apprehension, though I don't know who is to get it."

"Well, I only hope it's all true," said Tom Davis, bending his face down over the bill, "for ever since these highwaymen have been on the road we have done no trade at all; people are afraid to travel, and never go anywhere if they can help it."

"Not only that," returned the newsvendor, "but I have heard something else, though, of course, I don't know how true it may be."

"What is it?"

"Why, all the inn-keepers round the country are grumbling fearfully at the badness of trade. No one will stop there even for half an hour; they just have a drink at the door and are off again. And what should you think is the reason?"

"I have really no idea."

"Well, then, there's a report set abroad that Dick Turpin and his highwaymen have got a roadside public-house of their own, and that someone deep in their confidence keeps it. Where this inn is I believe no one can tell at present, but it is said if anyone should enter it they never are seen to come out again alive."

Tom Davis gave a great start, and exclaimed in well-simulated surprise, dashing his fist violently on the table while he spoke:

"That accounts for it—that accounts for it. I wondered what this dropping off in trade meant. Why, do you know it is the greatest rarity for me to catch sight of any one now-a-days? But it was not so—it was not so."

"That's the cause," said the newsvendor, as he drank the last drop of ale; "you know the reason now, and depend upon it there's some foundation, in fact, for what I have just told you."

"I shouldn't wonder," said Tom Davis.

"Well," said the man, "I will be off. I thought this would turn out a better job than it has at present; the papers don't move off at all briskly; somehow no one believes it."

"I can scarcely bring my mind to believe it," said Tom Davis; "but the day is young yet—you have plenty of time before you. Will you stop and have another jug of ale?"

"No, not now; many thanks to you—not now; but if I am by this way again you may depend I shall call."

"Do so—do so."

The man rose, carefully picking up his long tin horn and his bundle of papers, and then sallied forth.

Tom Davis accompanied him to the front door of the inn, where a few parting words were exchanged.

Then he stood upon the door-step watching him until he got out of sight.

Now that there was no one to observe it, Tom Davis's countenance underwent a very great and striking alteration.

It was easy to tell that the intelligence that had just been imparted to him filled him with very great anxiety.

"Dick in Newgate," he muttered as he turned away. "I fear there is no room left to doubt it. However, I will hear what the others say."

Returning to the kitchen, he found that the three highwaymen were fully as anxious as himself.

The bill that had been left upon the table had been carefully perused.

It gave very few details, and many of them, as the highwaymen were perfectly certain, were quite incorrect.

It stated that Dick Turpin's famous mare, Black Bess, was in the hands of the police officers.

This was palpably false, for Black Bess was at that moment in the stable.

Yet from this circumstance they managed to extract some amount of confidence and consolation.

"If they are wrong about Black Bess," said Tom, "why may they not be wrong about her rider? For my part I can scarcely believe that Dick is in Newgate, although I see it in print before my eyes, and although he has failed to return at the time appointed. The question is, how are we to ascertain it without incurring danger ourselves?"

"Yes, that's the point we have to discuss," cried Tom Davis, "and the sooner we begin it the better. And not only that—did you hear what the man said about the roadside-inn? The secret passage has not been constructed one hour too soon, for, as I dreaded, the police officers have got wind of our nice little scheme. I knew very well things were going on by far too pleasant and comfortable to last."

CHAPTER DCCCXLVII.

TOM DAVIS SETS OUT FOR LONDON IN ORDER TO ASCERTAIN WHETHER DICK TURPIN IS REALLY A PRISONER OR NOT.

"YES," said Sixteen-String Jack. "We all heard him, and, at any other time than the present, should feel a very great deal more uneasiness than we do now. As it is, however, a consideration of the captain's position outweighs everything."

"You are right there," rejoined Tom King. "If what we have heard is true, no exertions and sacrifices must be wanting on our part to effect his release. You all know very well that if any of us happened to be in his position, he would be the first one to attempt a rescue."

"He would—he would," said Claude Duval, "and I will willingly do all I can."

"It seems to me," said Tom Davis, "that almost the first thing to be done is to ascertain, somehow or other, whether the facts set down in this bill are true."

"Yes, that's it," said Sixteen-String Jack. "But how is it to be done?"

"If you will allow me," said Tom Davis, "to make a suggestion——"

"Oh, certainly!"

"It is, then, that you allow me to set off without delay to London. When there, I shall be able to ascertain for certain."

"A good suggestion," said Tom King, "only I can improve it."

"In what way?"

"By allowing me to go instead of yourself."

But Tom Davis only shook his head.

"No, no!" he exclaimed—"I am quite certain that would never answer at all! You would run a thousand risks of detection, whereas I should run none. If seen by anyone, it would only be thought that I was about my regular business."

"Yes, yes!" cried Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval. "Tom Davis is perfectly in the right. He ought to go, and let him start at once, and then he will be back the sooner."

"I am ready now."

"No doubt you are," said Claude. "And don't stay a moment longer than is absolutely necessary. When you have found out whether Dick is in Newgate or not, hasten back at the top of your speed."

"I will, depend upon it!"

"Very well, then—be off!"

"In a moment. Where's Maud?"

They looked around, and just at that moment Ellen entered.

The question was repeated.

"She is still senseless," was the answer. "We are quite alarmed."

"You must try to bring her to," said Davis, "and as soon as she is conscious let her know that I have gone to London, and say I hope to return with good intelligence."

"How long shall you be absent?" Ellen asked.

"That is impossible for me to say; but no longer than I can help. While I am away," he continued, addressing the highwaymen, "do you keep carefully out of sight, and if the officers pay a visit in my absence, don't hesitate to avail yourselves of the secret passage."

"We will not; but if Dick should unfortunately be the inmate of a Newgate cell, the officers will all be clustered round about there like so many bees."

"Yes; and that reminds me that I scarcely ought to start off to London without some arrangement being made."

"What kind of arrangement do you mean?"

"Why, suppose that it turns out that Dick is really a prisoner—mind, I say this only in case it turns out so—it is best to be prepared for the worst, is it not?"

"Quite. But what then?"

"Why, had we better not come to some determination as to our proceedings?"

"I don't see how it is possible."

"Nor I, exactly; but my present idea is to run the risk of calling upon old Matthew Gale, in Drury Lane."

"Oh, ah! That's a good thought!"

"He is a long-headed fellow, you know, and takes an especial delight in outwitting the police officers. Ten to one he could give us some valuable suggestions, and render us some still more valuable assistance."

"Beyond a doubt he could. I am glad you thought of it. Call there by all means."

"Well, then, I think that is about all that can be done at present. I will put one of the horses in the light cart, and drive off this moment."

The highwaymen urged him to leave.

But just as he was passing through the doorway, Maud descended the staircase.

There was an air of great wildness and frenzy in her manner, and, seizing Tom Davis by the breast of his coat, she exclaimed:

"Tell me—tell me—let it come from your lips, and I shall be satisfied—is what I hear the truth?—is Dick really a prisoner?"

"I have no means of answering," said Tom Davis, "I have heard as much, and am now about to set off to London to ascertain whether the report is true or false. I hope the latter, and, if possible, I will return in a few hours, bringing Turpin with me."

"No, no!" she exclaimed. "That hope is a vain one! If the officers have really captured him, such close watch and guard will be set upon all his movements that escape will be totally impossible. They are already exasperated beyond measure. Alas—alas! I feel that his doom is sealed."

She wept bitterly and violently—so violently that Tom Davis grew alarmed.

"Calm yourself," he exclaimed—"pray calm yourself for a little while until I return! Then will be the time to give way to grief, when you feel there is no longer room left for hope."

"I know it now," she said—"I have a presentiment in my mind which I cannot mistake! I feel as certain as I should do if I had witnessed all with my own eyes, that Dick is at this moment languishing a prisoner in one of those gloomy cells. He will be watched and guarded—no movement, however slight, will pass unnoticed—access will be denied to him. Tell me, then, how you can hope to effect his escape!"

"We cannot look forward to so much as that at present," was his answer. "We have first to satisfy ourselves he is a prisoner, and I can assure you I by no means feel sure of it, nor did the man who sold the paper."

Maud released him from her grasp, and, stepping back a pace or two, clasped her hands together.

Then, fixing her eyes upon his countenance, she said:

"Is that really and truly so, or do you simply say it out of some motive of mistaken kindness? If so, let me beg of you to recall your words; otherwise the disappointment will be bitter—more bitter than I can bear!"

"It is not a false hope," said Tom. "The man was not certain, and that's why I am setting out to ascertain."

"Then go," she exclaimed—"go at once! I will not detain you a moment longer, and while you are absent I will try to be as calm and hopeful as I can! I shall long for your return—I shall count every second, so, in pity to me, be no longer than you can help."

Tom Davis promised faithfully, and, glad to leave her in such a mood as this, hastened at once towards the stables.

His preparations were quickly made.

The horse was harnessed to the cart, and, after one more farewell and a reiteration of his injunctions, he rode off.

The time passed most wearily and anxiously.

The sun rose higher and higher in the sky, until the meridian was past.

Hours and hours elapsed, and yet there were no signs of Tom Davis's return.

What could have detained him, they were at a loss to imagine; but, from his long absence, they drew most unfavourable auguries.

Had the report been a false one, it could have been ascertained immediately, and he would have been back long and long ago.

Such being the case, the highwaymen resigned themselves to the worst, and already began to speculate in their own minds as to which would be the likeliest means by which they could obtain the captain's liberation.

Maud's calmness and hopefulness departed also, and so great did her agitation become, and so vehement was her grief, that the worst consequences were apprehended.

Still Tom Davis came not, and it was not until the long shadows of evening were beginning to creep over the landscape that the distant rattle of his light cart could be heard.

Burning with curiosity, the highwaymen watched its approach.

In a few moments it came in sight, and then Tom Davis drew up with a dash in front of the inn, with a look of unusual importance and seriousness upon his countenance.

CHAPTER DCCCXLVIII.

RETURNS TO DICK TURPIN AND THE HUNTSMEN.

HAVING now brought events up to this point, we feel that we shall be able to devote the whole of our attention to the very peculiar and critical position in which Dick Turpin is placed.

It will be remembered that his words were that he would surrender freely and without any resistance to Sir George.

No sooner were these words spoken than the baronet stretched out his hand and placed it on the highwayman's shoulder, and as he did so he exclaimed:

"Dick Turpin, you are my prisoner!"

Dick only bowed.

Sir Marmaduke, frantic with rage, seized Turpin also.

"Bind the villain," he cried; "secure him! Pinion him so that he cannot escape! I command you all to obey me in this matter!"

Dick Turpin shook off the grasp of Sir Marmaduke rather roughly.

"You forget," he said. "I did not yield myself a prisoner to you, but to this gentleman, and I warn you that if you interfere you will find that you have a very dangerous customer to meddle with."

Fairly white with passion, Sir Marmaduke again carried his hand to his sword.

"I wish you would cross weapons with me," shouted Dick, as he observed the movement; "but I know your nature too well to think for a moment that you would ever have the courage to do so."

This remark stung him to the quick—so much so that he half drew his sword from its sheath.

But dashing it back again, he said:

"I am a fool to bandy words thus with a robber, and I deserve all the abuse I get."

"Excuse me," said Sir George, "but my opinion is that the abuse is on your part."

"And my opinion is," retorted Sir Marmaduke, "that if you had the opportunity you would allow this man to regain his liberty."

"You may be right and you may be wrong," was the calm reply.

"Well, then," cried Sir Marmaduke, "let me ask you what it is you intend to do with your prisoner?"

"Do with him? I have not the least idea. I don't want him. I would much rather look after my own business."

"Then hand him over to me."

"But he objects."

"Yes, decidedly," said Dick.

"Well, then, you must take him to Newgate yourself, Sir George."

"I'll be d—d if I do."

"But I say you shall," shrieked Sir Marmaduke. "Don't think I am blind to the partiality you have all shown for him!—I take it as the greatest of all insults to myself. But you will repent of it ere long, mark my words if you don't!"

The huntsmen smiled rather derisively, and, to tell the truth, they were by no means sorry that a pretext had arisen for turning away altogether from their arrogant, pragmatical neighbour.

Now they had very good cause for refusing to meet him anywhere, and they resolved that whenever another meeting took place he should not be one of their number.

"Come on," cried Sir Marmaduke; "if you choose to take him prisoner you must hand him over to the officers of justice. Come on."

"No. I would much sooner remain here and simply keep guard over him. I am not so fond of police officers as to be ambitious of emulating their doings."

"It is such men as you who bring their authority into disrepute," retorted Sir Marmaduke; "but a proper representation of this affair shall be sent to the proper quarters, and you will then see what will be the result of it."

"So we shall if we live long enough," returned Sir George; "but if I knew there was anyone with such vindictive feelings as Dick Turpin has against you, I should feel doubtful about existing much longer."

It was easy to see that, in spite of his boast and swagger, this idea alarmed the baronet greatly, for he again turned very white.

"If you would keep guard over him," he said, at length, after a pause, "I would quickly put an end to the matter by riding off immediately, and returning with a body of police officers."

"Then why don't you do it?"

"Simply because I know that as soon as I turned my back you would allow that rascal an opportunity to escape, and he would avail himself of it in a moment. Ah!" he cried, in quite a changed voice, and throwing up his arms with great exultation. "Now we shall soon see the aspect of affairs altered. How fortunate, to be sure?"

Raising his voice to its highest pitch, he bawled:

"Robert—Robert! This way quick! D—n you—make haste!"

The others immediately turned their heads, and saw at no great distance the form of a man dressed in the attire of a gamekeeper.

He was evidently well known by Sir Marmaduke.

On hearing himself called thus, Robert came running forward, gun in hand, at great speed.

"Yes, your worship," he replied, as soon as he recognised Sir Marmaduke—"yes, your worship? What is it you might be pleased to want?"

The baronet smiled triumphantly.

"You will take this horse," he said, "mount it, and ride off with all speed to the nearest place where you can make sure of meeting with a body of police officers. Bring as many as you can, and tell them that we have Dick Turpin here a prisoner."

The gamekeeper looked round him in great surprise.

But Sir Marmaduke checked him abruptly.

"Here's the horse!" he cried, "Mount—ride off at full speed, if you break the horse's neck and your own as well! Every moment is of consequence!"

Robert dared not refuse—he knew that, in spite of the confusion of his intellects.

So, without another word, he scrambled into the saddle, and off he went.

Sir Marmaduke watched him depart with eager interest, and so did Dick Turpin.

Through the latter's brain many strange thoughts were passing with wonderful rapidity.

He took, in the first place, a rapid review of his position.

If he waited until this gamekeeper returned with a body of police officers, his chances of escape would be remote indeed.

On the other hand, among all the huntsmen he believed there was only one, and that was Sir Marmaduke, who would oppose his departure if he made a bold run to escape.

This course he would most certainly have adopted but for one consideration, and that was the effect it would be likely to have upon Sir George and the others, who had shown themselves inclined to be his friends.

He had a tolerable idea of the amount of power such a man as the chief magistrate of the county would possess, and he was also aware that the punishment for aiding and abetting a felon was severe, and would be inflicted upon Sir George and his companions just the same as upon anyone else.

Now Dick was far too generous in his nature to attempt, by running away, to make his escape, and so draw down upon the huntsmen the consequences of this act.

Moreover, he felt inclined to trust in Sir George, although he had not much faith in human nature generally.

Yet that gentleman, by his manner, seemed to imply that it would be wise for him to resign himself for awhile to his fate.

At last this was what Dick resolved to do—not only on this consideration, but because he all at once recollected a little circumstance that in the excitement of the moment had quite slipped his recollection.

This was the locket that had been given him by the lady who was surrounded by so many mysteries, not one of which Dick had been able to pierce.

From the moment he had received it until the present he had never attempted to make the least examination of it.

Yet as the recollection of all the circumstances came into his mind, a great degree of confidence sprang up in his breast.

"Surely," he thought, "she would never have been so anxious to make me this present if she had not been fully aware of its efficacy. Yes, yes—I feel that I can trust her, and that this locket will be the means of extricating me from my present perilous predicament. She told me not to make use of it until in the utmost extremity of danger. I will not, for if I can see any opportunity of escape without having resort to it, I shall most certainly avail myself of the chance. Yes, yes—that is my determination. And now for a little while I will content myself with being merely a calm spectator of events."

Having come to this conclusion, Dick grew quite calm, and again folding his arms, looked around him with an easy, self-satisfied air, which elicited the utmost admiration of the huntsmen.

Suddenly a loud and joyous cry burst from the lips of Sir Marmaduke, and all turned their eyes in the direction in which he was gazing.

They then perceived, at several fields' distance, a large body of police officers, whose large-buttoned scarlet waistcoats made them conspicuous objects.

They were all mounted on strong, powerful steeds.

Sir Marmaduke waved his hat, and they took off theirs in response, and accelerated their speed.

"Here they come," he cried, in the utmost exultation—"here they come! Now we shall see a little change in the posture of affairs! He looks very bold, and has carried things off with a high hand up to the present; but it has been because he has not been in danger. I have come face to face with criminals before to-day, and I'll warrant you that no sooner does he find himself surrounded by officers, than this loud-crowing cock will show the white feather! Aha!"

CHAPTER DCCCXLIX.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN IS HANDCUFFED BY THE POLICE OFFICERS, AND THE JOURNEY TO NEWGATE IS COMMENCED.

DICK TURPIN just glanced at the approaching police officers for a moment, then, turning round, addressed Sir George.

"Of course you are aware," he said, "that there is a reward of a thousand pounds offered for whoever shall apprehend me. I believe that is how the bills run—apprehend merely. It is not necessary that my conviction or execution should follow to entitle you to that amount. Now it would gall me exceedingly if I thought those lubberly fellows who are coming galloping up yonder were to share among them such a nice little amount as this, and therefore, Sir George, I have to beg that you will claim it yourself—you are heartily welcome to it."

The huntsmen were in no small degree amazed to hear Turpin talking in this oivil fashion upon such a topic, and they exchanged glances with each other accordingly.

Sir George burst out into a laugh, as he said:

"Well, of course, a thousand pounds is an amount to any man, no matter how rich he may be, and as you say, I think it would be very unjust to allow those officers to share it, though, if it comes to that, you surrendered yourself to me—I did not capture you."

"It's all the same thing," returned Turpin, "if you like you can lay hands upon me and capture me now."

Sir George paused a moment as though some fresh thought had struck him.

Then, with a twinkle in his pleasant gray eyes, and a smile upon his lips, he advanced, and held Turpin firmly by the wrist and the back of his coat collar.

"Now," he said, "you are my prisoner."

Sir Marmaduke scarcely knew what to make of all this—he was still foaming and fretting with rage.

But he consoled himself with watching the approach of the police officers and with thinking that now they had arrived he should be able to turn the tables to some extent upon his companions.

The officers were some who had been fetched from the nearest market town to where they happened to be—strong, stout-built fellows, as ignorant as gateposts, and possessing none of those qualities of courage and skill necessary to the keeping of a man like Dick Turpin a prisoner.

Dick noted all this with an air of satisfaction.

"After all," he thought, "I shall not have to trouble myself about the locket—I shall have plenty of opportunities to get free from them."

On their arrival these officers greeted Sir Marmaduke with an immense amount of respect.

Indeed, it seemed as though they would never have left off bowing to him.

"Now, my men," he said, "that is Dick Turpin. Seize him, bind him securely, and convey him with all speed to Newgate! You know the reward that is offered for his apprehension."

"Yes," said Sir George. "But I wish to remind you all that he is my prisoner, and mine only, and I shall not relinquish the reward in favour of anyone! Officers, I call upon you, as a mere matter of duty, to escort this man to Newgate."

Hearing this, the officers looked greatly mortified and crestfallen.

However, they turned to Sir Marmaduke for consolation.

"We'll see all about that," he said. "Just hark at this, my men: It is true Sir George may claim the reward, as he says, though I don't think he will; at any rate, if he does, I will use my influence to have the reward paid to you as well; or, if I cannot do that, why, I will pay you the thousand pounds out of my own private pocket as soon as you assure me he is safe within the prison of Newgate."

"Done, sir," said the one in command—"done, sir, and many thanks to you! I'll warrant when we once take charge of him that he doesn't escape."

While he spoke, the officer produced a pair of handcuffs from his pocket.

"There," he said, "these are the little things I am going to treat you with. I have heard a great deal about your cleverness, Mr. Turpin, but I want to know whether you can wriggle yourself out of these?"

Dick looked at Sir George, as much as to say:

"Save me from the indignity and pain of having those handcuffs put on me."

But Sir George only nodded at him and smiled reassuringly.

The officer with the handcuffs made a great show of bluster and violence.

"You need not make so much fuss," cried Sir George. "Just set about your duty quickly, and remember that I am keeping an eye upon your proceedings; the man offers you no resistance, so perform your duty peaceably."

Thus rebuked, the officer checked himself in some very biting remark that he was going to make, and silently put on the handcuffs.

"As he is my prisoner," said Sir George, "I shall accompany you with him wherever you may go."

"And so shall I," cried Sir Marmaduke. "I can tell what you mean, well enough; but you will find I shall have an eye on all your movements—I shall not leave Dick Turpin until I find him safely a prisoner."

"Well, I can't prevent you from doing that, nor do I wish to do so," answered Sir George. "I only spoke for myself, because I can assure you, that the thousand pounds will come in particularly useful just at the present time."

No further remark was made, and Dick Turpin was requested to mount one of the officer's horses.

He complied, and had not the bridle been grasped by several of the officers, he would then, although his arms were secured behind him, have made a bold rush to escape.

This was at present impossible, and wisely he resolved not to expend his strength or run any risk in making an abortive attempt at escape.

When he did try, it should be when he could feel almost certain of success.

A rope was next produced, and tied round his leg just above the ankle.

This rope was then passed underneath the horse's belly, and secured tightly to his other leg.

"Now, then," cried the chief officer, "one of you mount behind him, and clasp him tightly round the waist with your arms. Two others shall hold the reins and lead the horse along."

Sir Marmaduke was highly delighted with this expedient, and complimented the officer upon his cleverness.

While Dick Turpin was so guarded he must of necessity be safe.

The other huntsmen seemed half inclined to join in the procession, for such it seemed when all was in readiness for a start, and a few of them actually followed for a short distance.

One by one, however, they dropped off, until only Sir Marmaduke and Sir George were left.

The distance to London was considerable.

But neither cared for that.

Sir Marmaduke was still burning with revenge, not only because of Turpin's attempt to rob him, but also because his conduct had been so exposed, and because so much ill feeling had been shown towards him.

There was no fear but that this feeling would carry him much further than to London.

On the other hand, Sir George was actuated by widely different feelings.

It was his intention, if possible, to enable Turpin to make his escape, for he was a man who always admired boldness, no matter where or with whom he found it.

Dick Turpin he had somehow taken a kind of liking to from the first moment that he saw him, and he was determined that no effort should be wanting on his part to procure his release.

Of course he would have to be exceedingly careful while Sir Marmaduke's eyes were upon him, for if that individual could bring the charge of aiding Dick to escape home to him, he would certainly do so, and press for a severe punishment.

Sir George, in his light-heartedness, did not care a whit.

Already in his own mind he had resolved what he should do with the thousand pounds' reward which, be it understood, he fully intended to claim.

The officers and Sir Marmaduke were all in high spirits, and they trotted along the high-road towards the metropolis at a very respectable rate.

Many persons they met turned to look at such a strange cavalcade.

But no explanation was given as to the meaning of it.

But it was noticed first of all by Dick Turpin that the clouds were beginning to gather up in a pack away upon the horizon.

He had not led an out-door life so long as to be ignorant of the portents of the weather, and from what he saw he felt perfectly certain that ere long there would be a terrific storm.

From having nothing else to occupy his thoughts and attention, he amused himself by watching the progress of the clouds, and in a shorter space of time than he had expected he found that they had crept over the whole firmament, leaving not one single patch of blue to be seen.

The rain then began to fall—not gently at first, but it poured down at once with its full force, with such effect that everyone in the party was in an instant drenched to the skin.

Sir Marmaduke especially felt very uncomfortable for the rain was driven directly in his face, and struck against it with pelting force, each rain-drop seeming almost like a hailstone.

Then the hollow mutterings of thunder could be heard, followed shortly by a feeble flash of lightning.

All this only served to give an indication of what was to come, and the least experienced of the party knew well enough that a storm of unusual violence was going to break forth.

Sir Marmaduke, keeping the rain out of his eyes as well as he could, looked anxiously around him, hoping to perceive some place of shelter.

CHAPTER DCCCL.

THE OFFICERS STOP FOR SHELTER AT THE BAG OF NAILS INN, AND DICK TURPIN RESOLVES TO AVAIL HIMSELF OF THE OPPORTUNITY TO ESCAPE.

THE others looked around them too, with the same intent, but at present there was not a human habitation, or even a barn, within sight; and yet there might have been one at no great distance, for such was the velocity with which the rain reached the earth, that it caused a kind of mist to arise, which effectually prevented them from seeing any other objects than those which were close at hand.

The officers took their ducking rather complacently, for they were used to exposure to the weather. Not so Sir Marmaduke and Sir George, however. They gave vent to their annoyance in very audible terms.

As for Turpin, he said nothing.

His mind was occupied just then in devising some means by which he could release himself from his present unenviable position.

But as yet he could see no opening, and all he could do was to hold himself in readiness to take advantage of any accident that might take place.

All at once Sir Marmaduke, still peering through the mist and rain, perceived before him the dim outlines of a building of some kind.

"What place is that?" he asked, addressing himself to one of the police officers, and pointing in advance while he spoke.

"That, sir," was the answer, "is the Bag of Nails Inn, or I am much mistaken. It is kept by one Timothy Goodall—a rare fellow, I can assure your honour, and his house affords the best possible accommodation for man and beast."

"Then, in the devil's name, push on!" shouted Sir Marmaduke, impatiently, for he had tried in vain to stem the officer's loquacity.

"Will you stop there, sir?"

"Yes, certainly, till this storm be past. Besides, you cannot perform the journey to London without halting somewhere."

"True enough, sir. The horses will be glad of something to eat, and a rub down."

"Then just tell those fellows in front to push on at a little better speed, will you?"

The officer rode forward to obey this injunction, and Sir Marmaduke bent his head before the storm, the violence of which had now very much increased.

Dick Turpin overheard this conversation with secret pleasure.

He was quite delighted to think the storm had broken forth, although by it he had suffered some passing inconvenience.

A stoppage at an inn would be, he felt certain, an event that offered him a favourable chance of making his escape.

The distance to the Bag of Nails was only trifling, so that, as the officers increased their speed, it was quickly reached.

As they drew up in front of the horse-trough, they perceived the landlord standing at one of the low windows, looking out.

He witnessed the stopping of so many persons before his door with great surprise.

"This will be quite a windfall for old Timothy," said the loquacious officer. "He won't quarrel with the storm, I'll be bound, for, except by chance like this, he does no sort of trade at all."

This piece of gratuitous information was silently received, the fact being that each and all were anxiously endeavouring to get beneath the roof of the inn as quickly as possible.

The landlord appeared at the front door.

"Jim—Jim!" he cried. "Where on earth is the lazy rascal? Jim—Jim, I say!"

"Here I be, master. What's the row?"

A very peculiar-looking individual made his appearance from the rear of the inn. His hair was filled with bits of straw, as though he had just been lying down in the loft.

Without another word he ran forward and took charge of the horses.

"See to them well," said the commanding officer.

"And especially to this one of mine," added Sir George.

Sir Marmaduke said nothing. He was too busy occupied in watching Dick Turpin's every movement to think about anything else.

With great care and caution the officers dismounted their prisoner.

Dick was careful not to offer the least show of resistance, for he hoped, by submitting quietly to everything, to throw the officers off their guard.

While they continued to watch him as vigilantly as they had done up to the present moment, it was ridiculous to think of making an escape.

The officers seemed by their looks to be a good deal surprised at his demeanour.

They expected to have a vast deal of trouble, and when they found Dick submit so easily, they really felt quite injured and disappointed.

Densely surrounded by his foes, Turpin was hurried into the inn.

As they crossed the threshold, Dick's reflection was:

"Now, if old Matthew kept this inn, what a difference it would make to be sure! He would get me out of this scrape in no time. However, it is no good to think about that, I must rely upon my own resources."

From this it will be seen that Dick treated his present dangerous position very lightly.

The fact was, the more he thought upon the subject the more reliance he was disposed to place in the locket that had been presented to him.

It would have been an additional satisfaction to him if he could have opened it and just taken one peep, but that was quite impossible.

In fact, we may go the length of saying that, but for one circumstance, he would have felt more careless still.

But he thought of Maud and his comrades.

He knew how much grief and alarm the first would suffer when she had heard what had taken place; and with regard to his comrades, he feared, not unnaturally, in their strong desire to rescue him, that they would run themselves into great and unnecessary danger.

"No," he muttered, "I won't trust to the locket if I can possibly escape, if only for their sakes. The sooner I am back among them the better. Yes—yes, I will escape."

When Dick Turpin once made up his mind to a thing it was strange indeed if he did not accomplish it. Nothing short of absolute impossibility would have stayed him.

Upon entering the Bag of Nails Inn, the police officers at once betook themselves to the largest room in the place. They were pleased to find that it was vacant.

A huge fire, however, was burning on the spacious hearth, and they looked at it pleasantly, as it promised to dry their soaked apparel rapidly and effectually.

Before attending to this or anything else, their first care was to see that their prisoner was quite secure.

With this view a strong chair was called for, which was placed beside the fire.

In this Dick Turpin was seated, with his hands still secured behind him.

A rope was produced, and then wound round him in such a way, that he could not possibly move without carrying it with him.

THE ENTRY OF DICK TURPIN INTO NEWGATE.

This made his hopes of escape sink down to zero.

If the officers chose to remain in the same room, and, beyond a doubt, this is what they intended to do, he could not by any possibility get away unseen.

Sir Marmaduke superintended all these arrangements, and when they were completed, the chief officer said:

"Beg pardon, your worship, but don't you think we had better order a bit of a snack while we are drying our clothes. We shall not be able to leave until the storm gives over a little, and it does not promise to do that yet awhile."

"Oh, yes—yes, anything you like; but mind your prisoner is safely kept, that's all."

"Oh, leave us to see to that, your worship."

A very substantial meal was then called for, and by the time it was ready, they had managed to dry their garments.

A very savoury odour arose from the various viands, and reminded Dick that a long time had elapsed since he had partaken of any food.

He waited a short time to see whether anything would be offered to him; but finding the officers began their feast without paying the slightest attention to him, he said:

"Don't you intend me to have anything until you get me to Newgate? Or if Sir Marmaduke grudges the expense, I will pay my own share, and yours as well!"

Sir Marmaduke frowned, and growled out an inarticulate reply.

"Certainly," said Sir George, "you shall have what you wish—I will see to that."

"But," said the chief officer, "how can he eat?"

"Just take off these handcuffs and I'll soon show you," replied Turpin.

The chief officer paused, and looked irresolutely at Sir Marmaduke, who, being a magistrate, was of course expected to have the supreme command.

"Yes," added Sir George, "take off his handcuffs: there will be no difficulty then."

"Don't you wish you may get it," replied Sir Marmaduke. "No, no, my fine fellow, I have heard too much of your narrow escapes and your cleverness to think of allowing you to be any less safe than you are now."

"But," added Sir George, "what difference can taking off the handcuffs make? You can sit here, all of you, with your eyes upon him, and could prevent him untying the ropes, and if he did not do that, wherever he went he would have to carry the chair with him."

There was a silence.

"I insist that this shall be done!" said Sir George. "You have no right, and duty does not permit you, to refuse this man something to eat."

The chief officer ventured to nudge Sir George, and he whispered:

"I think it might be as well, your worship, to let him have his own way; we can keep a good eye upon him and see he does not untie the ropes; it will be the way to avoid all bother."

Sir Marmaduke also thought so, and therefore Dick was for a time released.

But before removing the handcuffs they took good care to see that all the ropes were perfectly secure.

Now, the reader may imagine that it was not altogether from the want of food that Dick made this request, though a long time had elapsed since he had tasted anything, and he felt faint in consequence.

A good meal would, he knew, endow him with fresh strength, and place him in a better position to make an effort for freedom.

A plate was brought and placed upon his knees.

But it was a difficult matter to eat, owing to the manner in which the rope was bound round his body and secured to the back of the chair.

Dick Turpin fixed his attention so entirely upon what he was about, that the officers in a short time grew tired of watching him, and looked after what they had on their own plates.

CHAPTER DCCCLI.

IN WHICH THE POLICE OFFICERS CONTINUE THEIR JOURNEY TO LONDON WITH THEIR CAPTIVE.

As for Sir George, he was, to tell the truth, very much astonished to find a man in so perilous a position as Dick Turpin eating a meal with so much relish and coolness.

He certainly appeared to be more at ease than any other one of the party.

But although it could scarcely have been gathered from his countenance, Dick's thoughts were very busy indeed.

He began to see pretty plainly that for the present his attempt to escape must be abandoned.

The least movement of his towards untying one of the many knots by which he was secured to the chair could not fail to be seen by some of the officers, and then they would all be immediately upon him.

His ankles were also tied very tightly, and he moved his legs about a little in the hope of being able to loosen the cord.

But this he found was impossible.

Whether or not he would have another opportunity allowed him before he arrived at Newgate was a very doubtful matter.

He was inclined to think that when the storm cleared off, the officers would make a start, and by travelling gently, endeavour to reach London before nightfall, and without making another halt on the way.

If this was the case, what was the next best use he could make of his hands while they were at liberty? for he knew his captors well enough to feel certain that as soon as his meal was over the handcuffs would be replaced.

His thoughts were still running upon the locket which he knew he had secure in one of the pockets of his waistcoat.

It would have been a great source of confidence to him could he but have opened it and glanced at what it contained.

This was not to be thought of, for if the officers saw it they would seize it immediately, and as a matter of course he would never catch sight of it again.

This brought to his mind the fact that, should he be carried as far as Newgate, the officials, when searching in his pockets, would be sure to find it, and he would be deprived of it.

Then how and in what way could he conceal it so as to keep it safely?

This was a point upon which he bestowed a great amount of consideration.

The only plan that he could think of that seemed at all feasible was to watch an opportunity to take it secretly out of his pocket and convey it to his mouth, keeping it there until alone in his cell.

He had arrived at this conclusion by the time he had finished his breakfast, if so substantial a meal could be so called.

And without further hesitation he put his thumb and finger into his waistcoat pocket at a moment when he believed not one of the officers had his eyes fixed upon him.

The locket was there, and he drew it forth eagerly, holding it between the tips of his fingers.

Its size was small, and it was evidently composed of the purest gold.

The inclination then came over him to open it and take a glance at its contents, for had it not been for the possession of this, Dick would have tried harder for freedom, even if he lost his life in the attempt.

But he was putting great faith in the word of a stranger, and it might turn out after all that the trinket would not prove efficacious.

Just then, however, the storm passed over, and the sun broke forth, sending a few watery beams into the apartment.

As soon as he caught sight of the sun's rays, Sir Marmaduke rose to his feet, crying:

"Now, my lads, the weather is fair again, and we have stopped here quite long enough. Secure your prisoner again, and have the horses brought round to the front, for the sooner we reach London the better I shall be pleased."

His word was law, for it was to him, it must be recollected, that the officers looked for the thousand pounds' reward, provided the amount offered by Government should be obtained by Sir George.

The officers, however, were one and all in excellent humour. What with the capital repast they had had, and the pleasant prospect there was before them, who could wonder that their minds should be occupied by a feeling of great self-complacency?

In imagination they could see dancing before their eyes the tempting sum of one thousand pounds all ready for them, and only waiting for the moment when they should choose to put forth their hands and grasp their own share of it.

But Dick, perceiving this sudden movement on the part of the officers, took advantage of it to slip the locket into his mouth.

It was done neatly, for at the same time he pretended to wipe away a few crumbs from his lips.

Owing to the small size of the locket, he knew he should be able to retain it in his mouth and speak also without much difficulty.

The officers having despatched one of their number to see to the horses being brought round, clustered very closely round his chair, and had he deferred the execution of his project for another moment, he would unquestionably have failed.

The handcuffs were again placed upon his wrists, in spite of the objections that he raised to such a proceeding.

The police officer shut one eye knowingly, and, addressing the prisoner, said:

"Will you give me your word of honour, Dick, that if we leave you without the handcuffs you will go quietly with us to Newgate and make no attempt to escape?"

Dick's reply was of course in the negative, so the officer added:

"Then there is no help for it, my lad—the darbies must go on."

The handcuffs were fixed upon Turpin's wrists with professional dexterity.

Then the ropes were untied, and he was comparatively free.

He shook himself with an air of great satisfaction, for he was cramped from remaining so long in one position.

In a compact body the officers then moved to the front door of the inn.

Most of the horses had been brought round, so Dick was placed on one at once.

A man mounted behind him, and the same order of procession observed as before, except that, instead of two men walking by the side of the horse and holding the bridle, they cut the rein in two, so that it might be held by a mounted officer on either side, who could control the movements of the animal.

In a few moments all was ready, and Sir Marmaduke, addressing all the officers collectively, said:

"Now, my good fellows, just listen to me for a moment. You have all had a capital breakfast, your horses have every one been well taken care of; the distance to London is great, I know, but not so great as to prevent us from reaching it without another halt by the way. It won't be quite so pleasant, perhaps, but, take my word for it, it will be much better. I know there are plenty of public-houses, the landlords of which are friendly to highwaymen, and we might have the mortification of seeing our prisoner escape us. In order to guard against that, let me advise you to put up with the inconvenience of riding the whole distance without stopping."

"We will, your worship," said the chief officer—"we will; your advice is the very best that could be given, and I will see that it is followed."

"Then, as that is settled," said Sir Marmaduke, "let us set forward at once."

The order was given, and the journey was commenced.

After hearing this little conversation, Dick had good reason to congratulate himself upon the course he had adopted.

Had he neglected to avail himself of the opportunity, he would probably never have had another.

Now he felt that all depended upon whether the locket possessed the virtues that had been ascribed to it.

The journey was performed at a gentle speed, so as not to distress the horses too greatly.

There was sound policy in this, for the animals were not knocked up half so quickly as they would have been had another course been adopted.

As they drew nearer and nearer to London, Sir Marmaduke grew more and more exultant.

At last he thought the notorious highwayman, Dick Turpin, would be safe within the walls of Newgate, and to him would be due the honour of having brought about such a desirable state of things.

Sir George, with every wish to save Dick Turpin if he could, had as yet seen no opportunity for interference.

Events had turned out differently to what he had expected, and he began to regret having taken upon himself the responsibility of advising Turpin to surrender, when perhaps he might by chance have made his escape.

Dick began to see that it was pretty certain his captors would carry him to Newgate, for instead of their vigilance abating in any degree, he believed that it increased.

But then, as we know, this was owing entirely to a personal cause.

Revenge was the dominant spirit in Sir Marmaduke's breast, and this it was that made him watch Turpin so closely, while the officers were anxious to do their best in order to obtain the reward.

A strange, gloomy feeling began to creep over Dick's heart as he got nearer and nearer to London.

He strove against the sensation, but could not banish it.

He kept thinking that there were many points on which he would like to feel more satisfied than he did at present.

And one of them was whether Black Bess had succeeded in reaching the inn in safety.

Could he but have felt perfectly certain that this was the case, it would indeed have removed a very considerable portion of the oppression at his heart.

CHAPTER DCCCLII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS AT LENGTH ARRIVE AT NEWGATE WITH THEIR PRISONER.

Dick Turpin knew, however, that there was no other means by which this could be ascertained than by waiting patiently.

Yet when the procession fairly entered London streets, his breathing grew laboured and difficult, and the gloom which had already begun to spread itself over his spirits grew darker and darker.

By no means did he give way to this feeling, but it was one entirely beyond his own control.

Sir George also looked anxious and vexed, and all could tell that he was in deep thought on some subject or other.

Sir Marmaduke presented a most remarkable contrast to these two.

His face was beaming with triumph, and such was his exultation that he could scarcely restrain himself within moderate bounds.

The officers, also, were greatly overjoyed, for, having once reached London, they considered that the danger and difficulty of their task was at an end.

Surely there could be no fear of his escaping now?

So good was the speed they made, that when they arrived in the metropolis the business of the day was in full swing, and the streets were unusually full of vehicles and pedestrians.

Quickly from mouth to mouth the intelligence spread that Dick Turpin was a prisoner, and in an incredibly short space of time the officers found themselves surrounded by a mob of uncommon magnitude, shouting, yelling, and otherwise violently behaving themselves, all being animated by one desire, which was to catch sight of the notorious prisoner.

But the officers closed still more closely around Dick.

They knew him to be a popular favourite, and dreaded that the mob would make an effort to set him at liberty again.

Very likely, had there been one master spirit to direct the movements of the crowd, this would have taken place.

The only person capable of it, however, was Sir George, and personal considerations prevented him from doing so.

Therefore the mob contented themselves with yelling as before, and running so as to keep pace with the horses.

By the time the Old Bailey was reached, the thoroughfare was completely blocked up.

The officers began to grow more anxious, and Sir Marmaduke scarcely dared confess to himself the fears he had that, after all, it would be difficult to gain the interior of Newgate.

Dick looked around him, as well as he was able, at the numberless faces.

But there was not one that he could recognise.

And now being in sight of the great prison of Newgate, that gloom which we have already mentioned reached its height.

He gave one glance up at the frowning walls, and only one.

How vividly was brought back to him the time when he had made so strange and daring an escape.

Now that the ravages of the fire had been repaired, the prison looked stronger and more dismal than ever.

At a slow walk the officers urged their steeds along past the Sessions House, past the residence of the Governor, until the small, well-known doorway was reached through which the prisoners were admitted.

The great commotion in the street outside had made the man on the lock aware that some unusual event was taking place, and he was on the look-out accordingly.

Little did he imagine, however, that he was about to open the door to give entrance to Dick Turpin.

Such proved to be the case, however.

Sir Marmaduke saw the man's face through the bars at the top of the door, and shouted loudly to him to admit them instantly.

While with one hand the man turned the key in the well-oiled lock, he with the other pulled a wire that communicated with a bell in the Governor's apartments, the ringing of which betokened that his presence was inquired in the vestibule.

With greater caution than they had used when entering the Bag of Nails Inn, the officers dismounted, and then assisted their prisoner to the ground.

More than a dozen hands seized hold of Dick in various ways, and, as the handcuffs were already tightly secured behind his back, he stood but a poor chance of getting free—so poor a one, indeed, that he made not the slightest effort to liberate himself, but allowed his captors to lead him up the steps and across the threshold of Newgate.

When the heavy door closed with its peculiar clang, Dick felt indeed that he was a prisoner.

Strange enough, however, no sooner had he come to the realisation of this fact than all his heaviness suddenly departed, his usual coolness, courage, and vivacity came back to him.

Drawing himself up to his full height, he looked around him.

Even though they stood beneath the roof of the prison, the police officers did not yet venture to let go their hold.

"The Governor," said Sir Marmaduke, sharply—"where is he? Send for him at once!"

"He will be here directly, sir," said the man on the lock. "I have already rung the bell, so that he will know he is wanted urgently."

At that very moment, the door communicating with the Governor's apartments was thrown open, and that individual appeared upon the threshold.

Mr. Cawthorn's successor was an under-sized, shrivelled-up, middle-aged man, who, to those occupying positions above him, was most disgustingly humble—indeed, the way in which he fawned upon the sheriffs and other high officials was positively sickening.

But to all the men and the prisoners he was a perfect tyrant, always choosing some opportunity or other for displaying his power.

From his servility, however, to the ruling powers, he was likely to retain his situation for a long time.

"What is all this?" he cried, sharply—"what is it? Speak, some of you, and tell me! What do you mean by keeping me in suspense in this manner?"

"I will soon inform you," said Sir Marmaduke, stepping forward. "But, first of all, just allow me to remark that my name is Braham—Sir Marmaduke Braham, chief magistrate of the county of Surrey."

Dick really thought that the Governor of Newgate was about to fall on his knees at once; but he did not, though he bowed his head so low that it was the greatest wonder in the world how he regained his perpendicularity.

He did not stand upright, however, but, continually oscillating backwards and forwards, and waving his hands so as to keep time with the movement, he said:

"I beg ten thousand pardons, Sir Marmaduke! I was not aware that you were present! I am very sorry indeed that I spoke so sharply, only, you see——"

"Oh, yes, yes!" cried Sir Marmaduke, impatiently. "I see all about that! Just pay attention to me!"

"I am all attention, Sir Marmaduke."

"Well, then, I have brought you here a prisoner, no other than the notorious rascal——"

He stopped suddenly, and uttered a shout, and for a moment there were one or two who wondered what could be the cause.

It so happened that Sir Marmaduke, while speaking, was standing very near to Dick, and just in front of him.

No sooner did the word "rascal" escape his lips, than Dick, whose legs were at liberty, took one step forward, and, raising his right foot, subjected the baronet to the indignity of a kick upon his hinder quarters.

The Governor stood aghast.

Dick Turpin, with a smile on his lips, resumed his former attitude.

"I will have your life!" screamed Sir Marmaduke—"I will have your life, rascal, villain that you are! No, no!" he added, with a sudden change of manner—"no, no—I won't touch you—I'd scorn to do it! I'll wait my time, and, if it costs me half my fortune, I will have the best place to stand to see you hanged!"

"Just as you like," said Dick—"it's quite indifferent to me. Of course, you understand that my arms, being fastened behind me, prevented me from using my fists, as I should have done, but I think my foot made a very good substitute."

"You shall be punished for this insolence, rest assured!" cried the baronet, foaming with rage. "Take care of him, Mr. Governor! He is a dangerous man—a most dangerous man! Don't lose sight of him for one single moment!"

"All right!" said the Governor—"you may depend upon me! Why, can it be possible?" he continued, as he looked closer. "Yes, yes, it is—I recognise him now! Why, you have really captured Dick Turpin!"

"Yes, yes—I have!"

"Speak the truth," interrupted Dick. "I say you didn't!"

"Be silent!"

"I sha'n't, without you choose to gag me!"

"It is not true that you captured him, Sir Marmaduke," interrupted Sir George. "The man surrendered himself to me. I took him prisoner, and therefore I claim the reward of a thousand pounds that is offered for his apprehension."

"And who may you be, sir?" asked the Governor, sneeringly.

"My name is of no consequence to you, but perhaps I had better say I am Sir George Hazlitt, Sir Marmaduke's neighbour."

The Governor bowed again.

"Really," he said, "the villanous rascal has had too much honour. The idea, now, to be captured by a baronet!"

"Pay attention to what I say," continued Sir George. "He was my prisoner, and was quite willing to follow me to Newgate without resistance, provided I had felt inclined to bring him; but Sir Marmaduke, being present, thought fit to take upon himself the management of affairs, so sent for this troop of officers, to whom, of course, I handed over the prisoner, and they have done no more than perform the very simple duty of bringing him here."

"Yes," cried Dick, "that's it—that's quite correct every word of it."

"Who told you to speak?" roared the Governor.

"Seek information of my elbow!" replied Dick.

There was a general titter at this, though one and all endeavoured to conquer their propensity to laugh.

"Be silent, then," said the Governor. "I will not allow you to say a word!"

"And you shall not prevent me," said Dick, "so what do you think of that? Now, I don't mind telling you something for your own good. If you desire to have peace and quietness in the prison, just let me have my own way; if you do not, take my word for it I will convert it into a regular little hell upon earth!"

CHAPTER DCCCLIII.

DICK TURPIN ENRAGES SIR MARMADUKE, BUT MAKES FRIENDS WITH THE GOVERNOR OF NEWGATE.

THE Governor of Newgate stood perfectly aghast.

The idea that such words should be addressed to an august functionary like himself, and, above all, by a prisoner, was monstrous in the extreme.

So great was his amazement that he could only stare with wide-open mouth and eyes at Dick, who nodded his head as much as to say:

"I mean it, every word of it."

What the Governor would have said or done we really cannot tell, but Sir Marmaduke interposed, saying:

"Pay not the least attention to him—treat all he says with contempt, and just listen to me."

"Yes—yes, I will listen—I am all attention, of course, but if ever——"

"Never mind him, I say—keep that to yourself. I want to know how this case stands?"

"What case, Sir Marmaduke?"

"Why, as to who is entitled to the reward?"

There was a pause—an awkward one for the Governor, for he did not want to reply so as to give the least offence to the baronet.

"I cannot presume to decide," he replied, at length, "and really the matter has nothing whatever to do with me."

"But you will have to give a receipt for the prisoner!"

"Oh yes—that's according to form."

"Then give it to the officers."

"No, no," said Sir George. "I object to that. The receipt should be mine, since it will show that the capture was made by me."

The Governor looked from one to the other irresolutely.

He was quite in a fix.

"I can't give two receipts," he stammered—"that's quite impossible, and as to who ought to have it, I am in doubt, though, after all, I should think the officers are the most proper."

"Yes, certainly," broke in Turpin—"give it to the officers, Mr. Governor, but mind you write across it that I was captured by Sir George Hazlitt."

The Governor gave the prisoner an angry glance, but Sir Marmaduke restrained him.

"A good suggestion," said Sir George. "I will have it done so; that puts an end to the difficulty at once. Surely you have no objection to making that addition to the receipt?"

The Governor made a wry face as he answered:

"No—I don't know that I have. It is unusual, yet it might be done."

"Then do it."

The receipt was duly written out and examined by Sir George to see that it was entirely to his satisfaction.

It was then handed to the police, who took it rather unwillingly.

They had quickly come to a decision on the disputed point, and their opinion was that Sir George was fairly entitled to the whole of the reward, so that they would have to depend entirely upon Sir Marmaduke for anything for themselves.

The baronet must have noticed this, for he said:

"Never mind all this, my lads—it shall make no difference to you. I am well pleased with the manner in which you have performed your duty, and I shall recommend every one of you, and my recommendation ought to be worth something; besides, I will be as good as my word with respect to the reward."

The officers were most enthusiastic in their applause, and would insist upon treating Sir Marmaduke with three cheers.

After that, at the wish of the Governor, they departed.

Sir George, as he passed by where Dick was standing, just muttered:

"I like your bold spirit, and, if only for that, would do everything in my power to aid you; but I consider myself guilty of having brought you into your present scrape, and I will try my best to get you out of it."

Dick had only time to murmur a few words of thanks, and Sir George was gone.

As soon as all the visitors had departed and the door was closed again, the Governor of the prison strode up to Dick in a very aggressive, defiant manner.

Probably his reason for so doing was that he knew Dick's arms were perfectly safe behind his back.

As for Turpin himself, however, he had quickly come to a decision as to how he should in future treat the Governor of the prison.

His position was a very peculiar one, and if by any means he could obtain the forbearance or good feeling of the Governor, it would be a great thing gained.

Therefore, in a calm and pleasant voice, he spoke before the Governor had time to pronounce the angry words that were hovering upon his lips.

"Mr. Governor," he said, "pray do not think anything of what I have just said—it was only to exasperate Sir Marmaduke. I owed him a grudge, and that was the only way in which I could pay it. A little while ago I made you a threat, now, if you like, I will give you a promise."

The Governor was astonished that he should be addressed in this manner by the prisoner, and as his astonishment prevented him from making an immediate reply, Dick continued:

"The promise is this: If you will put me into comfortable quarters and see that things generally during my stay here are made tolerably pleasant, I will promise you faithfully—in fact, I will give you my word—that I will make no attempt whatever to escape from your custody."

The Governor's surprise increased

"If, now," he said, hesitatingly—"if I might believe what you are saying——"

"You may believe it," said Dick, "and place implicit faith in it. I respect my word more than I should an oath. I have spoken, and it is for you to decide whether you will believe me or not."

The Governor remained for some time silent.

Of course he was well aware of the causes that had led to the suspension and finally to the dismissal of Mr. Cawthorn, his predecessor, and he was therefore certain if Dick Turpin should make his escape that the consequence would be very disastrous to him.

A cunning thought entered his brain.

His eyes sparkled with pleasure, and he answered:

"Well, Dick, I will take your word—you shall have the most comfortable cell there is in the prison, and you shall have every indulgence short of being permitted to depart. Now, what do you say to that?"

"Why, that I shall be always obliged to you; and depend upon it, any man's good will is better than his hatred, and I will sacredly promise you not to make any effort at escape—at least, not while things go on to my satisfaction, and when they do not, I will give you timely notice."

For the life of him, the Governor could not help laughing at the cool, easy, business-like way in which Dick spoke of his imprisonment.

"Well," he said, "come on quietly, and I will take you to the cell."

"But remember your promise," said Dick.

"Oh, yes, I'll remember it."

"Very well, then."

Dick held out his hands behind him significantly.

"Oh! you want the handcuffs taken off?"

"Yes, I do—they hurt my wrists confoundedly."

This was putting the Governor to the test, and he hesitated for one moment. He thought:

"Suppose, now, this fellow, of whose daring I have heard so much, should make a sudden attack upon us and escape by the door, what a fool I should look, and how much I should be blamed for taking his word!"

But the next moment he decided to have Dick released, for he reasoned with himself in the following manner:

"I will keep myself well upon my guard, and if he keeps peaceable and quiet, and makes no attempt at resistance or escape, I shall begin to put faith in him, for he would never have a better opportunity than the present."

The order was given, and the handcuffs were removed.

Dick gave himself a good shake.

He fully meant every word he said, and, turning quietly to the Governor, he said:

"You will never repent of this. Believe me, I am much obliged to you."

"Oh, don't mention it. If things can be managed quietly and comfortably, they might as well be as not."

"So I thought," added Dick, "and that's why I mentioned the subject."

The turnkeys were all very much surprised to see the Governor on such familiar terms with the prisoner; but, then, Dick was a prisoner of no ordinary kind, and the Governor wisely held him in dread; and, as we have already stated, it was part of his creed always to bow down before authority.

"You must not expect to find anything at all luxurious," he continued, with a laugh. "The comforts here are scarce. However, come this way."

Dick followed the Governor along a corridor and up a flight of steps.

Pausing before a row of strong doors, the Governor made a sign for one to be opened.

The fastenings were removed, and then really a clean and comfortable cell was disclosed.

It had a window in it of a size larger than was usual, and this window looked into a kind of court-yard.

"Ah!" said Dick, "this is better. I had no idea that you had anything of this kind in Newgate."

"Nor had we until lately," was the reply. "This is part that has been lately built. Will this suit you?"

"Oh yes."

"Very well, then, walk in and take possession. You must know, by a recent regulation, my strict duty is to leave two men or more constantly in the cell with you to watch your every movement, but I suppose that will not be pleasant?"

"Not by any means," said Dick. "I should prefer to be alone."

"Well, then, I will run the risk of disobeying my instructions."

"Then I shall be infinitely obliged to you. And I tell you what it is, Mr. ——"

"Bradbury," said the Governor.

"Well, then, Mr. Bradbury, I can tell you that you will never have cause for regret if you continue to treat me as well as you do now—indeed, it will turn out one of the best things in the world for you, so mind that."

CHAPTER DCCCLIV.

DICK TURPIN OPENS THE LOCKET, AND MAKES A FRIEND IN NEWGATE.

THE Governor stared at Dick Turpin in the utmost surprise; but the highwayman's countenance underwent no change, and, for all he could tell, by the expression of it, Dick fully meant what he said.

"Well," replied Mr. Bradbury, at last, "I have not been Governor of Newgate very long, but if I continue in this post a hundred years I'll warraut I never have a prisoner talk to me in such an easy, off-handed way as you do."

"Very likely not," said Dick. "I don't hesitate to say you are a good fellow—a much better one than I expected to find."

The turnkeys, who stood on the threshold of the cell, were highly amused at this conversation, and afterwards it was repeated with all due exaggerations to their companions in the vestibule, the result of which was that, taking their cue from the Governor's conduct, they were prepared to treat Dick in the friendliest manner possible.

"Well—well," said the Governor, as he prepared to leave the cell, evidently by no means displeased with Dick's flattery, "I will make things as comfortable as I can for you, but you must be careful not to speak of any little extra indulgencies that I may allow you."

"Oh, certainly not!" said Dick. "Don't feel any fear on that score, I beg."

The Governor then withdrew, and, by his orders, the turnkeys closed the door after him.

While they were putting up the ponderous bar, and securing other fastenings, he said to them, in a whisper:

"You heard what I said just now? Of course I agreed that he should be left in the cell by himself."

The men nodded.

"But," he continued, "I don't care about trusting him too far, so—aha, it's a joke!—two of you shall remain constantly outside the door while he is here; then, if you hear or see anything unusual, the alarm can be instantly raised."

The Governor strode away without waiting for a reply, congratulating himself in his own mind upon the vast amount of cunning that he had shown in the transaction, and rubbing his hands quite gleefully as he went.

It was no small relief to his mind to have Turpin's word that he would not escape, as it would save him such a vast deal of trouble; and now this extra precaution, he felt, would make all things easy.

As for Dick himself, he was glad enough to get rid of the Governor, and as soon as ever the door was closed, took the locket out of his mouth, where he had managed to keep it concealed during the whole of the time.

His impatience with regard to it was very great, for he wanted to know how and by what means it could possibly get him out of his present strait.

He tried to open it.

But his haste and eagerness were so great as to defeat his object, and he had to pause and look more carefully at it.

He then noticed that it was secured by a small spring, which he pressed, and immediately the locket flew open.

What he saw within it by no means increased his confidence, for all he could perceive were too small portraits, one of a male and the other of a female.

They were, however, beautifully executed, and set round with small precious stones.

"The deuce!" he exclaimed—"how is this to help me? Have I been befooled after all?"

He looked more carefully still at the portraits, and then two cries of surprise rapidly escaped his lips.

In the portrait of the female he recognised the features of the mysterious lady

There was a great alteration in them, yet the likeness could not fail to be recognised.

Evidently the portrait had been painted when she was a very young girl; now she was, to say the least, middle-aged.

The other portrait was still more unmistakeable.

The features as well as the costume, were well known to Dick as soon as he scrutinised them.

It was a portrait of his Majesty the King.

But Dick was by no means satisfied that he had seen all the locket contained.

Surely there should be some direction in it as to how he should act, and some suggestion as to the means by which the portraits could be made useful to him.

But, although he spent nearly an hour in examining the locket in every part, he failed to find anything else, and finally came to the conclusion that the portraits were all that it contained.

He closed it sharply.

With a feeling of great disappointment, he thrust it into his pocket and began to think.

"I can't believe that she meant to play me false," he said, at length. "There's only one way I can think of by which this locket can be made useful, and yet, surely I should have had some hint about it, but I have not, though the idea must be tried if possible. I must find a means of conveying this locket to the King."

This certainly seemed about the only reasonable thing that could be done with the locket, and yet how great would be the difficulty for anyone confined in a cell in Newgate to communicate with the King—indeed, any other person than Dick Turpin would probably have considered it an impossibility, and have never even made the attempt.

But Dick never lost anything for the want of trying, and, having made up his mind that the locket should be handed to the King, he set to work to think by what means this purpose could be carried out.

The task was beset with innumerable obstacles, and he thought of fifty things without being able to decide on any.

He was interrupted in his ruminations by the removal of the fastenings upon his door.

Listlessly, he turned his eyes in that direction, and saw a turnkey enter.

To Dick's surprise, he closed the door behind him.

There was an expression on this man's face which Dick interpreted as being favourable to himself.

"Well," he asked, quickly, "what is it? Nothing disagreeable I hope?"

"No, captain—nothing disagreeable. I have come to know what there is you would like."

"What I should like?"

"Yes."

"Well, then, to speak the truth, that you would just take me up and pop me down somewhere outside of the prison."

The turnkey shook his head.

"I can't do that, captain—I can't indeed. If I could I would, mind you," he added, in a suppressed tone that seemed to be perfectly earnest.

"Would you indeed?" said Dick, grasping him by the hand. "For what reason is it that you are so willing to befriend me?"

"Well, I've got two reasons, captain."

"Quick, then—out with them!"

"Well, the first is owing to a little circumstance that, perhaps you may have forgotten, but which I shall always remember. You once saved my life."

"Saved your life?"

"Yes; you don't recollect me, very likely."

"I am certain I do not," replied Turpin, gazing more closely into his countenance, "and, as a rule, if I once see a person I can always recognise him again."

"Well, you never did see me—at least, not that I know of," replied the man.

"And yet I saved your life?"

"Yes."

"But how so?"

Do you not recollect that, one night, a long time ago now, you called in at a cottage and asked for something to eat? The woman who kept it said she was very poor, yet put the best meal she could before you, telling you at the same time that her husband was lying ill in bed, and dying for want of nourishment, which she had not the means to procure?"

Dick reflected.

"Yes, yes—I have some faint recollection of it. But what then?"

"Why, you took your departure very suddenly, and after you had gone we found under the plate a large sum in gold. That money enabled my wife to purchase the things I stood in need of, and so saved my life. I rapidly grew better, and finally well, though when I recovered health and strength my stock of money was exhausted.'

"Well, you were quite welcome," said Dick. "It was no favour on my part; the service your wife rendered me was not overpaid by the one I rendered in return."

"Well, we may be of different opinions as regards that," said the man. "However, you saved my life, captain, and, to the longest day I live, I shall always feel grateful to you for it, and I will do anything in my power for you."

"I am heartily glad to hear it," was the reply, "more especially as there is a service which you can render me. But you spoke of another reason—what is that?"

"Why, it happened, strangely enough, but one of the gentlemen who came in with you when you were brought here—Sir George, I think you call him——"

"Yes—yes."

"He watched for me outside, and as soon as I appeared told me to follow him. I did so, and we entered a public-house. He approached the subject very cautiously, but finding how friendly disposed I was to you, was very glad.

"'Here,' he said, 'I know that in Newgate, as everywhere else, much can be done with money. Take this purse of gold, and see that Dick Turpin has everything which the regulations of the prision will permit. If you require any more, come to me as soon as your funds are exhausted, and take him word from me that I will use all my influence to procure his liberation.'"

"Did he say that?"

"Yes, he did, and here, captain, is the purse just as I received it."

"Well, but I don't want it, my good fellow. Keep it—keep it, I beg, and use it as occasion may require."

"I will, captain, the King shall not be more comfortable than you are, provided the Governor does not interfere, and I don't think he will, if we keep things snug."

"The King?" repeated Dick. "Yes, that reminds me of what I want."

"What, captain?"

"Why, paper, a pen, and ink—I must write a letter."

"I shall have to smuggle those in when I get a chance," was the reply, "for it is entirely against the rules to furnish those articles. However, you shall have them."

"And as soon as possible," said Dick—"every moment is of importance."

"All right, captain. Is there anything else?"

"No, no—nothing at present until that is done."

"Anything to eat and drink?"

"No. I tell you until this affair is off my mind I cannot attend to anything else."

CHAPTER DCCCLV

DICK TURPIN WRITES A LETTER TO OLD MATTHEW AND DESPATCHES IT BY THE FRIENDLY JAILER.

"I WILL go at once, captain—direct, and I will be back here again as quickly as is possible."

With these words the friendly jailer left.

After his departure, Dick more fully realised how fortunate this event had proved for him.

Nothing more unexpected than finding a friend beneath the roof of Newgate could he have thought of, and yet, in a most substantial way, he experienced the benefit that always follows the doing of a good action.

Unless the man was black and treacherous indeed, he would be entirely devoted to Turpin's interests.

From the fact of Dick asking for writing materials, it may be guessed that he had made up his mind how to proceed, and so he had, for the finding of this friend altered the aspect of affairs entirely.

His intention was to write a letter to his companions, and entrust it to his friend to deliver.

He had resolved not to send to the Three Spiders, however, because that would be too dangerous.

His connection with that place could not be too carefully kept secret.

He would send it in the first place to old Matthew, in Drury Lane, and trust to him to forward it to the proper quarter.

The turnkey was absent only a short time, and when he came in, the expression of his face showed that he had been successful.

"Here you are, captain," he said—"a drop of ink, there's a pen, and here's a piece of paper."

"Thanks—many thanks. It will take me some little time to write this letter, so come in again when you next have the opportunity; by that time it will doubtless be finished."

"Very good, captain—I will."

"But stay," said Dick, "you did not tell me how it was you came to be turnkey in Newgate."

"Well, the fact is, after I got well I was a long time trying to get fresh work, but I failed—why, I knew not. I tried many different occupations, and at length happened to hear by chance that turnkeys were wanted for Newgate. I applied, and succeeded in getting the situation, and here I have been ever since."

"That explanation is simple enough then."

"Yes, captain; but there's one thing more. Do you happen to know that two men are posted outside the door?"

"I fancied so."

"Well, then, it is the case; so that when we speak to each other we must sink our voices a little above a whisper; those other fellows may betray us."

"You were quite right to caution me," said Dick "For the moment, I had forgotten all about them."

The turnkey said no more, but departed, and as soon as he was alone, Dick set down, first to think and afterwards to write.

The latter was to him a very tedious operation.

Yet, after awhile, he succeeded in producing the following epistle:—

"DEAR MATTHEW,—

"I suppose by this time you have heard that I am a prisoner in Newgate. The circumstances of my arrest are very peculiar. No doubt you wonder that I should have surrendered at all, knowing how often I have declared that I would rather die. Circumstances alter cases, though, and when we meet again, which I hope will be soon, I will relate all the details to you; I have not time to write them.

"I want you, as soon as may be after the receipt of this letter, to send over to a certain place I need not mention, and let them know that I am safe. Tell them not to be alarmed, and for the following reason:—

"Along with this letter you will receive a small locket, take care of it, for on that depends my liberation. Strange, is it not? but I have faith in its power. I want it delivered to the King with all speed, wherever he may be at the present time. And here let me give you a particular caution: T. K. will be the proper person to deliver it, for, mark me, the locket must, by some means or other, be placed in the King's hand. It will not do for it to reach him through any official connected with the palace. At all risks, hazards, and difficulties, access must be had to the King in person, and the locket presented.

"There is no one I can think of better calculated to perform such a task than the person I have named. Let him go as soon as possible, and with all speed let me know the result.

"The bearer of this you can fully trust in every respect. I would pledge my life as to his fidelity.

"If you like to make inquiries you can soon learn how it was that I came into possession of this singular locket, and then you will not feel so surprised at my pinning my faith upon it.

"Above all, I should like you to endeavour to reassure Maud. I know she must feel greatly distressed at what has happened, but let her know from me that my position is by no means so perilous as she imagines, for should, by any unlucky accident, the locket fail, I have a friend here by whose aid, I doubt not, I should be able to make my escape.

"Last of all, impress upon everyone the necessity of remaining quiet where they are, and making no effort to release me, as any such attempt on their part will only get them into trouble, and increase the difficulties of my position.

"If you like to send word back, you can do so. Do not be afraid of putting trust in the bearer.

"Yours,

"DICK."

Turpin took a great deal of pains over this letter, and he was occupied a long time in writing it.

Scarcely had he laid down the pen, however, when the friendly jailer entered.

"Here it is," Dick exclaimed, folding up the sheet of paper and addressing it. "I want you to take it to one Matthew Gale, the landlord of the White Horse, in Drury Lane. Do you know it?"

"I think so—a large, old-fashioned building, is it not, standing at the corner of White Horse Yard?"

"Yes, that's it. Here's the letter, and be sure that you deliver it into the hands of Matthew Gale himself. You will know him, for he is tall and stout, with a jolly, good-tempered-looking countenance, and usually wears a white apron. Try as well to slip the letter into his hand when there's no one by."

"All right."

"And this," said Dick, giving him the locket—"above all things be careful of that; do not lose it, for upon it all my hopes depend."

"You can trust me, captain," was the reply. "Such a service as this is a mere trifle, but yet I will perform it as well as if you had gone in person."

"I am satisfied to trust you; take it now and go at once."

"But, captain," said the man, "don't you want something to eat or drink? You have been here a good many hours now."

"I know that, but I am accustomed to go long without food, especially if I have anything important to do."

"But when I come back?"

"Why then, if you like, you can bring me the best dinner you can procure, for when I know the letter and locket have been delivered safely, and are in Old Matthew's hands, a great load will be lifted off my heart."

"Well, then, I will start, and make haste back."

"Do so—do so."

The turnkey carefully secreted the letter and locket about him—then left the cell.

It may easily be imagined that Dick Turpin suffered no small degree of impatience and anxiety after the jailer had departed.

In spite of everything, and try as he would, some doubts as to the fellow's honesty would obtrude themselves upon his mind.

It was a dreadful thing to think of, for should he be betrayed in this, his position would be dangerous indeed.

And so, as minute after minute passed away, his uneasiness increased, and, rising to his feet, he paced rapidly up and down his cell, pausing every now and then to look through the barred window, hoping that he should catch sight of the turnkey approaching.

Dick had no means whatever of ascertaining the time, for, of course, on his first introduction to the vestibule of Newgate, every article was removed from his pockets, and the locket would have gone as well had he not so cleverly concealed it.

Yet he fancied that a very long time indeed had elapsed since the man's departure—much more time than was needful for him to perform the journey to Drury Lane and back, and for Matthew to send a message in return.

Unless by imagination we could place ourselves exactly in his present situation, it would be difficult indeed to form a proper estimate of the anxious state of his mind, or guess what doubts, and fears, and hopes by turns assailed it.

That the jailer had been absent a very long time he was quite certain, although his state of suspense might have caused him to exaggerate it.

Now, however, there was no mistaking the fact that the day was fast closing in, and in a little while longer it would be dusk, if not dark.

But in that cell of Newgate the days were much shorter than they were outside the prison, for it was not until long after the sun had risen in the morning that any daylight found its way into it, and by sunset it was nearly dark.

At length, however, Dick heard a footstep in the passage.

He paused, and directly afterwards the fastenings were removed, the door opened, and the jailer entered.

"You have been absent a long time," said Dick, as soon as it was prudent to speak.

"Yes, captain, I have; but you will find that I shall be able to give you a very good explanation of it."

CHAPTER DCCCLVI.

TOM DAVIS GATHERS SOME INFORMATION RESPECTING OLD MATTHEW FROM THE LOQUACIOUS BARBER.

We revert now to the proceedings of Tom Davis.

It will be remembered that when he left the Three Spiders it was very early in the morning indeed.

The horse he had was a good one, and took him to London in capital style, so that he arrived before many of the inhabitants were astir.

He took the precaution, however, to leave his horse and trap at an inn about half a mile from Drury Lane, because he was anxious to arrive there without attracting any notice.

Walking quietly down on the side opposite to that upon which the White Horse stood, Tom Davis pretended to be gazing with interest at the shop windows, but in reality he did this only that he might be allowed a better opportunity of looking carefully on all sides of him.

But as he proceeded he saw nothing at all peculiar or unusual.

Arriving at length opposite the White Horse, he saw that the shutters were down and the door open.

But, more by chance than anything else, Tom Davis cast his eyes upwards, and, very greatly to his astonishment, he caught sight of a couple of police officers who were on the top of the house, looking down over the parapet.

They made some signs with their hands, but what they portended Tom could not guess.

But, looking before him, he saw two men dressed in plain clothes, who were replying to the signals given by those above.

"Oh, oh!" he muttered. "So Matthew is troubled with another visit of his old friends, is he? Well, if such is the case, the wisest thing I can do, perhaps, is to keep out of the way for a time. Where can I go?"

Tom looked around him again, for if by any chance he could remain somewhere within sight of the White Horse Inn, why then it would be so much the better.

Fortune favoured him.

It will be remembered that nearly opposite the front door of the White Horse Inn was a barber's shop.

The barber himself was an object of considerable aversion to Old Matthew, for the simple reason that he was very fond of prying into his neighbours' business.

Of course, we all know that Matthew had many secrets that he wished to keep carefully concealed from the eyes of those around him, and he had often been annoyed by this barber's inquisitiveness.

Tom Davis, however, no sooner saw the shop than he felt quite a sensation of pleasure.

Here he could enter and remain for some time, and probably learn what was going on at the White Horse.

Just as he reached the door of the shop, some person came hastily out, and following him, almost treading on his heels, was the barber himself.

He stopped on the doorstep, and looked attentively across the road.

What more he would have done is hard to say, for just then Tom Davis went up to him and entered the shop.

"Bless my heart," the barber exclaimed, in brisk tones, "I never knew such a thing in all my life!"

"As what?" asked Tom, as he seated himself in a chair.

"As business this morning."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, I have been uncommonly busy—most uncommonly busy, and just because I didn't want to be scarcely believe it, sir," he continued, as he adjusted a cloth beneath Tom's chin—"you'll scarcely believe what a many useless, idle hours I pass here; but then, of course, there's nothing going on. But, mark me, I'll be bound if there's anything particular occurring, people keep dropping in one after another, and I don't get a moment to look about me."

[DICK TURPIN IS SUMPTUOUSLY REGALED IN HIS CELL BY THE FRIENDLY JAILER.]

"Dear me," said Tom Davis, "I'm quite sorry I entered."

"Oh, don't mention it, sir—don't mention it! I shall be done in a moment."

The barber took it for granted that Tom required shaving, and to this operation our friend submitted first, not that he intended to leave when that was over, for he meant to have his air trimmed, which would occupy some little length of time.

"May I venture to ask," said Tom, "What it is that is going on this morning that you are so anxious to witness?"

"Oh yes, certainly—I will tell you with the greatest of pleasure! It is no secret—no secret at all. Did you happen to notice that public-house opposite?"

"Yes, I think I did."

"Well, then, I may go so far as to say that it is one of the most notorious places in all London."

"In what way?"

"Why, all the highwaymen and flash coves of every kind go there if they are in trouble, and the landlord contrives to hide them somewhere, so that if the officers search ever so strictly they can't find them."

"Dear me—how extraordinary!" said Tom Davis, as if in the greatest astonishment.

"It's a fact, I can assure you," continued the barber, speaking with great rapidity. "I could fill a whole volume with things that I have witnessed myself, for, being rather curious about such matters, and living exactly opposite, of course I have had ample opportunities for observation."

No. 176.—BLACK BESS.

"So I should think."

"I have heard, though," he went on, "that Matthew Gale, or old Matthew, as we generally call him, although he will place a highwayman or almost anyone in safety, yet refuses to hold out his protection to anyone he knows to be a murderer; but that may or may not be true, and whether it is or not, after all, does not signify. There you are, sir—all done now. Good day, sir."

"Not quite," replied Tom. "I am sorry to hinder you, but now I am shaved I must have my hair dressed; it would be impossible to leave it, so you must make the job complete."

The barber gave a sigh, and began to get his implements ready.

"Do you know any of the particulars of what is going on to-day?" asked Tom.

"No," replied the barber, "scarcely any, and that's why I am so anxious to find out."

"Then, if you like," said Tom, "as I am in no particular hurry, and as I feel curious as well as yourself, perhaps you would not mind leaving me here for a few moments and ascertaining?"

"My dear sir, I shall have great pleasure, and while I am gone you can amuse yourself with looking at the newspaper—there it is. Now I'm off."

Glad enough, apparently, to get out of the shop, the barber darted through the door.

Tom was not likely to interest himself in the newspaper while things of so much importance to him were going on around, so, flinging it aside, he hastened also to the door, which he opened a very little way, so as to take a peep at the barber's proceedings.

That individual crossed the road rapidly, and entered the White Horse.

"He has gone to head quarters for his information certainly," was Tom Davis's mental observation. "What an extraordinary fellow; but what an intolerable nuisance he must be to old Matthew."

The barber was absent a long time—so long that Tom Davis's patience would have been put to a sore trial had it not been for the fact that the officers had not yet left, and he did not wish to enter the White Horse until they had.

At last, however, the barber, with his usual smirk upon his lips, came tripping across the road.

Tom no sooner saw him approaching than he resumed his seat, and pretended to be reading the paper very attentively.

"I've been a long time gone," the barber began, as soon as he appeared; "but, then, as you were kind enough to say you were in no hurry, I thought it would not matter."

"Oh, not in the least!" said Tom. "I have been very well interested during your absence."

"That's all right, then."

"But what have you learned?" inquired Tom, with some anxiety.

"Why, it seems the police are after a man who is suspected of being the author of several mysterious murders. The police got information that he was seen to enter the White Horse, and that he had not emerged again."

"But stay—did you not tell me that this landlord refused to hold out any protection to murderers?"

"Yes, certainly, and I made the remark as soon as I heard the particulars; but the officers are rather incredulous, so they have been all the morning searching from the cellar to the attic."

"And have they found him?"

"No, not even the ghost of a clue. Old Matthew takes it very coolly, declaring most positively that no one of the kind is in the house; but the officers take no notice of that, for they are well aware he would say just the same thing if the man they wanted was under their noses."

"He is really quite a remarkable character," said Tom Davis. "You interest me greatly; I really think I shall feel inclined to run across when I leave you just to have a peep at so extraordinary an individual."

"Oh, he is nothing much to look at," said the barber, "and I should not think so badly of him as I do but for one thing."

"And may I ask what that is?"

"Yes, he does not support his neighbours as he might. Instead of coming to me to be shaved he actually has the meanness to shave himself. Then, as for hair-dressing, he never requires it, for his head is about as bald as a head could be. He even does not patronise me by buying a wig," the barber added, in conclusion.

Tom Davis could not help feeling greatly amused at all he heard, and some more time still was spent in this kind of conversation.

The barber himself was never so happy as when he could get hold of some one who would listen patiently while he talked.

And so long after the operation of hair-dressing was over, Tom remained in the shop.

And yet it did not seem strange for him to do so, for his hand was on the knob of the door all the time, as if he was about to take his departure each moment.

At length, feeling anxious to see whether the officers had left, Tom passed out into the street again.

He glanced up and saw nothing of the officers, but he thought, after all, it would be more expedient if he allowed an hour or two to elapse before he paid his visit, so he walked briskly in the direction of the Strand, intending to while away his time somewhere else.

About an hour and a half afterwards he returned, and approached the White Horse as circumspectly as he could. He was rejoiced to find that the barber was not standing at his door, as he feared he would be, in which case he might have run across the road and entered at the same time, intending to take a friendly glass with him.

That, however, would by no means have answered Tom's purpose, so, with a feeling of great relief, he hastily crossed the threshold.

CHAPTER DCCCLVII.

IN WHICH TOM DAVIS AND OLD MATTHEW HOLD A CONSULTATION RESPECTING DICK TURPIN.

THERE was an air of quietude about the interior of the inn that seemed to tell Tom Davis at once that the officers had taken their departure.

With increasing confidence and ease, he made his way along the passage to the bar window.

Only a few people were sitting in the public-room, and they were conversing with each other in low tones, as if upon particular business of their own.

Tom Davis glanced all about him, but seeing no one who would observe his movements, he left the bar window and proceeded to the door, which he opened hastily, and as hastily closed after him.

Opposite was that door we have so frequently had occasion to mention, which communicated with old Matthew's private sitting-room.

Here Tom fully expected to find his old friend, so he opened this door also without ceremony.

His conjecture proved correct.

Seated at a table, on which was spread a repast of a very substantial character, was old Matthew.

The opening of the door caused him to look up, and no sooner did he see who had entered than he dropped his knife and fork and uttered an ejaculation.

"Why, bless and save us, Tom! is it you?"

"It is," was the answer, and, as he gave it, Tom closed the door quietly behind him.

"But what on earth brings you here to-day?" said old Matthew. "I'm glad to see you. Sit down, you are just in time for breakfast. I am rather late this morning; but those confounded officers have kept me hard at work."

"It is rather late," said Tom, seating himself as he had been desired, and thinking at the same time that the meal looked very much more like a dinner than a breakfast.

But old Matthew was a rare trencherman, as he knew very well.

"Now, Tom," he cried, "help yourself—don't be afraid; and then, while I finish, you can tell me what has brought you here to-day."

But Tom Davis only replied to this invitation by shaking his head.

"I can't eat, Matthew," he said, "or drink. Can it be possible that you do not know what has brought me here?"

"No. Why, what has happened—nothing serious, I hope?"

"My trust is that the report is without foundation," replied Tom Davis, "yet I can scarcely indulge in such a hope."

"What—what? Confound it, man, why don't you speak out?"

"Why, this morning, early, I heard that Dick Turpin had been captured and was confined in Newgate!"

This intelligence came upon old Matthew like a thunder clap, and in his astonishment he gave the chair on which he sat such a jerk that it went rolling along the floor on its castors until stopped by the wall.

"In Newgate?" he gasped, rising to his feet. "Ridiculous—impossible—nothing of the sort!"

Tom Davis drew a long breath.

"I am glad to hear it."

"Why, how on earth could such a report have reached your ears? If it was true, depend upon it I should have heard all about it long ago."

"So I should think," returned Tom Davis, who was beginning to feel more at ease. "However, Matthew, if you will have the patience to listen for a few minutes I will give you an account of the whole affair, from beginning to end."

"Proceed, then—I am all attention."

Thereupon, Tom described how Dick had taken his departure—how Black Bess had returned—how they had waited for him in vain, and at last, how the newsman had brought the intelligence.

"Well, it's very strange," said old Matthew, thoughtfully, and resting his head on his hand—"very singular indeed; but I have been away from home the last few days. Particular business, connected with a relative of mine, took me down to Dover. I started three days ago, and did not return until this morning, and when I did arrive I found my house all in the greatest confusion, for a party of police officers had taken it into their heads that I had secreted somebody or other. I was vexed, of course, to think the place should have been so overhauled during my absence; but yet my mind was easy, because I had no one concealed."

"Then," said Tom, beginning to look grave again, "it is quite possible that during your absence Dick's arrest may have been effected, and since you have returned home doubtless you have been in such a state of confusion and excitement that you have had no time to hear anything."

"Well, Tom, there may be something in that, and I am inclined to think there is; I should be more so but for one fact."

"What is that?"

"Why, I think it was only about the very last time he was here that Dick Turpin most positively assured me that he would die a thousand times rather than surrender."

"Yes—yes, I have heard him say the same thing often."

"Well, and Dick is invariably as good as his word, so therefore I think the intelligence, after all, must be untrue."

"I fervently hope so," said Tom Davis, "for I can assure you that his comrades are in the utmost consternation; and as for Maud, the shock was terrible, and when I left her she was only keeping herself up by the hope that I should bring back good news."

"Which I hope you will," said old Matthew. "But don't let us sit here any longer talking thus and remaining in suspense. If Dick is in Newgate, the fact will be easily ascertained, and quickly too; if he is not, you may depend he is well able to take care of himself."

"Yes, yes—I have no doubt about that; and I beg, Matthew, that you will, without any further delay, make the necessary inquiries."

"Will you go too?"

"No; if you have no objection, I would prefer to sit here until you return."

"It will perhaps be quite as well," replied Matthew, and as he spoke he took down his hat and changed his coat.

Just as he was about to quit the room the door was opened, and the girl who minded the bar in his absence said:

"You are wanted—now—in a moment."

Matthew just nodded to his old friend and passed into the bar.

At the window was the turnkey who had shown himself to be such a good friend to Turpin.

"You are Matthew Gale, I suppose?" he said.

"I am."

"Well, then, take this, and this, and I will wait here for your answer."

While speaking, the man handed over the letter and also the locket, both of which Matthew received with considerable surprise.

Hastily opening the letter, he glanced at its contents.

At the first word the expression of his countenance changed suddenly.

Turning round, he made his way into the inner room.

"It's true, Tom," he said, as he sank down into a chair—"true, Tom—every word of it. Just read that; I am so confused that I can't."

Tom Davis took the letter with a trembling hand, and, in a low, shaking voice, read what Turpin had written.

Until its perusal was finished, no word was spoken, and then, looking into Matthew's face, Tom said:

"Well, now, my friend, what do you think of that?"

"Think?" replied Matthew, wiping his forehead. "I hardly know what to think; it seems impossible. Just let me have a look at the letter, will you?"

Then, as if unable to believe his ears, he glanced rapidly over the sheet of paper.

"What can all this be about a locket?" he exclaimed. "Stay—here it is; let us look at it."

With some difficulty, he found out the means by which the locket was opened, and he gazed with great interest and attention upon the two portraits.

Tom Davis gazed also.

"I remember," he said—"I remember now. Dick told me all about it, and you will understand better if I make you acquainted with the facts."

In as few words as possible, Tom Davis then related to old Matthew Dick Turpin's peculiar adventure with the mysterious lady, to whom he had rendered such an important service, which she had requited him by the bestowal of the locket.

Old Matthew looked thoughtfully.

"That, then, accounts for Dick having surrendered himself. He must have great faith in it—more faith than I should like to put in anything."

"He has good reasons, rest assured," said Tom Davis. "I have every confidence in him. Now that I have read his letter, with all speed I shall hasten back to the Three Spiders, and to-night, in all probability, Tom King will seek his audience with the King."

Matthew shrugged his shoulders.

"It seems an impossibility to me!" he exclaimed. "How on earth can he hope to get an audience?"

"That I know not; I shall leave it to him. He is very cunning in all expedients; and if any person could succeed he would."

Old Matthew was silent.

"You may as well inform me, or ascertain, if you don't know, one fact that will save him some trouble, perhaps."

"What is that?"

"Why, whether the King is at St. James's or at Windsor."

"At Windsor, I believe. But before you go I will take care that there shall be no doubt upon this score."

"Who brought the letter? Where is he?"

"At the bar window," returned Matthew. "He looks to me like one of the warders of the prison."

"Then," suggested Tom Davis, "had we not better have him in here for a few moments, and get from him some personal information?"

"A good thought," replied old Matthew—"a very good thought; we'll have him in at once. It will be some satisfaction to know from some one who has seen him so lately just how Dick Turpin is."

CHAPTER DCCCLVIII.

DICK TURPIN CONTRIVES TO MAKE HIMSELF VERY UNCOMFORTABLE IN NEWGATE.

THE friendly jailer was at once called in, and a conversation of considerable length followed.

There was nothing in it, however, that deserves to be repeated, since the reader is already acquainted with such particulars as the turnkey was able to give.

Yet it was a very great satisfaction indeed both to Tom Davis and old Matthew Gale to hold conversation with a man who could tell them how Dick spoke and looked

"He is not very easy in his mind," the turnkey said; "but he will be all right when I return. You must understand this letter was written yesterday, soon after his arrival in Newgate. He gave it to me, and I promised to deliver it at once, but, unfortunately, was prevented from doing so until this morning."

"How so?"

"Why, quite unexpectedly, and at the last moment, the Governor set me on to some extra duty, which prevented me from leaving. I can assure you the captain's disappointment was very great when I took the first opportunity of returning to his cell and informing him of my failure. It was then just growing dark. He had been in the greatest suspense, fully expecting that I had taken the letter, and was wondering at my delay. However, I told him that he must wait until to-day."

"And I suppose you took the first opportunity to get away this morning?"

"I did."

"Well, then, when you return, tell him that no effort on our parts shall be wanting to secure his release, and if the locket fails, we shall adopt other means."

"I will be sure to tell him. Believe me," he added, earnestly, "you can fully trust me, and any further message you have to send you had better give to me verbally, and I will repeat it to him. There will then be no fear of the letter being lost or discovered."

"Good!" said old Matthew. "But at present that is all that I can think of to say."

"Except," added Tom Davis, "that we are all very anxious about him, Maud especially, and that I shall endeavour to calm her as well as I am able."

Soon after this the turnkey took his leave.

He was only allowed to be absent from the prison for a certain time, but, being a favourite of the Governor's, he was allowed indulgences of various kinds.

After he had gone, Tom Davis and old Matthew sat for some time in consultation.

At length the latter departed, in order to ascertain the whereabouts of the King.

This was information easy to be obtained.

In about half an hour old Matthew returned, saying:

"The King is at Windsor, though it is not known how soon he may leave the castle for London."

"That will do," said Tom. "It only shows what necessity there is for promptitude of action. I'll be off at once."

"It puzzles me exceedingly," said old Matthew, "and I shall be heartily glad to see him out of Newgate. That locket will have rare power indeed if it releases him, for I know how determined all the authorities are to secure him, if possible."

"Well, we shall see," added Tom Davis, who went on. "By-the-way, Matthew, there's one little circumstance I may as well mention to you, which is this: You have a neighbour opposite—a barber."

Matthew nodded.

"He is the most inquisitive fellow I ever met with, and his especial pleasure is to find out what is going on here."

"I know it," said old Matthew—"I know it very well. I have been waiting, hoping to catch him and put an end to his tricks. I shall do it some day, I know."

"Be careful, Matthew," continued Tom—"pray be careful! You don't know what mischief a man like that might do!"

"It is impossible to guess, and I am much obliged to you for the caution. I have had my eye upon him for a long time past."

"And now, Matthew," said Tom, "one word before I go. If anything particular occurs, you may rely upon seeing me here again very shortly, so don't be out of the way if you can possibly help it."

"I will not, you may depend. I feel quite as much concerned in this business as you do, and I shall keep my eyes open to pick up all the intelligence I can."

With this understanding the two friends parted.

Tom Davis would have left the inn by the front door, but old Matthew prevented him.

"No, no," he said—"you had better not go that way—the officers might see you. Come here—it will be better to pass through the stables."

Of the interior arrangements of the White Horse Tom Davis knew little except from hearsay, and his surprise was very great when Matthew took him out into the yard and led him into the secret stable that we have previously described.

From this, it will be recollected, there was a communication with the numberless streets lying between Drury Lane and Clare Market, and in which anyone might easily get out of sight.

Tom Davis glanced around as he emerged into the open air.

But, so far as he could tell, there were no police officers on the watch.

Taking a circuitous route, he made his way to the inn where he had left his horse.

As he hurried through the streets, he was surprised to find how late it was—the day was really drawing to a close.

Before he could reach Ealing, he felt tolerably certain night would be at hand, and, with the view of returning as hastily as possible, he made his horse put forth its best speed.

How he arrived the reader is already aware, and now the intelligence he carried is known also.

This leaves us at liberty to follow the turnkey back to Newgate.

As he had said, Dick's disappointment and vexation on the preceding night were very great indeed, and during the long hours of darkness he remained counting every minute as it passed, for his mind was in too feverish a state for sleep.

He was now awaiting, with the greatest impatience, the turnkey's return.

When he caught sight of him, one glance into his countenance was sufficient to assure him that the man had been successful.

"All's right, captain," said the turnkey, closing the door—"all's as right as you could wish!"

"That's a relief."

"No doubt."

"But begin at the beginning, and tell me, quietly and calmly, every little circumstance—do not spare one detail."

The turnkey complied, and, as he proceeded, Dick's composure and light-heartedness returned.

"Bravo!" he said. "I feel now like a free man! I have a presentiment that my longer stay in Newgate will be brief in the extreme!"

"I hope so, captain. And now, then, let me entreat you to partake of something. You have eaten nothing yet, and it may be necessary for you to keep up your strength."

"I am all right now," was the answer, "and can do justice to anything."

"That's the style, captain! You speak quite different now! Have patience for a short time only, and I will set such a dinner before you as would suit a prince!"

Dick smiled at him, and the man left.

A sensation of great faintness came over him immediately afterwards.

Now that relief was afforded to his mind, Nature asserted her supremacy.

Such a change as was perceptible in him would have astonished any beholder.

The turnkey was as good as his word.

In an incredibly short space of time, considering all the difficulties, a most excellent repast was brought in.

The fact must not be overlooked that in those days the discipline maintained inside a prison differed widely from that of the present day.

It is notorious that the greatest criminal, if he only had the means at command, could do almost what he liked, except to leave his cell.

It was a shame and disgrace that such a state of things should be permitted, but the abuse continued until long after the time of which we write.

Dick drew his chair up to the table eagerly.

"Now, captain," cried the turnkey, as he removed the covers, "if that does not tempt you, I'm a Dutchman! And here, look, are a couple of bottles of the best wine that can be obtained in London."

"We shall do rarely," said Dick. "I really think I never felt so hungry in my life."

"Lay on, then! I will wait upon you."

"No you won't!" said Dick. "You will sit down as well. You are my friend, and shall be treated as such."

The turnkey was nothing loth.

With a pleased expression in his eyes, he drew a stool up to the table, and for some moments there was a perfect silence—both were too busily engaged in doing duty to the good things before them to speak.

The wine was tapped, and proved to be indeed of the most excellent quality.

A sensation of calmness and satisfaction crept over Dick.

Glass after glass was drained, and, could any person have taken a peep into that particular cell in Newgate at that moment, they would have been struck with the greatest amazement.

Dick leaned back in his chair, as though perfectly content and at home.

"Upon my word, now," he exclaimed, "life in Newgate is not so bad, after all!"

"Not so bad!" repeated the turnkey. "And yet I expect you will be glad enough to leave it."

"I shall; for, no matter if its comforts were ten thousand times greater than they are, I should still be deprived of the greatest blessing of life, and that is liberty."

"Hush!" said the turnkey. "I can hear somebody coming. Who is it, I wonder?"

Both listened.

A step was heard without, and then the sound of a voice came to their ears, though the words uttered could not be distinguished.

"It's the Governor," cried the turnkey, in some alarm. "Confound him! What in the world does he want here? Where can I hide, I wonder? Oh, nowhere, of course!"

CHAPTER DCCCLIX.

MR. BRADBURY, THE GOVERNOR, CONVEYS A DISAGREEABLE MESSAGE TO DICK TURPIN IN HIS CELL.

One rapid glance round the cell was quite enough to make the turnkey aware that all attempts to conceal himself in it would be futile.

The only hiding-place, if it may be so called, was underneath the table, and the turnkey rather shrank from availing himself of it.

Dick was by no means disconcerted—he was just in the humour to be pleased with everything.

The heavy fastenings were slowly undone, and the door thrown open.

"Dear me!" exclaimed the Governor, sniffing the air as he entered—"dear me; what do I smell?"

"The good things of this earth," said Dick. "I am pleased to see you, Mr. Bradbury; had I known you were about to pay me a visit, I would have postponed my dinner so as to have had the pleasure of your company."

The Governor stared, as well he might.

The idea of his sitting down to dinner with a prisoner was a rich joke.

"You are making yourself comfortable, I see," he exclaimed; "but, then, I suppose, you think of your motto: A short life and a merry one."

"Yes, yes—begone dull care! Would you allow me the pleasure of taking wine with you, Mr Bradbury?"

"Bah! nonsense! Don't be a fool. If I wink at proceedings of this kind, it is only to show you how willing I am to do you any good turn for your promise not to make the attempt to escape."

"Yes, yes—I know that," replied Turpin. "I don't look as if I was breaking my word, do I?"

"You certainly do not, and I should not have looked in, only once a day I make it a practice of paying a visit to every cell, and I saw no reason why yours should be an exception."

"Certainly not, Mr. Bradbury—certainly not. I feel rather hurt to think you will not take wine with me. But, however, it don't matter, I won't bear you any grudge for it. Whenever you like to call I shall be proud and happy to see you."

Mr. Bradbury hardly knew whether to be amused or annoyed at this familiarity, and while in this state of hesitation his eye chanced to fall on the form of the turnkey.

"Oh, you are here, are you?" he cried. "What the devil do you mean by it? Is this attending to your duty?"

"Beg pardon, sir, if I've done wrong," said the turnkey, humbly, "but I'm off duty now, sir, so I thought there was no harm."

"Well, then, you thought wrong. Be off at once; I will not allow you to remain in any cell with the prisoner, mind that!"

The turnkey retired, glad enough to make his escape.

"Don't be hard on to him," cried Dick, "the fault is all my own. I tempted him with money first to get what he has brought, and then persuaded him to remain, for above all things in the world I do hate to dine alone."

The Governor drew a long breath.

"I have come across some strange characters in my time," he exclaimed—"very strange ones, but I'll be hanged if you don't beat them all! No one would believe that you were in the slightest bit of trouble."

"No more I am," was the reply, given with a smile. "I feel quite comfortable—never better in my life."

"Well, we shall see; but there's one thing I have invariably noticed."

"And what may that be, Mr. Governor?"

"Why, that those who carry things off with such a high hand and pretend to be so very game always show the white feather at the last."

"Then you will find I shall be an exception to your rule," said Turpin, with more earnestness than he had before made use of. "But something seems to tell me that we are destined to be much better friends than we are at present."

"Well, I don't know that. I have one piece of information to give you, which perhaps will make a change in your manner."

"May I inquire what it is?"

"Oh, certainly; I intended to tell you before I left. I suppose I need not remind you that, having once been tried and sentenced, that little formality will not have to be gone through again."

"Oh, indeed!" said Dick. "I was not certain. However, I am not sorry."

"Not sorry? Why, it would have given you a day or two longer to live. But the warrant that was sent here for your execution has been carefully preserved, and it has just been returned by the Secretary of State with a fresh endorsement upon it, thus saving a world of trouble."

Dick was silent.

"According to the instructions contained in it," continued the Governor, "your execution is appointed to take place on the third day from this at Tyburn. A very strong feeling is against you, and I have certain knowledge that the Secretary of State has determined at all risks and hazards the sentence shall be carried out. Newgate is watched in every part—not a mouse will leave it without being seen, so things look very awkward for you, though I must say you do well to make the best of what little time there is left."

"Yes," replied Dick, as calmly and unconcernedly as before. "If during the remainder of my stay here things go on as pleasantly as they have begun, I shall have nothing to grumble at. I shall be quite content."

The Governor shrugged his shoulders.

"Well, perhaps you are tired of your life; if you are not, I am at a loss to imagine why you should treat your coming death so coolly."

"That's not the reason, though perhaps you may know it ere long. On the third day from this, did you say?"

"Yes."

"Then that will be Friday."

"Exactly; and on Friday all the preparations at Tyburn will be made, and by this hour all will be over."

"So you think," answered Dick, significantly; "but time proves all things."

"A true proverb," said the Governor, "and it will prove that you are at the end of your career on that day, without you intend to break your word."

"I have no thoughts of doing so; but if I should resolve upon that course I will give you timely notice."

This seemed the best joke of all, and the Governor, after a few more words, left the cell.

When he had gone, Dick rose, and somewhat of a change came over his countenance.

"So soon," he said—"so soon. I have scarcely expected they would be so prompt. Tom, indeed, will have to be expeditious to perform his task, and the locket must be of rare efficacy if it liberates me. Well, well—time alone will show."

He paced the cell somewhat uneasily, endeavouring to picture to himself as best he might how his comrades were engaged at that time.

"I wonder if they know the time is so short?" he muttered, pausing before the window; "if so, Tom would start to-night; if not, he might delay, and the delay would perhaps be fatal. But away with these gloomy forebodings, I will hope and trust for the best!"

So saying, he folded his arms and continued to gaze out at the little bit of sky visible through the grated window of his cell.

He continued to watch until it gradually darkened and darkened in colour, and until the faint glittering stars appeared.

Then he knew that night had come.

More anxiously than on the preceding night did he continue to watch.

His brain was all the time occupied in suggesting to him what his comrades might be doing.

He would have given much could he but have obtained one peep at their proceedings.

That, however, was impossible, and so, in uncertainty and suspense, the time passed away.

How long he sat there he knew not, but at last exhausted nature gave way, and he sank off into a deep and dreamless slumber, from which he did not awake until he heard some one removing the fastenings of his door.

He started hastily and opened his eyes.

To his astonishment he discovered it was daylight.

"Have I indeed slept so long?" he murmured. "Well, it is better, so the night is gone. I wonder now whether Tom King has been successful, and if he has, whether the locket will produce the desired effect?"

Just then the door was opened, and the friendly turnkey entered.

"I will not let them know I am so anxious," Dick thought. "I will assume a carelessness of demeanour, even though I feel it not; the only thing that I can do is to wait with patience, and in the meantime make myself as comfortable as I can."

"Breakfast, captain," said the turnkey, entering—"and a rare good breakfast it is. I hope you will do justice to it."

"Put it down," said Dick, "and help yourself."

"No, no, captain—I must not. The Governor is a strange man, and I know how to deal with him. It vexed him to see me here last night. I don't wish to get him at all angry, and so it will be best for me to comply with his wishes. Of course, if he liked he could prevent me from paying my visits altogether, which would be a bad thing for both of us, I think."

"You shall be the best judge," said Dick, "in that. I leave it entirely to you."

"Then I am off, captain; when I can leave the prison I will slip off to Drury Lane. I may be able to pick up something you would like to hear."

"Very likely" said Dick—"very likely."

With these words the turnkey left, and Dick sat down to the table.

But in reality he had but little appetite.

Now that the time grew closer he grew more and more doubtful respecting the virtues of the locket, and he was troubled as well by the statement the Governor had made respecting the vigilant manner in which the prison was guarded.

He was conscious that, should the locket fail, nothing could save him from an ignominious death on the morrow.

CHAPTER DCCCLX.

TOM KING, CLAUDE DUVAL, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK SET OUT FOR WINDSOR CASTLE.

Having taken such a calm survey of his own very perilous condition, Dick Turpin might indeed feel anxious in the extreme.

But there were others who fully shared that anxiety with him.

To make all clear, however, we must now go back to the moment when Tom Davis arrived at the Three Spiders Inn.

He was besieged at once with a multitude of questions; but, raising his hand, he said:

"If you will all be silent I will tell you everything, from beginning to end, and by this means much time will be saved."

It may perhaps be imagined with what amount of interest the highwaymen, and Maud, and Ellen listened to his recital.

Maud, learning for certain that Dick was in Newgate, gave vent to a passionate burst of grief; for, inspired by the words Tom Davis had uttered ere he left, she had hoped on to the last, and believed that he was free.

Davis, however, tried to make things look as bright as possible, and produced the locket.

Great as was the interest his narrative had excited, yet it was as nothing to that which they felt while gazing upon this little trinket.

The King's features were well known to them all, but not so those of the lady.

"It's a very strange business, truly," said Tom King, after Davis had informed him that it was Dick's wish he should deliver the locket—"a very strange business; but, yet I hope everything will turn out successfully."

"It is our only hope," said Tom Davis; "and before I left I took good care to inquire where the King was staying. He is at Windsor, though it is not known how soon he may leave."

"Then," replied Tom, "there can be no doubt that the best thing we can do is to start off at once; any delay might prove of the greatest consequence."

"Yes, although he did not mention it, Dick no doubt wishes the locket to be delivered immediately; and besides, the sooner we know the result the better prepared we shall be to act, and the more time we shall have in case of any emergency."

"Very true," said Tom King. "It is fortunate our horses are all so fresh as they are; the journey to Windsor will be performed easily and rapidly."

"You will let us accompany you?" said Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack. "You cannot tell what aid and assistance you may require."

"I cannot. If you had not spoken then I was just about to ask you to accompany me."

"But," said Tom Davis, with a little hesitation, "I don't like to raise up obstacles and to throw cold water on your plans, but yet I should very much like to know by what means you hope to gain access to the King?"

Tom shrugged his shoulders.

"I shall be guided entirely by circumstances and my good luck. If they fail me I have no other guide."

With a great effort Maud wiped aside her tears, and, advancing towards Tom King, looked him earnestly in the face, as she said:

"In pity and mercy let me know your inmost thoughts. Do you really believe that this locket will procure Dick's liberation?"

Tom paused ere he replied.

Then, in a voice of great earnestness, he said:

"You must remember, that the service Dick rendered to the person who gave him this locket was a very important one indeed, and, thinking over all the circumstances, I don't believe that such a gift would have been proffered had it not been felt at the time that it was all powerful."

"You really think it, Tom?"

"I do, indeed."

"Then," she said, "I will master my grief and hope on."

"Do, do—perhaps ere another twenty-four hours elapse the captain will once more be amongst us."

"Hasten—hasten," said Tom Davis; "night is closing in, and you have a long ride before you; if you like, I will begin to get the horses ready."

He did not wait for any answer, but left the inn at once.

The three highwaymen looked carefully to their weapons, provided themselves with ammunition, and also took with them a few other articles which they fancied might be required in the course of the night's adventure.

This done, they said farewell to Maud and Ellen, and hastened to the stables, where they found the horses nearly ready.

Tom Davis glanced around him, and finding only the highwaymen were near, said:

"I feel very, very uneasy, I can assure you."

"What about?"

"Why, that locket."

"In what respect?"

"Why, don't you happen to know that Windsor Castle is always well guarded by a strong force of military, and more especially when the King happens to be there? By what means do you hope to pass the sentinels?"

Tom drew a long breath.

"It will be an awkward job, I am afraid," he replied, at length; "but yet, if courage, coolness, and stratagem will effect our purpose, rely upon it we shall succeed."

"Well, I leave you to it," said Tom Davis. "You are more used to getting yourselves out of scrapes than I am, and perhaps you will be able to think of something that I should not."

"That is very likely indeed," said Tom King. "And now farewell! You may expect us at daybreak, if we meet with success; if not, we shall remain somewhere close at hand, on the watch for another opportunity."

With these words, Tom sprang into the saddle.

His companions had already mounted, and they stealthily took their departure through the plantation.

On the present occasion, Tom King was, to all intents and purposes, the leader of the expedition, so, without saying a word upon the subject, Claude and Jack placed themselves slightly in the rear, prepared to follow wherever he might lead.

Tom's brain was too busy to permit of speech; moreover, the rapid pace at which they were going would have made conversation very difficult.

He had resolved at once upon the route he intended to take, and, having crossed the Thames, he took off across the open country, thus materially diminishing the distance to his destination.

There was another reason for this course, which was that they were now scarcely likely to meet with an interruption of any kind, whereas, had they kept on the high-road, they might have encountered some of the numerous bodies of police that they knew were on the watch for them.

There was only once that the highwaymen paused, and that was at a small roadside inn situated about halfway.

They were attracted to it by a dim light that was shining from one of the windows.

The clatter of their horses' hoofs as they drew up in front caused the landlord and the ostler to make their appearance.

"Will you alight, gentlemen?" said the former. "There's every accommodation."

"No, no," returned Tom King, hurriedly—"we cannot stay! A little hay and water for our horses is all we want, and while they are eating it we will take a draught of your best October ale."

"Very good, gentlemen."

The stay here did not occupy many minutes, yet both horses and riders felt much refreshed by it, and in better tune for performing the remainder of the journey.

With undiminished speed they galloped on, until by the faint light of the new moon they perceived in the distance the massive tower of Windsor Castle and the vast expanse of forest all around it.

Great circumspection was now required in all their movements, but, with a boldness that was somewhat surprising, Tom kept on in a straight line for the castle.

"I wish we had had the opportunity of reconnoitring," he said, slackening his speed at the same time. "Our task would then have been so much easier. Now I can scarcely tell how we are to discover which is the weakest point of the defences."

"Let us draw a little closer," said Claude Duval—"we shall be better able to judge then."

In a few minutes afterwards, they found themselves in a position that afforded them a view of a considerable portion of the castle, and here, concealed by the shadow cast by some huge trees, they paused.

For some moments not a word was spoken—all had their gaze fixed upon the building before them.

"And so that is Windsor Castle?" muttered Tom King at length. "I have never been so near it before."

"Nor I," said Claude Duval. "But there's one thing that strikes me very forcibly."

"What's that?"

"Why, supposing you should get over the difficulty of effecting an entrance, how should you manage, in so vast a building, to find the King?"

Tom shrugged his shoulders.

"There is time enough to think about that when I get inside," he said. "It's foolish to burden the mind with too much."

"Yes, I agree with you there. But then, suppose the King should be in some part of the castle remote from the point at which you may enter, and that you may be so fortunate as to guess the route, how far do you think you could proceed without being seen by some one who would know immediately that you were an intruder?"

"There are too many supposes, Claude," said Tom, with a light laugh, "but I know what you mean. The difficulty of getting inside the building is almost insurmountable, and you wished to remind me that when that was done much would still lie before me to be accomplished."

"That is precisely what I meant."

"Well," said Tom, "just let me get inside. If I can do that, I shall have great hopes of performing my mission. Let us draw a little closer."

"Be cautious," said Sixteen-String Jack, "or we may be seen."

"All right! Tread as silently as you can."

Slowly and with extreme caution the highwaymen drew somewhat closer to the royal residence, and this they were enabled to do unperceived, in consequence of the huge trees that were growing everywhere.

At last they saw before them a wall, the height of which might be twelve feet or rather more.

Beyond that appeared to be a garden, and further on still the walls of the castle itself.

As soon as he perceived it, Tom said:

"That looks a favourable point at which to make the attempt. What say you, comrades?"

"That wall might easily be surmounted, certainly," they said. "But then, that is not all. Look—what do you think of that?"

Tom looked, and then, round an angle in the wall, he saw a soldier come in sight.

The mechanical manner in which he walked a certain number of paces, and then turned round and walked back again, showed that he was a sentinel.

CHAPTER DCCCLXI.

TOM KING GETS ONE STEP NEARER TO THE ACCOMPLISHMENT OF HIS PURPOSE.

BREATHLESSLY the highwaymen watched the dusky figure of the sentinel, until he disappeared round the angle of the wall.

Even after that they did not venture to move or speak.

At length, in a faint whisper, Tom said:

"Remain where you are, perfectly still. Let us notice how long a time will elapse before he comes in sight again."

They waited, and from the duration of his absence, they guessed that he had a tolerably long walk to perform.

When he had disappeared round the corner for the second time, Tom said:

"Follow me. We will see where he goes to, and what he does."

With greater caution than ever, they slowly made their way from the trees, until they performed the end they intended.

The wall was still before them, only in this place it seemed to be somewhat higher.

It required a piercing glance to make out the figure of the sentinel.

But at last they perceived him at some distance.

Then he paused, and he was seen to be joined by another.

A salutation of some kind was exchanged, and they turned again.

"Well, now," said Tom King, "the question is, would there be time for me to climb over the wall while this sentinel is at the further end of his beat?"

"I think not," said Claude. "In my opinion, you would most certainly be seen."

"Then what is to be done?"

"Wait awhile, I think, and endeavour to comprehend our position a little better than we do at present; all around us is so very strange."

They were silent, for the sentinel now was very near to them.

Following his movements they perceived something which else would probably have escaped their notice.

This was a sentry-box placed against the wall, near the corner of it, and here the soldier stood for a short time, then resumed his monotonous duty.

"It seems to me," whispered Sixteen-String Jack, "that the best plan to adopt will be to seize the soldier and gag him, then get over the wall."

"But," objected Tom, "the other sentinels would notice that he did not perform his march as usual, and the alarm would be raised."

"I don't know that. Supposing that I put on some of his accoutrements and acted sentinel, how then?"

"That's a better idea, and it will be perhaps possible to carry it out successfully. But how about that relief of the guard—what should you do then?"

Jack was puzzled.

"I'll tell you what it is," said Claude, "I have hit upon it at last. No doubt the men are changed every two hours. We must wait until the change takes place, then one of us, whoever happens to be most like the soldier, will personate him, while you will know then that you have two hours clear before you to perform your task."

"I think that would be the best," said Tom King—"at any rate, we will think over it until the guard is changed, and then, should anything better be thought of, why, we will try to carry it into execution."

This being agreed upon, the highwaymen all became silent and still.

It was fortunate that they thought about the change of the guard, for in a few moments afterwards they were startled by hearing the rattling of a drum.

After that there was a silence, and then they perceived a small body of men advancing.

The sentinel stopped at once.

They came towards him. One of its number took his place; he fell in with the remainder, and they passed on.

The highwaymen watched all these proceedings with the greatest possible amount of attention.

The changing of the guard occupied but a very short space of time, and then Jack, touching Tom on the arm, said quietly:

"Now then, comrades, what say you? Shall we make the effort or not? Now is the time, or never."

"I can think of nothing else so likely to achieve success," was Tom King's reply.

"Then let it be done."

"Be cautious, then—we must pounce upon the sentinel, and seize him in a moment, taking care that he has not time to utter the faintest cry, otherwise there will be an immediate alarm."

"It is not so very difficult," said Jack. "We will leave our horses here, and as soon as the sentinel turns the corner we will dart across and stand in the shadow of the sentry-box; then, as soon as he appears, let one of us place a hand upon his mouth, and the others hold him tightly."

"Yes," said Claude Duval, "the whole thing must be accomplished with speed and silence."

Another moment elapsed, and then the sentinel again disappeared from view.

As they had arranged, the highwaymen started forward.

The distance they had to go was insignificant, and, to their great satisfaction, they reached the shadow of the sentry-box without having caused the slightest alarm.

They now stood in readiness to seize the soldier directly he turned the corner.

They listened, and could hear his regular heavy footstep as he marched on.

Little did that sentinel think that he was about to be dealt with in so summary a manner.

He had been long at his present duty, and had never met with anything to vary the dull routine of it.

He was therefore wholly and entirely unprepared for what took place.

The highwaymen took the opportunity.

While Claude, darting forth, placed one hand immediately before the soldier's mouth, Jack seized him from behind, and Tom King, standing in front, with his sword drawn, said, in a threatening whisper:

"Move hand or foot—struggle, or attempt to speak—and you die!"

The man was so thoroughly taken aback by what had occurred that he was unable to move a limb.

He only stared at Tom King with eyes stretched wide open by astonishment.

With great dexterity, Sixteen-String Jack stripped off the upper portion of the soldier's uniform, Tom King, by threats, compelling him to surrender each article quietly.

When this operation was over, Sixteen-String Jack bound him tightly, and then, by means of a piece of rope doubled and twisted, gagged him most effectually.

This was managed by introducing the rope into his mouth like a bit, and tying it tightly at the back of his head.

It was possible for him to make a very faint sound, but it was so faint that it was not worth troubling about.

Perfectly helpless, he was now carried by Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval, and placed inside the sentry-box.

"I will take his place," said Claude—"it will be better, for you know I have had a little military training, and he appears to be about my height."

"Agreed!"

Claude hastily put on the soldier's uniform and picked up his musket.

"Hush!" he said, and before his companions could utter another word he marched off along the wall.

Some little time had of course been occupied by these proceedings, still it was not long—no longer, really, than a sentinel might have paused near his box had he chosen to do so.

But Claude was anxious not to be too long, and so he marched forward with a confident step.

Reaching the end of his beat, he found himself face to face with another soldier.

"All's well!" said the other sentinel, turning round.

"All's well!" replied Claude, supposing that to be the proper salutation.

He turned hastily round when he spoke, and marched off.

The other stopped abruptly.

"Well, that's odd," he said—"that sounds quite like a strange voice; and yet it can't be—it is my fancy."

These words just reached Claude's ears, and he thought to himself how necessary it would be to be careful when he returned to that point of his beat again.

Reaching the sentry-box, he said to his companions:

"Over with you, and be quick about it. Leave me here—I shall be all right!"

"Are you sure?"

"Yes, yes—don't trouble yourselves on my account. I shall hold my position so long as it is tenable, and when it ceases to be so I shall make a run for my horse."

"Do so—do so. On no account suffer yourself to be made a prisoner."

"I will not. And now I must leave you—it will not do to halt too often, or perhaps suspicion may be aroused."

Claude marched on as before, imitating the movements of the real sentinel very well indeed.

Tom King looked up and wondered how the wall was to be surmounted.

The sentry-box at once suggested itself to him, but it was a difficult thing to mount upon it, as there was neither hand nor foothold, and a little thing would turn it over completely.

They waited until Claude came back again.

As soon as they explained their difficulty, he said:

"Well, I will stand on this side and press against it with all my might, then you mount as well as you are able; when once on the top of the sentry-box the remainder will be easy."

"I could mount with Jack's assistance," said Tom, "if he would bend his back; but then I don't see how Jack is to accompany me, and really after all, I think there is no necessity for it. No, no; Jack, if you are willing, I will leave you here?"

[CLAUDE DUVAL PERSONATES THE SENTINEL, AND TOM KING SCALES THE WALL.]

"Just as you please, Tom; you have the command in this enterprise, though, of course, I should prefer to be with you."

"No, no—one is less likely to be seen than two. Come, Jack, bend your back and I will return with all possible speed."

Jack bent his back as desired.

Tom stepped upon it, and in this position was able to gain the top of the sentry-box.

Here he drew himself up carefully until he could look over the top of the wall, being careful not to raise his head any higher than he could avoid.

As he expected, some gardens, very beautifully laid out, were on the other side, and his eyes quickly roamed over the enclosure, in order to ascertain whether any persons were near or not.

All, however, was perfectly silent and dark, so, with a sudden spring, he swung himself clear over the wall. Then, hanging at arms'-length, dropt gently upon the soft earth below.

So rapidly and cleverly was the feat performed that, unless some person had been looking very carefully at that part of the wall at that precise moment, he could not have been seen.

Claude resumed his march, and Tom King remained standing just where he had dropped, and wondering what should be his next proceeding.

CHAPTER DCCCLXII.

TOM KING FINDS HIS PERILS AND DIFFICULTIES INCREASE AT EVERY STEP.

Gazing through the trees, the first thing that attracted his attention was a blaze of light, proceeding from what appeared to be the range of windows on the ground floor of the castle.

Strains of music, too, came faintly upon his ears, and therefore it was easy to conjecture that some scene of festivity was going on within.

The point, however, upon which Tom felt the greatest amount of uneasiness and which made him hesitate to move was whether there existed an inner circle of sentinels.

If this should prove to be the case, how should he contrive to pass them?

The gardens themselves, however, were so very dark and silent, that Tom felt great hopes of being able to creep forward unperceived, even if anyone should be on the watch.

This, the more he reflected, seemed unlikely, for, judging by appearances, this was some private portion of the grounds into which no one would be permitted to intrude.

Using as much caution, however, as he would have done had he felt quite certain that sentinels were near, Tom King crept slowly in the direction of the lights.

In a short time he was able to see them distinctly.

The range of windows that was illuminated was a very long one.

The music had ceased, but now it burst forth again with a sudden crash, and even as it did so some doors were thrown wide open.

Tom glanced keenly through the portal, and as he did so he saw a crowd of persons of both sexes elegantly and brilliantly attired.

Some were in the spacious hall, and others descending a staircase; evidently they were all about to issue forth into the grounds.

Perceiving this, Tom crouched down as low as he could behind a huge tree, trusting that its shelter would conceal him.

From this position he watched the approach of the glittering throng.

The threshold was crossed, the broad flight of steps descended, and then, amid the silence that prevailed, he could hear the low murmur of courtly conversation, and occasionally the faint sound of laughter.

The number of guests who thus poured forth into the garden surprised Tom beyond measure.

They dispersed themselves over every part of it, and he began to feel very doubtful whether he would be able to remain concealed where he was without being discovered by some one.

Then a bold and fresh thought darted into his mind.

He felt surprised that this thought had not occurred to him before.

It was no other than to quit his place of concealment and mingle with the crowd.

Among so many his presence could scarcely be noticed.

Most certainly there would be many who were strangers to each other, and might not be pass for one of the strangers?

The only difficulty was about his costume, which was by no means in keeping with that of the gentlemen around.

Still, in the gardens it was dark, and even this might escape notice.

At any rate, it would be better, he thought, to stand up boldly than to remain so evidently in hiding.

Scarcely had the idea crossed his mind than, without reflecting much upon it, he proceeded to carry it into effect.

Lightly knocking from his clothes the dust that was upon them, he stepped forth with all the boldness in the world on to one of the well-kept footpaths.

The success he met with was something far beyond his expectations.

Several glances were cast upon him, it is true, but no one ventured to accost him, or, so far as he could tell to make any remark as to his appearance.

But time was passing rapidly on; there was the necessity for urgent speed, and, delightful as the gardens were, Tom by no means wished to linger in them.

"Surely," he thought, "this would be a favourable opportunity for gaining the interior of the castle."

At any rate, he resolved to try it, especially when he perceived that many of the guests, tired of their promenade in the open air, were rapidly returning.

Surely he might drift in with the crowd; and it seemed to him that, once beneath the roof of the royal building, the remainder would be easy.

Not without considerable trepidation—for he knew how much depended upon his actions—Tom King directed his steps towards the spacious doorway.

Several were before him, several behind him, laughing and chatting gaily.

He was now, however, in the full blaze of the light, and he could scarcely refrain from shrinking a little.

Assuming all the boldness and confidence he possibly could, however, he strode on.

Two domestics in gorgeous livery were standing at each side of the doorway, and when Tom fairly crossed the threshold and passed them he drew a long breath of relief—he considered it was such a good omen of future success.

Drifting with the tide of persons, he was carried along the corridor towards another door that stood wide open.

Congratulating himself mentally, Tom King walked on, every step increasing the amount of confidence he already felt.

Suddenly, however, he felt a light touch on his arm.

He affected to disregard it, but it was repeated, and this time more unmistakably.

Glancing round, he found himself face to face with an elderly gentleman, who was splendidly attired, and who carried in his hand a long white wand.

"Excuse me," he said, somewhat abruptly, and yet from sheer force of habit making a bow while he spoke—"excuse me, but I have not the honour of your acquaintance—your features are quite unfamiliar. May I trouble you to produce your card of invitation?"

Tom smiled and endeavoured to look indifferent.

"My card of invitation?" he said. "Well, that's amusing. I have not one."

"Indeed?" said his interrogator. "That is strange; but you treat this matter lightly. By what right do you intrude?"

"The best," said Tom King, boldly. "I come here on secret service, and my business is with the King himself."

"With his Majesty?" said the other, involuntarily taking two or three paces backwards.

"Even so," said Tom; "and if you will do me the favour of showing me into his presence at once I shall be obliged to you. I was looking everywhere for you when I felt you touch my arm."

An expression of perfect bewilderment now came over the old gentleman's countenance, as he ejaculated:

"Step this way—step this way."

Tom obeyed without hesitation, and soon found himself in a little ante-room.

"Now, sir," said his guide, "just let us come to an understanding. Who can you be, so ignorant of the usuages of the court? What do you mean by saying that you come here on secret service?"

"Simply what I say," returned Tom; "and let me assure you it is important that I should be immediately ushered into the presence of his Majesty."

"Is it upon business?"

"Certainly—urgent, pressing business."

"Then it is not his Majesty you wish to see, but his secretary. Come this way."

"No, you mistake," said Tom King; "my business is with the King only."

"Well, well, this way," said the other, impatiently—"this way, I say. I am wanted elsewhere. How on earth you came to be admitted to the castle I am at a loss to imagine."

To this speech Tom made no reply.

He considered that he was making much better progress than he could possibly have anticipated.

He followed willingly enough in the old gentleman's footsteps.

The little ante-room communicated with a larger apartment, and beyond that there was another and another, until Tom began to grow tired of his long walk.

All at once his guide tapped at a door, which was immediately opened.

Admittance was allowed, and Tom found himself in the presence of a very plainly-dressed, middle-aged man, who was seated at a table.

Before him were a quantity of letters and other documents, with which he seemed to be busily engaged.

"This gentleman," said Tom's guide, "I found among the guests. He says he comes here upon secret service, and desires to see the King."

So saying, he abruptly left, and his Majesty's private secretary looked at him inquiringly.

"Secret service?" he said. "What secret service?"

"Excuse me," said Tom, bowing and speaking with the utmost respect, "but I assure you my business is with his Majesty, and his Majesty alone."

"But," said the secretary, half-angrily, "do you not know that nothing can reach the ears of his Majesty except through myself? Speak on, and let me know what your business is without any further delay. I have no time to waste."

"I regret very much to decline," said Tom King, "but I again most positively assure you that the business is of so private and personal a nature that I can only communicate it to his Majesty himself."

"Bah!—nonsense! I know all his Majesty's private business; and let me hear this—be quick! If you refuse, you will have to go as you came; it is quite impossible for you to see the King—you might know that."

Tom King hesitated.

He was puzzled how to act.

Should he indeed trust his message with this man? Should he confide the locket to him and await the result?

No. Tom made up his mind instantly.

Had not Dick Turpin positively enjoined him to place the locket in the hands of no one but the King himself?

There must be no circumlocution.

"It vexes me exceedingly," he said, addressing the secretary, "to appear so pertinacious; but believe me again when I say that not even to you can I confide my business."

"Then," said the secretary, "I will have you arrested! Ten to one it is some bold, audacious attempt to assassinate the King. Your story about secret service must be a mere subterfuge. Here, guard—guard!"

He shouted out the last words at the top of his voice, and even while he did so he struck his hand upon a bell that stood upon the table before him, and which no doubt was an additional summons for immediate assistance.

CHAPTER DCCCLXIII.

TOM KING BECOMES SOMEWHAT ALARMED AT HIS POSITION, BUT MEETS WITH AN UNEXPECTED SURPRISE.

THESE energetic proceedings on the part of the King's private secretary were so sudden and so unexpected that for a few seconds Tom King was half bewildered, and scarcely knew how to act.

The sound of hasty footsteps in the corridor served to arouse him from his state of indecision.

With one bound he reached the door.

It was his intention to secure it effectually.

But the only fastening he could perceive consisted of a small brass bolt.

This he slipped rapidly into its socket, and, when he turned again, he saw that the secretary had hastened to one of the windows, which he threw open, while he again cried:

"Guard—guard! Here—a spy—a traitor! Guard—guard!"

Tom King sprang towards him as he cried,

"Silence—silence, or your life! Once more I demand to see the King"

But the secretary only continued his vociferations in a louder key than ever.

Finding remonstrance of no avail, and hearing on the massive panels of the door a succession of heavy knocks, Tom King doubled up his fist, and the next thing of which the secretary was conscious was that he was lying in a decidedly damaged condition underneath one of the tables.

It so happened that this table was covered with a long crimson cloth, so that when he rolled under it he vanished completely from sight.

All hope of Tom King keeping his presence in the castle a secret was now at an end.

The first thing he had to do was to secure his own safety.

How this could be done was more than he could tell, yet he resolved to suffer anything rather than abandon the task of delivering the locket to the King.

The blows on the outside of the door now much increased in violence, and there could be no doubt that those without were endeavouring to force an entrance.

One glance round the chamber was given by Tom King.

Then, finding there was no other door save the one by which he had entered and at which the soldiers of the guard were doubtless now standing, he turned again towards the window.

It was very dark outside.

But below him he could just distinguish some of the shrubs and plants in the garden.

The distance to jump was somewhat alarming, but, then, Tom was aware that the soil was soft, and would serve most materially to break the force of his fall.

Without further delay, then, he jumped through the window, and, as he had fully anticipated, alighted on the soft mould in safety.

As soon as he had recovered his feet, however, and took a glance around him, he saw lights flashing through the gardens in various directions, and he could hear voices shouting to each other.

Almost at the same moment a party of soldiers made their appearance at the window through which he had just escaped, and in loud tones they called upon those who were in the garden to search narrowly for the intruder.

Tom felt very anxious and distressed.

If his own safety was all he had to care about, it would have been a very different matter.

The question was, would it be possible for him to find some place of hiding that would serve to conceal him from the close search that was about to be made?

He shook his head while asking himself the question.

Such a thing seemed very far from likely.

Close to where he stood, however, was one of the winding gravel-paths which spread like a net-work over the entire gardens.

On each side it was planted with some kind of prickly shrubs of a very ornamental character, and growing to a great height from the ground, but as impenetrable and as insurmountable as a high brick wall.

There was something of a very private and secluded character about this path.

It was plunged in total darkness, and it seemed to Tom that it offered him by far the best chance of concealing himself.

Without further consideration, he turned down it, and ran hastily forwards for some distance.

Despite the darkness, he was able to follow its windings and turnings tolerably well.

All at once he came to a sudden stop, and a cold perspiration began to break out upon his forehead, for he feared that he had taken a wrong step, and had fallen into a trap.

At the extremity of the path he had been pursuing was a conservatory, from the glass windows of which Tom could see rare plants growing in great luxuriance and beauty.

But in honour of the festival that had that night been celebrated, this conservatory had been prettily lighted up by a number of coloured lamps suspended either from the ceiling or from the branches of the ornamental trees.

The effect of these coloured lights was to shed an amount of illumination around resembling twilight.

To venture into this conservatory, Tom felt would be madness, for the probability was that such a place would be much resorted to by the guests.

He tried to turn either to the right or to the left, but found this impossible, owing to the density of the prickly vegetation.

"I will retreat," he muttered—"retreat while there is yet time. Perhaps I may manage to reach the end of this path again without encountering anyone; if so, I shall esteem myself fortunate."

He started to run, but quickly reduced his pace to a stealthy, cautious walk, for on the other side of the hedge—if we may so call it—he could hear the voices of those who were in search of him, and at times catch a glimpse of the lights they carried.

That every nook and corner in the castle gardens would be narrowly searched there could be no doubt, and if Tom King could only discover some place which had once been thoroughly examined, that would afford him the best chance of concealment.

This idea was passing through his mind, as, with long, stealthy, almost noiseless footsteps, he took his way towards the entrance of the path.

In a few moments he perceived it before him.

Impatient to extricate himself from so unpleasant a position, he increased his speed.

But the next moment, while scarcely able to repress a cry of vexation, he paused.

Round the corner came several persons.

Owing to the darkness, he could only perceive them indistinctly, and could not make out who and what they were.

Most probably, however, they formed part of the detachment of soldiers who were searching for him.

With rather rapid steps they came walking down the path, and now Tom found himself in a very critical position indeed.

If he remained where he was, or if he advanced, detection was quite certain, while, if he retreated and took refuge in the conservatory, it was very doubtful whether he would remain unfound.

This last course, however, was the only reasonable one that he could adopt, so, with all possible speed consistent with the requisite silence, he turned round, and retraced his steps.

"If I had only been a moment sooner," he murmured, "or if I had only known that I could not leave this pathway, how much better a chance I should have had of concealing myself! Now it seems almost impossible."

But the remembrance of the perilous position in which Dick Turpin stood, and that upon his exertions that night no doubt depended the captain's life, made a wonderful difference to his actions and to his daring also.

When he reached the door of the conservatory, he knew that speed was the principal thing required: therefore, with marvellous haste, he turned the knob and entered.

The door was furnished with a spring, and so closed of itself the moment he passed through it.

The atmosphere was warm and heavily laden with the perfume of a thousand rare and curious flowers, which had been brought there at great expense from every corner of the world.

He was much rejoiced to find that the conservatory was perfectly silent, and the peculiar stillness in the air told him that no human beings were at that moment beneath its roof.

Almost the first object on which his eyes rested was one that offered at least a chance of hiding himself.

It was a magnificent shrub, or, rather, a dwarf tree, for its height was a little under ten feet.

It was, however, from its tops to its roots one mass of long, shining leaves, much resembling blades of grass, only many hundred times as large.

Growing thus from the top, and falling quite down, they bore no slight resemblance to a fountain, and they were so thick and so close together, and overlapped one another to such a degree, that Tom felt confident they would hide him from the view of anyone unless the leaves were drawn aside.

There was little time for him to consider whether he should avail himself of this place of shelter, or whether he should seek for some other.

Already he fancied he could hear the approach of footsteps on the gravel-path without.

Hastily and yet carefully, so as not to disarrange anything, and so leave a trace of his presence, Tom pressed some of the long leaves apart, and, stepping up to the huge wooden flower-pot in which the singular tree was growing, was in a moment completely lost to sight.

He turned round, settling himself into as easy and comfortable an attitude as he possibly could, for he knew how necessary it would be for him to remain quite still and without feeling the inclination to shift his position.

Scarcely had this been done than the door of the conservatory was opened.

Tom's heart beat rapidly and painfully.

He could scarcely bring himself to think that he was in anything like a secure position.

If he was properly searched for he would beyond a doubt be found.

But hearing that the low murmur of voices followed the opening of the door, and that the persons, whoever they might be, entered quietly, and not as he anticipated the soldiers would, Tom very carefully parted the leaves just sufficiently to allow him to take a glimpse of what was going on outside.

His first sensation was that of astonishment, followed quickly by delight, succeeded, however, by one of vexation.

The reason for this was that his eyes rested upon the form of his Majesty King George II.

Tom recognised him in a moment, for in happier times he had seen him frequently.

He noticed that the King looked a trifle older, and thinner, and careworn than he did when last he saw him, but that was all.

CHAPTER DCCCLXIV.

IN WHICH TOM KING OVERHEARS A CONVERSATION BETWEEN THREE MEMBERS OF THE ROYAL FAMILY.

Well might Tom King be both astonished and delighted at the occurrence of such a fortunate incident as this.

Who would have thought that one of the persons he heard approaching was the King himself?

What more favourable opportunity than the present could he hope for to start forward and place the locket in his hand?

But his feelings, as we have said, quickly changed to vexation, for, walking a little behind the King, or, rather, at the side of him, came her Majesty the Queen.

Next came a young-looking man, with by no means a prepossessing countenance.

This was the King's eldest son, Frederick, and consequently the Prince of Wales.

Such an occasion as this was not, therefore, what Tom wanted.

He recollected the circumstances under which Dick had obtained the locket, and felt sure that the adventure would be one that the King would desire the Queen to know nothing of.

Tom was rather surprised to see the Prince of Wales thus alone with his parents, for it was well known that a coolness, if not absolute enmity, existed between them.

Tom King, however, was not allowed much time for making reflections and speculations—he was too much engrossed by the events that were taking place before him.

As soon as his Majesty had fairly entered the conservatory, he turned round, and, in a high, squeaking voice, said:

"Willis, close the door. You will understand we all wish to be alone—quite private. Go!"

The distinguished individual called Willis made a low obeisance and retired, closing the door of the conservatory carefully behind him.

The King and Queen stood close to each other, and the Prince of Wales, with his arms folded, a few paces from them.

The Queen was the first to speak.

Evidently by her manner she had all a mother's affection for this her eldest son, and it was also tolerably certain that it was not her fault that the feeling of ill-will existed.

"Now, Frederick," she said, "your father is here and I am here. Good. He has promised to listen to what you have to say. Is it not so, George?" she added.

"Yes," said the King—"speak on!"

"Then, your Majesty," said the Prince of Wales, "I have to ask that we be once more friends. It is bad and wrong of all of us, and it is a bad example to set the nation."

"Yes," interjected the Queen—"a very bad example indeed!"

"Frederick," said the King, sternly, "no one knows better than yourself that this is all your own doing and your own bringing on. I cannot close my eyes to the practices in which you have indulged—I will never close them; therefore, before we can be friends, you must consent to change your present mode of life."

"I am willing to obey you in all things reasonable," was the reply; "but I think you go too far—you pry too deeply into my concerns."

"No, no—I do not, Frederick," returned the King, with more tenderness of manner and tone than he had yet displayed. "But I remember what I was at your age, and now I am filled with regret and remorse for what I was. I see you treading the same downward, ruinous path, and I am anxious to save you the years of misery that I have passed."

The Prince was silent.

"You have around you," he continued, "a set of men whose names are loathed and execrated by the whole nation. While you continue to keep them, so to speak, as a body-guard around you, we cannot be friends, nor can you win the respect and good-will of the English nation."

The Prince was silent for a few moments, and the Queen added:

"Frederick, you hear the words just pronounced—you feel as well as I do that they are correct. Now comes the moment for you to decide. It is between us and the persons just alluded to that you have to choose, so which shall it be?"

At this moment there was an unusual disturbance just outside the conservatory.

The King uttered an ejaculation, and Tom King allowed the leaves to fall into their places, which he had held aside in order to watch the proceedings of the King.

He knew very well that the noise proceeded from the soldiers who were without, and who were desirous of searching in the conservatory for him.

Loud voices were heard, and then the door was gently opened.

The personage addressed as Willis just intruded his head.

"Your Majesty———" he began.

The King interrupted him with a snarling, impatient sound.

"Your Majesty, a detachment of the guard is without in search of——"

"Yah—bah! Shut the door! Begone! Did we not say we would not be disturbed?"

Thus admonished, Willis closed the door, and Tom heard him say:

"It's all very well for you to tell me that you have searched all through the gardens and can find no one, and that in consequence the man you are in search of is hidden here—I tell you it cannot be so! The King is there, and I have been watching ever since; but if you are not satisfied, wait till the King leaves; you can go in then and search to your hearts' content."

Some words were muttered by way of reply to this, but what they were Tom could not catch.

Turning his attention once more upon the royal party, he saw the Prince of Wales had stepped forward a pace or two, and was holding out his hand.

"Let there be a reconciliation!" he was saying. "My own folly I can see now only too plainly. Let us be good friends, as we should be, but do not seek to curb me too much; it is not my fault that I am impatient of the least control."

"Let it be so, Frederick," said the King, extending his hand—"let it be so, and let us rejoice that on this occasion you disobeyed me. When I heard you were in the saloon my anger was great; now, however, all has turned out well."

The Queen was quite overcome with joy at this result of the meeting; it was more—far more—than she had dared to expect.

"Come, George," she said, "let us return to the saloons, the sooner it is known that the misunderstanding between you and Frederick is cleared up the better it will be."

"No—no," said the King—"not this moment—not this moment! Leave me, both of you—I will follow soon—leave me, I say; I wish to be alone!"

The Queen knew her husband's nature too well to attempt to thwart him in any way, and therefore prepared to obey without another word.

The Prince drew her hand beneath his arm, and they left the conservatory together.

When they had gone, the King began to pace up and down with rapid strides.

There were signs of great vexation, remorse, and anguish on his countenance; but by what produced, who could tell?"

Perhaps it was this unexpected reconciliation with his son that had affected him so deeply, or perhaps it was that some memory of the past came back to him, bringing with it nothing but misery and sadness.

So strange was the King's whole manner, and so well did his face portray the uneasiness of his mind, that Tom could not avoid gazing upon him for some time in silence.

"Well," he thought, "who would believe that that miserable, dejected-looking, prematurely old man is the King of England?"

Rousing himself from these thoughts, however, Tom suddenly recollected the purpose he had to accomplish.

Chance had favoured him to a degree that he had not dared to hope for.

The King was now alone, and what would be so easy as to step forth and confront him.

In his present mood, would he not be more likely to listen to his application and to be inclined to an act of mercy?

Surely yes.

There was only one fear.

That was, as soon as he caught sight of the intruder he would utter such a cry as would have the effect of calling his attendant, Willis, into the conservatory, when the highwayman's discovery would be inevitable.

That risk had to be run, and Tom made up his mind to delay no longer, for he could not tell what moment the King might take it into his head to leave.

Such a chance as this once lost would probably never be regained.

Watching his opportunity, then, he slowly and gently left his verdant hiding-place.

The King's back was towards him.

Concealed by some of the shrubs, Tom waited until he turned round in his restless walk and came past.

Then, holding the locket open in his hand, he stepped forward.

"Your Majesty," he said, bowing deeply, and speaking in a low, respectful voice—"will your Majesty deign to look at this?"

The King started, as well he might, at this unexpected intrusion.

His lips parted, as though he was about to give vent to that cry, the consequences of which were so much feared by Tom.

But just then his eyes fell upon the open locket, and immediately a strange and wondrous alteration overspread his features.

He stepped back a pace.

His lips opened wider, his eyes dilated, and he pressed one hand upon his forehead.

He made several gasping attempts to speak.

"What—what," he said, at last, in a hoarse whisper—"what—what is it that you hold before me? Take it away—take it away! Is it real or some delusion? Have I pondered over this event in my past life until my fancy has conjured up this relic? What—what—what——"

"Your Majesty," said Tom, in the same respectful voice, "it is no fancy, but reality. I have been charged to deliver the locket into your hands, and, at the peril of my life, I have done so."

While he spoke, Tom let the open locket fall into the King's outstretched hand.

CHAPTER DCCCLXV.

TOM KING'S STRANGE INTERVIEW WITH HIS MAJESTY IN THE CONSERVATORY.

The King closed his hand convulsively, and then, in a changed voice, said:

"Who and what are you? How came you by this? Speak quickly- tell me all. Yet stay—follow me—this way—this way."

The King hastily strode towards the further end of the conservatory, and Tom wondered greatly at his motive for so doing.

But his wonder soon ceased when he perceived a very pretty rustic-looking seat placed there for the convenience of visitors.

On this the King sat, and, resting one of his elbows on the arm of it, supporting his head with his hand, he said:

"Now tell me, and as quickly as you can. Use no more words than you are absolutely compelled."

"Your Majesty," Tom began, "as you seem to know, that locket was sent as a token."

"Token—token of what? How came it in your possession?"

Tom reflected a moment; then decided that it would be best to let the King know the history of the locket, as this would be more likely to achieve his purpose.

"The lady," he said, "whose portrait is in that locket——"

Here the King started violently, and glanced all around, as if he expected some eavesdropper to be near.

"Hush—hush!" he cried. "Don't name that—don't name that—do not let any such words escape your lips."

His agitation was extreme.

"I will be careful, your Majesty. The lady, then, found herself in a situation of much difficulty and danger. Your Majesty may perhaps remember a certain letter, on the outside of which appears the stain of blood."

The King started again, and removed his hand from his face.

Tom was absolutely startled by the expression of it.

It was as white as marble.

Seeing that the King was struggling to speak, Tom remained silent, and at length his Majesty gasped forth:

"Who and what are you, knowing all these things, which I believed buried for ever in oblivion? Speak—explain yourself, I say!"

"I will do so if your Majesty will permit me," replied Tom, calmly. "But the letter of which I speak, and which, as you know full well, was highly prized by the lady, as it was necessary she should retain it in her possession—that letter, I say, was stolen from her, and was held by a certain nobleman, whose name perhaps I need not mention, who used it as a means of power over her, terrifying her into compliance with all his wishes."

The King groaned.

"Yes—yes," he said, "I know all that—all that! Proceed."

"Your Majesty, the lady felt that, at all risks and hazards, that letter must be re-obtained. How to perform such a difficult task as this she had not the remotest idea; but at last she thought of one who, by his daring deeds and open defiance of the law, seemed likely to suit her purpose. To this man she applied herself, and he undertook to obtain the missing document. That undertaking he fulfilled—the letter was returned, and he was told to name his own reward. He refused, however, to take anything, but at last the lady forced this locket into his hands, telling him to keep it carefully, and when in some great peril from which he could not extricate himself by other means, he was to send a faithful messenger to convey this locket and place it in your Majesty's own hand."

The King remained silent for some moments after Tom King had ceased speaking.

It was evident that he was deeply plunged in thought; but as to the nature of his reflections, Tom King could only give a guess.

Starting at length from his abstraction, as if only suddenly aware that Tom was present, he said:

"Then this man who obtained the letter is now in a position of danger?"

"He is, your Majesty. At this moment he lies in a cell in Newgate, upon a charge affecting his life, and if immediate measures are not taken he will be executed at Tyburn."

"Indeed!" said the King, musingly. "His name?"

"Dick Turpin."

Tom watched, with some anxiety, to observe the effect that the pronunciation of this name would have upon his Majesty.

He saw the King give a slight start of astonishment.

Then he mechanically repeated his name.

That was all.

Looking scrutinisingly into Tom's countenance, he said:

"But you have not yet told me who you are. In what way are you connected with this matter? Surely you are no companion or associate of a desperado like Dick Turpin? Your appearance and mode of speech are those of a man of education, and one accustomed to a higher sphere of life. There is something, too, in your countenance and in the tones of your voice that seems familiar. Where and when have I seen you before?"

These questions produced a most embarrassing feeling upon Tom King.

How to reply he scarcely knew.

But he saw the King was watching him closely, and he felt that it would be unwise and dangerous to tamper with him in any way, for upon his breath hung the captain's life.

"Circumstances," he said, "have made me what I am. It is scarcely possible, however, that your Majesty can have ever seen me before to-night; some accidental resemblance has misled you. But, to confess the truth, I am Dick Turpin's comrade and bosom friend, and ready at any moment to die, if by dying I could save him."

"You the comrade of a robber—a thief?"

"Your Majesty," replied Tom, "I have said it."

Little was it guessed how great was the amount of humiliation that Tom King felt at this moment.

Most forcibly was brought back to him the unhappy past, and the events which had conspired to make him what he then was.

The topic of conversation was painful, and could only become more so by being prolonged.

To Tom's great relief, the King's eyes happened just then to fall upon the locket, which still lay in his hand.

He started, as if he had suddenly recollected the business in hand.

"And this Dick Turpin is in Newgate, you say?" he resumed, in a different tone of voice. "Confound the fellow! there has been trouble enough to catch him, and now that he is safe in custody it seems the favour you require from me is a free pardon."

"That is it," said Tom, "if your Majesty will be so gracious. I leave it to you to decide whether the service of wresting that letter from Lord Spindelow is worthy of such a boon."

"It is—it is. But yet—yet I am so hampered and fettered by one and another, that I fear I cannot grant your request."

"Your Majesty?"

"It is so. I know how strong is the feeling of the ministers against this man—they would do all and everything to ensure his execution. Were I to interfere, such an outcry and bother would be made about it that I should know no further peace. No, no—it cannot be done."

"And must I take back that answer?" said Tom, in tones of the deepest disappointment and regret.

"Yes; and yet I do not ask you to abandon all hope—no, no, do not think so badly of me. I can be grateful, although it would not be prudent for me to grant a pardon; yet, by some other means, I may effect his liberation from Newgate—at any rate, his life shall be spared."

"Oh, your Majesty," said Tom, surprised beyond measure at this unexpected relief, "would that I could find words to express my gratitude!"

"Well, well—that will do—we will suppose them uttered. Now go—leave me. Rest assured your comrade is safe."

"I humbly take my leave," said Tom; "but yet, your Majesty's kindness emboldens me to make one more request."

"Say on."

"It is that you furnish me with some kind of passport or watchword, in order that I may leave the castle in safety. Your Majesty appears to have overlooked the fact that I have baffled the vigilance of all your officials, sentinels, and domestics, and have found you alone. Had I been a conspirator and not so scrupulous as to whether I committed the crime of regicide, I should have had ample opportunity."

The King sprang to his feet.

Alarm was in his breast.

The very word "conspirator" had brought back to his mind all the attempts which had been made to hurl him from the throne.

His dread of the Jacobites was something most intense.

"I only mention these facts," said Tom, "in order to show you that it will be necessary for me to have some kind of passport when I leave. The soldiers, knowing an intruder is in the castle, have searched in all directions, and, no doubt, as soon as I leave this conservatory, I shall be pounced on."

"But suppose," said the King, "that I leave you to get away again by your own stratagem?"

"Then, your Majesty, I can do no more than try my best. You have given me your assurance that my comrade's life is safe. If I should perish in my endeavours to escape, I shall not care, because I shall know that I have purchased his safety with my life."

The King could not avoid gazing upon the highwayman with admiration.

Such devotion as this was rare indeed.

It made him sigh and wish that he had attached to his own person people who would be as staunch and true, instead of the hollow-hearted set by whom he was surrounded, and whose sole aim was their own aggrandisement.

But events had made the King suspicious.

He fancied that perhaps this was only bravado on Tom's part.

At any rate, he resolved to put him to the test.

"You presume too much," he said. "I have already granted one request—let that suffice. Be satisfied that you gained an audience of me in spite of all my retinue. Now let us see whether you will be equally successful in returning."

"Your Majesty," said Tom, "I take my leave. My best thanks are yours for having promised to save my comrade's life. As for myself, I shall do my best to gain my way to liberty. If I fall, it will matter little; existence has but few charms for me, and when I am gone there will not be many to regret my loss, and even by them I shall soon be forgotten."

While thus speaking, Tom King bowed low, and turning quickly round, strode towards the door of the conservatory.

CHAPTER DCCCLXVI.

TOM KING ENDEAVOURS TO REJOIN CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK.

Tom walked on with a steady and unfaltering step, wondering much at the sudden alteration in the King's manner.

It was not until his hand was actually on the fastening of the door of the conservatory that the King, in a sharp, commanding voice, cried:

"Halt!"

Tom stopped instantly, and turned round.

He saw the King standing at the further end, and beckoning him to approach.

"It was merely to make a trial of you," said the King, as soon as he neared him. "I can see now that you were fully in earnest, and know henceforth that the King of England can appreciate bravery and devotion wherever he may find it—if in the person of a highwayman. Here, Willis, I say!"

The door opened immediately in response to the call, and Willis appeared.

"You will escort this gentleman to the gates of the castle," said the King, "and after that return to me."

Willis looked surprised, as well he might, at finding someone in the conservatory in conversation with the King.

But he was too well-bred to utter a word.

Merely bowing, he made a sign to Tom to follow him.

The King in the meanwhile, sank down again upon the little rustic seat in an attitude of great dejection.

Recollections of the past came thronging thickly into his mind—recollections painful and unpleasant; but yet, strive as he would, he could not banish them.

With a very different kind of feeling, Tom King followed Willis from the conservatory.

His heart was elate with hope, and he stepped briskly forward.

Not only was his own escape from Windsor Castle ensured, but he had the King's word that the captain should be liberated.

Well might he rejoice then, and well might he felicitate himself upon the success that had attended him in his efforts.

Looking back, he could scarcely believe what had occurred.

It seemed impossible that fortune could have so favoured him.

When at a safe distance from the conservatory, Willis turned round towards Tom, and, with preparatory cough, said:

"Excuse me, sir, if I asked by what means you gained the conservatory."

"Secret service," said Tom King.

Willis stared.

"You do not understand me," he said, in a louder voice. "How did you gain the conservatory?"

"Secret service," said Tom, in the some calm, even tones as before.

Willis stamped his foot impatiently.

"I insist upon knowing, sir! My vigilance is at stake. Will you or will you not answer my question?"

"I have answered it."

"But I say that is no answer."

"Then," returned Tom, as coolly as ever, "I can give you no other, so obey his Majesty's command by showing me out with the least possible delay."

Willis bit his lip, and he looked at Tom with a revengeful scowl.

There is no doubt that if he had the opportunity he would certainly do him some serious injury.

In fact, Willis was never satisfied until he had pried into every domestic matter of the King's; and in this strange, unaccountable interview he sniffed out some family secret with the details of which he wished to make himself familiar.

But in Tom King he had the wrong person to deal with.

Threats and cajolery would be alike unavailing.

Of course, Willis was allowed to go wherever he chose unquestioned, and as it was seen that Tom was under his immediate guidance and protection, no effort was made to stop him.

Tom, however, was full of impatience once more to get beneath the open sky.

He had not forgotten the perilous position in which he had left his two companions, and he was well aware that, in their devotion to himself, they would go to any length—run any risk—in order to cover his retreat.

Therefore it was that he wished to make his way round to that particular part of the castle where he had left them, and to let them know that all was well.

Whether the two hours had elapsed, or whether a longer period had gone by, he could not tell.

He had omitted to take notice of the time.

To judge by events, his stay in the castle must altogether have been of considerable duration.

As he walked on, Tom rightly conjectured that there must be many exits from the castle, and therefore requested to be led out as near as possible to the garden.

Willis made no reply to this request, however, but marched on.

Some slight revenge, however, he felt was now within his reach.

Evidently Tom was unacquainted with the interior of the castle, and therefore Willis led him to the gateway furthest from the place he wished to reach.

Just as he passed beneath the portal, he said:

"Turn to your left, and walk on. In two minutes you will be there."

Not suspecting any deception, Tom followed these directions; but after walking for a long time, he could not come in sight of one of the objects that in his approach to the castle he had noted down as landmarks.

There was no resource, however, but to keep walking on and on, trusting to arrive in a short time.

But his patience was destined to be put to a severe trial, and before he had gone much further, he guessed the nature of the trick that had been played him.

But so delighted was he at the success he had met with, that he was inclined to laugh at any bit of spite of this sort, so walked steadily, knowing that if he made a complete circuit of the castle that he must inevitably come to the point he wished to reach.

His only uneasiness was on behalf of his companions.

He wondered how they would fare when the time came for a change of guard.

Windsor Castle, however, was greater in circumference than Tom had anticipated; and owing to occasional detours that he was compelled to make, it took him upwards of an hour to reach the garden wall.

Keeping under the shadow of the trees as before, he now approached with the utmost caution.

Sentinels were pacing up and down as before; and at last the front of the identical sentry-box, the top of which he had mounted, was reached.

Near to this he could perceive the figure of a man was standing.

He was clad in soldier's uniform; but whether it was Claude that he beheld, or a veritable sentinel, Tom King could not tell, the obscurity was so profound.

He resolved to wait a little while, and, if possible, to creep a little closer, in order to be able to form a better idea.

He watched the opportunity when the soldier, resuming his march, turned the angle of the wall, and was for a few moments, out of sight.

Anxiously he waited for the sentinel to reappear.

At length he came into sight.

Shielding his eyes with his hands, Tom looked at him earnestly and scrutinisingly; then, after a moment, shook his head, as he muttered:

"No—no; it's not Claude, nor Jack either. Where on earth can they be? What has happened during my absence?"

These were questions that Tom King could not answer.

But leaving him in doubt, we will revert for a few moments to the proceedings of his comrades.

CHAPTER DCCCLXVII.

SHOWS HOW CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK DISPOSE OF THE SENTINEL.

No sooner had Tom King leaped over the wall in the manner described than Sixteen-String Jack took hold of the sentinel as he lay helpless upon the ground, and dragged him towards the sentry-box.

With some difficulty he succeeded in forcing him into it, Claude Duval, in the meanwhile, performing the part of sentinel to great perfection.

It was clear that he had not yet forgotten his military training, and it would have required a keen eye indeed to detect the imposition.

Sixteen-String Jack contented himself with hiding in the shadow of the sentry-box.

Here he believed he should be quite out of sight, and also in such a position as to render immediate aid to Tom King should he require it.

And so, without the occurrence of any incident to break the dull monotony of his duty Claude Duval paced up and down outside the wall, pausing occasionally to exchange a few whispered words with his companion.

The time passed on but slowly, by no means so rapidly as with Tom, who was actively engaged during the whole time.

At length a tremendous uproar was heard, and they could only come to one conclusion respecting it, which was that Tom King had been discovered as an intruder in the castle, and that close search was being made after him.

Claude stopped a moment near the sentry-box, and, resting on his firearm, said:

"Tom is discovered, Jack, depend upon it. Now, then, what are we to do?"

"Why, nothing that I can see, except to remain here in readiness to assist him when he appears. Rely upon it he will make his way direct to this point, not only from his desire to rejoin us, but also because the horses are here."

"I wish I could see over the top of the wall, nevertheless," said Claude.

"Be persuaded by me," said Jack, "and don't attempt it. You would be seen almost to a certainty, while ten to one if you could make out what was going on."

To stay longer was imprudent, so Claude marched off again, feeling very uneasy, and yet being all the time on the alert.

Time passed, and Tom did not appear.

Then suddenly they heard the regular tapping of a drum, the same sound that they had heard a short time before.

"The time is up," said Claude, halting again; "the guard is about to be changed. Now what on earth shall we do?"

Jack was puzzled.

"I am afraid Tom is captured," he said; "and if he is, we shall only run our own necks into the noose by attempting to rescue him."

"I suppose so," was the answer; "and yet that does not reconcile one to abandoning him to his fate."

"It certainly does not; but be quick and decide before the soldiers appear in sight. It will not do to remain here."

"That is certain," said Claude, hastily stripping off the soldier's coat—"detection would be certain."

"And it will be now," said Jack, "for the soldiers, when they arrive here and find their comrade in this condition, will raise an immediate alarm."

"Let us look at him," said Claude, "and see what condition he is in by now."

He stepped out of the sentry-box and went close up to the soldier.

He was in a peculiarly uncomfortable position.

Claude shook him.

But he took no notice.

"I believe he is insensible," he whispered. "If he is, we can manage it."

"How—how?"

"I cannot stay to tell you. Watch my actions—that must suffice."

Quick as thought, Claude dragged the sentinel out of the box, and then found his conjecture to be verified.

The man was indeed insensible.

His next proceeding was with great rapidity to rid him of the ropes by which he was secured, and to take the gag out of his mouth.

As soon as Jack saw what his comrade was about he assisted him, and the fragments were thrown over the wall.

Then, with a great deal of difficulty, the sentinel's coat was put on, and his musket placed beside him.

In his pocket Claude carried a small case of brandy.

This he produced, and poured a quantity of it into the man's mouth, who made a convulsive attempt to swallow it.

"That will do," he cried. "Now, Jack, follow me with all speed. When they come, ten to one if the guard don't take him to be dead drunk."

As noiselessly as shadows the highwaymen departed, concealing themselves once more in the trees.

Here they remained to watch what would happen next.

On came the little troop of soldiers, just as they had seen them on the preceding occasion.

At length they stopped opposite the sentry-box, upon which the highwaymen's attention was fixed.

The sentinel, who was now beginning to recover his consciousness, was sitting on the ground, with his back against the sentry-box.

"Hullo!" the highwaymen heard a gruff voice say, and which doubtless proceeded from the officer in command—"hullo! what's this? Why, d—n me if he is not drunk! Wake him up there, will you, some of you?"

The soldiers gathered round their companion and shook him violently.

The odour of the brandy was very powerful, and made itself apparent to all.

"He is drunk," they cried. "Can't you smell the brandy! Well, who would have thought of this?"

"There'll be a row about it," said another voice.

"Silence!" cried the officer. "Get him up and make him a prisoner."

[TOM KING TAKES THE ROYAL LETTER-BAG TO NEWGATE.]

Not without a great deal of trouble the sentinel was got upon his feet.

His comrades, enjoying the sport, shook him about furiously.

Rough as these means were, yet the man began to recover his senses rapidly, and he gazed around him with a stupefied, bewildered expression.

"Aha, my fine fellow," said the officer, "you will pay dearly for this; it is no joke for one of the King's guard to be found dead drunk and asleep at his post."

"Dead drunk" ejaculated the sentinel; "who says I'm drunk?"

"Why, I do," answered the officer.

"I will take my oath," said the man, "I have not had a drop to drink to-night."

"You insolent rascal!" was the answer. "Do you mean to call me a liar? Why, you stink now of brandy to such a degree that it is scarcely possible to come near you!"

More bewildered than ever, the sentinel licked his lips, and as he did so he tasted the brandy, which, of course, increased his bewilderment considerably.

All at once, however, the recollection of what had taken place came over him.

"I will tell you all," he said—"I will confess all. I am not drunk, but——"

"Silence!" cried the officer. "If you say another word I will make it all the worse for you! Silence, I say, and don't palter with me any more!"

"But let me speak—it is most important!"

"Will you be silent?" said the officer. "Now, then,—attention—right about—quick march!"

The troop of soldiers marched on, and were quickly lost to sight.

During the occurrence of this scene, Claude and Jack remained profoundly silent, nor did they venture to speak until the sentinel, having commenced his duty of pacing up and down, had turned the angle of the wall.

"Now," said Claude, "if Tom will only quickly make his appearance all will be well."

"He must be quick," was the reply, "for although the soldier has been hustled off at present, yet, depend upon it, before long he will make his story known, and then a regular alarm will be raised."

"True," was the answer. "I would give much to know how Tom has succeeded in his attempt to obtain an audience of the King. I am afraid the chance is lost, and that if Dick is liberated it will be by his and our own exertions."

CHAPTER DCCCLXVIII.

THE HIGHWAYMEN HAVE SOME DOUBTS AS TO THE GOOD FAITH OF THE KING.

"I FEAR so too," replied Sixteen-String Jack; "but we will wait here till daybreak in the hope that Tom will return. Rely upon it, if he does come back, he will make direct for this point, because his horse is here."

"Yes, we will wait," said Claude; "it is not likely that we will abandon him."

And so the time passed on.

So firmly impressed were both the highwaymen with the notion that Tom King would make his appearance over the wall, that they paid but slight attention to any noises they might hear either to the left or right of them.

Consequently they were unaware of Tom's approach until he was almost upon them.

"Claude—Jack," he said, in a low tone—"speak—where are you?"

"Tom, is it you?"

"Yes, I am here, safe and sound."

His comrades pressed round him eagerly.

"Have you succeeded?" they asked, with breathless anxiety—"have you succeeded?"

"I have," said Tom, with a conscious triumph. "I have seen the King and had an interview with him, and he has given his word that Dick shall be set at liberty."

Claude and Jack threw their hats in the air, and in a faint whisper said

"Hurrah!"

But for the contiguity of the sentinels, the cheer would have been a lusty one; but prudence restrained them.

"Mount!" said Claude. "Let us mount and gallop back; such good tiding as these cannot be communicated too quickly. We had just resigned ourselves to despair when you appeared."

The highwaymen mounted their horses with all speed, and turned their faces homeward.

Tom found he should get no peace until he had told his two companions all that had happened to him after his daring jump over the wall.

They listened with breathless interest, and at last Claude said:

"And that, I suppose, is all we shall ever hear of this mysterious locket. What we know suggests a great deal more; and yet we may draw our own conclusions, and still be very far from the mark."

"Nothing more likely," said Tom; "but yet, after all, we may obtain some further intelligence. But, either way, it does not much matter, now that our end is obtained."

Taking the same route as before, the highwaymen galloped at full speed back to the Three Spiders Inn.

They paused only once on the journey, and yet, in spite of all their exertions, it was fairly daybreak before the plantation was reached.

They looked up anxiously at the little window, hoping to catch sight of the signal-light.

But it was not there.

Such being the case, they were afraid to make any further movement.

Chafing with impatience, more than half an hour elapsed, and then upon the hard road in front of the inn they heard the clatter of horses' feet.

Listening intently, they soon found that some persons or other were taking their departure, for the sound grew gradually less and less distinct.

Shortly afterwards the little door in the stable was opened, and Tom Davis crossed its threshold.

The highwaymen advanced towards him instantly.

"Is all well?" they asked.

"Yes, all's well now; but only a few moments ago the officers were here."

"What, again?"

"Yes, again. I really thought they were satisfied; however, on this occasion, as you were all absent, and as I knew there was nothing that could betray me, I allowed them to search everywhere, and a most rigid search it has been. Of course," he added, "they discovered nothing."

"Well, then," said Claude, "I hope this is the last we shall have of these visits. Surely they must have some strong suspicion, or they would not be so frequently repeated."

"That's my own fear," returned Tom. "I can't understand their pertinacity; but we have only to be cautious, and then all will be well."

Jack shook his head.

"I don't know that," he said; "they may pounce upon us in an unfortunate moment, and then there will be an end to our remaining here."

"Well, well—we will leave that. Tell me first how you have succeeded in your enterprise?"

"Better than we expected."

"Have you seen the King?"

"I have."

"Then," ejaculated Tom Davis, "I shall never consider anything impossible again. Had I been asked what there was that no one could perform, I should have said, obtain an audience of the King."

"Well, I have done it, and with less difficulty than you imagine. Not only that, he has given his word that Dick shall be set free."

Tom Davis gave a shout, and then he exclaimed:

"I am glad to hear it—heartily glad to hear it; for I have just received intelligence that has filled me with uneasiness."

"Indeed? Does it concern Dick?"

"It does. But come in; let us close the stable door, and while we are seeing to the horses we can talk it over."

This was done, and as soon as they were fairly beneath the roof of the stable, Tom Davis said:

"The officers brought me word that the authorities, fearing some rescue or escape, have determined to push things on to the utmost. No time has been lost anywhere, and, in order that they may make sure of the execution taking place without delay, the old warrant sent for Dick has been endorsed, and all preparations have been made, so that his execution is fixed to take place at noon to-morrow."

"No matter," said Tom King—"no matter. If any faith is to be placed in the King's word, Dick will be free long before then, and the authorities will be again disappointed."

"I trust so," said Tom Davis; "but you must tell me some more of the particulars. Do you think there is that dependence to be placed on the King's word? After you have gone, is there not the fear that he may be influenced by some of his ministers to break his word?"

"I trust not," returned Tom King—"I think not; but should he be weak enough to be persuaded, his conduct will be base in the extreme."

"There cannot be two opinions about that," returned Tom Davis; "but, then, I have often heard that the King is weak and vacillating. How much better it would have been could you have procured some document from him in confirmation of his promise."

"It would, truly," replied Tom King; "but, then, I was afraid to push him too far. I thought I had been extremely successful in obtaining his word."

"And that ought to be sufficient," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and don't let us meet trouble half-way."

"I am the last to do that," returned Davis, "only we ought not to lose sight of any consideration."

"You are right," said Tom King; "but let us go in now. Above all, attend to this—let no word of doubt reach Maud's ears."

"Certainly not—it would be unwise and cruel to a degree."

With these words, the horses having been made comfortable, the three highwaymen followed Tom Davis into the inn.

They found Maud pale and tearful, anxiously watching and wishing for their return.

She sprang forward as soon as they crossed the threshold, and in imploring accents said:

"Tell me—oh, tell me the result of your efforts! Tell it me in a word. Do not keep me longer in suspense—it has half killed me already."

"I will not," said Tom, cheerfully. "I have seen the King—the locket has had its expected effect, and he has given me his promise that Dick shall be liberated without delay."

With an hysterical cry, Maud burst into tears.

That intelligence was indeed a relief to her overfraught heart

Those tears, however, quickly passed away, and, turning a smiling countenance towards Tom King, she said:

"When—oh, when may we expect him?"

"Soon, I should think—very soon. The King no doubt would despatch a messenger at once, and Dick would be set free on his arrival. Surely we may expect to see him some time between this and nightfall."

This was encouraging indeed, and Maud, having learned all the particulars, hastened to the front of the inn, and took up her position at a window which commanded the best view of the lane.

Here she remained during the whole of the day, refusing to move.

This act of hers enabled the highwaymen and Tom Davis to speak freely on the subject that was uppermost in their minds.

And, as the day slowly wore on, it was strange to see how much the doubts felt by all increased.

"If the time was not so fearfully short," said Claude Duval, "it would not so much matter; but really, if anything should go wrong, it leaves us no chance whatever to use our own exertions. Are you sure, Davis," he asked, for about the twentieth time, "that the execution is appointed for to-morrow?"

"Perfectly certain," was the answer. "I have the best authority for the statement."

"Well, comrades," cried Sixteen-String Jack, "with your permission, I will tell you what we will do."

"What?"

"Remain here until nightfall; then, if Dick does not make his appearance, we will mount our horses and ride towards London. Should he be returning, we shall meet him; and should we ascertain that no messenger has been sent, we will try what we can do ourselves."

After some discussion, this course of action was resolved upon.

Never, perhaps, had a day gone by so tediously as that.

They all sat watching the little Dutch clock in the inn kitchen, as its hands moved slowly round the dial-plate.

It would have been better could they have slept; but in the excited condition of their minds slumber was impossible.

When it was getting towards sunset, they, all anxious to be doing something, rose from their seats and made their way to the stables.

Here they occupied themselves in attending to their horses, and just as twilight was deepening into night they put on the saddles and bridles.

Up to that moment, nothing whatever had been seen or heard of Dick, and therefore they might justly feel afraid that things were not going right.

"I can wait no longer," said Tom King. "Come on, comrades. We will ride slowly towards London, and I hope before we have gone far we shall be lucky enough to meet him."

"Most heartily do I echo that wish," said Tom Davis. "Take my advice, and be prepared at all points. Now that you are about to depart, I don't hesitate to say that from the first I had but slight faith in the King's word, and now I might go the length of telling you that I feel none at all. In a moment and under the circumstances you describe, he may have given you the promise, but after-reflection has caused him to alter his mind. It is my humble opinion that if Dick Turpin is to be liberated from Newgate to-night, it will be by your exertions, and yours only."

"Well, we shall see," said Tom King. "Come on, comrades. When once we are in motion we shall do away with the dreadful sensation of suspense that we have been suffering so long. Come on—come on!"

CHAPTER DCCCLXIX.

RELATES HOW DICK TURPIN PASSED THE DAY PREVIOUS TO THE ONE APPOINTED FOR HIS EXECUTION.

There was one to whom the minutes of that day lagged quite as slowly as to Tom Davis and the highwaymen, and that one, as may be guessed, was no other than Dick Turpin, in his comfortless cell in Newgate.

The tempting breakfast that had been brought him by the friendly jailer he left untouched; and when, shortly afterwards, the jailer came in, he exclaimed:

"Why, captain, you have had nothing at all. This looks bad. How is it?"

"I am sick at heart," said Turpin—"I am full of uneasiness and suspense. Can you not contrive to leave the prison soon, and slip off to Drury Lane? Ten to one you will learn something there that will give me ease."

"I will try my very best, captain—rest assured of that. I hope things are all going right with you, because——"

"Because what?"

"Why, I don't like to say it; but yet perhaps I had better tell you that they are making every preparation for turning you off to-morrow."

"Are they indeed?"

"Yes, they are, and it's talked of in the prison as a thing of course, for, having given your word not to make the attempt to escape, they feel certain that you must perish."

"Well, we shall see," said Dick, whose spirits were by no means raised by this intelligence—"we shall see shortly. In the meantime, go to Drury Lane. I shall know better how to act when you return."

"I will, captain; but though I am a bit of a favourite with the Governor, yet I cannot do exactly as I like. No doubt I shall slip off soon."

With these words, the jailer left, and Dick was once more in solitude.

He tried to keep himself calm.

But vainly. He would not have been human had he not felt the great peril of his situation.

His life, it might be said, hung merely upon a thread.

Had the day of his execution been appointed for that day week instead of the morrow, he would have felt perfectly indifferent, because if the King did not aid him he would then have a chance of using his own powers and profiting by the assistance of his comrades.

While at the height of his suspense, he heard the muttering of voices outside his cell.

Then the fastenings were withdrawn, and the door flung open upon its hinges.

Dick started forward with impatient anxiousness, for he fully expected it was the friendly jailer who had returned with welcome intelligence.

What was his disappointment, then, to perceive that it was a total stranger—a slim little man, wearing spectacles and a very dirty peruke?

To his intense astonishment, this man, with extended hand, ran forward and cried:

"My dear sir, this is really a pleasure—I am rejoiced to see you! Preserve that expression—pray preserve that expression, and it will be first-rate."

Dick instinctively shrank back from the stranger's advances, and put up his arm in a defensive attitude, as if to shield himself from the attack of a foe.

What on earth the dirty, untidy little man could mean he could not tell.

Casting his eyes towards the door, he saw that one of the men on guard outside had thrust in something square, carefully wrapped up in paper.

Along with it came a small oblong box, and what appeared to be three pieces of wood strapped together.

He was still in the dark as to the stranger's intentions.

But he was not long suffered to be so.

"My dear sir," he said again, "just look here. Wait a moment. It is a pleasure, I am sure—a very great pleasure. There!"

With nervous haste he picked up the three pieces of wood, unstrapped them, and placed them on the floor in a triangular sition, and then Dick saw before him a painter's easel.

But before he could make any remark or recover from the state of surprise into which he had been thrown the stranger hastily stripped off the paper from the square parcel, and disclosed a piece of canvas stretched on a frame, all ready for painting upon.

This he placed upon the easel, and with the same rapidity of movement opened the box, and took therefrom a palette and some brushes.

"There, my dear sir, that's it—that's it! Only a few moments in that position, and I shall be done. I am wonderfully rapid, I assure you—not an R.A. as yet, but soon to be, I hope. There—there!"

While he spoke, the painter—for such he evidently was—made many flourishes with his brushes, but before he could make many lines Dick stepped forward.

"Excuse me, sir," he said, "if I inquire the meaning of this extraordinary intrusion. If I have not asked this before, it is simply because I have been taken so utterly by surprise."

"Intrusion?" said the painter. "Oh, no intrusion, I assure you! Return to your former attitude—let me entreat you to return to it, and remain so; then, in the meanwhile, I will give you every information you wish."

"No," said Dick. "I wish to know distinctly, first of all, what it is that you intend to do."

"Why, my good sir, to immortalise you. I am going to paint your portrait."

"Indeed! At whose wish?"

"My own—my own, sir—my own entirely. The idea struck me, and then I said to myself, 'Septimus Gibbon, your fortune is made.'"

"But keep to the point," said Dick. "Believe me, I am not in the humour to-day for a long conversation."

"I am at the point now, my dear sir—I have just reached it. I thought to myself, I would paint your portrait. By that means, I should not only immortalise you but achieve never-ending fame myself. That's my idea. So I went to my uncle, the sheriff, and he, with his usual kindness, gave me permission to enter your cell. So here I am, you see, and all you have to do is to stand for half an hour or so, and everything will be done."

"But stop a moment," said Dick. "It seems to me that you have made one little omission."

"An omission? And pray, my dear sir, what may that be?"

"Why, this: You have asked leave of the sheriff, but you have forgotten to ask leave of me."

"Oh, a needless piece of ceremony altogether," said the painter; "but if you wish it, I will be quite formal."

"No, no," said Dick. "In a word, understand me that I firmly and most positively refuse to give my consent. You shall not paint my portrait."

"But, my dear sir, reflect."

"I have reflected already. Begone! Trouble me no more!"

The painter looked rather abashed, and then a bright thought struck him.

Getting one of his brushes ready prepared, and standing close to his easel, he said, with a slowness of utterance that contrasted remarkably with his former glibness of speech:

"My dear sir, I am exceedingly sorry that I should have offended you. I never dreamt for a moment but that you would willingly give your consent to my painting your portrait. However, I find you have an objection, and therefore, when I have tendered you my sincere apologies for the intrusion I trust you will accept them, and I will depart."

While slowly speaking these words, the painter glanced continually from Dick to his canvas, and worked busily with the brush.

Dick guessed what he was about, and just as he had finished his speech, stepped forward.

Mr. Septimus Gibbon, as he called himself, endeavoured to cover over what he had been doing with his palette.

But Dick knocked it impatiently aside with so much impatience, that it slipped from the painter's hand, and falling to the floor of the cell, was broken into a thousand pieces.

"Why, you deceitful rascal," said Dick, the moment his eye fell upon the canvas; "while pretending to talk to me as you did, and to offer your apologies, you have actually drawn the outlines of my face! You could have walked off, and would have finished the portrait at your leisure. What do you mean by it?"

"My dear sir," stammered the painter, "I—I——"

"I suppose you thought I should not see it?" said Dick, fiercely, and seizing hold of the canvas while he spoke.

"Now, my dear sir, don't—pray don't touch it! Let me entreat you not to touch it!"

But paying no attention whatever to his words, Dick lifted the frame from the easel, and commenced an immediate attack with it upon the painter.

He banged him most lustily over the head with it, until, at length, after one blow stronger than the rest, the canvas gave way, and the painter's head passed through it.

The effect was, that he stood with rather a ridiculous-looking collar round his neck.

His cries, however, had reached the ears of the turnkeys outside, and they had hastily thrown open the door.

When they saw what had occurred, however, they could not forbear from laughing.

"There," said Dick, "be off—be off, will you, at once! You will find this rather harder than the rest, so I advise you to begone!"

He seized hold of the easel as he spoke, and the painter, fearing a blow with it, made a rush to the door of the cell, pulling frantically at the frame round his neck, and endeavouring to free himself of his disagreeable encumbrance.

But his alarm and excitement prevented him from doing the very thing that he wished, so he tugged and tugged in vain.

Dick was just then in the humour to be angry with anybody or anything, and it was rather a relief to him than otherwise that the painter should have made his disappearance just then.

After his departure, he flung all his apparatus out into the corridor, and, addressing the turnkeys, said:

"Where is the Governor? Send for him; I want to see him at once!"

The turnkeys winked their eyes at each other.

It was a rare joke for a prisoner to demand an interview with the Governor of the prison.

"Do you hear what I say?" roared Turpin.

"Yes, we hears, captain," was the reply; "only we are afraid he will not come."

"Well, then," said Dick, "just tell him from me that if I have another intrusion of this kind I shall consider the compact between us at an end."

The turnkeys promised obedience, and withdrew, carefully fastening the door after them.

"Confound his impudence!" said Dick, still fuming. "I wish I had hit him a little harder, that's all!"

It was something, nevertheless, to be diverted from the contemplation of his position; and by the time he had succeeded in regaining his usual calmness the door was again opened, and the friendly jailer appeared.

Before he spoke, Dick could tell by the expression of his countenance that he had nothing particular to communicate.

"Well," he said, in a whisper, as soon as it was prudent to address him, "have you been?"

"I have, captain."

"And what is the result?"

"I have seen old Matthew."

"Well?"

"But he knows nothing. Since Davis took his departure yesterday, he has not seen or heard anything of him or his companions."

"That is strange," said Dick—"very strange; but perhaps he will hear shortly. When the day is further advanced, go again."

"All right, captain. And, now, what would you like for dinner?"

"Don't trouble me about dinner. I am in no humour to touch a mouthful."

"Well, captain, you may be right, but I don't think you are. You ought to make the best you can of matters, and eat heartily while you have the chance."

"But who could eat in such a place as this?" said Dick, glancing around him. "No, no; my appetite has gone, and I loathe the very sight of food."

"It is bad, captain," said the jailer, shaking his head—"very bad. I hope you will soon be better. You want some intelligence of your friends, and if it is to be procured, I will obtain it."

"I know you will," said Dick, shaking him by the hand. "I shall always be deeply indebted to you."

"No, no; quite the reverse."

"But I say yes."

A few more unimportant words were exchanged, and then the jailer again left, promising to pay another visit as soon as he should be successful in getting leave of absence.

He had not been absent more than five minutes before the door was again opened.

"Another intrusion!" thought Dick, this time growing angry in earnest.

He glanced towards the doorway.

He saw that it was the Ordinary, who was attired in full canonicals, and carried a couple of books under his arm.

"Unhappy man," he said, in a whining tone, and with his eyes so turned up to the ceiling of the cell that only the whites were visible—"unhappy man, I have come to pass a few hours with you in meditation and prayer!"

"Thank you," said Dick. "I am much obliged to you, but I prefer to be alone."

"A hardened sinner," said the Ordinary, with a grin—"a hardened sinner, yet he may be converted to the ways of grace."

"It strikes me," replied Dick, "that I am by no means so bad as you imagine; but I think that a man in my position should, at least, have a few little privileges accorded to him, and one of them should be that he should please himself whether he remained alone or whether he was intruded upon."

"Worse and worse!" said the chaplain. "Do you know, unhappy man, that in twelve hours from this you will be standing on the brink of eternity?"

"I do not know it," said Dick, firmly.

"Well, then, it is my unhappy duty to inform you of it. In twelve hours, at the most, you will be no more."

"It's a mistake," said Dick—"quite a mistake."

"No, I assure you it is not. Every preparation has been made by the officials connected with the prison. Your execution is appointed to take place at noon to-morrow, and, therefore, I have come to prepare you for your approaching inevitable fate."

"I am much obliged to you for your kindness," replied Dick, "but believe me when I say that it is quite unnecessary."

"Unnecessary?"

"Yes. Do not misunderstand me; you are labouring under a great mistake. I shall not be executed to-morrow, and therefore I stand in no need of your spiritual consolation and preparation."

"It is a vain hope," said the Ordinary—"a vain, delusive hope, and let me entreat you to cast it from you."

"It is a hope that will be realised," said Dick, "and therefore let me entreat you to grant me the poor favour of leaving me by myself for a short time."

"I will," said the chaplain, "but only for a short time. I trust reflection will soon assert its sway—then I will return. May your heart be softened, and may you be brought to a proper knowledge of your position!"

Dick was silent, for he wished the reverend gentleman to leave at once.

He did so.

The turnkeys opened the door, and Dick was once more left alone.

His uneasiness had now reached a fearful pitch.

He paced restlessly up and down his cell.

"Can it be," he muttered to himself—"can it be that everything has gone wrong, and that I am doomed at last to perish? No, no, I will not think that—not even when the cap is drawn over my face and the noose adjusted round my neck; even then I will not despair, but place faith in the exertions of my comrades."

In spite of this, however, Dick felt that it would be no trifling relief could he but be freed from his present state of suspense.

He could tell that the day was gradually drawing in and that night was approaching.

Yet he saw nothing of the friendly jailer; in fact, it was not until the interior of the cell was quite dark—just, indeed, about the same time when the highwaymen were setting out from the inn—that the door was once again opened, and Dick's eyes were gladdened by the sight of his friend.

But there was no hope or encouragement to be gleaned from the expression of his countenance.

"You have bad news," said Dick. "Come, speak out at once—the sooner it is over the better."

"Not bad news," said the man, "without you call no news bad news."

"Well, speak—do not keep me waiting."

"Well, captain, I have just come back from Drury Lane. I have seen old Matthew."

"And what does he say?"

"He says but little. He is in a state of great uneasiness. He is afraid something has gone wrong somewhere, and did not hesitate to say it."

"He has not seen or heard from Davis?"

"Not a word of any kind."

"How strange!"

"That is what he says. He calls it very strange—in fact, is unable to account for it. Had all gone well, you should by this time have been set at liberty."

"And what is his advice?"

"He said he was unable to offer any, except that, if he stood in your position, he should trust to no one but himself."

"He means, endeavour to escape?"

"Yes."

"But how short is the time!" said Dick. "What earthly chance have I?"

The jailer shrugged his shoulders.

"A very poor chance, I am afraid, captain, for I can assure you that never since this prison has been built has there been such close and observant guard kept all around it. The men are all on the alert, and it would be totally impossible for any person to leave Newgate at any point unseen. How you are to escape under these circumstances passes my comprehension."

"Well, well," said Dick, "leave me—I should like to be alone, and to think over my position as best I may."

"Then I will go, captain. Are you sure you want nothing?"

"Nothing whatever."

With a glance, plainly of pity and regret, the turnkey left the cell.

As soon as he had departed, Dick sank down upon the chair, and, clasping his hands over his face, began to think.

"What has gone wrong?" he murmured—"what can have happened? How unfortunate it is that I should be left thus in the dark, and Newgate so closely guarded, and the time so short! Well, well—at all events, it will be perfectly useless for me to attempt an escape. Had I the means and the time, it would be equally useless, for now I have heard how Newgate is watched, from such good authority, I cannot doubt it, nor could I hope to leave it unperceived."

He was silent, giving up himself to gloomy thought.

His mind was principally occupied in thinking of Maud.

It was by no means difficult for him to picture her friendless and forlorn situation, and the reflection that he had been the means of bringing her into it by no means increased his cheerfulness.

Then, with a slow and solemn note, he heard the clock of St. Paul's Cathedral give forth the hour of ten.

How fearfully close the time appointed for his execution seemed to be.

To one thing, however, he had quite made up his mind, which was that it was impossible for him to escape, therefore he made no effort, but continued to sit in the same attitude upon the chair.

Eleven o'clock sounded, and found him still in the same position.

Any one gazing upon him would have found some difficulty in saying for certain whether he was sleeping or waking—to all appearances, however, he was completely blind and deaf to all that was going on around him.

He did not even raise his head when the clock struck.

Another hour passed.

Then midnight came.

The twelve strokes were given forth by all the various churches around, the stillness being so great that distant ones were plainly audible.

In every variety of intonation was the hour proclaimed, and when the strokes had died away, the sound was succeeded by another less audible and of a far different character.

It required a momentary attention before one could decide upon the nature of this sound.

It was that low, hearse murmur something like the sound produced by the waves, and which is ever the accompaniment of a large mass of people.

That hoarse murmur, then, came from the dense throng of people outside Newgate—from those who, with extraordinary patience, had taken up their positions in the Old Bailey, in order, by waiting there, to be the first to catch a glimpse of the doomed man when the folding doors were unclosed.

A drizzling rain began to fall from a dark, overhanging sky—a rain that threatened to become more violent ere long, and which showed every indication of continuing without intermission for many hours.

But the steadiest downpour would not have had the effect of dispersing those who had congregated without.

Suddenly the sound of a footstep breaks the deep silence which reigns through the prison of Newgate.

More and more distinct it becomes, until at length it pauses before the door of Dick Turpin's cell.

A bright ray of light comes streaming through the huge keyhole, and falls upon the prisoner.

But he heeds it not.

Some words were hurriedly exchanged, followed by retreating footsteps.

Then the door of the cell was flung open.

A brilliant light seemed at once to be shed all over it, yet this was only by contrast with the previous darkness, for the illumination proceeded only from a lantern.

"Asleep!" said a voice. "Can it be possible? Would a man sleep thus on the night before his execution? Turpin—Turpin, awake!"

These words entered Dick's ears, and penetrated to his understanding.

With a sudden start, he looked up, and then he saw Mr. Bradbury, the Governor of the prison, standing before him.

CHAPTER DCCCLXX.

THE DETERMINATION OF THE HIGHWAYMEN TURNS OUT TO BE A MOST FORTUNATE ONE.

In order to explain what follows, it is necessary to go back to the proceedings of Dick Turpin's comrades.

According to their stated intention, they quitted the Three Spiders, and made their way by the most direct route to the London Road.

There was no small amount of danger in so doing, but they reasonably concluded that, Dick being still in Newgate, the principal force of the police would be collected round that point.

At any rate, danger or not, that was the road they determined upon.

The very daring of the proceeding was likely to bring with it a certain amount of success.

"We cannot do much better," said Tom King, "than journey on to old Matthew's. Of all other men, he is the most likely to give us information respecting the captain."

"Yes, decidedly so," said Sixteen-String Jack; "and he is the man best calculated to help us in our present emergency. He is fertile in all expedients, and may perhaps give us advice well worthy of being followed."

"Not a doubt of it," joined in Claude Duval. "Come on, comrades—mend your pace a little! It is trying to one's patience to creep along like this!"

At a brisk trot the highwaymen now took their way along the hard, well-beaten road, nor did they pause or speak until the sharp clatter of a horse's hoofs upon the road behind them reached their ears.

"Hark!" said Tom, gently drawing in the rein, "some one is coming after us at full gallop. Who on earth can it be?"

"Some chance traveller perhaps," said Claude. "Push on—never mind!"

"But he will inevitably overtake us ere long," said Tom. "Let us pull up and draw to one side."

"No adventure, Tom," said Sixteen-String Jack—"no adventure! We have enough already on hand."

"I know that," was the answer. "Yet it will be better to allow this man, whoever he may be to pass, then we can follow on as we please."

"Well, just as you like," said Claude. "You have command of the expedition to-night, and you can do just as you like, provided that you don't embroil yourself in any other adventure."

"Don't fear that," said Tom King. "Look—yonder is a narrow lane. Let us go down that a little way; we shall then be unseen."

"But let us take a glance as he passes by, whoever he may be," said Jack.

"Oh, yes, certainly—I fully intended it."

Just on the left hand was a narrow lane, on both sides of which trees were growing very thickly, so that a deep shadow was cast all round about the spot.

Just at the mouth of this lane—if we may so call it—the highwaymen placed themselves in a line.

They knew they could depend upon their horses remaining motionless, and from their present position they would have no difficulty in glancing at the approaching traveller.

On he came, his speed accelerated, if anything.

It was a horse of rare quality, as the rate he was going at fully proved.

"He is no ordinary rider," said Tom King, "rest assured of that."

Scarcely had he spoken the words than the traveller, with a rush like an arrow, sped past the top of the lane, and was instantaneously lost to sight.

"One would think he was riding for his life," said Tom. "However, he is past, so we will jog on quietly behind him."

Just then the silence of the night was broken in upon by another sound.

This was the loud report of a firearm of some description, and scarcely had the report ceased before it was followed by another.

Then our friends fancied they heard a cry of pain.

"By Jove," said Tom, "he has stopped!"

He alluded to the traveller.

The next moment, however, the sound of a horse's hoofs could be heard as distinctly as ever.

"No, no," murmured his companions.

"But he is coming back now," said Tom. "What on earth is the meaning of this?"

There could be no doubt as to the truth of what Tom said.

The traveller was evidently galloping back at the same tremendous rate.

Tom King pressed forward a little nearer to the high-road, and this time caught sight of him.

The clouds, which up to then had covered the sky completely, parted in one spot, or, rather, the moon happened to shine through a portion of the clouds less dense than the remainder.

By the dim light thus shed upon the earth, Tom perceived, to his astonishment, that the traveller was seated in a most peculiar position on his steed.

His head was bent over towards the horse's neck, and his arms seemed to hang helpless by his sides.

Then, scarcely able to restrain a cry, Tom perceived him sway backward and forwards in such a manner as to place him in imminent danger of losing his balance.

Another roll to one side, and then, with a crash, the traveller fell into the roadway.

His foot was entangled in the stirrup, and the frightened horse galloped on.

Only for a few paces, however.

The gallant creature, with the rare instinct of its race, knowing that something was amiss with its rider, stood stone still.

Amazed at this occurrence, Tom was about to hasten to the stranger's assistance, when he heard another horseman approaching, so, acting upon the impulse of the moment, he stood still, and waited for him to approach.

This second horseman came on more carefully than the first, yet the speed he made was very great.

All at once, however, he appeared to catch sight of the prostrate form in the roadway and the horse standing near it, for he uttered a faint cry, and slackened the pace of his own steed.

Less than a minute sufficed for him to reach the spot where the first traveller lay.

In a moment he flung himself from the saddle almost before his horse had stopped.

From his pocket he produced a lantern, and, drawing back the slide, turned the rays full upon the face of the fallen man.

"Right," he said—"I am right."

He stooped down as if about to pick up something.

At this moment the prostrate stranger groaned.

Seeing this, Tom considered he had remained a passive spectator long enough.

Dismounting with ease and rapidity from his steed, he ran on tiptoe towards the spot where these events were taking place.

The second traveller was stooping down over the first, so Tom had him decidedly at an advantage.

With a powerful grasp, he seized him by the back of the neck.

With a yell of fear, this man raised himself, and endeavoured to twist his head round so as to obtain a view of his assailant.

In vain, however.

In his sudden fright he let go the lantern, but luckily it chanced to fall in an almost upright position.

Some of the rays fell upon the dress of the first traveller, and no sooner did he perceive it, than Tom King uttered an ejaculation.

"A messenger," he cried—"a royal messenger! I know the livery well."

These words reached the ears of his two friends, as he fully intended they should, and they both hastened towards him.

"Yes," said Sixteen-String Jack, as soon as he arrived, "it's a King's messenger, sure enough. And look—what's this?"

He picked up the lantern, and turned its rays upon the second traveller, who held in his hands a little leathern bag, attached to which was a strap so that it could be slung across his shoulders.

"Why, that's his despatch," said Tom. "Seize it this moment!"

The second traveller resisted, holding tightly to the strap.

But Claude, with ready thought, drew his sword and severed it.

Finding himself thus foiled, the stranger, with a sudden cry of rage, made a tremendous effort to release himself from Tom's detaining grasp.

Luckily for him, it happened that our friend was not quite so vigilant as he should have been, his attention was being too much given to the proceedings of his comrades.

The consequence was that the effort was successful.

No sooner, however, did he break from his hold, than Tom drew forth a pistol.

"Hold!" he cried—"stop this moment, or I fire! Stop, I say! The consequences of refusal will be on your own head!"

But the flying man paid no attention to these words, and Tom, hastily levelling his pistol at the rapidly-retreating figure, pulled the trigger.

There was a loud report, followed by a screaming cry, then all was still.

If there had been any doubt as to the identity of the wounded man, it would have been set at rest by a glance at the leather bag Claude had obtained.

On one side it was mounted with the royal arms in silver, and over the lock on the other side were the same figures, only smaller.

Our friends looked at each other in bewildered surprise, as well they might, for so suddenly had all this occurred that they were scarcely able to come to any conclusion respecting it.

That the King's messenger had been shot down by the second traveller, who had been waiting in ambush for him, seemed pretty evident, and that he was anxious to obtain possession of the leather bag was equally clear—that, in fact, constituted the motive for the crime.

Whether the messenger was dead or only wounded our friends at present knew not.

Asking for the lantern, however, Tom King stooped down in the endeavour to ascertain.

The roadway all around was dyed with blood, which poured at an alarming rate from two wounds in the messenger's breast.

Tom King turned up the messenger's coat in such a manner as to cover them, and pressed his hand upon it.

By this means the flow of blood was temporarily checked.

"Speak," he said—"speak if you have the power. The man who shot you down is baffled, the letter-bag is safe. Have you any request to make?"

The man struggled painfully to speak.

He fought wildly with his hands, plucking at his throat as though there was some obstruction there impeding speech.

At last, in scarcely articulate accents, he pronounced the words:

"Newgate—Newgate—New——"

He stopped.

A gush of blood issued from his lips, and with a convulsive shuddering of the limbs he fell back dead.

CHAPTER DCCCLXXI.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN WITNESS ANOTHER STRANGE SIGHT ON THEIR WAY TO LONDON

When the first shock of horror and surprise was over, Tom King bent down over the body of the unfortunate messenger.

His object was to ascertain whether life was yet extinct.

He hoped that there might be some flutterings of existence that might be temporarily increased in strength.

The man had said too little.

It was necessary that many questions should be answered before the minds of the highwaymen could be completely set at rest.

One glance at the fallen jaw and the filmy eyes assured Tom that this hope was over.

The immortal essence had for ever gone.

"He is dead, comrades," he said, as he resumed an erect position. "This is a black piece of work, and as yet I can scarcely comprehend it."

"Nor I," said Claude and Jack.

There was a pause, for Tom wondered what should be the next step he should take.

He asked the opinion of his comrades upon it.

"My friends," he said, "what are we to do next? In what way shall we act, and what effect do you imagine this occurrence may have upon our future plans?"

"It will require time to think over these things," said Claude, "don't you think so, Jack?"

"I do indeed, and if, Tom, you would be guided by me, and——"

"What is it you advise?"

"Why, that without further delay we make the best of our way to the White Horse Inn, at the risk——"

"Never mind the risk."

"Let us go—let us lay all the facts before old Matthew, and let us hear what he has to say respecting them."

"I can think of nothing better," said Tom. "But are we to leave this poor fellow here?"

"No; and yet I do not see how we can be of any benefit to him."

"No, nor I either, only we may draw him on one side out of the way, so that he may escape further injury from any chance passenger."

"Yes, yes—by all means we will do that, and we will fasten his horse close by, leaving those who find him to place what construction they please upon the whole matter."

This suggestion was promptly carried out.

Despite the repugnance they could not help feeling at handling a dead body, the King's messenger was carefully raised and placed in a leaning position against a little embankment at one side of the highway.

His horse, which had stood perfectly still during the whole of the time, they secured to the low-lying branch of a tree, and so left him.

Just as they remounted their steeds and were about to turn away, Tom exclaimed:

"There's one point which I should like to have set at rest."

"What is that?"

"Why, to what extent my shot was effectual! I wonder where the assassin is, and who he can be?"

"It is easy to ride back a little way," said Claude; "and, precious as time is, I think it will be worth our while to do so."

"So do I," cried Tom. "Follow me—it will occupy scarcely a moment."

They rode off along the highway in the direction the assassin had taken until, having reached the spot where they believed Tom's bullet had struck him, they paused.

They still retained the lantern, and by its aid they perceived upon the ground a few dark red spots of blood.

Looking further, they saw that a hole had been forced in the hedge, and to one of the sharp, prickly boughs a shred of clothing was adhering.

This shred they took and carefully stowed away.

Beyond was a large field.

They looked at each other irresolutely.

Tom found that his companions were evidently waiting for him to speak, and so he said:

"I fancy the rascal is only slightly hurt, and by this time he may have got to some place of shelter, where he would, ten to one, remain and defy all our attempts at discovery. Unwillingly, then, I propose that we leave him to his fate."

"And so do we."

"Then forward, for, believe me, I am to the full as anxious to reach London as you possibly can be yourselves."

Again putting their horses to a sharp trot, they journeyed in the direction of the metropolis, exchanging but few words on the way.

Tom was wondering where horses could be bestowed in safety.

He had some dim recollection that there was a stable in the neighbourhood of Clare Market, the occupier of which was in league with old Matthew.

Vainly, however, did Tom try to remember any further particulars, and finally he was compelled to abandon the effort in despair.

Yet in his own mind he decided that they should make their way to the White Horse by the back way.

They would then be less likely to be observed by any of the officers.

So deeply absorbed was Tom by his reflections, that he paid no attention whatever to anything around him.

All at once he was aroused by ejaculations from his companions, who with one accord reined in their horses.

"What is it?" he asked, following their example instinctively—"what's amiss?"

"Look there!" said Claude, pointing with his whip. "Is it possible you did not notice it?"

Tom glanced quickly in the direction indicated, and then ceased to be surprised at his companions' astonishment.

They had now arrived within view of that ill-omened spot Tyburn.

In journeying to London they could not avoid passing by it.

Generally their gaze was half-averted as they passed by, and indeed on most occasions the darkness was so intense that it was more by imagination than actual vision that they saw the dismal-looking blackened beams.

But now Tyburn Tree presented a very different appearance.

It was lighted up by the fierce red glow of a fire, the light of which shone with picturesque and rembrandt-like effect upon the ancient timber.

The tree was cleared—that is to say, none of its horrible fruit was dependent from it.

For some time Tom and his companions remained quite still gazing upon this strange spectacle.

"What does it mean?" asked Tom King at last, in a subdued voice. "How strange!"

"Very," responded Claude; "but I am as much in the dark as you are."

"So am I," added Sixteen-String Jack, "but let us creep a little closer, and then, in all probability, we shall ascertain."

Without a dissentient word this suggestion was acted upon.

Allowing their horses to proceed at a walk only, the highwaymen gradually drew closer and closer to the ghastly spot.

At length they reached a point from which a distinct and perfect view could be obtained, and then they at once met with the solution to what had looked a short time before so incomprehensible.

Encamped round Tyburn Tree was a strong detachment of soldiers, and for their own comfort they had kindled two or three blazing fires.

The effect indeed was pleasant to behold, for the firelight flickered prettily upon the polished accoutrements of the soldiers.

Their arms were all piled, and the men stood about in clusters here and there quite at their ease.

Outside could be perceived the dark forms of many other persons, in all perhaps two hundred.

"It's clear enough now," said Tom King, as he set his horse in motion, "Tom Davis's information was correct. To-morrow is appointed for Dick's execution, and these preparations are being made for it."

"Yes, no doubt."

"And," continued Tom, "the authorities have evidently made up their minds that the law shall take effect. Those soldiers have been sent in anticipation of the gathering of a large crowd between now and morning. Whenever it becomes necessary they will form an impregnable square around Tyburn Tree, and so keep the mob from pressing too closely upon it."

"Yes, yes—that's it. Come on—we've seen enough."

"We have," said Sixteen-String Jack; "but if I live, the authorities shall be baulked, even though it be at the last moment, and in spite of all these extra precautions that they have taken."

"So say I," cried Claude, heartily, "and yet that sight yonder shows that they are terribly in earnest. It won't be a trifle that will stop them."

"True," said Tom King. "But forward now, and let us waste no more breath in conversation. I have already decided where to go and what to do, so follow me and all will be well in that respect."

His two companions complied without another syllable

Riding direct into Lincoln's Inn Fields, then a very lonely, unfrequented place after nightfall, he turned to the right, and the highwaymen soon found themselves in the midst of the narrow insalubrious streets in that locality.

In Vere Street, at the corner of a narrow turning, stood a large public-house, and, upon reaching it, Tom saw at a glance that there was accommodation for horses.

Turning up this narrow street, he quickly paused in front of some large gates, which were closed.

A ring at the bell brought the ostler forward.

Tom spoke in quick, authoritative tones.

"Here—be quick," he cried, "take charge of these three horses. We shall be back soon—perhaps in half an hour, or it may be less or more; but have the horses ready, and it will be something in your pocket."

Without waiting for any reply to these orders, the highwaymen all alighted from their steeds, and strode off in the direction of Drury Lane.

The ostler was quite surprised at the whole transaction, or rather at the suddenness of it.

But grumbling something or other, unintelligible to anyone but himself, he took hold of the horses by their bridles and led them through the gateway.

All three of our friends looked after their steeds wistfully.

Great indeed would have been their satisfaction could they have seen them safely housed, and known just where to find them.

The attempt at this, however, might prove an additional source of danger.

The ostler, or some other person, might see and recognise them.

The distance to White Horse Yard was now insignificant—a few hundred yards brought the highwaymen to the extremity of it.

On their way, without appearing to do so, they kept a vigilant look-out, but saw nothing whatever of a character to excite their suspicions.

Pausing at the little door in the wall that has been so often mentioned, Tom pressed upon the secret spring, and waited with anxiety for the result.

[THE GOVERNOR'S MIDNIGHT INTERVIEW WITH DICK TURPIN IN HIS CELL.]

Scarcely a moment elapsed before they heard the sound of a footstep.

The door was cautiously opened a little way, and old Matthew's form appeared.

He recognised our friends at a glance.

"Come in," he said. "Quick—quick! The sooner the better, or you may be seen! I have been watching for you for hours and hours. Come in!"

Wondering why he had been waiting, for they were not conscious of having made any appointment, and besides, never dreaming of repairing to the White Horse by daylight, the highwaymen obeyed him by stepping as rapidly as they could across the threshold.

"Why, Matthew," they asked, "what is it?"

"Don't speak now. This way. One more minute, and we shall be in comfort; not that there will be any time for talk; you must employ the next few hours in earnest action."

"We are quite ready, Matthew," was the reply. "But, first of all, there is an important matter which must be discussed by all of us, and to which I trust you will give your best attention, in order that you may advise us how to proceed."

"You may depend upon that," replied old Matthew, in a tone of seriousness that was indeed unusual with him. "There—there, now we are all right, and need fear no interruption. Say on. I am burning with curiosity to know what it is you wish to impart."

CHAPTER DCCCLXXII.

TOM KING ANNOUNCES HIS INFLEXIBLE DETERMINATION TO HIS COMRADES AND OLD MATTHEW.

WHILE this brief conversation was going on, old Matthew hurried his three visitors across the yard and into the little private room behind the bar where he had so often held conferences with the highwaymen, and where, as we know, he had such an elaborate piece of mechanism to warn him of the entrance of any police officers or suspicious person into the house.

"Speak low," he said, as the highwaymen seated themselves around the fire, which they were glad to do, for the night was chilly—"not a soul knows of your arrival, I firmly believe, and, if you are only ordinarily careful, we shall settle everything with comfort."

"But, first of all," said Tom, "satisfy me on a point which puzzles me completely."

"Well, what is it?"

"Why, you said you had been waiting for us—what made you expect we should arrive? The resolution was only made, I might say, at the last moment."

"Why," said old Matthew, "simply because Dick has sent here several times to-day to know whether there was any intelligence for him or not. Of course there was none, and that made me in momentary expectation of some of you."

"Then he is still in Newgate?"

"Yes, he was less than an hour ago, and I daresay is now; and, speaking candidly, there I think he is likely to remain, unless you can contrive to get him out by main force or stratagem."

"Has there been any communication from the King?"

"None that I have heard of."

"Then Davis's forebodings are only too true. But stay, it will save time if I begin at the beginning and tell you all."

Old Matthew nodded, as though he fully believed this.

Accordingly, Tom commenced relating to Dick's old friend all those events with which the reader has already been made acquainted.

There is no necessity for repeating his brief summary of them.

To the account of the assassination old Matthew listened with the keenest interest, and asking many questions with the view of eliciting every detail.

"Now you know all," said Tom, in conclusion, "and, such being the case, think the whole over and give us your advice."

"I will. But hush!—wait an instant."

All this time old Matthew's eyes had been directed to one particular part of the wall, the spot indeed that was occupied by the supposititious clock.

As usual, the clock showed the hour of six, but just as Matthew spoke, the hand dropped to the quarter past.

The highwaymen had all been made familiar with this piece of mechanism, and they gazed upon it with mingled interest and admiration.

"Just keep quiet," said old Matthew. "There's some one standing at the bar to drink—I wonder who it is? Ah! look there."

The hand dropped to the half hour.

An anxious look settled upon all their countenances.

"Something suspicious," said old Matthew. "This is what I feared—I was afraid the coming and going of that jailer so frequently would be noticed. Depend upon it, some police officer has seen him, and now they are again on the alert. We may have some trouble—not that it would matter on any other night than the present, for I could baffle them easily; but now every moment is precious indeed."

So the highwaymen felt, and they remained with their eyes fixed upon the dial-plate with an intensity that can scarcely be imagined.

Suddenly there was a simultaneous cry of relief.

The long hand flew back to its original position, and the clock again showed the hour of six.

"All right so far," said Matthew, settling himself more comfortably in his chair. "A false alarm, I suppose—nothing more."

"But is the danger over, think you?"

"For the present, I can answer most certainly in the affirmative, and should anything fresh arise, fear not that we should receive timely intimation of it."

With this assurance, the highwaymen were satisfied, and now they remained waiting, with no small amount of anxiety, for old Matthew to communicate his views upon the subject laid before him.

Before he spoke, he took hold of the letter-bag, which, we need scarcely say, had been carefully taken care of by the highwaymen.

He turned it over and over several times, looking longingly at the lock, and making one or two feeble attempts to open it.

"If I could only peep inside," he said, "then our doubts would be at rest—we should know just what to do. The royal arms are on it. There's a letter inside evidently from the King to the Governor of Newgate, the question is, does it concern the captain? Is it the order for his release?"

Old Matthew twisted the letter-bag over and over again.

"That's just the question," said Tom King, leaning forward in his earnestness. "I wish with all my heart that we could ascertain that."

"It is impossible, I fear," returned Matthew. "To open this bag would be, in my opinion, in the highest degree dangerous; the Governor would know then that something was amiss."

"But what baffles me," said Claude Duval, "is the assassination of the messenger. By whom could that have been perpetrated, and what was the object? Certainly we know so far as this, that it was intended to prevent the delivery of the letter-bag."

"That, I fear, will remain an unexplained mystery we may conjecture something upon it, and yet be all the time far from the truth. The principal thing to me appears to be what shall we do with the letter-bag?"

"And to me also," said Tom King. "Let us fix our attention upon that."

There was a long pause.

It was broken by old Matthew.

"As it is unwise, if not impossible, to open this bag and glean the nature of its contents, the question is, shall we deliver it at the prison and wait a short time and ascertain the effect produced by it? If none at all, why, then we must make up our minds to some desperate proceeding."

"It seems so," answered Tom. "But I confess my own uneasiness increases rather than abates. In such a case the only thing that we could do would be to attempt a rescue at Tyburn, and I sadly fear that, however well that might be organised, it would fail; the authorities have been served that trick once, and what we saw to-night proves clearly that they will be prepared at all points for resistance."

An ominous silence followed this speech, from which it might be inferred that its truth could not be disputed by anyone present.

Again their attention was distracted by the dial-plate.

The hand fell rapidly to the quarter, and from the quarter to the half-hour, as before.

"Confound it!" said old Matthew, angrily. "There's some one lurking about, I am quite sure of it. However, keep still, there's no cause for immediate apprehension; perhaps the danger will pass away as before."

Had he expressed a wish to this effect its fulfilment would have been immediate, for even while he spoke the clock signalled "all well."

"It is best to be over cautious," he said. "I have given strict injunctions. Better a thousand false alarms than to be kept a moment too late."

"Oh, certainly," said Tom—"most certainly!" And while he spoke he rose to his feet.

There was an air of determination about him which all immediately noticed, and long before he spoke they knew that he had formed a settled resolution.

"My mind is made up," he said—"firmly made up. That letter-bag shall be delivered, and we will run the risk for an hour or two of the effect it produces. Give it here, Matthew, I will take it myself."

"You take it?" ejaculated Matthew. "Nonsense—you are mad! I will never suffer such a thing!"

"I am in earnest," said Tom, "and nothing in the world shall cause me to change my decision. Give it to me; I shall not be content until I know for certain that it is delivered safely. And how can I be so well assured of that as I shall be if I place it in the Governor's hands myself?"

"But it is outrageous—impossible!" cried old Matthew, excitedly. "Even if this bag contains the message we so earnestly wish for, you will only be thrusting your own neck into the noose."

"No matter," said Tom, if possible more firmly than before—"no matter, my mind is made up! I will go! Yes, I would not shrink even though I felt certain that my instant death followed the delivery of the bag. Now you know my determination, and words and entreaties will be alike powerless to turn me from it."

A dead silence followed the utterance of these words, and old Matthew suffered Tom King to take the letter-bag from his hands, not making a further show of resistance.

"This should be done alone," Tom went on; "and if I am successful, you will shortly be aware of it."

At this juncture, however, Claude and Jack warmly interposed.

"No, no, Tom," they said; "we are willing to give in to you to almost any extent, but we cannot allow you to have things entirely your own way. No, no; not by any means. We have heard your decision; now hear ours. If you persevere in your intention, we will accompany you on this the most perilous and rash adventure we have yet undertaken."

"Be it so, then," said Tom, and they could tell by his manner that he felt a secret pleasure at this manifestation of devotion—"be it so. I would allow no opposition myself, therefore I will offer none to you."

"Then it's settled," said Claude and Jack. "Now, Matthew, one glass, and we start. That will just allow us the opportunity to see that our weapons are in perfect order, for we may have to use them ere long."

"No remonstrances," broke in Tom King, sternly, fancying that Matthew was about to put in a protest—"no remonstrances. We will be deaf to all."

"I am sorry you are so headstrong," said Matthew, placing a glass before each—"very sorry; because, if I could only get you to see it, there would be very much more prudence and safety in my delivering this letter-bag than in your taking it, and I trust that the suggestion as I now make it will be acted upon."

"No, no, Matthew," said Tom King, "I must positively refuse you. I am Dick Turpin's best and nearest friend. We have been many a time in the utmost danger, and the one has never hesitated to sacrifice himself for the other. Dick's life is now at stake—literally, it is trembling in the balance. On such an occasion, then, I will yield the right of aiding him to no man, not even, Matthew, to you."

CHAPTER DCCCLXXIII.

GIVES A LONG, BUT NECESSARY, EXPLANATION RESPECTING THE ASSASSINATION OF THE KING'S MESSENGER.

In order not to leave any mystery unsolved, it may, perhaps, be as well in this place to interrupt the thread of the narrative, for a moment, to explain why, and by whom, the King's messenger had been assassinated.

It was not until afterwards, however, that the facts came to the knowledge of the highwaymen.

But still, it will be seen, their relation now will serve to make all perfectly clear.

The reader will remember Lord Spindelow, and with reference to whom it must be mentioned that he occupied a prominent position at court, and was indeed high in favour with the King.

Yet he was not satisfied; and hearing by chance of the existence of the mysterious letter, he, by a clever stratagem, gained possession of it, and then found himself in a position to exercise unlimited power, not only over the mysterious lady, but over the King himself.

It must be understood, though, that while he held unlawful possession of this letter, no opportunity arose for him to make use of it.

Willis was one of the King's personal attendants, and, by various means, Lord Spindelow had won him over entirely to his interests, employing him generally to act as spy upon his royal master.

On the evening that Tom King had his strange interview with royalty, Willis applied his ear to the keyhole of the conservatory door, and managed to glean something of the matters that were discussed between them.

Lord Spindelow was at the time absent from the castle, but on his return on the following day, he was at once made acquainted with everything.

In London his lordship had learned with unfeigned delight that Dick Turpin was at last a prisoner in Newgate, and that he would inevitably perish at Tyburn.

It may be guessed how revengeful and bitter would be his feelings towards him; and, indeed, it was with difficulty that he could restrain himself from paying a visit to Newgate, in order to exult over him.

No sooner did he hear that the King had promised to liberate Dick Turpin than he was frantic with rage.

But, in such a position, what was he to do to help himself?

Dark thoughts quickly rose in his mind, especially when he learned that a messenger had already been despatched.

He did not hesitate then to form a bloodthirsty resolution.

Obtaining a fleet horse, he started off in pursuit of the messenger; but owing to the latter having paused at a small inn lying a little way off the road—where, in fact, there was a pretty daughter to whom he paid his attentions at every opportunity—Lord Spindelow missed him, and did not discover the fact until, at a hard gallop, he performed nearly the whole of the journey to London.

Then he reined up and looked about him with the intention of riding back slowly in order to meet the man he wanted.

His calculation was that if he could assassinate this man, destroy the letter, and hide all traces of his crime, Dick Turpin's execution would take place before there would be time to communicate again with the King.

Then, as for the discovery of the murder, he hoped to avoid all the consequences resulting from the same.

This, then, gives us the necessary clue.

We have seen how the unfortunate messenger fell into the ambuscade laid for him, and how the bullet which Lord Spindelow despatched upon its deadly errand did its work.

When Tom fired, the bullet from his pistol struck his lordship near the shoulder, inflicting a painful and dangerous-looking wound. But aware of the consequences that would follow his discovery and recognition, he felt himself moved to double strength to make the effort to escape, and so he forced his way through the hedge, and staggered rather than walked across a field.

Here he came to another hedge, through which he made his way with still more difficulty.

Then another field, and afterwards he perceived a light gleaming in the darkness.

Doubting not that it proceeded from the window of some cottage, he struggled painfully on in the hope of reaching it at every step.

He felt, however, that his strength was rapidly leaving him.

Finding this to be the case, oaths and curses of the most horrible description issued from his lips.

What angered him more than all was the knowledge that, after having committed the crime of murder, he had been foiled at last.

His eyes grew dizzy, and it was with difficulty he made out the objects by which he was surrounded.

Suddenly he stumbled, and the shock this gave him seemed to revive him a little.

Greatly to his surprise, he found that he had reached the rude palisading with which the garden of the cottage was surrounded.

He could see the humble little habitation plainly enough now, and, still holding by the palisades, crept on slowly in the hope of finding the gate.

He was successful.

Pushing it open, and leaving a trail of blood behind him as he went, he staggered up to the door.

He tried to knock, but his strength failed him, and he fell with a dull, lumbering sound against the panel.

A faint scream came from the interior of the cottage.

Then the door was unbolted.

No sooner was the fastening removed than the weight of Lord Spindelow's body forced the door open with great violence, and he fell heavily upon the threshold.

The greatest consternation was created in the house by the occurrence of this event.

But when their first alarm was over, the inmates turned their attention to the wounded stranger.

Gently they raised him and carried him towards the fire.

They saw that blood was pouring from the wound, and tried in vain to check it.

They called upon him, and entreated him to speak, disclosing his name and place of abode.

But his lordship's tongue was silenced for ever; he could only move his lips in vain attempts at articulation.

By the shape of his lips, however, the people fancied that he asked for water, and so a small quantity was brought and placed to his lips.

He drank it eagerly, and no sooner had he done so than, as is frequently the case under such circumstances, he drew a deep breath and expired.

It was terrible and strange to think he should be overtaken by a retribution of this kind.

He had perished as nearly as possible as the man had perished he had so cowardly assassinated.

The poor inhabitants of the cottage were not a little alarmed at such an incident as this.

For aught they knew, they might be regarded with suspicion, and have some difficulty in clearing themselves.

Searching in the pockets of the deceased, they found papers which disclosed his name, and title, and all the information they required.

The knowledge that he was a nobleman only increased their terror, for they know there would be a great outcry respecting his death.

The particulars of the tragedy in the high-road, however, never came to their ears.

Lord Spindelow's relatives were communicated with, and the body removed.

Then it was that Willis, finding himself freed from his hard taskmaster, confessed all to the King.

Could the unscrupulous nobleman have succeeded in his design of intercepting the messenger's letter-bag, there is no doubt that Dick Turpin would have perished, for the King, having despatched the letter, would probably have thought no more upon the subject.

We have yet to describe how the letter-bag was delivered, and the effects produced by it.

As will be seen, it was the means of bringing upon the highwaymen no small amount of danger.

Not to anticipate, however, we will go back to the White Horse, and relate what followed Tom King's declaration as to his intentions regarding his comrade.

Having spoken as he did with great firmness and dignity, he glanced around upon the friends who stood near him, as if daring them to raise a word by way of objection.

Perhaps they felt this. At any rate, a silence of some moments ensued, which was at last broken by old Matthew himself.

CHAPTER DCCCLXXIV.

THE HIGHWAYMEN DELAY THEIR DEPARTURE FROM THE WHITE HORSE UNTIL TOO LATE.

"Well, Tom," he said, "a wilful man must have his own way, and so I suppose you will. As to duty or right, I say nothing at all, my only wish being to propose that which is most likely to secure the safety of all."

"I know that, Matthew. But I am so firmly bent upon this enterprise, and I am so fully possessed with the value of this leather bag that I cannot think of allowing it to be delivered by any other hand than my own."

"Well, then," said Matthew, "since that is the case, I can only wish you good luck. Let me recommend you to start at once, for the sooner Dick is out the better."

"Decidedly. Come, comrades, are you ready?"

"We are, quite."

"This way, then," said Matthew—"this way."

While he spoke, a faint clicking sound was heard

He started, and looked towards the clock.

The finger then stood at the quarter past, and just as he was raising his finger it described a complete semi-circle, stopping at a quarter to seven.

"There is danger—immediate danger," he said, in a tone of vexation. "Confound it! What a pity it is we have wasted so much time in discussion! But for that, you might have started ten minutes ago, and there would have been no trouble at all."

"But we must make the best of it."

"I know that. This way—this way. I wish I could stop to give you some instructions, but I can't. You must just be content to remain here."

With that rapidity which always characterised his movements whenever danger was pressing, old Matthew had crossed the parlour towards the fireplace.

Then, very much to the surprise of the highwaymen, who wondered what he was going to do, he seized hold of one end of the chimney-piece, and pulled with all his might.

A most singular result followed.

The whole of the fireplace, fire and all, came out bodily, turning on hinges fixed at the opposite side of the chimney-piece to that at which Matthew was pulling. The effect, indeed, was just the same as if the whole of the fireplace had been a door.

A dark, uncomfortable-looking cavity could be seen behind.

The highwaymen hung back a little.

"In there," said old Matthew—"in there—it is your only chance—and remain until I come to you again."

"But——" began Tom.

"No remonstrances—in with you! Hark! Can't you hear them now?"

Footsteps indeed could be plainly heard, mingled with voices.

Matthew thrust the highwaymen almost into the hiding-place, then, with one quick movement, restored the fireplace to its original condition.

It was done instantaneously, and no trace whatever was left to show that it had ever been disturbed.

Surely, if any hiding-place would escape the acuteness of the officers, that would.

All this, that has taken so many words to describe, actually took place in a briefer period of time than would perhaps be imagined; in fact, before anyone at a moderate speed could have counted twenty, the highwaymen were securely hidden.

Old Matthew, not losing his presence of mind in the least, nor becoming flurried, turned round to the table and picked up the glasses that had just been used.

He was in the act of doing this when the door of the parlour was dashed violently open, and several police officers appeared.

From the way in which they glanced around the room, and the disappointed look which settled upon their countenances, it was evident that they fully expected to find some one else there than the landlord.

Old Matthew affected to be taken completely by surprise.

He let one of the glasses slip from his fingers, and it fell to the floor with a crash.

Then, stepping back, he ejaculated:

"Goodness gracious, men, how you startled me, to be sure! I never expected such a thing. Why, what on earth is the matter?"

"Matter?" said the officer in command. "We know you are up to your old tricks again; but mark me, old fellow—you have been successful for a long time, but you will be caught at last."

"Not by you, though," said Matthew, calmly.

"I don't know that," said the officer. "At any rate, I command you, upon pain of immediate arrest, to remain where you are. Sit down in the chair, and don't leave it."

"But what for?" asked old Matthew. "Why should you take these proceedings against me?"

"Simply because we intend to search this house."

"What, again?"

"Yes, again. It is only by repeatedly doing it that we can hope to succeed at last, and I want you there, and I want to keep my eyes upon you, so that you do nothing towards hiding anybody."

"And who should I hide?"

"Oh, you know best how to answer that question, but on one point I am quite confident."

"May I inquire what that is?"

"Yes, certainly you may."

"Well, then, what is it?"

"Why, I know, by my own observation, that you have been in continual communication with Dick Turpin in Newgate. Don't deny it, because, if you do, it will be equivalent to calling me a liar. Now, I want to know what the communication was about."

Old Matthew shook his head slowly backwards and forwards.

"What do you mean by that?"

"Why, you see," said Matthew, "you have placed me in a very awkward position."

"Indeed!—how?"

Why, by not permitting me to deny it."

"Would you have the audacity?"

"Yes, certainly I would, and I assure you that you must have been deceived in some way—how, I can't pretend to tell. But why do you think I should have any communication with the prisoner?"

"Oh, it's all very fine, Matthew; but I've heard your character over and over again, and mark me this—you will have to be ten times more careful and clever than ever you have been to escape us. Let us once catch you, and see if we are not down on you."

"I don't doubt it," said Matthew; "but I take all such threats with composure—I am not at all afraid."

"Well, confound your impudence!" said the officer. "One would think, to hear you speak, that you were a much-injured man, and never credit that this house is known throughout London as being one of the chief resorts of all members of the 'Family,' and especially the flash ones."

"I have enemies," said Matthew, with a sigh—"men who will say anything against me. Will you allow me to ask you one question?"

"Oh yes, by all means."

"Well, then, have you or any other officer ever found anything to warrant your suspicions when making a search in my house?"

"Yes, plenty to make us suspicious," was the answer; "but, luckily for you, we have not been able to get at the proofs."

"Oh, that's the way with you," said Matthew. "But just tell me what you expect to find."

"Well, then, I don't mind if I do. We expect to find some of Dick Turpin's comrades here, and if they are beneath this roof—as we firmly believe them to be—we will have them."

"And why do you imagine such an unlikely thing as that?" said Matthew.

"Unlikely? What other conclusion could we come to upon finding that a turnkey was running backwards and forwards between here and Newgate all the time? You, I daresay, have not had a direct communication with the prisoner, but, then, does it not point to the fact that there is some one in this house, interested in his fate, who has?"

Old Matthew regarded the officer with admiration.

Then drawing a long breath and shaking his head, he said, emphatically:

"Oh! it's a pity—a great pity."

"What's a pity?"

"Why, that men should mistake their vocations. Now, what a mistake you must have made in becoming a police officer."

"Bah! nonsense!"

"I stick to it," said Matthew; "just think what a lawyer you would have made if you had only given your attention to it; I never heard anybody speak so much like one in my life, never—never."

The officer hardly knew whether to feel flattered or offended at these remarks.

Accordingly he passed them over without notice.

"To the point, Matthew," he said. "You are very likely surprised that I should be remaining here like this talking to you so quietly; but just let me alarm you a little."

"Alarm me?" repeated Matthew, with a start.

"Yes; while I am here keeping such good watch on all your movements, a lot of my men are round the building, some more are searching the cellars, some more are searching the rooms upstairs, and others are on the roof."

"Of course you have a warrant?"

"Oh yes, I have a warrant; don't think I should put myself in the power of such a dangerous customer as you are. No, no—I know better than that."

"Well," said Matthew, "I hope the search will soon be over, and that you will leave me in peace."

"The search will soon be over," said the officer—"that is, if we find those we are in search of, and in the event of so doing, why, off you go along with us, and your business may take care of itself as best it may."

Matthew smiled.

"I am content" he said—"quite content. And so I am to sit in this chair during your good will and pleasure?"

"Yes."

"Oh, it might be worse—much worse; perhaps you don't object to my drawing a little nearer to the fire?"

"Oh no."

"Well, that's a comfort; I am just going to finish my glass; perhaps you would all like a drop of something?"

The officers behind their chief in a moment looked as though they should very much.

"Well," said the one in command, stroking his chin, "just a little perhaps wouldn't be amiss."

"Very likely," said Matthew, changing his tone and speaking with resolution; "but I'll tell you what it is, Mr. Officers, I'll see you all jolly well d—d before you have a drop of anything that's in my house, except, mind you, when you succeed in capturing those you speak of, and then, why you shall be welcome to the best there is in the cellar, and to as much of it as you can drink."

"Yes, we know that," said the officer, pretending not to look disappointed; "you wouldn't be able to help yourself then, old fellow; we should have it all our own way—not that I wanted a drop, and I'm sure not one of my men does. But you will do yourself no good, so mark that. If ever I can once catch you, you shall pay dearly for it."

"Ah, I shouldn't wonder," said old Matthew, sipping his brandy-and-water with an air of satisfaction that was aggravating indeed to the officers, and especially when he smacked his lips as if to say "that's good." "They are a long while upstairs," he added; "perhaps they may be longer, so if you have no objections, gentlemen, I will have a quiet smoke and soothe my nerves."

CHAPTER DCCCLXXV.

THE POLICE OFFICER AND OLD MATTHEW HAVE RATHER A STRANGE CONVERSATION WITH EACH OTHER.

With the greatest possible composure, old Matthew filled his pipe, lighted it, and leaned back in his chair with the air of a man who was bent upon enjoying himself.

The police officers evidently looked upon his coolness with great misgivings.

"Surely," they thought, "if he has anyone concealed upon the premises he could not remain so indifferent as he appeared to be."

Had they not known old Matthew so well as they did, they would have been still more of this opinion.

But they were well aware that he was as cunning as a fox, and quite capable of acting in this manner on purpose to throw them off their guard.

The fact was, Matthew felt quite secure in the excellence of the hiding-place he had last devised.

He was perfectly certain that no one had the remotest idea of its existence except himself and those who were at that moment concealed.

Every now and then a lumbering sound would be heard above, followed by one below.

On such occasions Matthew would just glance up and down, but no more.

"You seem to take it d—d easy!" said the chief officer at length, for he was getting enraged.

So long a time had elapsed since his men begun to search, that he began to be terribly afraid that the chances of their finding anybody now were small indeed. No one's disappointment could be greater than his.

He had observed the friendly jailer going backwards and forwards, as he said, and had not unreasonably jumped to the conclusion that the reason was some of Dick Turpin's comrades were concealed at the White Horse.

Under this impression, he had succeeded in persuading his superiors to allow him to have the use of about twenty men to make a thorough search.

His request was granted with great reluctance, for the authorities were most anxious to keep the prisoner they had already secured, and to that end nearly the whole available force was occupied in watching Newgate; and the Governor had by no means exaggerated when he described how impossible it was for any living thing to leave the prison unseen.

At length the trampling of many feet could be heard upon the staircase.

Matthew looked up, and so did the officers.

Directly afterwards a knock was given at the door of the parlour, and several more police officers entered.

"Well, Jenkins," cried the chief, gruffly, "what is it—what's the result?"

"Beg pardon, sir," said Jenkins, touching his hat respectfully, "but I give you my word that we have searched every square inch upstairs, and can't find no traces of nobody."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite sure. There is not a corner in which a cat could have crept which we have not rigidly examined."

"Have you left anyone up?"

"No, sir—I began at the top and cleared the way before me."

Before the officer had time to make any further remark, those who had been searching in the cellars also appeared, and they brought with them the same tale.

Then the chief, looking towards old Matthew, said:

"You hear?"

"I do hear perfectly well. It's just what I expected. You wouldn't believe that I had no one concealed. I hope you are satisfied at last."

"Well, I don't know, Mr. Gale—I don't know! Could I have a word or two with you in private?"

"Oh, certainly, if you wish!"

"Well, then, I hope you will be attentive."

Then, turning to his men, he bade them depart, saying he would rejoin them presently.

Old Matthew wondered what was coming next.

The officer took a chair, and brought it close to the fire, and seated himself.

Little did he think that those of whom he was in search were at that very instant at little more than arm's-length from him.

"Matthew," he said, "I hope you will have a little serious talk with me—it is on a serious subject."

"Well, I don't mind," said Matthew. "Speak up!"

"I will. Now, I hope, in the first place, you won't feel flattered when I say that I believe you to be a very clever fellow—more clever than people generally are inclined to admit."

Matthew made a deprecating gesture.

"Oh, it's true—it's true," said the officer, "but the unfortunate thing is that you should have allowed your cleverness to run in the wrong direction. If you had sided with us instead of the 'family' it would have been a much better thing for you, and even now it is not too late, which brings me to what I was going to talk about."

Old Matthew remained silent.

The officer cleared his throat, and went on:

"In spite of my close search," he said, "I am not satisfied that the men I want are not hidden in this house—they are in some secure, out-of-the-way place. Now, assuming such to be the case, I will tell you what I propose, and which I have the best of authority for proposing."

"Proceed," said old Matthew, "I am paying every attention."

"No doubt you are. Well, then, my proposition is that you deliver those highwaymen over to us. You need not appear to do so—the fact of your complicity need never be known. A wink or a sign will be enough to let us know where to search. Then, if we capture them, well and good—they cannot blame you. Stop—stop," he added, hurriedly, perceiving that old Matthew was trying to interrupt him—"hear me out to the end! In return for this, supposing you are willing, I am empowered to offer you one half of the total reward—that is to say, seven hundred pounds, and not only that, a perfect immunity from all that you have done in the past, and with the probability of doing the same bit of business over again."

"And so you advise me to betray them?" said Matthew.

"Yes, certainly! And I daresay it strikes you as a singular thing that we officers should all be agreed to give you one half the reward, when in reality you will have so small a share in earning it?"

"Well, I am rather surprised, I confess."

"Perhaps you feel doubtful, but if you do you are wrong. Our reason is that we wish above all things to secure those offenders, and we don't think we can do it without your aid—that's the reason, for our continual failures have got us into such sad disgrace that nothing but this capture can put us right. I wish with all my heart that Dick Turpin was at liberty, so that we could have the chance of capturing him. I wonder what business a lot of gentlemen had to interfere, and so take the credit out of our hands?"

"Seven hundred and fifty pounds?" repeated Matthew musingly. "That's a large sum."

"Yes, a very large sum," said the officer, with glittering eyes, and speaking with some excitement—"such a sum as you don't often handle, I'll warrant. It would be more than the amount of a year's profits, if you did ever so good a trade, and be very much more than you could hope to get from the highwaymen for defending them, besides the risk you run of your own liberty."

"It's worth thinking over," said Matthew—"it's worth thinking over."

"Do you indeed think so?"

"Yes, I do."

"Well, then, so do I, and if you are wise you will think over it repeatedly. Perhaps you will be able to come to a decision at once?"

"Well, perhaps I should," was the answer, "only for one little difficulty that stands in the way."

"And what may that be?"

"Why, you ought to know perfectly well that the men you want are not here at the present moment, for if they were they could not escape the vigilant search of your men."

Upon receiving this reply, the officer looked at old Matthew keenly, as if doubtful as to his veracity.

"It is so," added our old friend, "and I don't mind saying that what you have just told me has made an impression. I didn't think of it before in that light, and I promise you to turn the matter over in my mind."

"Do so, and I am certain that reflection will bring you to the right decision. And now let us have a glass of something upon the good faith of what you say."

"I don't mind if I do."

Old Matthew rose from his seat and went into the bar, with the view of supplying his customer's wants.

When his back was turned, there was a peculiar smile upon his face—one which the officer probably would not have cared about seeing.

Having obtained what was requisite, Matthew stopped silently to the door of the parlour, and, just peeping in, saw that the officer had taken advantage of his absence to make a rigid search around.

Matthew darted into the room suddenly.

The officer, thus caught, looked rather confused.

"Ah!" said old Matthew—"doubtful still, I perceive. Well, one would think that, after having received so many proofs, you officers would be content to take my word."

"Oh, pooh! don't mention it," said the officer. "I could not resist the temptation of looking round me, and that's a fact."

"Well, don't let me interrupt you, then," said Matthew "Make no stranger of me. Search as long and as much as you are willing."

The confident, easy tone in which these words were spoken, and the coolness Matthew had displayed all along, brought the officer at last to the conviction that in one respect he had been mistaken.

If the highwaymen had been there, they were not at the inn now; but that a communication had been made with Dick in Newgate he was absolutely certain.

With cunning calculation, he made sure that more good was to be done by pretending to keep on a friendly footing with Matthew than by coming to an open rupture with him; and, indeed, the officer felt he had good cause to be satisfied with the impression he believed he had already made upon Matthew, for the temptation of handling seven hundred and fifty pounds was a very great one indeed.

It was not long after that the officer rose to take his departure.

Matthew rose also, determined to see him safely out of his house.

The officer, if he had any intentions of attempting to remain, abandoned them, for he walked out into Drury Lane and called his men around him.

Then, bidding farewell to Matthew, he marched off with them, our old friend standing on the steps of his house and watching them until the intervening houses hid them from his view.

Then, rubbing his hands briskly together, and with a smile of satisfaction on his lips, he turned round and hastened to the bar.

As he passed the girl who served the customers he said, in a hurried whisper:

"Are you quite sure all the officers have left the house?"

"I am not quite sure," was the response. "My belief is that one or more are in hiding somewhere."

"Well, well," said Matthew, "all you can do is to keep your eyes wide open. I will go back into the parlour, and if you see anything in the least degree suspicious, give the signal instantly. I shall be on the look-out. Don't be afraid of making a mistake. Better have a thousand false alarms than give the signal of danger too late."

CHAPTER DCCCLXXVI.

OLD MATTHEW RELEASES THE HIGHWAYMEN FROM THEIR PLACE OF CONCEALMENT, AND SHOWS THEM A NEW MODE OF LEAVING THE PREMISES.

KNOWING that he could place the fullest trust in his dependant, old Matthew turned at once into the parlour, closing the door carefully, and, for greater security, slipping a small bolt into its socket.

Before opening the secret hiding-place to conceal the highwaymen therein, he had taken care, by a rapid glance at the only window in the room, to ascertain that the shutters were close shut, so that there could be no overlooking him from that quarter.

He placed his hand upon the mantelpiece, and looked steadfastly at the little clock.

Finding the signal remained unchanged, he rapidly pulled the fireplace out, and liberated our friends, who were not a little rejoiced to make their escape.

"Are they gone, Matthew?" asked Tom, eagerly.

"I believe so. At any rate, all we have to do is to watch the dial."

"Yes, I know; but if you will tell me the best way to do it, I will leave the place at once. The night is wearing on, and there is no time to be lost."

"True," said Matthew; "and yet I should recommend you to wait for a few moments, in case any of the officers should yet be lurking about."

"We will stay, Matthew, if you think it best, of course."

"Well, do so, and tell me what you think of your hiding-place."

"Oh, excellent, so far as security goes; but decidedly unpleasant if you have to remain in it."

"And especially with such a roaring fire as you have now," said Claude. "It was decidedly uncomfortable."

"And hot as an oven," said Sixteen-String Jack, wiping the perspiration from his face.

"You must not mind such little drawbacks as those," said Matthew. "Is it not an excellent idea?"

"Most excellent; and I should think would have occurred to no other person than yourself."

"Oh, I don't know," said Matthew, modestly. "I was looking at the chimneypiece one day, and the notion came into my head: so I set to work, and accomplished it all with my own hands."

"Did you, indeed?"

"I did; and worked so well, that, in spite of the perpetual interruptions to which the officers subject me, I succeeded in completing it without the knowledge being shared in by anyone save myself."

"Well, it has done us a good turn," cried Tom, "there's no doubt about that."

"None; and it has amply repaid me for the trouble of constructing it. But," he added, "did you not overhear the conversation I had with the officer?"

"We did," said Tom, looking at him, searchingly; "every word of it."

"I thought you would," he answered, quietly. "You guessed my object in speaking as I did?"

"Well, scarcely."

"You did not think that I seriously intended to betray you?"

"No, no; I would never think that, Matthew, for if you played us false, we could never place dependence on any human being again."

"That's all right, then. It would have grieved me very much had you doubted me."

"But your object, Matthew, what was it?"

"Why, I thought if I pretended to fall in with their views that I should get on better than if I uttered a positive refusal. The officers, no doubt, will now hang off and on for a good while, expecting that, at the right moment, I shall deliver you into their hands. But there's no fear," he added; "I am only fooling them, as I have done many a time before."

"It was good policy to act in this manner," said Tom. "But now do you not think sufficient time has elapsed? I am growing uneasy, and anxious to leave."

"Yes, I think you may venture to go. But is there anything I can do for you during your absence?"

"Nothing that I know of," said Tom. "If I could only form some reasonable idea as to the contents of this letter, we should then be able to make a better arrangement. As it is, we must trust to chance, and leave things just as they are."

"Very well. But if there's any chance of my rendering you a service, don't fail to let me know."

"Rest assured of that. What time is it now?"

"Close upon half-past eleven."

"Is it indeed so late? Then it is really time we left, otherwise the Governor may not take it into his head to look at this letter till the morning."

"Come, then," said Matthew, taking down a key that was hanging on a nail, "you may as well go this way as any other."

While speaking, he advanced to the window, which he opened, and threw back the shutters.

"Now," he said "follow me through here and I will show you out by a fresh route."

With an agility and ease that, considering his size, were truly remarkable, old Matthew stepped on to a chair and passed through the window into the yard at the back.

The highwaymen followed immediately, and by his directions the window was closed again and the shutters put to.

"Now," he said, "there's a stable here, the existence of which is well enough known to the police, but the loft over it looks into a small yard at the back of a house in Blackmore Street. When you enter the stable, get up into the loft as quickly as possible, pass through the window I speak of, and drop into the yard just mentioned. Do you understand me?"

"Yes, perfectly."

"Then take this key, and with it unlock the door at the back of this house. Hang the key on a nail driven into the doorpost, and, having crossed the threshold, shut the door behind you, but don't fasten it on the inside."

"But what house is this, Matthew?"

"An empty one," he replied; "one that, by a lucky accident, was placed in my hands to let as soon as I could find a suitable tenant; but," he added with a chuckle, "it will be a long time before I find one, I'll warrant."

"You're sure the house is empty?" said Tom, laughing.

"Yes, quite sure. Walk boldly along the passage; there's nothing in the way, and you will come to the front door. It is fastened only by a latch, but that latch cannot be raised from the outside. Open the door cautiously, watch your opportunity, and emerge. Pull the door shut, and the latch will fasten itself. Then the rest depends upon yourselves."

"Thanks, Matthew—thanks," said Tom King; "you are indeed a friend well worth the having. By taking this route, surely we shall baffle the officers."

"I hope so," said Matthew, "yet it is impossible for me to say where they may be hiding at the present moment. Your chief care will be to keep yourselves as much out of sight as possible."

With this caution they parted, the highwaymen wringing Matthew's hand.

Successfully following his instructions, they soon entered the stable, mounted into the loft, and paused a moment at the little window, or, rather, opening in the wall, that he had described.

About eight feet below them was a small, dirty yard, bounded on each side by high brick walls, over which it would be difficult indeed for anyone to look.

A most profound silence reigned in this locality, and the tall buildings all around caused a deep darkness to prevail.

"It will be all right," said Tom, in a whisper. "I will go first; you can follow."

He rapidly lowered himself feet foremost from the window while he spoke, and, having hung for a second at the full length of his arms, he let go and alighted in safety in the yard beneath.

Then placing himself close against the wall so as to keep out of sight, he waited for his comrades to follow his example.

As may be guessed, they were not very long in doing so.

By this time their eyes had become accustomed to the obscurity, and they were able to see what they had not perceived before, namely, the back door of which Matthew had spoken.

Towards this they crept silently, for they were fearful that a footfall might betray them.

They were able all the time to keep close under the wall.

The door was opened by the key, and the key hung upon the door-post, according to the directions they had received.

That peculiar, damp, earthy smell that always pervades a shut-up, uninhabited house assailed their nostrils as soon as they crossed the threshold, and when the door was closed behind them the darkness was intense indeed—so intense that they would have had great diffidence in proceeding without a light, had not old Matthew so particularly assured them that there was nothing to fear in the shape of an obstruction.

A few paces brought them to the front door, for the house was a small one.

Tom listened while he placed his hand upon the latch.

All was still, and so he slowly opened the door to the extent of about a quarter of an inch.

It was well that he was thus cautious, for a heavy footstep on the pavement without reached their ears.

There was a flash of light, and a hoarse, wheezy voice, exclaimed:

"Half-past eleven, and a cloudy night."

It was a watchman going by, and the light from his lantern quickly faded away.

"That's lucky," said Tom; "it would have been awkward had he passed while we were just emerging. I think we can venture now; at any rate, I will go first."

Opening the door no wider than was actually necessary to allow his body to slip through, Tom passed out.

He was pleased to find that the door was a projecting one, so that he did not step at once into the street, but remained concealed by its deep shadow.

In a whisper he informed his friends of this, and they slipped quickly out.

"It's all right, I believe," said Tom. "I don't think there's a single police officer lurking near."

"Quick, then," said Claude—"the sooner we are out of here the better. Should we be seen it would look suspicious at once."

Tom assented, and at the same time obeyed.

Yet, as was proved, this was an unlucky movement.

The watchman's beat extended only to the end of Blackmore Street, and having reached it, he was returning with all speed to his comfortable watch-box at the corner of Drury Lane, in which he meant to ensconce himself for the next half hour, leaving the street to look after itself.

Sauntering thus along, he was surprised by seeing the three highwaymen make their appearance so suddenly, as though they had sprung from the earth.

He knew there was no turning near, and was perfectly certain they had not walked down from the top of the street.

Advancing briskly to them, he held up his lantern, as he cried:

"Hullo—hullo! Where have you come from? Out of that empty house, I believe!"

"Be off!" said Claude. "What does it matter to you?"

"But I'll know who you are," said the watchman. "It's suspicious! Mind, or I'll spring my rattle! Who are you, I say?"

"Well, if you must know," answered Sixteen-String Jack, in a very hoarse, sepulchral voice, "it's the devil taking an evening walk with two of his friends. Good night to you!"

So saying, he struck the watchman's lantern from his shaking grasp, and passed quickly on, followed by his companions, and leaving the guardian of the night in a state of mingled bewilderment and dismay.

CHAPTER DCCCLXXVII.

THE HIGHWAYMEN PROCEED TO NEWGATE TO DELIVER THE KING'S MISSIVE.

TURNING the corner of the street, the three highwaymen were quickly out of sight.

They drew down their hats over their brows, so as to conceal their features as much as possible, and then, in as steady, unconcerned a manner as they could assume, made their way towards Newgate.

It was a bold and adventurous act—one, in fact, scarcely excusable, and yet, after all, very likely to be successful from its sheer audacity.

Knowing that the prison was surrounded, and so closely watched by the police officers, one would have thought that it would be the very last place they would venture to approach.

The streets of London were well known to Tom and his comrades, and after a very little reflection they were able to decide within themselves which was the best route by which their destination should be reached.

They were anxious to avoid the principal thoroughfares, and yet by no means wishful to enter such as were rarely used, and in which their appearance could not fail to attract attention.

Yet as they walked onward, for the most part in silence, they fancied more than once that persons who passed them looked back curiously.

But, after all, this might have been more their own fancy than aught else.

Strange as it may seem, it is nevertheless true, that they reached the Old Bailey in perfect safety, and without having been interrupted or questioned by anyone, and without having come into collision with any police officers.

At the corner of a narrow lane from which they emerged, and which was situated nearly opposite that part of the prison forming the residence of the Governor, they paused, and well they might, for an unexpected sight met their view.

Yet their surprise abated instantly, and they felt they might have known it had they given such a thing a moment's consideration.

The Old Bailey at this dark and lonely hour of the night presented a scene of unusual animation.

It was thronged by many persons, whose numbers increased every moment, for fresh spectators kept arriving from every street.

A noisy, dissolute crowd, it was composed of the worst specimens of humanity that the metropolis could then boast.

Some were wandering restlessly to and fro, others, with pipes in their mouths, were lounging in groups against the walls of the houses, and in every other place against which they could plant their backs.

Others, with wild cries and shouts, were amusing themselves by pushing violently through the throng, and whenever any accident occurred it was greeted by a roar of laughter.

Vendors of nearly all kinds of eatables and drinkables were there in considerable numbers, working their way backwards and forwards, and filling the air with their discordant shouts.

Some had torches, and others a brazier of blazing coals, the light from which shed a ruddy tint on all around.

Never before had the highwaymen beheld so strange a spectacle as this, and it was therefore almost unconsciously that they stood for some moments gazing at it.

Claude was the first to speak.

"Surely," he said, "this ought to be favourable to us. Can we not turn it to our advantage? Among all this confusion and noise, it is scarcely likely that we shall be noticed. Believe me, I think all things are favourable to the accomplishment of your design."

[OLD MATTHEW INTRODUCES A FRESH ALLY.]

Tom nodded as he said:

"I think so too; the only thing is, that we should be careful in forcing our way through the throng."

"Yes," said Sixteen-String Jack, "there lies our danger. Some unexpected person may recognise us."

"We must run that risk," said Tom; "and the best way will be to put on as much indifference as we are able. Come, follow me—we will delay no longer."

Tom began slowly to push through the throng, and as if he had no particular object in doing so—as if he had no precise point he wished to reach, but seemed to be wandering listlessly about, like the majority of those present.

It was well that he had the presence of mind to act thus, for any injudicious haste would at once have had the effect of calling down special attention upon them.

Short as was the distance, yet, owing to this cause, some time elapsed before the highwaymen got fairly in front of the Governor's house.

But for this they cared not, for up to the present all had gone well.

Now, however, came their greatest danger.

Looking right and left, they could perceive many police officers, who were bent with exemplary closeness upon the duty that had been set them.

The fact was that there was not one of them who did not believe in his heart that the night would not pass over without Dick Turpin making some effort to liberate himself.

In such a case, they were animated by the hope they would be instrumental in recapturing him—not because of any reward, but merely for the credit of the whole body of police officers.

In ascending the steps of the Governor's hor standing for a moment at the door, Tom felt there would be the utmost peril;—he could not fail to be noticed then by many.

For one thing, he was not aware that the officers had made up their minds to pay no attention whatever to anything that took place in the Old Bailey; nor, indeed, were they likely to trouble themselves about anyone who sought admission to the prison. Their chief solicitude would be to prevent any person from leaving it.

Slowly moving forward, as if he had no such design, Tom King suddenly turned round and ascended the flight of stone steps, his eyes fixed upon the brass handle of the bell, and he pulled it vigorously.

In Newgate, all doors were promptly answered, and scarcely had the tinkling of the bell died away than this front door was thrown open, and a man appeared upon the threshold.

"The Governor," said Tom, disguising his voice—"I want to see him immediately, upon important business."

"Then you can't."

"But I must," said Tom, placing his foot in such a position against the doorpost that the man could not close the door. "I must see him on most urgent business, and beware how you refuse me!"

"But I tell you you can't, and there's an end of it! Wait till to-morrow!"

"Never!" said Tom. "I don't move from here until the Governor comes!"

"What's all this?" said another voice at this moment—"what's all this, I say—what is it?"

The man at the door fell back immediately into an attitude of respect.

"I beg pardon, sir," he said—"humbly beg pardon!"

"But what is it—what is it?" said the same voice, in snappish, querulous tones.

"You are the Governor, I presume?" said Tom, making a profound bow while he spoke.

"Yes, yes!" replied Mr. Bradbury. "But, confound it all, why can't you say what it is!"

"Well, then," said Tom, "I have to deliver this bag, which, I believe, comes from the King?"

"The what?"

"The King. A short time ago one of the King's messengers met with an accident while riding here at full speed. I happened to be near, and asked if I could be of any assistance. He gave me this bag, and entreated me to deliver it to the Governor of Newgate with all speed, as it contained a missive from the King of a most important character."

The Governor looked rather amazed, and seemed to shrink from taking hold of the leather bag.

"That is all," said Tom; "and, not liking to refuse his request, especially as my own business was bringing me to London, I promised to deliver it according to his request; and here it is, and that's all I know about it."

The Governor took the bag.

"Will you walk in, sir," he said, "while I look at the contents?"

Tom felt strongly inclined to say yes, but, fearful of the consequences of such a mad proceeding, he restrained himself, and answered, in an indifferent tone:

"No thank you, Mr. Governor, I am much obliged to you for your hospitality all the same, but the delivery of this letter-bag has already brought me considerably out of my way, and as my time is short I cannot afford to spare any more from my own concerns."

"Good evening then," said the Governor, retiring.

"Good evening," said Tom, hastily descending the steps.

The door was closed, and the highway n mingled with the throng.

Luckily this little incident as scarcely noticed, for the popular attention was just then diverted by a pitched battle between two men who had rapidly changed from words to blows.

The police officers who were nearest looked on, but saw nothing peculiar or suspicious, and, as before, continued to give their best attention to the walls of the prison.

The idea that Tom King should be there delivering anything to the Governor was so monstrous a one that it was not likely to occur to the minds of any of them.

But, having been successful so far, the highwaymen now became a prey to the greatest anxiety.

Drifting with the throng of persons, they hastily exchanged a few cautious observations.

"What will be the result?" said Tom. "How is this to end? How fearfully short the time is now until the hour appointed for execution."

"Don't think of that, but pin your faith upon the King's honour; I don't think you will have occasion to repent it."

"I trust not."

"Above all things," said Sixteen-String Jack, "don't let us get far away. If, as I take it, that letter contains an order to the Governor to release Dick Turpin immediately he will do so, and when he appears he will doubtless require all the aid we shall be able to afford him."

"Yes, there is no doubt of that," said Tom: "let us turn back again and be on the look-out."

Accordingly they did so, and as minute after minute slowly passed away the suspense that they suffered increased to an alarming degree.

So absorbed were they by one thought that they became altogether unmindful of themselves, and forgot all about looking to see whether they were noticed.

At each instant, too, they kept creeping nearer and nearer to the door of the Governor's house, for somehow, without knowing exactly why, they fancied this would be the route by which Dick Turpin would leave the prison.

But from the length of time that elapsed, their hopes sank down to zero, and, without daring to confess it, each felt in his own mind a disagreeable conviction that the letter they had been at such pains to deliver did not concern Dick Turpin at all.

CHAPTER DCCCLXXVIII.

TOM KING AND HIS COMRADES WATCH IN VAIN FOR THE APPEARANCE OF DICK TURPIN.

It was at this moment that the huge clock of St. Paul's Cathedral proclaimed the hour of one.

The highwaymen started and looked uneasily at each other as they heard the sound, because then they knew that a full hour had elapsed since the delivery of the letter.

What, then, were they to think of so long an interval?

What other conclusion could they come to than that which had already fixed itself in their minds?

So far as they could tell, the gloomy prison bore its accustomed look, and there were no tokens that anything of an unusual character was taking place inside.

The people in the street grew, if anything, more turbulent, and the police officers more alert and watchful.

Tom drew a little on one side, as if to address his comrades, but at that moment Claude Duval said, in a hasty, impressive whisper:

"Tom—Tom, I am afraid we are seen and recognised!"

"How so?—how—how?" cried his two companions.

"Why, there's a police officer yonder—don't look at him—I have seen him staring at us for some time past, and now he has whispered to one of his comrades. They are suspicious."

"What is to be done?"

"We have no help that I can see but to mingle in the throng, which is fortunately growing more dense every moment."

"But we shall leave the door."

"That cannot be helped. Come—come, as you value your own safety and mine!"

With these words, Claude turned round and pushed his way among the mass of people.

Tom King and Jack kept him in view, and followed, for they were by no means desirous that a separation should ensue.

It was a fortunate thought of Claude's, and, under the circumstances, no better means could have been found of escaping the observation of the officers.

In less than a moment they were completely swallowed up and lost in the seething mass of human beings.

The highwaymen sought for the thickest of the crowd, and as they made no movements calculated to attract the attention of those around, and as there was nothing remarkable in their appearance, they escaped all comment and notice.

When near to the opposite side of the street, and being, as they believed, out of sight of all of the officers, they ventured to make a stand.

Looking across the dark thoroughfare, they could just perceive the Governor's front door, looking like a black patch, a little darker than the walls of the prison itself.

Yet while standing there, they felt assured that the door could not be opened unseen by them.

Moreover, there was an additional advantage accruing from this change of position, for they were now able to command a view of about the only other exit from Newgate—namely, the door at which the prisoners were admitted.

Over the upper portion of this door a light could, as usual, be seen burning, and that was about the only sign there was that the place was inhabited at all.

But another half hour elapsed, and no alteration in the aspect of affairs took place.

And now it may be said that the alarm and anxiety of the highwaymen had reached the highest point.

"The King has proved faithless," murmured Tom—"we can place no other construction upon it. Had it been an order for Dick's liberation he would have been free long ere now."

"That's my opinion," said Claude.

"And mine also," assented Jack.

"Then, such being the case, how are we to act? We must not remain here with our hands tied behind us, as it were, but take active measures, for on no account must the captain perish."

"On no account," said Claude. "Yet, how very weak and powerless we are against authority."

"True," said Tom, sadly. "If the worst comes to the worst we must make an effort; but, alas! I fear it will be a vain one."

"It must not be made with that spirit," said Sixteen-String Jack, "or failure is certain. Shall we remain waiting here any longer, or shall we endeavour to enlist the sympathies of the family in our behalf?"

"Let us think—let us think."

Again there was a silence, and although the highwaymen had expressed themselves so positively, yet they could not help feeling a faint hope that, after all, Dick would be released.

It was a hope to be clung to to the last, and in this state of hopeful indecision another half hour wore away.

It was now two o'clock, and the ringing sounds aroused them all from their abstraction.

"We must be quick," said Claude. "If we wait much longer I question whether we shall have a chance of meeting any of the family. They have twice done us good service, recollect," he added, "and perhaps they may again."

"Let it be so, then," said Tom; "and as I come to think upon it my opinion is, that the best course to pursue will be for one to go on this errand to the family, another to remain here, and the third to proceed to old Matthew's in Drury Lane, in whom I feel the utmost confidence."

"Good--that's a sensible suggestion! Now, without further delay, let us decide who is to remain and who is to go."

"Then," said Tom, "if you, Claude, will consent to visit the family I should like to remain here, watching for Dick, and Jack can go to Drury Lane."

"Agreed!" they both cried; and Claude added:

"It will be better for me to go to the ken, because I have already been on that business before."

With these words they separated.

Tom King, choosing the darkest place that he could find—a spot where one house, projecting beyond another, made a shadowy corner—took up his post, determined to watch with unremitting care.

But all his watching went for nought.

The crowd gradually increased in bulk, the clocks continued to chime forth at every quarter of an hour, but still no other alteration in the aspect of affairs took place.

No door was opened—no person emerged from Newgate.

Oh, how terribly uneasy Tom King felt, and, at the same time, how powerless!

Really it seemed to him as though his comrade was on this occasion destined to take his last look at life.

No words, however powerful and well chosen, could ever convey an adequate idea of the state of his feelings on that dreadful night.

Three—four—five—six o'clock sounded.

Still there was no change, nor did his companions return.

Then seven o'clock struck, and by that time a dusky kind of light filled all the street, and made the black prison opposite look gloomier and more soul-chilling than ever.

Then, glancing around, Tom perceived Sixteen-String Jack at no great distance, and, by his manner, he was evidently searching for him.

Moving from his place of concealment, Tom, watching an opportunity when Jack's gaze was turned in that direction, made a rapid sign.

A recognition instantly followed, and he fell back.

A moment afterwards, and he was rejoined by Jack.

"You are securely hid here," he said. "For the last two hours I have been vainly searching for you, and forcing my way through the mob. Such a crowd surely was never known in London before. Should you wish to leave it now you would find it would take you a full hour to do so."

"Indeed!" said Tom, wearily and sadly. "And what says Matthew?"

"He could say nothing—nothing, at least, of any value. But he is almost distracted by the imminence of the danger, yet I can tell by his manner that he is ready to abandon all hope."

"And so am I," said Tom. "Where is Claude—have you seen him?"

"No."

"Nor I."

"Let us hope, then, that he will bring us good intelligence."

"Yes, that's our only chance. But we stand too much in the shade for him to see us, should he work his way through the crowd to this point."

"Shall we shift to a more open part?"

"No, no—not now. It is growing lighter, and we should be careful how we show ourselves."

"True, Tom—true. But I am so excited, and Dick's danger appears so very great that all others sink at once into insignificance when compared with it."

"Yes, you are right. But look around you, can you see nothing of him?"

"Nothing whatever."

The hour of eight now pealed forth, and a man standing near the highwaymen, exclaimed to those near him:

"They're at breakfast now, I suppose! Well, I don't care how soon it's over."

"It isn't long to wait now," said another voice. "Ah, look! here come the sheriffs!"

A great commotion at this moment took place, and from the lower end of the Old Bailey there came loud shouts and cries.

Neither Tom nor Jack could resist the temptation of looking in this direction, and then they caught sight of the horses, the gorgeous carriages, and the servants in their gaudy liveries.

They paused for a moment near the Sessions House, then a gate was thrown open, and the carriages rolled into the court-yard.

"One more hour," said the man who had before spoken, "and we shall begin to see something; it generally takes about an hour."

Oh! how full of anxiety and alarm were Dick's two comrades then!

They felt as though impelled to dash themselves against the hard stone walls of Newgate.

With eyes bloodshot with gazing steadfastly so long, they continued to look upon the building before them.

It must not be lost sight of that in these days executions took place generally about noon, and not at an early hour, as is the custom at the present day.

At nine, or shortly afterwards, if the crowd was very dense, the procession usually started, and made its way, at a slow, walking pace, towards Tyburn, which was rarely reached before the hour of twelve.

As nine o'clock approached, then, the highwaymen and all the crowd became more impatient and excited than ever.

By this time, too, the dimensions of the crowd were mething terrible to think of.

As far as ever the eye could reach, in all directions, people were jammed together as closely as was possible, and the windows and roofs of the contiguous houses presented nothing but one mass of faces.

Most of the spectators, too, grew more violent and demonstrative.

But the huge uproar ceased as if by magic.

The hour of nine was struck by St. Sepulchre's clock, and then, with breathless eagerness, all eyes were turned towards the huge folding doors, through which the procession would issue.

A few moments only must elapse, and then those gates would be thrown back.

Already in imagination they could see everything in readiness for the start.

"The moment has come," said Tom, turning his haggard face towards his companions. "Can nothing be done?"

An impatient murmur rose from the crowd, and increased in sound as they found minute after minute elapsed without the opening of the doors.

CHAPTER DCCCLXXIX.

IN WHICH THE HIGHWAYMEN AND OLD MATTHEW GIVE THEMSELVES UP TO DESPAIR.

CLAUDE DUVAL, on separating himself from his companions, made his way at once to the Jew's Harp, in Hanging Sword Alley, where, as will be remembered, he met the "Family" on a former occasion, when he enlisted their services on Dick's behalf.

But upon reaching this locality, he found, to his great disappointment, that immense alterations had taken place, and of the well-known thieves' ken not a trace remained.

The fact was, it had been broken up by the police officers some months before.

But of this fact Claude Duval was quite ignorant.

This disappointment was in truth most distressing, for the time was growing so fast towards morning.

He was beginning even to have some doubts whether this night was a meeting night at all; but remembering that the Three Tuns in Seven Dials was a well-known resort, he determined to hurry there, in the hope of success.

But here again he met with disappointment.

Making himself known to the landlord of the place, he was at once warmly received; but in answer to his inquiries, he was informed that no meeting of the family had taken place that night, or would, and that most of the members were scattered over the country.

Knowing that he could place the fullest trust in this man, Claude sought his advice.

But the landlord only shook his head by way of reply; but being pressed still further, he answered, at length:

"Well, then, if you must know, it is my deliberate opinion that the captain has reached the end of his race. I have nothing to say against him myself, except that he carried things off with rather too high a hand to please me; but that's neither here nor there."

"And can you offer no suggestion?"

"None whatever. The Government has made up its mind to hang him, and hang him they will. Mark my words—they will come true."

"I hope not," said Claude, and he once more sought the open air.

He paused irresolutely now, uncertain which should be his next step to take.

But after much reflection, he could think of nothing better than making his way to old Matthew's in Drury Lane.

He regretted now that he had not repaired there in the first instance.

The distance was not great, and he arrived just after Sixteen-String Jack had taken his departure.

He found old Matthew in a dreadful state of agitation.

Sixteen-String Jack had told him of his errand.

"No luck, then, Claude?" he said, as soon as he caught sight of his face. "The expression of it is enough—you need not tell me."

"But, Matthew," exclaimed Claude, with great earnestness and warmth, "you are a man of great resources, as I know full well. Is it possible that in this emergency you can find yourself quite aground?"

"It is," said Matthew, with a groan. "I don't believe any living human being could devise anything to save him from his fate. You see, those in power have made up their minds to his execution, and how is it possible for us to prevent it?"

"How I regret that we troubled ourselves about the locket at all—that has been nothing but lost time."

"And it has tied your hands behind your backs as well," said Matthew, "for you kept waiting and waiting for that when you ought to have been actively engaged."

"Yes—yes, I can see my mistake now plain enough; but yet it is terrible to think of Dick being led forth to execution and us being unable to aid him."

"It is indeed," said Matthew. "I have only just been told that a fresh detachment of troops has been sent down to Tyburn to reinforce those already there. From this," he added, "it would seem as though there was a suspicion a rescue would be attempted, and against well-armed, disciplined soldiers what chance would the populace have?"

Claude sank down in a chair, and covered his face with his hands.

Old Matthew tried to say something about never despair, but failing in the attempt, sat down also, in an attitude very similar to Claude's.

Thus they remained for some time, until the highwayman, suddenly starting to his feet, exclaimed:

"But this will never do, Matthew—never—never!"

"We may as well remain thus," said the landlord, in a broken voice—"we can do no good."

"I don't know that," said Claude. "If we cannot save him we can at least perish in making the attempt, desperate and fool-hardy as it may seem. I, for one, will endeavour to set him free, even if at the last moment."

"And so will I," said Matthew—"so will I. Just wait a moment—I will put on my coat, and we will be off to Newgate together."

Matthew quickly donned his coat and hat, and then, leaving the house to take care of itself, accompanied Claude towards the Old Bailey.

Long before they got anywhere near this thoroughfare, they found themselves surrounded by a vast crowd through which they with great difficulty forced themselves, for every step had to be vigorously contested.

The crowd was even denser and greater than Sixteen-String Jack had represented it to be.

All were anxious to get in such a position as would enable them to command a view of the procession when it started, and those who had got anywhere near resolutely refused to allow another to pass them.

It was only, then, by dint of the greatest exertions that Claude and Matthew managed to progress at all.

It was shortly after the hour of nine—about the time when the silence that had fallen on the multitude was succeeded by a hoarse murmur—that old Matthew and Claude found themselves at length on the spot they wished to reach.

Glancing keenly around, Matthew made out the form of Sixteen-String Jack, and at once pushed towards him.

In another moment they were all standing in a group.

Tom and Jack had ventured to indulge in the hope that these new-comers had brought with them welcome intelligence.

But they were quickly disappointed.

"The time has come," murmured Tom King. "Surely in another moment at the most the gates will be thrown open. We shall catch one sight of him then I hope."

"The delay is extraordinary," said Sixteen-String Jack. "And look how excited and tumultuous the people are becoming! Shall we look upon this delay as a good or a bad omen?"

No one ventured to reply, and with an ever-increasing interest they turned their eyes towards the gate.

The air was now rent by violent cries proceeding from lusty throats.

Their patience was quite tired out at having waited for so long.

All their vociferations, however, were not productive of any effect.

While they shouted and bawled, time went relentlessly on.

The finger of St. Sepulchre's Church clock, at which ever and anon rapid glances were cast, moved slowly and steadily onward until the half hour was once more reached.

No one could be more perplexed at this strange circumstance than were the highwaymen and their friend the landlord.

Strive as they would, they could come to no plausible solution of it.

Ten o'clock came, and yet there were no more signs of the gates opening than there had been hours before.

The behaviour of the populace now partook very much of the nature of a riot.

Cries were raised that the gates should be battered down and the prisoner brought forth.

All at once there was another sudden change in the behaviour of the mob.

A whisper was passed from mouth to mouth almost with the speed of electricity, and spreading like some huge wave, reached the uttermost verge of the crowd.

That whisper consisted of four words, and those four words were:

"Dick Turpin has escaped."

The highwaymen started so violently upon receiving this intelligence, and showed so much surprise, that it is a wonder they escaped suspicion, and the fact can only be accounted for by the preoccupation of everyone.

"Escaped!" murmured Tom, between his lips, and looking as startled as though he had been told Newgate had been swallowed up by an earthquake—"escaped! How? Impossible!"

"So I fear," said Claude Duval. "How can such a thing be true?"

"Have you kept good watch, Tom?" asked old Matthew.

"The very best, and I will swear at any moment that since I delivered the letter last night no living person has left the prison."

"Well, well," said Matthew—"this is more than strange; but let me advise you to cast it from your minds, not to buoy yourselves up with hopes which are sure to be fallacious. It is some idle tale invented by some one to account for the delay. No, no—such news is too good to be true. Dick Turpin has not escaped."

But the remark was repeated again and again.

Another hour passed away, and the gates were not opened.

Then, indeed, it seemed as if there was some foundation for the report, for how would the execution take place at the appointed time?

Then such cries and groans of disappointment as arose from the vast mob had surely never been heard before.

They considered they were cheated, deceived, and were exasperated accordingly.

"Dare we believe it?" said Claude Duval, just after the clock struck. "Dare we place any faith in this assertion?"

"I don't know," said Matthew—"it seems very strange; and if I thought I could only force my way through the crowd I would endeavour to put the question to some of the officers or officials of the prison. At any rate, I will try," he added—"I can do no harm. Wait here, and I shall know where to find you."

The highwaymen made no opposition to his departure.

By gently insinuating himself in between the closely-packed people, old Matthew performed what seemed to be an impossibility, for he proved that there was room for yet one more among them.

But his dimensions were so great that people instinctively shrank back to allow him passage, hoping he would get further away, in order that they might be relieved from the extra pressure.

And in this manner—although it was a very tedious operation—Matthew actually succeeded in getting to the opposite side of the Old Bailey.

Upon arriving there he found a scene of great excitement and animation going forward.

The police officers had congregated into a huge group, and were conversing eagerly.

To most of them old Matthew was known, yet they were so absorbed in their conversation that they did not perceive him.

Venturing at last to touch one on the shoulder, Matthew said:

"What's this extraordinary tale I have just heard—is there any truth in it?"

The police officer eyed him suspiciously.

"I fancy you had a hand in it," he said. "It passes my comprehension."

"What?" asked Matthew, with a fast-beating heart.

"Why, how he could have escaped."

"Then he has escaped?"

"Oh, yes, certainly; I believe we can entertain no doubt upon that point, though how and by what means we cannot imagine."

"It seems to me incredible," said Matthew. "I can't believe it even now. I thought the prison was to be closely watched by the whole force of police officers."

"And so it has; we have formed a circle round the building, one man being almost within reach of the other. I am certain not one has been negligent in his duty; every part of the outside of Newgate has been watched, and how Dick Turpin has escaped I can't make out, for no person has left the prison. Yet I am told that when they opened his cell no trace of him could be seen."

CHAPTER DCCCLXXX.

DICK'S ESCAPE FROM NEWGATE CONTINUES TO BE A PROFOUND MYSTERY, AND OLD MATTHEW INTRODUCES A SINGULAR PERSONAGE.

THIS intelligence filled old Matthew with amazement, and, finding nothing more was to be gleaned, he turned round, and with infinite difficulty fought his way back to where he had left the highwaymen.

On the present occasion, however, his task was by no means so difficult as it had been, for the people were really beginning to believe that Dick Turpin had escaped, and accordingly were gradually separating.

Matthew's first words on rejoining the three friends were:

"Follow me—be quick; there's no good in remaining here any longer, and you had better retire before the crowd breaks up."

"But Dick," said Tom—"is it possible that he has escaped?"

"I believe it is true," said Matthew, with a smile, "and that's the same thing; but I am going to think about it."

They walked on rapidly through the streets.

Old Matthew led the way until, having got near to Drury Lane, Tom said:

"Had we not better go in here where we left our horses? Will it not be dangerous to go to your house?"

"No, I think not," was his answer. "If I can guard against your being seen, why, you know, I have a hiding-place that will baffle the closest search."

"I leave all to you," said Tom; "but be quick, for I am anxious to know the result of your cogitations."

Matthew walked boldly up White Horse Yard, and, finding no one was about to observe their movements, opened the little door in the wall.

"We're all right," he said; "but I should advise you to remain in the yard until I have seen that the coast is quite clear inside."

The highwaymen consented, standing so as to be out of sight of anyone who might look through the windows.

Matthew was absent only a moment, then he reappeared and beckoned them.

"All's right," he said, "there's not an officer in sight."

He conducted them straight to the parlour and made them acquainted with just what had passed between himself and the officers.

"Incomprehensible and increa[illegible] as it may appear," he concluded, "I suppose it is really true that Dick Turpin has escaped, though how he has managed to do so is positively marvellous. If he has gone, all will be well, and I should recommend you to stay here till nightfall; if he has not, we shall have quicker tidings of it here than elsewhere."

"But," said Tom, "can we not set it down as impossible—as some mistake? Closely watched as the prison has been, how can he have left it?"

Old Matthew put his finger by the side of his nose with a very wise expression.

Then glancing around and speaking in a suppressed tone, he said:

"I have an idea."

"An idea? but of what kind?"

"About this affair. I may be wrong, you know, but yet I have been putting two and two together."

"Go on, Matthew," said the others, feverish with impatience, for they knew how great were his powers in arriving at the solution of any difficulty.

"Well," he said, "I incline to the belief that the King acted in good faith after all, and that the letter you delivered was to the effect that Dick Turpin should be released. But didn't the King tell you," he added, turning to Tom, "that it was not in his power to grant a proper pardon because of the strong feeling his ministers had on the subject?"

"Yes, he certainly said that, or something to the same effect."

"Just so. Well, then, under the circumstances, what would be the most probable letter he would address to the Governor? If you observe, the messenger appeared to have been sent off with some secrecy; you might judge that by the time of night. Then the letter might command the Governor to let Dick out of Newgate somehow, secretly—stating that the Governor would be held free from the consequences of such an act."

Tom clapped his hands together.

"You have hit it, Matthew," he cried, enthusiastically—"you have hit it! Now you speak, all comes over me with the full force of conviction. That's it—we ought to have thought of it before."

Old Matthew shook his head.

"It's only an idea, understand," he said, "and it may be a very long way off the truth, yet to me there seems a very strong degree of probability about it."

"There seems something more than probability to me," said Tom.

"And to us also," added his two companions.

"Certainly," said Matthew, "it solves all our difficulties at once, and if I only knew for certain that Dick had escaped I should feel more confidence in it than ever."

"Well, we must try and ascertain that; but if Dick has escaped, surely he would make his way to Ealing."

"Yes, it may be that he is already there."

"Let us start off at once," cried Tom.

"No — no," replied Matthew; "restrain yourself; don't be blind to your own danger; it will be quite difficult enough for you to make your way here by dark, and as the day now is half gone I should recommend you to stay, besides, by nightfall, we shall have certain information."

With some difficulty the highwaymen allowed themselves to be persuaded by their old friend.

Matthew also entreated them to use their best endeavours to get a little repose.

He assured them that they would be in perfect safety, as he would watch over them personally, and give them timely warning of the approach of danger.

It was soon after this that he left them, and, by dint of making inquiries in various directions, received confirmation of the intelligence that had already been imparted to him.

The execution had not certainly taken place, and he felt tolerably sure that it would not be delayed except from some such cause as that named.

About dusk he again sought the parlour.

But looking in, he perceived that the three highwaymen were all sleeping soundly.

On making this discovery he closed the door softly.

"Let them stay," he murmured; "it is better thus; they will awake thoroughly refreshed, and equal to any emergency that may arise."

On that particular night old Matthew felt no very great apprehension of a visit from the police officers.

It was rarely indeed that they visited his premises two days running.

Some might be watching around, but yet, if such was the case, he had good hopes of getting the highwaymen out unseen.

Claude Duval was the first to awake.

He had fallen off to sleep unconsciously, and for a moment could scarcely make out where he was.

For one thing the darkness confused him, but in awaking he aroused his two comrades, and they, like himself, could scarcely believe that night had come.

Directly after this Matthew paid them another visit.

"You are awake now, I see," he said, with a smile.

"Yes, yes—but the news?"

"Good," was the answer. "The execution has not taken place to-day, and on every hand I receive nothing but confirmation of the news that Dick Turpin has been successful in making his escape, though how on earth he has managed it baffles everybody."

Simultaneously the three highwaymen drew long breaths of relief.

"It is at least a great comfort to know," said Tom King, "that there has been no execution at Tyburn to-day. I consider that points conclusively to the fact that Dick has escaped from Newgate; had he been safe in his prison the sentence of the law would most certainly have been carried out."

"I incline to that opinion too," said old Matthew; and it is my belief that if you will mount your horses and ride off to the Three Spiders, that you will find him there awaiting your arrival."

"Then let us go at once," said Claude, with great energy. "I am full of curiosity to know first whether this good news is really true, and if so, by what mysterious agency Dick got out of Newgate."

"That you will be sure to learn from his own lips," said Matthew, smiling; "and I suppose, as it is quite dark and altogether an uncomfortable night, I shall not be able to persuade you to stay with me any longer."

"No—no, Matthew," returned Tom, "not a moment longer, yet before we leave we must express to you how grateful we are for what you have done in our behalf."

"Pooh—pooh!"

"It's all very fine to say pooh, pooh, Matthew, but that doesn't alter the case in the least. Look at this last hiding-place of yours, for instance—it most assuredly saved us, and yet you could not have constructed it without great expense and trouble."

"And you think I mind either. No, no—not a bit."

"Well, Matthew," continued Tom, "I have made up my mind to this as soon as I see the captain; I shall relate everything to him, and then we shall decide upon a testimonial of some sort which we shall insist upon your acceptance of."

"Well," returned old Matthew, "if you put it in that light I don't mind. And now, then, where do you say you left your horses?"

The place was described.

"Did you thing of going for them yourselves?"

"What do you think?"

"Why, that it would be unwise."

"Who shall we send, then?"

"I have a little fellow here who will perform the task to your entire satisfaction."

"Can he be trusted?"

"Oh, yes, he ought to be. I knew his father well in years gone by, and befriended him on many occasions. This is his only child; he is an orphan, and unfortunately both deaf and dumb."

"Then he ought to be faithful."

"Yes; if he only takes after his father he will be faithful enough in all conscience, but I am not afraid."

"Well, then, will you send him?"

"I will."

"At once?"

"Yes. Should you like to see him?"

"If you have no objection."

"None in the least."

Old Matthew left the parlour, and shortly afterwards returned with a boy about fourteen years of age.

He was a very singular specimen of humanity indeed, with short legs, long arms, and a disproportionate head and body.

He was attired with that gaudiness which generally characterises deformed persons.

In his own opinion he was of great importance indeed, yet, as he followed old Matthew into the room something after the manner of an obedient dog, there was a peculiar shuffle in his gait, a bend in his shoulders, and a restless expression about his eyes that by no means prepossessed the highwaymen with his appearance.

His wide mouth was parted in a grin, and with his fingers he played with the huge polished metal buttons upon his vest.

By way of greeting he made a general salaam to all assembled, and yet as he made it his eyes, so quick and restless, took in every peculiarity in the highwaymen's appearance at one single glance.

Then, folding his arms, he stood in an attitude as much as to say:

"I am here—what do you want with me?"

CHAPTER DCCCLXXXI.

TOM KING AND HIS COMRADES MEET WITH A DISAPPOINTMENT ON THEIR ARRIVAL AT THE THREE SPIDERS.

Old Matthew waited a moment in order that the highwaymen might look well at the messenger.

Then making a sign to attract his attention, Matthew rapidly, with his fingers, instructed the boy to go to the stable and fetch the horses, bringing them towards the bottom of White Horse Yard.

He made a low bow and retired, not, however, until he had taken another good look at the three highwaymen.

"Well," said Matthew, as soon as the door had closed behind him, "what do you think of him—he is a queer-looking customer, is he not?"

"Very queer," said Tom King, "and I don't mind saying, something very disagreeable and unpleasant indeed."

"Do you think so?"

"Yes, very."

"Oh, that's only the first effect—it quickly wears off."

"Can he be trusted?" asked Tom, very earnestly.

"Certainly."

"Are you sure? Have you ever put him to the test?"

"Well, I can't say I have," returned Matthew, thoughtfully, "for, candidly speaking, I never trust anybody more than I can help, and since I have had Manuel I have never required his services particularly."

"Well," pursued Tom, "I may be mistaken, but if there is not treachery in him I am greatly deceived, so all that I can say is, be on your guard."

"I shall, you may depend."

"What, now, if he betrayed us?"

"Don't suppose such a thing!" exclaimed Matthew, with a start. "No—no," he added, "he would never be guilty of such baseness as that! He is a good boy, and he knows what I have done for his father, and is also aware that I am the only friend he has on earth."

"I may be doing him an injustice," said Tom King. "I hope I am, and yet I fear that you are allowing yourself to be led away by some feeling of attachment that you had for his parent."

Old Matthew was silent, as if these words had thrown him into a reverie.

Rousing himself, however, he said:

"It's a long story, and some day I may tell you all about it."

"About what?"

"About Manuel and his father, and how he came into my charge."

"We will not stop now, at any rate," said Claude Duval—"I am all impatience to be gone. Come, we may as well get outside and meet Manuel on the road."

"Yes, that's just what I intended," said Tom King, "and am quite ready."

"Farewell, then," cried old Matthew, as he led them into the back yard—"farewell! Remember me to the captain; tell him that I am glad he has got so nicely out of his difficulty, and say I shall be glad to see him whenever there is a chance."

"I will, Matthew," said Tom King, grasping his hand. "And now, once more, many thanks, and farewell for the present."

"Farewell!" said Matthew. "I am sorry you are going."

Claude and Jack also said good-bye, and the latter, as he parted from him at the little doorway, added:

"I hope we shall find our horses all right with your dumb friend; but I confess I fully share in Tom King's doubts, and, as a mere matter of caution, I only ask you to watch him carefully, and not to trust him with any secret until you have thoroughly tested him."

"Leave me alone for that!" exclaimed old Matthew. "I shall look upon this service to-night as some guarantee of his fidelity; it remains to be seen how he will perform it."

With these words the highwaymen departed, old Matthew closing the door in the wall quickly, lest any prying eyes should be abroad.

When he had said it was a rainy, disagreeable night he had only spoken the truth.

The sky was completely covered up by thick, heavy clouds, and the rain fell with the slow steadiness that seemed to promise a long continuance of it.

The wind blew bleakly down the narrow passage, and the highwaymen were glad enough to get out of it.

"We have a dirty night before us," said Claude, "yet it's all the better for that, as we are less likely to be pursued or interrupted, and I am anxious that we should make our way to Ealing with all speed."

"So am I," said Tom. "Hark!"

The faint clatter of horses' hoofs came upon his ears.

"There are our steeds!" he cried. "Follow me. The sooner we join them the better."

Hastening forward while he spoke, and trusting to his companions to follow his example, Tom crossed the street, and plunged down another.

The boy was only just leaving the stables.

He was leading out the horses.

They were at his side before he was aware of it.

Tom took a crown-piece from his pocket, and slipped it into his hand.

But the deaf and dumb boy seemed strangely absent and unobservant of what the highwaymen were doing.

Those keen dark eyes of his were peering through the darkness in all directions.

The highwaymen lost no time in mounting; but scarcely had they done so than a shrill whistle was blown, and the sound of horses' feet could be heard.

"The officers," said Tom—"the officers are upon us! Quick! Follow me, and I doubt not we shall outrun them."

Tom turned his horse's head in the direction of Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, that being the nearest route by which he could hope to gain the open country.

The officers, in strong force, made their appearance at the same moment.

Glancing back and seeing this, Tom exclaimed:

"It strikes me our suspicions were right after all! If that boy has not placed the officers on our track, it's odd to me!"

"It is very strange that they should appear so suddenly," said Claude; "and yet, had they been informed surely they would have taken better measures for our capture."

"I don't know that," was the reply. "It would be easy for him to give the news to one who would hurry off for assistance."

"True," said Jack. "And did you not notice that he had ample time to perform his errand and yet was only just leaving the stables? His calculation may have been that he would have to wait for us at the corner of White Horse Yard, and he would have loitered with the horses until he was sure the officers were there."

"It makes me feel quite uncomfortable to think of it," said Claude Duval, "and yet let us hope that we're mistaken."

"Hark!" said Tom King. "Now they are after us in good earnest! Urge your horses to the utmost, and let us out-distance them as quickly as we can."

Just while he spoke the officers came in view behind them in a dense throng.

Some little delay had somehow taken place in getting fairly in pursuit of the highwaymen, but at length they had succeeded in getting a fair start.

One cause of this delay was that all the officers knew well enough the resolute character of the men they were in hopes of capturing, and this made them desirous of all keeping close together in a body for protection.

There were some who could have joined in the pursuit before the rest, but this they shrank from doing out of personal considerations, and they trusted that, while keeping all together, they should yet be successful in running the highwaymen down.

Our friends' horses, however, had been well attended to during their absence, and the long rest they had had made them just ready for a good gallop.

Never before indeed did they appear to be possessed of so much vigour and mettle, and they tore along the silent streets at a speed that was positively alarming.

Yet, with a dogged perseverance, the police officers kept on their trail, and it was not until London was left behind and the country fairly gained that the three highwaymen succeeded in quite shaking off their pursuers.

Then Tom King, reining up suddenly, and wheeling his horse round, listened attentively.

The wind, rushing through the branches of the trees, made a rustling noise, enough to drown any faint sound.

But Tom's ears were sharp and well practiced, and after a moment's pause he exclaimed:

"I think all's well, Claude; I can hear nothing."

"Nor I."

"Then now is the time to change our route. Quick—forward!"

"You are more impatient to reach the Three Spiders than I am."

Turning off completely at right angles from the course they had been pursuing, they made their way in almost a straight line for their destination.

Even if the officers should be somewhere in the rear, and still keeping up the pursuit, this sudden change of direction would inevitably have the effect of baffling them.

For the rest of the distance not another word was exchanged, and although there was now no particular danger behind them, yet the horses were not suffered to relax their speed.

At length, entering the little plantation, they pushed on towards the stables, and when near them, stopped to look up.

The signal light was burning steadily but dimly in the little window, and, reassured by this, and drawing hopeful conclusions from it, they set about entering the stable without more delay.

The door was only shut to and not fastened.

It yielded to a touch.

The horses were just placed in their stalls, the door bolted, and, reserving the task of attending to them to a future time, the three highwaymen hastened across the yard, impatient in the highest degree to have their hopes verified.

Throwing open the door, they strode into the kitchen.

Their appearance was greeted by a general cry, that seemed like one of dismay.

"Good gracious," said Tom Davis, starting up from his seat, "you have come back at last!"

Stifling a shriek, Maud tottered forward.

"You have brought him," she said—"you have brought him! The danger is past."

The highwaymen staggered back as if shot, and could only gasp out:

"Brought him?"

"Yes," said Maud, "do not fear the shock of his appearance; nothing could be worse than this suspense."

"But we have not brought him," cried Tom King, in a loud voice—"we have not brought him, because we had every reason to believe that he was here already!"

It was now the turn of those present to be amazed, and after this last speech of Tom's, a strange silence fell upon them all.

Maud grasped the corner of a table for support, and seemed by her manner as though upon the point of swooning.

"But this must be explained," said Tom Davis. "Be quick—let us know all about it!"

"But are you sure," cried Claude Duval, "that Dick has not come back—are you quite certain of it?"

"Yes, quite certain. What a strange question to ask! If he was here, don't you think he would hasten to make his appearance manifest?"

"Yes, yes—of course!" said Tom King. "But, before going into any long explanations, just understand this important fact: Dick Turpin has escaped from Newgate without any of our assistance, and, as we came to the conclusion, had succeeded in reaching here."

"Escaped?" cried Maud, with a shriek. "Do you say he has escaped?"

"Yes, most certainly—we have conclusive evidence on that point."

She sank down with a sigh of relief, and began to weep.

Tom Davis was surprised beyond all measure, and he could only ask for a full account of what had happened.

This Tom set about giving as accurately as possible

When it was over, Tom Davis cried:

"Hurrah! It's all right! I don't feel afraid now—no, not a bit of it! If Dick has got out of Newgate, as it seems quite certain he has got out, he can be left to take care of himself wherever he may be! Yes—yes, it's all right! He's got out somehow or other, and is only waiting for the vigilance of the police to abate a little. Rest assured he will be here at the very earliest moment!"

"I hope so too," said Tom King, anxiously. "I can't take quite such a sanguine view of it as you do yet, if he is out of Newgate."

"But you told me you were sure of it."

"Well, so I am sure of it."

"Then," said Davis, again, "I tell you it's all right, and all you have got to do in the meantime is to wait here patiently, and trust to his making his appearance."

No one else present seemed inclined to look upon the matter in this hopeful light.

If, as had been suggested, Dick had managed to get somewhere just out of Newgate and no more, he might again fall into the hands of the officers, and then nothing could save him.

A gloomy silence followed, in which the ticking of the little Dutch clock became painfully audible.

Then Tom King, starting up, said:

"I don't know how you feel, comrades, but as for myself, I can only say I find it impossible to stop here a moment longer—I can't stay here inactive for the life of me! What do you say—will you accompany me back to London and endeavour to find out where the captain is?"

"Yes—yes!" cried his companions, eagerly. "We are ready now, and to the full as anxious as yourself."

"But——" began Tom Davis, in a tone of expostulation.

His words were suddenly interrupted by a terrific knocking at the front door—a knocking that seemed to cast quite a spell over everyone, leaving all immoveable.

"Jack Marshall," gasped Tom Davis—"it's Jack Marshall, for a thousand pounds! We're caught at last! No, no—hide—hide, quickly, all of you! Be sure and get out of sight! Leave nothing behind you, and I will delay opening the door as long as I am able!"

The words were scarcely out of his mouth before the knocking was renewed with redoubled vigour.

CHAPTER DCCCLXXXII.

DESCRIBES THE EXTRAORDINARY INTERVIEW THAT TOOK PLACE BETWEEN DICK TURPIN AND THE GOVERNOR OF NEWGATE.

The Governor of Newgate was extremely surprised at receiving a communication from the King in so strange a fashion.

Since he had been called to his present office, such an event as a personal communication from royalty had never occurred, and he was in a state of flattering excitement accordingly.

Certainly documents with the King's signature had reached him many a time; but then they had always been forwarded through the medium of the Secretary of State.

This, however, was no doubt a veritable regal epistle, with the King's own autograph, and especially addressed to him.

Hastening to his own room, he unfastened the lock by means of a key on a small bunch that he always carried with him, and inside, as he expected, he found a letter bearing a large seal, on which was unmistakably impressed the royal arms of England.

In a straggling, foreign-looking hand the letter was superscribed:—

"To the Governor of the Prison of Newgate.
["Private and confidential."]

[THE HIGHWAYMEN AND TOM DAVIS ARE ALARMED AT THE KNOCKING AT THE DOOR.]

For some moments Mr. Bradbury could not summon up courage enough to break the seal.

He felt ready to bow himself down and pay homage to this representative of the King.

Never before had he felt so strongly that peculiarity in his nature which always made him ready to worship anyone who stood higher in a worldly sense than himself.

At length the letter was opened, and to his unmitigated surprise he read the following words—not without some difficulty, however, for they had the appearance of having been hastily scrawled:—

"This is to certify that it is our royal pleasure that the Governor of our prison of Newgate shall at once set at large and release the prisoner he now has in custody, known by the name of Dick Turpin. And we still further command that this release be effected as privately and secretly as possible, so as to leave no clue behind; and as to the best means of doing this we leave entirely to the judgment of our faithful servant the Governor.

"GEORGE, REX."

Such was the letter, and after having perused it the Governor was in such a state of bewilderment that he could do nothing but sit helpless, while the King's letter seemed to dance before his eyes.

Recovering himself, he looked more closely at it.

Some doubt as to its genuineness had crossed his mind.

He scrutinised the signature attentively, and the result was that he felt perfectly convinced it was the King's own handwriting. He had seen it too often to make any mistake.

Yet, to satisfy any lingering doubt that he might have, he unlocked a small iron box, and took from it several documents to which the King's signature was appended.

These were one by one compared, and the result was to strengthen his conviction that the document was genuine.

Having come to this conclusion, he restored the papers, and, leaning his head upon his hands, he tried first to think what motives had induced the King to take so unusual a proceeding, and, secondly, by what means he could spirit Dick Turpin out of Newgate.

In both of these attempts he failed most signally, and as a last resource he took up the lamp and his master-key, muttering the while:

"My course is clear. This letter will shield me. I will go to Turpin—he is a clever fellow, and will give me some information, beyond all doubt. I can understand now why he gave me his word not to escape, and why he has taken things so coolly and comfortably ever since he has been here."

With these reflections the Governor made his way towards Turpin's cell.

The two men were there on the watch, as usual.

The door was unfastened, and he entered in the manner described at the close of a preceding chapter.

When Dick, thus suddenly aroused, perceived the paper in the Governor's hands, he felt a sensation of relief come over him

By instinct he seemed to know that the paper was the warrant for his liberation.

Accordingly, he sprang to his feet, and the door having been closed, the Governor said:

"Come here, and read this."

Dick advanced.

But his excitement was so great, and his eyes were so unaccustomed to the glare of the lamp, that he failed to make out a single word, although he tried his utmost.

"Thank you," he said, drawing back. "Would you oblige me by reading it? I cannot."

The Governor did oblige him, and Dick listened with sensations of the utmost pleasure.

At last he should be free.

All his anxieties and misgivings had passed away.

His comrade had succeeded, and the locket had proved its virtues.

"Now," said the Governor, sitting down upon a chair, "the authority of this paper is a thing that I cannot dispute, and of course I shall act in accordance with it; its production will shield me from all after consequences."

"There is no need to fear anything," said Dick; "but, at the same time, I should recommend you to preserve that letter faithfully."

The Governor smiled, for he had fully resolved never to part with it.

The position of Dick was now very much altered so far as the Governor was concerned—in fact, the latter was inclined to look up to him, as was his habit to almost everyone.

But the prominent idea in the Governor's mind was the very probable and reasonable one that Dick Turpin was the holder of some important State secret which, on the present occasion, had saved his life.

Wishing to understand as much of it as possible, Mr. Bradbury said:

"Now, Turpin, I have not found you to be altogether an unreasonable fellow, and I trust I have not gained your ill-will?"

"You certainly have not," said Dick. "I have got a few words to say upon that point."

"Well, reserve them for the present, and listen. I want you, if you will, to favour me with some account of the origin of this letter. How came the King to write it?"

"It is simple," said Dick. "Some time ago, chance threw me in the way of a lady connected in some manner or other—I don't pretend to know how—with the royal family. To her I rendered a most important service, and, in return, she forced me to accept a small locket, the deliverance of which to the King, she assured me, would suffice to get me out of the greatest danger."

"Oh!" said the Governor, drawing a long breath, "that's it, is it?" And you found some means of delivering this locket?"

"Yes, I did. A comrade of mine took it, I believe, and now you can understand why I gave you my word not to attempt to escape."

"I can understand it now very well," said the Governor, with another long breath; "and yet I question whether I should have placed so much faith upon the King's word as you have. I should have been full of doubts and fears."

Dick smiled.

"Not if you had lived in an atmosphere of danger so long as I have."

"Well, that may be," replied the Governor; "but what you have told me takes a great weight off my mind. And now, to consider the best means by which you can leave the prison unseen."

"Yes, that's important," said Dick; "and if the officers are watching so attentively as you stated, I don't know how it is to be done."

"I spoke the truth," said the Governor. "You can't imagine their vigilance."

"Wait a moment," said Dick. "We will, if you like, leave the discussion of that point for a little while longer. There is something I wish to say."

"What is it?"

"You spoke about my having no reasonable ground for complaint against you."

The Governor smiled.

"It is quite true," continued Dick, "and, in the event of things turning as they have, I had made up my mind just what I would do."

"Indeed!" said the Governor. "And what may that be?"

"Why, of course I might say a great many things expressive of my gratitude, and so forth, but then they would only be words, after all, leaving nothing substantial behind them. Now my desire is to give you some permanent mark of respect, if you will not mind accepting it."

"I want nothing," the Governor said, though the words were uttered in a tone that belied their import.

"Well," said Dick, "I am going to leave it to you in this way: I wish to make a substantial recognition, and this is how I propose it. Do you know Hampstead Heath?"

"I do—very well," answered the Governor, with a smile.

"Do you know the eastern end of it?"

"Yes, quite well."

"Do you happen to remember," pursued Dick, "seeing at the eastern extremity of the Heath an old tree that has been almost felled by time? The branches are all gone, and nothing but an old trunk remains, and that leans so far out of the perpendicular that it threatens to fall every moment."

"I cannot say I have observed it," replied the Governor, after a moment's consideration. "Surely I could have no difficulty in finding it."

"You will have no difficulty," said Turpin. "It is just in the position I describe, and so singular-looking a tree as that cannot be mistaken for another."

"Well," said the Governor, somewhat feverishly—"well?"

"It is well," said Turpin, with a smile, "for if, at any time you think proper, you will repair to that spot, and, going to the west side of the trunk of the tree, begin to dig close among the roots, you will find about eighteen inches from the surface the substantial recognition of which I spoke."

"But—but——" began the Governor, hesitatingly.

"You need have no scruples about appropriating it," returned Turpin—"in fact, I leave it entirely to you. If you like, you can go there and dig; and if not, I hope you will not be offended."

"By no means," said the Governor, before whose eyes there seemed to arise a most dazzling prospect—"by no means: not that I desire to have anything more than your thanks and the expression of your good will," he added, hypocritically.

"Well, then, you have them," said Turpin, "and you can have the other if you choose. And now, then, for a consideration of the other point."

"Your leaving Newgate secretly?"

"Yes—just so."

"Well, how is it to be done?"

"Can you think of no means?"

"No. I would rather leave it to you, and if you suggest anything reasonable I will consent to it."

"Wait a moment," said Dick.

Then, passing his hand over his forehead, he rapidly brought it down upon his thigh with an air of satisfaction.

"A good thought!" he said. "Yes, I have it—a good thought!"

"Well," said the Governor, anxiously, "out with it. Let me know what it is."

"Send the two men outside for a hackney-coach, and let it be brought round opposite the door leading from your own house. Then we will leave here together, and as soon as the coach arrives we will both pass through your front door, descend the steps, enter it together, and drive off. By that means the police officers will no doubt be thrown completely off their guard."

"Humph!" said the Governor, musingly. "Is there no other way?"

CHAPTER DCCCLXXXIII.

DICK TURPIN AND THE GOVERNOR OF NEWGATE HOLD A DEEPLY-INTERESTING CONFERENCE.

"NONE that I can think of," replied Dick. "But suppose you give the matter a few moments' consideration. You ought to be best able to judge what will be most successful."

The Governor rubbed his head with a puzzled air.

"I am sadly afraid——" he began.

"Of what?" interrupted Dick, anxiously.

"That your plan will never do."

"Indeed. Why not?"

"Simply because you have, as I might say, overlooked one very important fact—that of the prison being so closely surrounded by officers."

"Do you think they would notice us, then, if we left by your own private door?"

"Yes, I do; because when I said a short time ago that Newgate was so closely watched, and not a mouse could leave it unseen, I spoke literally. Depend upon it, the officers are so interested in what they are about that they will never for one moment remove their eyes."

Dick rested his chin in between his hands.

"That does indeed make it difficult: and so, Mr. Bradbury, I shall be obliged to leave it to you, after all."

The Governor was seriously puzzled by the task that was set before him.

For the life of him he could not tell by what means Dick was to be spirited out of prison.

Time was passing, too, and the crowd outside in the Old Bailey was something terrific, and even the presence of all those people increased the difficulty of quitting the prison.

At length, Dick, after some moments' thought, raised his head, and fixed his eyes with a peculiar expression upon the Governor.

"Mr. Bradbury," he said, "I fancy, after all, there is but one way."

"One way?" echoed the Governor, almost mechanically.

"Yes. As it is impossible for me to leave Newgate unseen, I must remain where I am."

The Governor stared at the prisoner for some moments in the most undisguised astonishment, and then he gasped rather than said:

"Remain where you are? Why—why——"

Dick only smiled at the puzzled expression of his countenance.

"I must make my meaning a little clearer," he said.

"Yes, do so, pray, for may I be hanged if I can understand you now at all!"

"Listen, then," said Dick. "I suppose when it is known I have escaped——"

The Governor interrupted him.

"You are beginning at the wrong end, my friend. It will be time enough to consider what will be done after your escape, when you have decided as to how you are to obtain your freedom."

"No, no," said Dick—"excuse me. Just allow me to finish."

"Very well. Go on, then."

"I say, after I have escaped, I suppose the vigilance of the police officers will materially abate, for there will then be no necessity for them to keep up their strict, observant watch."

"No—no, certainly not," said the Governor; "but what has that to do with it?"

"Everything," said Dick, "for, in half a dozen words, what I propose is that you should conceal me somewhere in the prison for the space of twenty-four hours or so; then, when it is given out and believed that I have escaped, and the officers, as you say, have relaxed their vigilance—then will be the time for me to slip off quietly."

"Good!" said Mr. Bradbury, clapping his hands together, with his eyes sparkling brightly—"good! You have hit the nail right on the head this time and no mistake! I wonder how it was we did not think of that before?"

"It is not yet too late," said Dick. "Am I to understand that you approve of this suggestion?"

"Yes—most decidedly I approve of it, for what better one could be made?"

Dick was silent, and then the Governor continued, almost immediately:

"There are a few obstacles in the way of carrying out this design."

Dick nodded, as he replied:

"I am quite aware of that; but still there is no doubt they can be overcome."

"Very likely," said the Governor; "and to begin with the first and greatest, we have the two men outside."

"Just so."

"Now, how are they to be managed? You cannot leave this cell without being seen by them; and so the question arises: shall we take them into our confidence?"

"Not by any means," said Dick; "and, if you will excuse me, I would suggest that we speak in rather a lower tone of voice."

"A good caution. But now, Turpin, if we don't take these men into our confidence, how shall you manage to get out of the cell?"

"We must consider," said Turpin. "There is time yet, and it seems to me you are the proper person to decide upon the best means of dealing with them."

"It has been many and many a day," exclaimed the Governor, "since I puzzled my brains to such an extent! If you'd give me the world I don't know how this is to be managed!"

"Stay a little," said Dick. "Could you not manage to send one of them to fetch something for you?"

"Yes—certainly," answered the Governor, abstractedly. "One could go; but how about the other?"

"Why, suppose, after a time, you send him too?"

"I comprehend you," cried the Governor, with a readiness of apprehension that rather surprised Dick—"I comprehend you, and, as there is no time to be lost, I will commence at once."

Dick did not venture to say no, for he was anxious to quit the cell in which he had passed so many lonely hours, though, had he followed his own inclinations, he would first of all have planned his proceedings from the beginning to the end.

The Governor, however, rose briskly to his feet, and, going to the door, tapped upon it with his knuckles.

The man outside understood the signal, and immediately opened it.

"Miller!" he cried.

"Yes, sir."

"You know my room—my office, I mean, where the papers are kept?"

"Yes, sir, I know it."

"Well, then, I want you to go there," continued the Governor, "and just inside the little drawer in the table, and lying quite on the top of the other papers, you will see a letter in a large envelope. Go and bring it to me."

"I will, sir,"

"You are sure you understand? Don't fail to bring the right one."

Miller shuffled off, and the Governor closed the door again.

"There's one gone," he said, in a whisper, to Dick,

"though we must be quick, for he will soon return."

"And the other?" Turpin exclaimed—"how about the other?"

"I will show you," said Mr. Bradbury. "But just wait a moment. I am not afraid that Miller will return just yet, for one thing, the distance is considerable, and for another, in the drawer to which I have sent him is a large flat bottle of hollands, and if he does not pay his respects to that before he returns, I am not Governor of Newgate."

Dick laughed, and then there was a pause of about half a minute's duration.

At the end of that time the Governor again went to the door and tapped at it as he had done on the previous occasion.

The other man opened it.

"Oh, I am very sorry," said the Governor, "but you heard what I said to Miller a moment ago?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, now, I find I have just made a mistake. The letter I spoke of is not in the drawer, but under the inkstand in the centre of the table. He will perhaps turn all my papers topsy-turvy. Just run and tell him what I say. I can guard the prisoner in the meantime."

The man nodded, and made off at once, for in Newgate Mr. Bradbury reigned supreme, and not one of his subordinates ever dreamed of such an outrageous thing as questioning any command that might be issued.

"Now is your time, Dick," said the Governor, turning round, hastily. "The coast is clear, and will be for at least another moment."

"Capital!" said Dick. "Upon my word, you deserve much for your ingenuity! You have managed this cleverly indeed. What a pity you were not a diplomatist."

The Governor smiled, and felt pleased at the compliment.

"I flatter myself," he said, "that I should have succeeded in that line very well. But be quick—there's no knowing how soon those fellows may take it into their heads to return."

"But where shall I go?" said Dick, who, in spite of his self-command, felt his heart beating at a more than usual rate.

"When you get into the passage," whispered the Governor, hurriedly, "turn to the right, and hasten forward for a short distance. On both sides of you you will see doors similar to this sunk deeply in the wall. Conceal yourself in one of them. The passage is dark, and as the turnkeys will never think of looking for you you will be unseen."

"And then," said Dick, "what next?"

"Wait there until you see me pass along the passage, then step forth, and, as noiselessly as you can, follow in my footsteps."

"Good!" said Dick. "I trust all to you, and depend upon it this will not be the worst night's work that you have ever done."

With these words on his lips Dick slipped through the door of his cell, and as he did so he drew a long breath, and felt quite a joyous feeling come over him.

It seemed to him that he was already free.

Following the injunctions of the Governor, he turned to the right, and hastened for some distance along the corridor.

As he had been told, it was very dark, for although oil lamps were burning dimly here and there, yet the warders did not trust so much to them as to the lanterns they always carried with them, and which served to dissipate the darkness.

The doors, too, were sunk very deeply into the wall, and, as a matter of course, these recesses were in very dark shade indeed, and Dick felt that he could scarcely hope for a better hiding-place.

All at once, he heard a footstep, and then, immediately afterwards, perceived at some distance the flashing of a light.

Murmuring voices reached his ears, and although he had not gone so far along the corridor as he could have wished, yet he felt that his wisest course would be to conceal himself at once, and therefore slipping into one of the dark recesses we have described, he squeezed himself as closely as he could into the corner formed by the door and the wall, and remained there a prey to considerable anxiety, and listening to the voices and footsteps of the men who were approaching.

CHAPTER DCCCLXXXIV.

DICK TURPIN MAKES HIMSELF COMFORTABLE IN THE PRIVATE APARTMENTS OF THE GOVERNOR.

Dick could not help reflecting how strange it was that he should feel so deep an interest in every movement made and word spoken by these two men, and yet such was the case, and he strained his sense of hearing to the utmost, in order to make out what they were saying to each other.

He gathered first, from the tones of their voices, that some dispute was going on between them.

Directly afterwards he distinguished the words:

"I tell you you are a fool, Dick Miller, and I don't go behind your back to say it!"

"Oh, bother!"

"Well, we shall see," returned the other turnkey. "Don't you think the Governor knows all about that bottle of hollands in his drawer?—don't you even think that he could have missed the smallest drop of it?"

"Oh, bother!" said Miller again.

"And yet when I came into the room," continued the other, "there you must be swigging at it, and not content with that, must be so frightened at hearing some one come in that you dropped it."

"Well, it was your fault!" growled Miller. "What the deuce did you want to come sneaking into the room like that for? Who expected you, I should like to know, scaring a fellow out of his blessed wits?"

"I didn't come sneaking in—I walked in because Mr. Bradbury sent me. What excuse shall you make about the hollands?—that's what I want to know."

"Well, how does it concern you?"

"Why, I know you of old. You would not scruple to put it on to my shoulders if you could!"

Dick Miller laughed.

"Well, stow it now," he said; "we can finish the subject another time. Do you want him to overhear us?"

"No—not I. But what will he say when we tell him that we can't find the letter he sent us for?"

"Ah!" exclaimed Dick Miller, with an air of satisfaction, "I am glad to say you are as deeply in for that as I am—he can't blame one without blaming both."

"Well," said the other turnkey, "he told me it was under the inkstand, and I'll take my oath any minute it wasn't—so there's an end."

By this time the two men got out of hearing.

Upon reaching the door of the cell so lately occupied by Dick Turpin, they tapped upon it with their knuckles.

The Governor opened it to the extent of about a couple of inches.

"Well," he said, "the letter?"

"If you please, sir," returned Miller, humbly, "we've looked everywhere, and can't find it."

"Can't find it? Was it not under the inkstand?"

"No, sir."

"Well, where can it have got to? However, never mind."

Then, turning round, as if Dick was still in the cell, and as if he was about to address him, the Governor said:

"I will go myself, Turpin, and fetch the warrant, since you profess to be so particular about it; or, if you don't mind waiting, you shall see it the first thing in the morning."

With these words, the Governor stepped nimbly out of the cell, drawing the door after him.

"Now, Miller," he said, "put the bar up, and fasten the door securely. Mind, you are responsible for your prisoner, and if he gets out between now and morning you will be punished severely."

"All right, sir!" said the turnkey. "You never knew Dick Miller make a failure of that kind yet. Now," he continued, as he finished putting up the fastenings, "get out of that, Mr. Dick, if you can."

Never for one moment did the idea occur to the turnkeys that Dick had been already liberated from his cell—indeed, it was not likely that so unreasonable a notion should enter their minds; therefore, drawing up the two three-legged stools with which they had provided them selves, they sat down with their backs to the door, prepared to wait patiently till morning.

The Governor walked along the passage with a heavy tread, the echoes of his footsteps reverberating through the long, silent corridors.

Dick observed his coming, and as soon as the Governor passed his hiding-place, he stepped out on tiptoe.

Then, guessing why the Governor was treading with such unusual heaviness, Dick cleverly and quickly fell into step with him, keeping such exact time, and allowing his feet to fall so lightly, that it would have required a very sharp ear to distinguish that two persons were walking along the stone corridor instead of one.

At every step they took the necessity for this caution abated, yet they did not venture to change their positions.

To what part of the prison the Governor was now about to conduct him, Dick Turpin scarcely knew, but contented himself with thinking that it would be to some place where, at any rate, they could sit down and hold a further consultation as to his future proceedings.

In this he was not mistaken.

Pursuing certain passages rarely used by anyone except himself, and which led directly to his own private apartments, the Governor hurried forward, nor did he pause until the room was reached in which he sat down to transact his business.

Dick Turpin entered closely after him, and, in obedience with a sign from the Governor, closed the door and slipped a little bolt into its socket.

Then the first thing that met their gaze was the fragments of the broken bottle of hollands, which were strewn in all directions about the carpet, while the room was filled with the overpowering odour of that spirit.

Instead of manifesting any anger at making this discovery, as one might have expected, the Governor placed his hands slowly together, and began to rub them one over the other with an air of great apparent satisfaction.

"Capital," he said—"capital! Nothing could be better!"

"Indeed!" said Dick. "May I ask to what you refer?"

"Why, this," he replied, pointing to the broken glass upon the floor. "I told you they would not fail to pay their respects to this bottle of spirits, and by some accident or other, you see, they have broken it. They will now be frightened to death, lest I should expose what they have done, and cause them to be punished. They are now quite in my power, which, just at the present time, is quite a fortunate circumstance."

Again the Governor rubbed his hands, and Dick, leaving him to indulge in his felicitations, drew a chair close up to the fire and sat down.

He spread out his fingers to the blaze, for his cell was damp and chilly, and the sight of a little fire was now quite a pleasant thing.

Outside in the street the roaring and howling of the people could be heard with painful distinctness.

It was a sound that Dick hated to listen to, and yet he could not close his ears to it.

Little, however, did he think that his comrades formed a parcel of the disorderly route outside, nor did he guess how anxiously their eyes where fixed upon that portion of the prison occupied by the Governor.

"Now," said Mr. Bradbury at length, turning to the fire, "having accomplished our purpose so far, and having succeeded so well, let us have a little further consideration."

"With all my heart."

"Well, then, it seems to me the chief thing is to decide where you are to remain concealed until nightfall."

Dick nodded.

"Well, continued the Governor, "I must confess that is a matter that puzzles me. I should be glad to place one of my private rooms at your disposal, but," he concluded, with a sigh and a shake of his head, "that is impossible—quite impossible."

"Indeed!" said Dick. "I am very sorry to hear that."

"It is no fault of mine," continued Mr. Bradbury—"none at all, I assure you. It is Mrs. B.—a most inquisitive woman she is, I can assure you; and as for trusting her with a secret—— But there, that will do—least said soonest mended."

Dick laughed as he said:

"I don't want to cause you any trouble, Mr. Bradbury. I am much obliged to you for all you have done; but is there no cell into which you could slip me and keep me safe till the appointed time?"

Mr. Bradbury again shook his head.

"We are so uncommonly full," he said—"I scarcely ever knew such a thing, and, besides, you might be liable to discovery in a moment."

"Then what on earth is to be done?"

"That's just what I want to know, and I should be glad if you would think the matter over."

Dick continued to warm himself by the fire, and for several moments there was a profound silence, which was broken at length by the Governor, who asked:

"Well, Dick, have you yet thought of anything?"

"Nothing particular," was the answer. "To be sure there's one idea; but then——"

"Let us hear it, said the Governor—"let us hear it, by all means!"

"Well, then," began Dick, "although you have been Governor of this prison for so short a period, yet you must be aware that the present building is quite a modern structure."

"Yes," said the Governor—"that's true enough."

"Quite true," replied Dick. "Newgate was first built many hundreds of years ago, and from time to time the place has been pulled down, and rebuilt and altered."

"Well, what of all this?" said the Governor, growing interested, though he could not see what it had to do with finding a hiding-place for his prisoner.

"Simply this," was Dick's answer. "In the course of this pulling down, and rebuilding, and alteration, some portions of the ancient edifice have been left, and, to cut short my remarks, I have been told that underneath this present prison of Newgate there exists what one may term another prison, being the remains of the dungeons formerly constructed there."

"Yes," answered Mr. Bradbury. "I have heard something of the kind myself, though I never paid much attention to it. Still, even supposing such places as you mention to exist, they have not been opened for centuries at least, and it is very improbable that any communication exists between the old prison and the new."

"Yet such might be the case," said Dick—"indeed, I have heard it confidently asserted. Now you understand the drift of my remarks. If we can find out this communication, surely, if I conceal myself in underground Newgate, I shall never be discovered, not even if my presence in the building was guessed at, and a close search made."

The Governor shivered, and half unconsciously drew closer to the fire.

"But just consider," he said, "what an uncomfortable place to be in. Fancy the idea of remaining in vaults or dungeons that have been closed up so long—alone, too! Should you not feel afraid?"

CHAPTER DCCCLXXXV.

THE GOVERNOR OF NEWGATE DISCOVERS THAT HE HAS MADE A TREMENDOUS BLUNDER.

At these words, Dick Turpin's lips curled with a contemptuous smile.

"Afraid," he said—"I afraid? No, fear and Dick Turpin have never been acquainted yet, and they will always continue strangers—least of all should I be afraid of darkness."

"It is not the darkness," said the Governor, "but the associations. However, not to go into the subject any further, just tell me by what means you hope to discover a way of communication, supposing any to exist."

"Oh," said Dick, "that's just the point."

"I wish I could give you some information upon it, but I can't."

"Neither can I," continued Turpin, whose eyes had during the last few moments been resting upon a range of shelves. "Do you not think it possible that some of those volumes might give us the information we seek?"

"They might," said the Governor; "they are the annals of Newgate, though, to tell the truth, ever since I have been here I have had enough to do in keeping a the records without looking back to the past."

"I suppose so," said Turpin, rising and going towards the books, in which, as may be imagined, he felt more than a common interest.

The Governor placed himself by his side, and, with a brush that he had picked up, removed a portion of the dust covering the books, so that the lettering could be seen.

"I am no book scholar," said Turpin. "Suppose you reach down one or two of them and glance over the pages; you may find something."

The Governor evidently thought the suggestion a good one, for he at once took down one of the dusty volumes and turned over its mouldering pages.

"If," said Dick, "you could only find a plan or map of some kind, that would be all we should require; but stay—what's that?"

Even as he spoke, the Governor paused in turning over the book, for in between two of the leaves a folded sheet of paper had been placed.

This he at once spread open, and he had to be particularly careful in the process.

The paper was so old, and so decayed by age, that it almost fell to pieces beneath his touch.

Upon it could be traced several indistinct lines, and in the lower right-hand corner in large letters was the word "Newgate."

"This must be the very thing," said Dick, bending forward eagerly.

The Governor bent down too, and managed to decipher the words:

"Plan of ye Prison of Newgate. Anno 1611."

"That's the thing," said Dick, as the Governor read these words aloud. "I think we are all right now."

Long and anxiously did that strange pair bend over the mouldering old map and follow out with their fingers the various lines upon it.

It was necessary that the examination should be a careful one, and it was some time indeed before they could exactly make out the bearings of it.

At last, having succeeded, the Governor said:

"Here, if anywhere, are the means of communication. Whether such may exist to this day is very doubtful, and yet I have a recollection of seeing an old door at the extremity of one of the underground passages, the cells leading out of which," he added, "have for a long time been disused in consequence of the damp."

"Then I have good hopes of it," said Turpin. "At any rate, we will go there and look."

"Agreed," said the Governor, folding up the map and restoring it to its place. "What a fortunate discovery!" he added, as he turned back.

"Most fortunate! And now, to set the point at rest."

"In a moment," said the Governor—"in a moment; but I feel fatigued, and exhausted, and chilly, this evening. Suppose we have one glass together; I should be better prepared to start then."

"As you will," said Dick, carelessly. "I hold you responsible for my safety. You know what the King has written, and he will look to you to carry out his commands."

"Yes," said the Governor, "there's no doubt about that. I will hide you somewhere, rest assured, and between now and morning there is time enough and to spare."

"Very true," said Dick; "and I would rather be seated here in your pleasant company than down below by myself."

The Governor went to a little cupboard, and produced a couple of glasses and a bottle.

A small kettle was simmering by the side of the fire, and with the water he made two glasses very hot and very strong.

Surely, of all the strange positions in which Dick had been placed, this was strangest of all.

Who in the whole world would credit that a notorious highwayman like himself, whose capture had been a source of so much trouble, should be seated quietly by the fireside drinking a glass with the Governor of Newgate?

Yet there he was, and could any of his comrades but have had a glance at him, they would have seen that he looked very comfortable indeed.

It was after a pause that had begun to grow irksome, that Dick said:

"Since we are to sit here a few moments together, Mr. Bradbury, there's a little subject I should like to talk over with you."

"Indeed! What is it?"

"Well, one that turns out to be of no importance now; but would you mind favouring me with a sight of the warrant that has been re-indorsed for my execution?"

"How strange!" thought the Governor, for just then he remembered the words he had made use of when leaving the cell.

Then aloud he added

"I am happy to oblige you in such a simple thing as that. Here it is."

He rose from his seat as he spoke, and placed a parchment in Turpin's hand.

"There," he added, pointing to some writing on the outside of it, "you see the secretary has just signed his name, and put the date."

"Yes, I see," said Dick; "but I am not quite satisfied."

"Indeed! In what way can I satisfy you?"

"I don't understand these documents myself," Dick answered. "Suppose you open it, and begin to read it."

"It'll take some time," said the Governor; "but, however, I can't refuse you."

Accordingly, he opened the warrant, and went through the preamble at the head of it; then uttered a shout of surprise.

Dick gazed at him quietly, and from his manner it was evident he expected some such manifestation from the Governor.

"What's the matter?" he inquired, seeing that the Governor looked more and more amazed.

Mr. Bradbury did not reply, but looked at the warrant again, as though in doubt whether his eyes had served him aright.

Then, with a look of consternation, and almost of horror, on his countenance, he dropped the paper, and stared at Dick, who simply said:

"Well?"

"Well?" exclaimed the Governor. "It is not at all well. But let me look again—I cannot even now believe it!"

He glanced again at the warrant, and then said:

"No, there can be no mistake—this is not the warrant for your execution."

Dick nodded as if he felt quite certain this was a fact.

"Indeed," continued the Governor, "it is a warrant for a companion of yours—to wit, Tom King."

"I don't doubt it," said Turpin; "but I am just a little curious to know by what means you could make that warrant serve for me. You told me I had been tried and sentence passed upon me, which was true, though not at Newgate."

"Ah!" cried the Governor, drawing a breath of relief; "you have been tried then?"

"Yes, certainly, but it was only for a boyish freak. I was taken up on a charge of deer stealing, and brought before a magistrate named Sir Thomas Deane, who found me guilty and pronounced sentence. But what has that to do with the present matter?"

"Nothing at all," said the Governor. "The blunder is mine—a most awful blunder, I must say, yet how it has remained undetected passes my comprehension."

"It is by no means clear to me," said Turpin, "though I could give a guess. But explain it."

"I will," said the Governor. "Candidly, then, I must tell you that the impression was quite strong and fixed in my mind that you had been confined in Newgate——"

"So I have," interrupted Dick.

"Tried and condemned."

"Which I have not," he interrupted, again.

"Well, I fully believed so, and I thought you only escaped when Newgate was attacked by the mob. That was during the time when Mr. Cawthorn was Governor."

Dick nodded.

"I was in Newgate then," he said, "but I was awaiting trial—not condemned. Tom King was here too, and the warrant was all in readiness for his execution, but, lucky, he escaped."

"That where the mistake is," said the Governor. "I went to these papers under the impression I have just named, and, coming to this warrant, did not trouble myself to glance at it particularly, for, as you see, it runs thus: 'Of Tom King, the accomplice of Dick Turpin and others.' You see, there's your name on it," he continued, pointing it out to Dick, "and so, with this impression on my mind, I folded it up and sent it off, believing it was veritably the warrant for your execution."

"But would not such a mistake be discovered?"

"I should have thought so," said the Governor. "It is pretty clear the Secretary of State looked at it no more attentively than I did; the probability is, he just endorsed it, as you see, without ever unfolding it; or, if he was aware of the mistake, as he may be, his idea might have been that it would be best found out afterwards."

Dick drew a long breath.

"I wish I had understood this fully before," he said. "It would have altered my course of action; and yet, upon second thoughts, perhaps things are best as they are."

"Yes, rely upon it," said the Governor, who, every time he looked at the warrant, felt a pang of alarm.

"But just for curiosity's sake," exclaimed Dick, "tell me what would have been the effect of the discovery of this mistake in the warrant, supposing it had been made before my execution?"

"Why, it could not have taken place, that's all," said the Governor—"at least, not by the time appointed. You would have been seized, imprisoned again, and properly tried. Of course a verdict of guilty would have been found, and your position would be just the same as before."

Dick suddenly became lost in thought.

Rousing himself at length, he cried:

"Say no more about it, Mr. Bradbury. Depend upon it, I will not mention the subject, for fear that it should bring you into any trouble, and for the present you know I am safe—in fact, I always shall be, for no matter what the odds may be, I will never yield myself a prisoner again—I have had enough of it."

The Governor pushed the warrant out of the way, and drained his glass.

"I am afraid," he said, "though I thank you all the same, that this matter will creep out; some people must recollect all about it, and then there will be a regular row."

"Don't fear," said Dick, "for through me you have gained a powerful friend."

This remembrance appeased the Governor greatly.

Dick emptied his glass also, and then said:

"Come, Mr. Bradbury, we have sat here long enough; it is getting fast towards morning now, and if the communication with old Newgate is to be discovered, now is the time. Lead the way—I shall be glad to be relieved of my present state of suspense."

"No doubt," said the Governor, rather gloomily. "I wish from the very bottom of my heart that the day was over, and night come."

"And I wish," Dick added, "that I was safe out of Newgate, and a mile away from it at the least."

CHAPTER DCCCLXXXVI.

DICK TURPIN SUCCEEDS IN GAINING ADMISSION TO A PORTION OF OLD NEWGATE.

"No doubt," said the Governor, smiling at the heartiness with which Dick Turpin spoke—"no doubt, but some time will have to elapse before that desirable state of things can possibly come to pass."

He took up the lamp as he spoke, and stepped towards the door.

"Excuse me for making myself so much at home," said Dick; "but if you have no objection I will appropriate this bottle of brandy to my own use; it strikes me that it will prove no bad companion to me when down there in the vaults."

"Take it—take it, by all means," said the Governor; "you will indeed want something to keep the damp out."

"And a light," said Turpin—"I must have a light of some description; not that I care so much about remaining in the dark, only if I have a lamp burning I shall know at once by the appearance of the flame whether the air I breathe is pure enough to support life."

The Governor nodded.

"A prudent thought," he said. "You must not be without a lamp, otherwise you might stray into some passage or other where the air is vitiated from having been closed up so long; no doubt the whole place is filled with a foul atmosphere."

"Then, if you like," said Dick, "I will take the lamp you have in your hand."

"Very good."

"But shall you not want some light in order to return?"

"No," replied the Governor, with a smile. "Short as has been my residence in Newgate, I have already learned every turn and corner in it. I can find my way back in the dark easily; and there will be this advantage attached to it, I shall be more likely to escape observation."

Dick nodded as he answered:

"Lead on, then, now—I am quite ready."

The Governor obeyed, and the next moment this strangely-assorted couple were traversing the long, silent corridors of Newgate.

Very still, very gloomy, and very oppressive were they, and a by no means comfortable sensation came over Dick, but he banished it as well as he could, and, in obedience to the injunctions of his companion, trod as lightly as was possible.

More like two ghosts, then, than two living human beings, they continued gliding along passages, which seemed interminable, especially to Dick, who was top-full of impatience.

Fearing to raise an alarm, scarcely a word had been exchanged between them since they started, but all at once the Governor, pausing slightly, said, in a whisper:

"Now, then, we shall soon know whether the entrance to old Newgate exists, for at the bottom of this flight of steps is the corridor of which I spoke."

Dick made no reply, but raised his finger and pointed down the slippery staircase at the top of which they stood.

Mr. Bradbury understood him, and commenced the descent.

Ever since they had quitted the Governor's apartments they had been gradually descending.

Each passage that they traversed was on a lower level than the one preceding it.

Never until now, however, had they reached a staircase so deep and well-like as this one.

The air, too, was bitter cold, and laden with an unwholesome moisture.

"There is not much fear of an interruption now," the Governor said, speaking as well as his chattering teeth would allow him; "this part of the prison is never visited, I believe, and you may almost make yourself safe here—the cells are all out of repair, and quite unfit for use."

Just as he finished speaking, the bottom of the staircase was reached, and then they found themselves standing in an arched passage, so narrow, that by standing in the centre of it, and stretching out the arms horizontally the sides could be touched, and so low that Dick's hat brushed away many of the dark fungi that depended from the ceiling.

The walls, too, in many places were covered with nitric exhalations, which had crystallised, and so sparkled brilliantly as the rays of the lamp fell upon them.

But there was a general clamminess in the air, and an unwholesome odour that irresistibly reminded them of the grave.

Mr. Bradbury seemed by no means anxious to linger in this passage.

He quickened his pace considerably, and then, having reached the extremity of the passage, paused.

Deeply set in the crumbling wall was a small door, apparently of great strength.

It was secured by means of massive iron bars, a huge lock, and a bolt of corresponding proportions at the top and bottom.

"There," said the Governor, with a shiver, "that's the door, and beyond all doubt there lies beyond it all that remains of old Newgate."

It was impossible for Dick to look upon the old doorway without a feeling of deep, strange interest.

"Will you hold the lamp," said the Governor, "while I try to remove the bars and bolts?"

"Nay," said Dick, placing the bottle on the gro

"allow me to do that, for I fancy I am stronger than you are. But how about the lock—how shall we undo that?"

"I know not," said the Governor. "The chances are a thousand to one whether the key belonging to it is in existence. To me, the door itself looks very old and rotten, and if the bars are taken down and the bolts withdrawn, we may be able to force it open."

Dick thought so too, and then, not without much trouble, and difficulty, and delay, managed to remove the fastenings spoken of.

The bolts gave him the greatest trouble, for it seemed as though they had completely rusted into their sockets.

"Now," said the Governor, when the last bolt was withdrawn, 'try if the door will open."

Dick pressed against it, and it gave way slightly.

"I think we shall manage it," he said. "Either the lock has rusted away or else the place into which the bolt fits has rotted."

He again renewed the pressure, though the Governor exclaimed:

"No violence, mind—no violence! This place, for all I know, may be visited to-morrow, and your destruction, or, at least, your discovery is certain if there are any appearances of this door having been forced."

"All right," said Dick. "There you are."

Just as he spoke the door creaked open a little way upon its hinges.

The lock had been forced, but it was the doorpost that had given way, and on the side where they now stood no traces of violence could be perceived.

No sooner was the door opened than a quantity of foul air rushed forth.

So powerful was it that both Dick and the Governor felt giddy and sick, and the light they carried was well-nigh extinguished.

But, mingling with the purer atmosphere in the damp passage, the foul air quickly lost its noxious qualities.

"That's not encouraging," said Dick, as soon as he was able to speak. "However, we will push the door wide open, so as to ventilate the place a little bit."

This he did, and remained for some time in order that the desired effect might be produced.

Then, warned by the flight of time, he picked up the bottle of brandy from the floor, and took the lamp from the hands of the Governor.

"Good-bye for the present," he said—"good-bye! Make the door secure after me, and when it is time for me to escape, come here again."

"You may depend upon that," said the Governor. "And, if a long time elapses, do not be either alarmed or uneasy, for circumstances may keep me away."

"You may depend upon that. I shall keep perfectly quiet until you return. I have no wish to be discovered."

"That is sufficient, then. Good-bye!"

Dick, with the lamp in his hand, crossed the gloomy threshold, and stood in a passage leading he knew not whither.

The Governor closed the door, and, in spite of the darkness, succeeded in replacing the whole of the fastenings, and so successfully that it was very doubtful that the fact of the door having been opened would be discovered.

Although in Newgate, and in that damp, cold passage, Dick Turpin had felt while the Governor was with him that he was an inmate of this world and that there was life around him; but as soon as the old door was closed this impression vanished, and was succeeded by a totally different one.

It seemed as though in crossing that threshold he had stepped from life to death.

The silence around was something terrible; even the retreating footsteps of the Governor could not be distinguished, and the darkness was so dense that it defied altogether the illuminating powers of the lamp, which seemed to shine only like a star from a dark cloud.

With a view of getting the better of these feelings, Dick applied himself to the bottle of brandy, and having drunk a small portion of the spirit, felt considerably relieved—he looked about him, indeed, with quite a different feeling, and he either imagined, or it was a reality, that the lamp now burned more clearly than before, and enabled him to see around him.

So far as he could tell, the passage in which he stood did not differ particularly from the one he had just left; yet he felt a strange sensation creep over him, as he reflected that probably he was the only human being who had stood there for more than a hundred years.

And now, as he remained quite still, listening, a faint sound that was before inaudible came upon his ears.

It was the dull drip, drip of water trickling down somewhere in the distance.

In such a place as that Dick felt that it would be some relief and consolation to hear even his own voice, and so, in default of having anyone to speak to, he uttered his thoughts aloud.

"I can't remain here all the time," he said—"I should be chilled through to the very bone. No, I will take advantage of this opportunity to explore the hidden mysteries of old Newgate. No doubt I shall find much to interest me and repay me for my trouble. But I must be careful in my wanderings. What means can I adopt to find my way back to this door with certainty?"

This was a question that required a good deal of deliberation.

Many means suggested themselves to him, only, unfortunately, he had not the necessary tools to carry them into effect.

A simple plan would have been to make chalk marks upon the floor, but even this was impossible, for he had no chalk.

Soon afterwards, however, it occurred to him that he might manage to pick out a piece of crumbling mortar from the wall, and make that answer his purpose; at any rate, he resolved to try.

He succeeded in obtaining a piece of mortar from between two of the stones, and, upon trying whether it would leave a mark behind it, was delighted to find that it answered the purpose almost as well as chalk itself, for, being soft with damp, it crumbled easily.

Feeling now great confidence in being able to find his way back, and having refreshed himself with another draught of brandy, Dick took up the lamp, and walked slowly and carefully along the passage, looking keenly at each side of him.

Having gone about twenty paces, he paused, and, stooping down, drew upon the flooring a rude representation of an arrow with the point turned in the direction of the door.

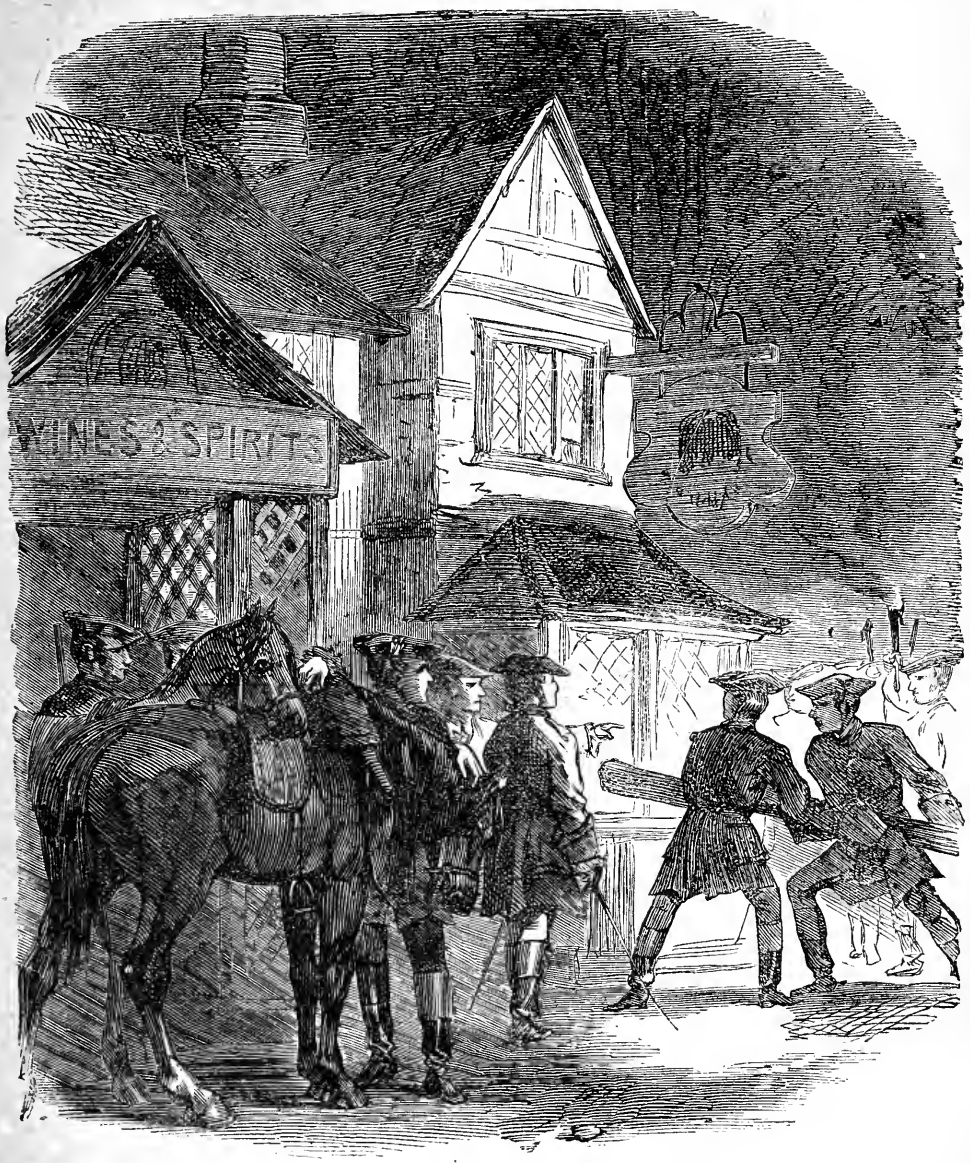
By the aid of this he could not possibly fail to find his way back, nor could he be in any doubt as to which way he should turn; and this precaution he resolved to adopt at every twenty paces or thereabouts.

CHAPTER DCCCLXXXVII.

IN WHICH THE TWO SHERIFFS LOSE THEIR APPETITES FOR BREAKFAST.

It was in no very enviable frame of mind that the Governor of Newgate groped his way back through the dark passages to his own apartments.

However much confidence he might place in the King's letter, yet he knew there could not fail to be a tremendous row when Turpin's absence was discovered, and the consequences might be very disagreeable to himself, though he was sustained by the thought that in the end all would be well.



His mind was troubled, too, respecting the egregious blunder he had made with regard to the warrant.

He was afraid that mistake would somehow or other become known, or the sheriffs might take it into their heads to look at the document, and then a discovery would be certain.

This would bring up a fresh charge against him, for he would have to clear himself from his very culpable negligence.

When, therefore, he ascended to his bedroom to snatch an hour or so's sleep before the business of the day began, he was in no humour to listen to the railings of his wife; and in a short time such a storm of words arose that the Governor was obliged to retreat vanquished from the room—sleep there was quite out of the question.

Descending to his office, he sat there watching the daylight as it gradually stole into the room.

[THE ATTACK OF THE POLICE OFFICERS UPON THE THREE SPIDERS INN.]

He went once to the blind, and drew it slightly aside to peep out.

He drew back immediately, somewhat dismayed by the immense concourse without.

"They will be enraged beyond all measure," he muttered, "when they learn their disappointment. However, the walls of Newgate are strong, and while I am within them I shall be safe."

Breakfast was brought, but Mr. Bradbury was too excited to partake of anything.

He solaced himself with one more perusal of the King's letter, which he carefully consigned to an inner pocket of his coat.

It was shortly afterwards the intelligence was brought to him that the sheriffs had arrived.

It was his duty to receive them, and usher them into the prison, so he went forth accordingly.

Never before had the Governor appeared so full of urbanity.

He bowed so continually and so deeply, that it seemed as if he was unable to straighten his back.

"Very good—very good!" said one of the sheriffs, in a wheezy voice, and who, had he not rejoiced in the suggestive name of Moses Moses, would have been known by the cast of his countenance to be a descendant of Abraham.

His companion was a Mr. Lupin, a silk mercer in the City, whose premises having once been broken into and robbed, had caused him ever afterwards to be an implacable foe to robbers of all kinds, and nothing in the world afforded him so much genuine satisfaction as to see one of the race disposed of at Tyburn.

"Breakfast is ready, I suppose, Bradbury," said Mr. Lupin. "We will sit down to breakfast, and then we shall be fortified against the heavy duties of this day. The prisoner is all right, I suppose?"

"Oh, yes!" said the Governor, licking his lips, and bowing again so as to conceal his countenance as much as possible. "I have been most particular in my charge of him, and paid him a visit in his cell at midnight, and left him there quite safe."

"And were two men outside the door?"

"Yes," responded the Governor, "they have kept a careful watch ever since."

"That's all right, then."

"Mr. Lupin," said Mr. Moses, "it strikes me it would be no very bad thing if we were to pay a visit to the cell the first thing—just a preliminary visit, you know."

"Good—so we will!" responded his companion. "I am sure the sight of the rascal will impart an extra relish to every mouthful I eat!"

The Governor began to tremble.

The moment of discovery had come.

"I'll warrant," said Moses Moses, "that, with all his bravado, this Turpin will not have so good an appetite for his breakfast as we shall—eh, Lupin?"

"No—no, decidedly not," responded that individual, passing his arm through that of his fellow-sheriff.

Mr. Bradbury, with a dreadful quaking at the heart, led the sheriffs to the vestibule of the prison.

Here they found the turnkey who had behaved in so friendly a manner to Dick, with a huge tray of eatables in his hands.

"Eh—eh?" said Moses Moses. "Who's that for?"

"What is it—what is it?" inquired the Governor, addressing the turnkey.

"The prisoner's breakfast, if you please, sir," he answered, respectfully. "I was just going to take it in."

"Dear me!" ejaculated Lupin. "The idea of a prisoner having such a breakfast as that! It's time this state of things was altered. Why, the rascals positively live in Newgate like kings—yes, like kings."

"You can follow us, then," said Mr. Bradbury; "we're going to the cell now."

To the cell accordingly he marched, and, reaching the door of it, he found the two turnkeys much in the same position as he had left them the night before.

They rose at once, seeing the Governor and sheriffs approach, and bowed very humbly.

"All right?" said Moses Moses, interrogatively—"prisoner all right, I suppose?"

"Oh, yes," returned Miller, with great politeness. "We've never stirred a blessed peg from this door since the Governor left us."

"Then he's sure to be safe—eh, Lupin?"

"Yes, decidedly safe, my dear sir."

"Then," cried Moses Moses, "just open the door, if you please."

The Governor made a sign to the two men to remove the fastenings, trying hard all the while to look unconscious of what was about to take place.

Little dreaming of the discovery they were about to make, the turnkeys pushed open the door.

Miller crossed the threshold with the intention of warning the prisoner that distinguished visitors were about to enter.

But no sooner had he gone far enough to enable him to command a view of the whole interior of the cell than he stood like a man suddenly transformed to ice, while all that escaped his lips was the remarkable exclamation:

"Well, blow my higgledy piggledy!"

The other turnkey, guessing at once something was wrong, jumped into the cell and placed himself beside his comrade.

Then, rolling his eyes around twice with a terrified expression, he uttered a fearful yell.

"Dear me!" said Moses Moses. "What is it?"

"An escape!" said Lupin, with a pang. "Oh, there's an escape—something tells me there's an escape!"

"An escape?" echoed the Governor. "Impossible! I assure you I left him here safe at midnight, as these two men will testify."

Unheeding his remarks, the two sheriffs pushed their way into the cell, where the Governor thought it prudent to follow them.

It needed only one glance to assure them all that the cell was untenanted.

The Governor pretended to look astounded.

"Well," he ejaculated, "this passes my comprehension altogether. I left him here safe not many hours ago. Miller, don't you recollect that I did?"

"Yes, sir, I do. I recollect it very well, and I will swear that since then we've never moved our backs from the door!"

"Then how has he got out?" cried Mr. Lupin, in such evident distress that it was plain his appetite for his breakfast had vanished. "By what means has he escaped?"

This led to a close investigation of the cell, which, of course, produced no result except that of convincing them that all was just as it should be, and that there was nothing whatever to show by what means the prisoner had departed

Had he vanished into air before their eyes, his disappearance could not have been more extraordinary or complete.

For some moments the sheriffs stood staring dumbly at each other, the Governor in the meantime looking at them furtively.

At length, in a very pompous voice, Mr. Moses Moses spoke.

"Bradbury," he said, "you will have to account for this, and it's a very odd thing to me if you don't find yourself in custody before the day is out—indeed, I have a good mind to give you in charge now."

"My dear sir," said the Governor, almost falling flat on his face—"my dear sir, don't utter any such words!"

"But he is gone," said Mr. Lupin, with a shriek—"he is gone, and he has taken my appetite with him!"

"At any rate," pursued Moses Moses, "these two men shall be carefully locked up. They shall answer for their neglect of duty."

Two men more utterly astounded than were these two turnkeys could not possibly be found.

The astonishment depicted upon their countenances was truly a sight to look at.

Had they been by some extraordinary means convinced that they were not in Newgate, but up in the moon, they could not have been more incredulous or overwhelmed.

Mr. Lupin all at once recollected that the Governor had mentioned paying the prisoner a visit at midnight, and so he made some inquiries on that point.

The Governor assured them that he had then left Dick Turpin quite safe in his cell, and that when he opened the door and went out, the men had carefully fastened it.

This, however, did not satisfy the sheriffs.

The more they thought the matter over, and the more they inquired into it, the more freely they became impressed with the conviction that the prisoner had made his escape at least by the connivance of the turnkeys, if not by that of the Governor himself.

At any rate, they determined that a searching investigation should be made.

Mr. Moses Moses started the idea that Dick Turpin might still be somewhere in the prison, and, unlikely as this idea was, it was seized upon gladly by the two turnkeys, who at once desired that the closest search should be made.

They hoped, with all their hearts, that Dick would be found.

They knew their own innocence, but they felt that it would avail them nothing at all.

We have overlooked the friendly turnkey, whose astonishment scarcely exceeded his joy upon finding that Dick Turpin had so mysteriously disappeared, yet when the sheriffs talked about searching the prison he felt fearfully uneasy.

He knew, from actual observation, how close was the watch which the officers had kept all around the prison, and therefore felt certain that by no possibility could Dick have left its precincts unseen.

Trembling, therefore, with dread, he waited with great anxiety the result of the search through the prison.

CHAPTER DCCCLXXXVIII

DICK TURPIN MAKES AN UNEXPECTED DISCOVERY IN ONE OF THE CORRIDORS OF OLD NEWGATE.

THE rapidity with which the intelligence spread all over Newgate that Dick Turpin had mysteriously disappeared from his cell was something astonishing.

From mouth to mouth the strange story went, until in the huge pile of building there was not a single person unacquainted with it, the prisoners alone excepted.

The utmost consternation was the result, and many were the strange, ridiculous speculations indulged in, all of which were very far indeed from the mark.

Mr. Moses Moses had quite decided upon the necessity of a search, and he suggested to the Governor that until the building was thoroughly looked over the news of the escape should not be suffered to reach the ears of any persons outside.

The Governor, of course, readily fell into his views, for he had no reason to oppose them; consequently, the search having been agreed upon, means were taken to set about it without delay.

"If I might suggest, Mr. Moses," said the Governor.

"Oh, certainly, suggest what you like."

"Well, then, I would propose that we all go to the vestibule and begin our search from that point, because it is from there that all parts of Newgate can be reached."

This proposition seemed such a reasonable one that the sheriffs at once adopted it.

To the vestibule accordingly they went, and, the necessary keys having been provided, they began their difficult and tedious task.

Yet they persevered, for the sheriffs really felt quite a personal interest in the matter, and it would have vexed them exceedingly had the prisoner got out of their clutches.

But there is no necessity for us to accompany them in their search through the vaults and corridors, since we know very well that the search could only result in a failure.

Down to the lowermost vaults and up on to the top of the roof of the building went the sheriffs, the Governor, and a party of turnkeys.

But nowhere could they discover a single trace of the absent prisoner.

Without appearing to have any such design, the Governor carefully avoided going to those damp, underground cells communicating with old Newgate, and as the acquaintance of the sheriffs with the prison was very superficial indeed, they were none the wiser in this respect—in fact, the door at the top of the long flight of steps descending to the cells was always kept locked, and the key was never out of the Governor's possession.

After searching for upwards of an hour, the sheriffs, tired, vexed, and hot, were obliged to come to the conclusion that by some means, supernatural or otherwise, the prisoner had vanished.

It was then that the news was first suffered to go forth, and it was then the assembled crowds in the Old Bailey outside learned the cause of the delay.

It was then the whisper circulated—

"Dick Turpin has escaped!"

His position, however, notwithstanding the failure of the sheriffs to discover his retreat, was by no means a comfortable or enviable one.

For aught he could tell, still closer search would be made, or so close a watch might be kept upon all the outlets of the prison that he would be unable to get away.

All these thoughts pressed heavily upon him as he endeavoured to while away the time by thoroughly exploring the strange place he was in.

As we have already stated, he took the precaution of making the arrow mark at every few yards, so that he should be in no danger of losing his way.

For a long time he found nothing, however, to recompense him for his trouble.

All at once, however, he perceived before him something that looked like a bright, glittering star.

His first impression was that a huge diamond must be lying in his path, of such lustre that it caught the faint light from the lamp he carried and reflected it with redoubled brilliancy.

Not long, however, did he remain under this impression.

With great suddenness he understood the meaning of what he saw.

It was some opening or other looking out upon the day light—perhaps some opening by which he might escape.

To carry his lamp forward with him towards this aperture would have been unwise in the extreme, as he would be in great danger of discovery, nor could he extinguish it, for he had not the materials with him to relight it.

All he could do was to place it down upon the ground in a spot where it was sheltered somewhat from the draught, and then, with his eyes fixed upon the light in front, to grope slowly and cautiously towards it.

This proceeding he carried out, and found the distance he had to go much less than he had anticipated, for the opening was very small, and as he drew close he perceived that it was crossed and recrossed by bars of iron.

It was also high up in the wall above him, and although he could see through it, yet he did not, as he expected, catch a glimpse of the blue sky.

On the contrary, all he saw was something looking very much like the roof of some chamber in the prison.

All at once he arrested his steps, for the murmur of voices came most distinctly upon his ears.

Clearly, then, he was near some portion of the new prison.

As persons were so close at hand, there was a double reason for silence and caution.

On tiptoe, therefore, and pausing between every step, he crept nearer to the opening, hoping that he might overhear some of the conversation that was being carried on.

He was successful, for, without making any noise whatever, he managed to place himself close against the wall, just under the grated aperture we have mentioned.

One of the voices speaking he immediately recognised as being that of the turnkey who had turned out so true a friend to him.

In the conversation itself there was nothing important or interesting, chiefly because it did not concern him or his proceedings.

Yet Dick listened to it intently.

That dreadful feeling of loneliness which had settled at his heart now passed away—he once more felt as though he belonged to this world.

To him there was an inexpressible pleasure in listening to the rude voices and coarse jests of these turnkeys.

After some speculation, Dick decided that he must be close to the vestibule of the prison, for in no other part would the turnkeys be likely to assemble. As he afterwards found, he came to the correct conclusion.

In former times there had been a door close to where he stood, communicating with a portion of the old prison, but becoming disused, the door was taken down and the wall built up. In its stead the grated opening above for some reason or other was left.

Folding his arms and leaning against this wall, Dick remained for some time.

He was disappointed at the result of his explorations so far, and he felt, besides, that he would rather stay there close to human beings than he would remain in some dark lonesome portion of the vaults.

Here, then, he stood when the Governor and sheriffs entered the vestibule as we have just described.

It may be imagined, perhaps, with what interest Dick listened to all that passed between them.

He had expected that Newgate would be searched, and yet when he found they were setting about it in such a determined manner, he could not control a considerable amount of uneasiness that crept over him.

But at length he heard from the turnkeys the delightful intelligence that the search had been given up as altogether hopeless, though there was a probability that it would be renewed.

Having heard that much, Dick was content.

He found himself weary, too, of remaining so long in one place and in one position, and, therefore, creeping noiselessly away, went back to the spot where he had left his lamp.

It was burning steadily and clearly.

Near him was a passage branching off to the right, and

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY

this passage, for want of something better to do, he determined to explore.

But as he strode on he found that there was nothing at all remarkable in its appearance—nothing to repay him for his trouble.

He was about to turn back, when his eye happened to fall upon something glittering on the ground near his feet.

He stooped to pick it up, then examined it by the light of the lamp.

To his surprise he saw it was a small portion of a gold chain that had evidently been broken with a great amount of violence.

To one end of this chain depended a small locket of peculiar manufacture, and in which was the portrait of a young and beautiful girl.

Dick gazed upon this portrait with very strange feelings indeed, and no wonder.

He had every reason to believe that the portion of Newgate he was now in had remained closed up and unvisited for nearly a hundred years.

It would, then, be only natural for him to expect to find that this young girl was attired in the costume of days long gone by.

To his surprise, however—though the word is too weak to express the feeling he experienced—he perceived that her dress was in every way modern—such, indeed, as was then almost universally worn.

Well might such a discovery as this find food for Turpin's thoughts.

Indeed, simply to find a trinket of this description in such a place would be strange enough.

But how came it there?

One thing he could not possibly resist, and that was, that it had fallen there lately.

Who, then, he asked himself, had traversed those passages beside himself—those passages which he fancied had been untrodden for so long?

This was a question to which, of course, he could return no reply, and so, with a vacant, absent air, he continued to turn the locket and chain over and over, and every now and then would pause to gaze upon the sweet, innocent face that had been painted there.

Rousing himself at length from his reflections, Dick carefully consigned the locket to his pocket, then, trimming the lamp, he held it aloft so that its light should be well diffused, and looked around him in all directions with uncommon closeness and eagerness.

Nothing, however, met his gaze, but the strong, damp, stone walls and the little doorways which at frequent intervals broke in upon their evenness.

"This is strange indeed," he muttered, as he took a step forward, "but it will be an odd thing to me if I don't come to some definite conclusion respecting it."

CHAPTER DCCCLXXXIX.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN HAS SOME FURTHER ADVENTURES IN THE CORRIDORS OF OLD NEWGATE.

CONTINUING to look around him thus closely, Dick Turpin slightly advanced until, having gone about half-a-dozen paces, he found the character of the place he was in altogether changed.

The passage abruptly terminated in a large, peculiarly-shaped chamber, and which, after a brief examination, he concluded must at some time or other have served as a vestibule.

Doors could be seen opening from it, and passages branching off similar to the one from which he had just emerged.

The roof of this chamber gradually got higher towards the centre, and, having paused as nearly as he could tell in the middle, Dick held up the lamp and endeavoured to ascertain its height.

This, however, he was not able to do, for overhead he could see nothing but a huge black patch.

Looking down again upon the ground, thinking perhaps to find some other fragment of the broken chain, he suddenly started

A strange expression swept over his face, and he seemed inclined to turn aside.

But changing his disposition, he stooped down.

The rays of the lamp then fell upon an object well calculated to make the senses of the boldest sicken with horror.

On the ground was a large spot of blood scarcely dry yet in some places, but evidently fast soaking into and mingling with the damp earth.

Marvelling more and more at what he saw, and feeling now fearfully anxious to unravel the whole mystery, Dick, keeping the lamp close to the ground, tried to trace the blood close to another spot.

But in this he failed completely.

There was no clue to it whatever.

But before him was a passage which seemed to invite him to enter it—at any rate, he strode quickly forward and commenced an exploration of it.

Less than ten strides brought him to the termination of it.

His further progress was barred by a door.

This door was old, worm-eaten, and seemed as though it would only require a slight touch to push it from its frame.

On the side upon which Turpin stood, it was secured by bars and bolts, and these, after some deliberation with himself, and after listening for awhile and finding all silent, Dick ventured to remove.

Pressing gently against the door, he found it opened to his touch.

Beyond all was darkness.

He listened again. But, reassured by the silence, crossed the threshold.

How great was his wonder to find himself in what he firmly believed from its appearance to be the cellar of a house.

In this he might have been mistaken, but soon all his doubts and surmises were set at rest, for going to the foot of a flight of steps that led down into it, he stood and heard distinctly the sound of voices above.

The tones were quite unfamiliar to him, and he was quite certain that it was none of the turnkeys of Newgate he heard conversing, besides, a woman's voice mingled with the others.

The light he carried with him prevented him from observing earlier what now came under his notice, which was that there was a small grating in one portion of the wall, through which a few gleams of light made their way.

Placing the lamp aside, he went close up to this grating, and peered through it.

In front was a small square, recess-like-looking place, at the top of which he could distinguish another grating, lying in a horizontal position.

Now, however, that he had reached this place, he received additional confirmation of his idea, for he could hear the sound of many footsteps hurrying by above, as well as the rumbling of wheels and the trampling of horses' feet.

Clearly, then, he was somewhere near a street, and beyond all doubt he was in the cellar of a house which must mysteriously and strangely have a communication with Newgate.

Retracing his footsteps, Dick closed the door, and examined it.

The fastenings were all upon the prison side of the door, and he felt certain that very many years had elapsed since these fastenings had been removed.

This blew to the winds the hypothesis that he had already raised in his mind to account for the discoveries he had made.

If the fastenings had been removable by anyone in the cellar, the solution to the whole mystery would have been easy; but he felt perfectly confident that it would be utterly impossible for anyone to pass from the cellar into the prison without resorting to the violent means of breaking down the door.

This palpably had never been done, so he was now quite as much in the dark as ever.

Replacing the bars, and pushing the bolts into their rusty sockets, he retraced his steps into the large chamber.

Again he endeavoured to ascertain the height of the roof, but the lamp now burned much more dimly than before, so that he met with no success—indeed, the condition of the light alarmed him a little, and upon examination he found that only a small quantity of oil remained in the reservoir made to contain it.

Perhaps the flame would expire in a few minutes.

At any rate, it could not burn long, and, much as it vexed him to leave the spot, he felt constrained to do so, as to find his way back to the door where the Governor would expect to see him would be perfectly impossible in the darkness.

Accordingly he retraced his steps, and, owing to the excellent precautions he had taken in marking his route, he had not the least difficulty in doing this.

The door was reached, but scarcely had he arrived at it than the lamp, after flickering a moment or two expired.

He was now in the most absolute darkness, and altogether without the means of dispersing it.

Nothing remained for him to do but to stay just where he was, and count the seconds as they elapsed.

How earnestly he longed for night to come, in order that the Governor might make his appearance.

He could not dare to reflect upon the contingency that some circumstance might arise to make it impossible for Mr. Bradbury to pay his promised visit.

It would be bad enough to consider the evil when it presented itself.

Dick was very weary, and a long time had elapsed since he had slept.

A drowsy feeling now came over him—perhaps caused by the badness of the atmosphere.

He did not attempt to struggle against it, but, sinking down in a curious, uncomfortable-looking posture, dropped off into a profound slumber.

Strange dreams flitted before him, in which the curious and fearful discoveries he had made held a prominent place.

How long he would have slept if left to himself would be a problem difficult of solution, but all at once he was aroused by a slight noise, and, opening his eyes, he saw the door open immediately afterwards, and perceived the Governor standing on the threshold with a lamp in his hand, the brilliancy of which absolutely dazzled him.

That was only because he had been for such a long time in total darkness, and it was a feeling that quickly passed away.

There was a look of anxious care upon Mr. Bradbury's countenance, such as Dick had never seen upon it before.

"You are safe, I see," was his first remark.

"Yes, safe enough," returned Dick, shaking himself. "I have been asleep—I don't know how long, for the lamp burned out and left me in darkness."

The Governor stared in surprise.

He could scarcely conceive of sleeping in such a place.

But Dick was anxious to know what was going on in the world above, and questioned him accordingly.

The Governor had but little to tell, and nothing that he said was very satisfactory.

A tremendous outcry had been raised by the police and all the authorities, and the prevalent idea in the minds of all was that he was still concealed somewhere in the prison.

"I had hoped," the Governor said, "that I should be able to release you to-night, and, for all I know, it might be accomplished; yet there is such an amount of hazard connected with it that I cannot help shrinking back."

"Indeed!" said Dick. "You fear you will be seen?"

"I do; not exactly that I need care much for the consequences, but still, the letter expressly states that you were to be liberated secretly."

"Yes; and it must be secretly," said Dick, "or, rely upon it, I shall be pounced upon at once."

Dick began to reflect a little.

Perceiving him to be silent, the Governor took from his pocket a small package.

"I guessed you would be hungry," he said, "and so I have brought you something to eat. Here is another bottle of brandy to wash it down with, so you must make yourself as comfortable as you can, and wait until there is a chance of getting free."

"Mr. Bradbury," returned Dick, "I am much obliged to you for all that you have done in my behalf—very much obliged to you indeed, and rest assured I shall not forget it. I should be very sorry, too, to get you into any trouble on my account."

"Oh," said the Governor, "don't mention it!"

"Excuse me," continued Dick, "but I will. Now, I don't think you will be displeased to hear that I fancy I shall be able to make my escape from the prison without your connivance or assistance."

"Indeed! How so?"

"Why, in my explorations through these corridors, I have found a door that, strangely enough, communicates with the cellar of a house which, from the position of it, must be, I take it, somewhere near Newgate Market."

"Indeed!" said the Governor. "I never heard of such a thing. Have you not been dreaming?"

"No, I think not; but, however, if you will leave me the lamp you carry, and take away this one, which has burnt out, I will try what I can do towards effecting my own release. If I succeed, all well and good—you will soon hear of me; if I fail, you will find me close to the door here, and I shall then be obliged to look to you for my safety."

The Governor remained for some moments in reflection.

"If this is really the case," he exclaimed, at length, "I shall be heartily rejoiced, since I shall have nothing further to fear from those who may take it into their heads to watch my movements. I will leave you, then, since you wish it, to your own exertions, and to-morrow night about this time I will, if it lies in my power, creep down to this door, and, if I find you are not here, I shall come at once to the conclusion that you have managed to avail yourself of the mode of escape you speak of."

CHAPTER DCCCXC.

DICK TURPIN IS SURPRISED TO FIND THAT HE IS NOT ALONE IN OLD NEWGATE.

"Just so," said Turpin. "And in case I should be gone, as I hope I shall be, just let me remind you about that substantial recognition I was talking about."

"Oh," replied the Governor, briskly, "there's no need to remind me about that—none whatever, I can assure you!"

"Very likely not," said Dick, smiling, "but I only just mentioned it in order that I might give you a caution."

"A caution? Of what kind?" asked the Governor, his timorous nature being at once awoke to danger.

"Why, it is simply this: I would advise you not to take any active steps for finding what is hidden under the old tree for, say, a week at least."

"And may I ask why?" said the Governor, after a pause.

"You may—I have no objection to telling you."

"Why is it, then?"

"Because I think it highly probable that for some time to come your movements will be closely watched by the police officers—mind you, I don't say they will be: I only think it probable, for some of them are such dunderheaded fellows that they might get hold of the notion that you were an accomplice of mine, which would be a very good joke indeed."

The Governor laughed, but rather grimly.

"At any rate," added Turpin, quickly, "it would not be well for anyone to become acquainted with this secret besides yourself."

"No, no—I can quite see the force of that.

"Then," added Turpin, "may we conclude that it is agreed you will not pay your visit to Hampstead for the space of a week?"

"Yes," answered the Governor, with something like a sigh, for no doubt he was both anxious and curious to know what kind of substantial recognition he was about to receive.

Dick's real motive for making this bargain did not for a moment strike him.

It was, however, simply because he knew very well no such treasure was buried among the roots of the tree he described, though he intended to place a reward there for the Governor to find.

He could not tell what might happen to him in the course of the next day or two, and if the Governor got to the tree before him it would be vexing in more than one respect; at any rate, it would seem as though he had spoken falsely.

Now, however, this was arranged, and Dick felt quite contented and easy upon the point.

In conclusion, the Governor said:

"And now, if you will allow me to give you a little piece of advice, and ask you to follow it, don't think it is given from a wish to get out of any further trouble with you."

"I would never think such a thing," said Turpin. "Pray what is it? I am most anxious to hear anything you may have to communicate."

"Well, then, candidly speaking, if you can manage by your own adroitness to get clear of Newgate to-night do not fail to do so."

"I will not," was Dick's reply, spoken with even more earnestness than the Governor's instruction.

"The reason why I advise it," pursued Mr. Bradbury, "is that there is great talk of a thorough search through the prison. Hitherto I have been able to keep them from this part of it, but to-morrow some one may step forward who knows all the secrets of this edifice, and a thorough search, in the proper sense of the term, will be made, in which event, should you be lingering here, you would be in great danger of discovery."

"All right," said Dick—"I take the hint."

"And I will depart," concluded the Governor, "for I am desirous not to be absent from my post for any length of time together. My whole thoughts are given to avoid giving cause for suspicions, if I can."

"Very prudent indeed."

The Governor stooped, and, putting down the lamp he had brought with him, the reservoir of which he assured the highwayman contained a good supply of oil, he took up the extinguished one, and said:

"Good night!"

"Farewell!" responded Dick, shaking him by the hand. "I am much obliged to you for all you have done, and I hope I shall not have the pleasure of meeting you again within these walls."

The Governor smiled, and then, evidently wishful to take his departure, stepped out into the outer corridor, fastening up the door as before, and, in spite of the darkness, made his way back to his own apartments without accident.

Dick felt loath for the Governor to go, and, indeed, shortly afterwards wished he had the power to recall him, but it was too late.

Getting into as comfortable a position as he could, Dick partook of the refreshment the Governor had brought, and drank a small quantity of the brandy, after which he felt greatly revived, and ready to embark in any adventure that might present itself before him.

He remained for some moments after he had finished his meal resting his forehead on his hand, and giving himself up to deep thought.

Then, rousing himself, he took from his pocket the locket and chain he had so strangely found.

Once more this underwent a thorough inspection, but nothing more was seen than he had seen already.

He dwelt for a long time upon the pleasing features of the young girl, and, as he returned the trinket to his pocket, he mentally made a vow to use his best endeavours to discover how and by what means it had fallen where he had found it.

Rising, then, and carefully removing all traces of his presence there, Dick took up the lamp, and, with tolerable certainty and confidence, made his way towards the irregularly-shaped chamber, upon the floor of which appeared so terrible and ominous a sign.

Again he made a close examination of this place, without, however, making any fresh discovery except that the increased illumination of the lamp enabled him to obtain a view of the ceiling, a thing he had so anxiously desired.

Instead of finding that the roof continued to slope upwards to a point, as he fully expected it would, he saw that across the upper part of it was laid what looked like a wooden flooring supported on two joists or beams, which, blackened all over by time, were only just distinguishable from the darkness around them.

While thus gazing up, a faint sound from above reached his ears; yet it was a sound, and that it came from the wooden floor above he felt convinced.

Doubtless human beings were at hand, and, as he might consider that all men were at war with him, he was right in fearing detection.

His first impulse, therefore, was to extinguish the lamp, and this he would most certainly have done, only he recollected just in time that he had not the means with him of reigniting it.

Yet the light of that lamp might show itself through any small crevices that there might be between the boards, and thus his presence become known.

Accordingly, without pausing to reflect, but urged only by an instinct which he did not attempt to resist, Dick hastily retreated down one of the corridors, and, having gone far enough as he imagined, stooped down, and placed the lamp in one of the recessed doorways.

Its light was now almost entirely cut off.

But just at this moment Dick started and almost uttered a cry.

It was only by a great effort of self-command that he repressed it.

The profound silence around was suddenly broken in upon by a sound, the nature of which he could not precisely make out, followed by a rushing noise as of some heavy body falling through space.

Then succeeded a dull, heavy crash, and simultaneously a groan.

Dick's first thought was that his imagination had deceived him, but he was not allowed long to retain this impression, for another groan came fainter but more unmistakably than the first.

Wondering what could have occurred, and undecided how to act—for if he ventured forth with the lamp he might be seen—Dick remained for a moment or two a prey to the greatest suspense.

During that period he continued to hear the faint yet painful groans, and, unable to remain a passive listener any longer, he, in spite of the obscurity, crept gently along the passage.

The distance to the chamber was not great, and upon passing over it he stopped and looked upwards.

He almost expected to see something peculiar up in the roof, but he perceived nothing—at least, nothing but darkness.

The lamp behind him, however, cast a feeble gleam of light along the damp, moss-grown flooring, and Dick strained his eyes in the hope of being able to distinguish something.

While thus engaged, he heard a voice say, though in tones no louder than the faintest whisper:

"Help—help, for Heaven's sake, help me! Have mercy upon me—pray have mercy upon me!"

There was no mistaking the character of this appeal.

Some one was lying there dangerously hurt asking for assistance.

Dick hesitated a second, and then, in the same low tones, answered:

"Speak—speak again, that I may know where you are, and grope my way towards you! Speak again! Why do you not reply to me?"

The silence of the grave, however, reigned around.

Dick felt more and more uneasy every moment, but, shaking off these fears which he despised himself for giving way to, he sank down upon his hands and knees, and, with one arm outstretched before him, crept slowly along the flooring.

His motive for this proceeding was, that he considered it would be dangerous to produce the light, lest it should be seen by some unfriendly eye.

Some time elapsed before he was able to make out a dark, dusky-looking mass in front of him, and he would never have perceived it but for the faint gleam of the lamp which we have already referred to.

Again he spoke, but, as before, he met with no response.

Crawling forward a few more paces, he stretched out his arm and touched the dusky form.

It was evidently that of a human being.

The feel of the apparel also told him it was a man, and at the same time he discovered he was either dead or insensible.

Dick no longer hesitated how to act.

A fellow-creature was in difficulty and danger, and it was a natural instinct on his part to assist him.

Seizing him by the shoulders, then, he dragged him slowly along towards the entrance of the corridor where he had left the lamp.

He paused once or twice to rest and to listen.

But the deep silence reassured him, though at the same time it made him feel strangely uncomfortable.

Having entered the passage, however, he proceeded with greater confidence.

He was full of the most intense curiosity to know who this strange being could be, and by what means he had so suddenly and awfully made his appearance in that portion of Newgate which Dick had believed was never trodden by human foot.

CHAPTER DCCCXCI.

DICK TURPIN IS THE AUDITOR OF A MOST EXTRAORDINARY NARRATIVE.

Having dragged the stranger as far as the lamp, Dick Turpin laid him down upon his back, and by the aid of the light looked attentively at his countenance.

It was one pleasing enough to look upon, for if its aspect could be taken as an index for the stranger's character, then, surely, he was of a noble nature and of a most generous disposition.

But his handsome features now appeared quite rigid, as though frozen by death, and his eyes only half closed, and his partially-opened mouth seemed to make it still more certain that he had expired.

It might be, however, that he had only swooned in consequence of the fearful injuries he must have received from falling from so great a height.

Dick sincerely hoped that this would prove the case, for it would have been a bitter disappointment to have been debarred from learning the occasion of the stranger's presence.

Remembering the bottle of brandy he had in his pocket, he drew it forth and poured a small quantity in between the young man's lips.

At first no effect could be perceived, but soon there was a flutter, then a struggle and painful gasps for breath.

Dick half raised him into a sitting posture, and then, to his great satisfaction, he perceived a portion of the brandy had been swallowed.

He instantly applied more, which was drunk eagerly.

"Sir—sir," cried Dick, "whoever you may be, be of good heart! I will defend and assist you to the uttermost."

"Ah!" said the stranger, dreamily, and drawing his hand across his forehead while he spoke, "is it possible that I have found a friend?"

"It is not only possible but quite true," responded Turpin, as cheerfully as he was able. "Do you not feel much better? Would you like more brandy?"

"Yes, I feel better—very much better. But no brandy just at present—I want to think."

Dick remained silent, and the stranger closed his eyes.

It was tolerably certain that he was endeavouring to collect his scattered thoughts and to remember where he was and how he came there.

All at once he uttered an ejaculation, and in the same breath asked where he was.

"That I will tell you presently," said Dick, "when you have recovered yourself a little more. My presence here is one of the strangest things in the world, excepting, of course, your own, for I believed this place was never entered by human beings."

These words seemed to puzzle the stranger exceedingly.

He was clearly fast getting better, for he was now able to sit up without Dick's assistance.

He moved himself a little closer to the wall, however, and rested his back against it.

Then, in a dreamy, half-sleepy fashion, he fixed his eyes upon Turpin as though wondering who he could be.

"Rouse yourself, sir," said Dick, perceiving the state into which he was falling—"let me entreat you to rouse yourself, for this is no place in which to linger. I wish to leave as soon as possible, yet I am determined not to depart until you are able to accompany me."

"Who are you," asked the stranger, "that you should take so deep and great an interest in a person I believe you have never seen before?"

"No matter who I am," said Turpin—"I am ready to do all that lies in the power of a human being to assist and recover you."

"But from what motive?"

"Humanity and, I confess it, a deep curiosity to know by what means you reached this place."

The stranger glanced around him at the dark, dripping walls, and by his manner it seemed as though he was as much in the dark in this respect as Turpin himself.

"You have a right to my confidence," said the stranger after a pause, and speaking in a more mournful tone of voice than he had done hitherto, "besides, my story cannot be too often repeated, since I have all to gain by the publicity of it, and everything to lose by keeping it a secret."

"Indeed," said Dick. "You inflame my curiosity. If I can assist you further, believe me, I am at your commands, for I do not hesitate to say that, over and above all these peculiar circumstances, there is something in your appearance that has wonderfully interested me on your behalf."

The stranger inclined his head and smiled.

"The time will not be altogether lost," he said, "that I shall consume with my relation, for while I am speaking I trust I shall get stronger and better, and, by the time I have concluded, be able to leave this place."

"So do I," said Dick, "and I have no doubt we shall be successful."

"I will begin, then, by telling you," said the stranger, "that the strongest feeling or passion that I have yet known has been that of friendship—friendship for one I have known almost as long as I can recollect—one who has been to me more than a brother, who is far dearer to me than any brother could be, although I have none.

"In our youth our stations in life were much the same—that is to say, we were possessed of a little, but not enough to live upon without exercising our own industry

"The very first disagreement—if so I may term it—that took place between myself and my friend was when the time came for us to make choice of our professions.

"You must understand that there was no similarity of temperament between us, which, for aught I know, might have been the cause of our friendship.

"But from his birth—as I may say—my friend, Leonard Wilton, had had a passion for the sea, and he always maintained that, come what would, he would be a sailor.

"Now, on my part, I had the greatest possible aversion to a seafaring life—indeed, so great is my natural antipathy, that often now I cannot bear to look upon the waves, and the very murmur of the waters on the beach thrills me with a most uncomfortable sensation. In anything else I would have given way to my friend Leonard, but in this it was impossible.

"Greatly as I regretted the separation, yet I felt it must take place—there was nothing else that he would turn his thoughts to; he was bent upon becoming a seaman; and I do believe that, had I accompanied him, one voyage would have brought about my death.

"However, I am entering much too closely into details; I will hasten to satisfy your curiosity.

"You must know, then, that it is nearly a year ago since my friend Leonard returned from his last voyage.

"During his absence in foreign lands a great change has come over my own fortunes; a relative dying, has left me in possession of what is to me a large fortune, and I had resolved that when Leonard came back he should go to sea no more, and that I would share this fortune with him.

"It so happened that I was absent in the north when his vessel reached home. I have certain knowledge that on leaving the ship he proceeded to London, but beyond that I can learn nothing in this huge metropolis; he seems to have been swallowed up like a drop of water in the ocean, and to be irretrievably lost."

There was a tone of deep feeling and pathos in the young man's voice when he reached this part of his narration.

"Wondering at his silence," he continued, "I hastened to London and endeavoured to seek him out.

"In vain, however—he was nowhere to be found.

"I was frantic with grief, and so was Lucy.

"Ah! that reminds me that I had not previously mentioned her name. Well, then, she is, as you may guess, a young girl upon whom my friend has bestowed his affections, and to whom he was about to be married.

"She was to join her solicitations to mine that, or there would be no longer any necessity for him to traverse the ocean, he would henceforth stay at home.

"I pass over without comment what her grief must be like upon learning her lover's mysterious disappearance.

"A thousand conjectures have occupied her mind and mine. I have devoted my wealth without stint, and given the whole of my time for a long time past in the hope of being able to learn something of his fate.

"I have been totally unsuccessful, however; not the slightest clue has rewarded me for my pains."

Again the young man paused and brushed his hand across his brow

His voice had grown husky while he spoke, and now he endeavoured to clear it.

As for Dick, he was so deeply interested in the narrative that was thus unexpectedly related to him that he really forgot where he was and the strange circumstances by which he was surrounded.

He did not like to urge the stranger to continue, and so for a short time there was a profound silence.

At last the young man resumed his story.

"I have had much dealings with the police," he said, "but they have failed to aid me any further than by uttering surmises.

"Their impression is that this young sailor, on reaching London, was decoyed into one of those places, so many of which are believed to exist, where, if a stranger enters with money about his person, he is never seen or heard of more.

"At last I came to this conclusion. I mourned my friend as one who is dead, but yet I felt impelled to discover if I could by what means he had reached his untimely end.

"I don't like to confess to you that there is still in my heart a faint, lingering hope that I may find him yet living, yet there is such a hope, and it is that which animates me to continue in my course, and that hope will never be extinct until I have proof positive that he is no more."

Dick regarded the young man with the greatest admiration and respect.

He had imagined much from his noble, intelligent-looking countenance, yet he scarcely thought that in the cause of friendship a man would risk and do so much.

In a more rapid voice the young man continued:

"Having, as I say, reluctantly come to the conclusion that my friend had been decoyed into some place and there murdered, as I told you, I devoted myself to the task of finding that place out. At least it would give me some satisfaction to bring such miscreants to justice.

"Adopting, then, almost all disguises, I have roamed London at all hours of the night.

"For some time I had the police with me keeping me in sight; but as I never met with any adventure, and as I came no nearer to my end, I guessed the reason was that the presence of the police officers was known, and therefore I resolved, in spite of the great personal risk, to proceed upon my dangerous adventures alone.

"I did so, but met with no more success than at first, yet I did not despair.

"To pass over all my failures, I will come to the adventures of to-night, though I ought to tell you that I had at last grown weary of my search—indeed, I had almost made the mental determination that if this night passed as the others had I would give up my quest altogether.

"Now, however, I come to the strangest and most fearful portion of my narrative, which I will render you in as few words as possible. The tale is terrible," he added, with a shudder of his whole body, "yet it shall be told."

CHAPTER DCCCXCI.

IN WHICH THE PRESENCE OF THE YOUNG STRANGER IN OLD NEWGATE IS ACCOUNTED FOR.

The stranger's eyes rolled so fearfully around while he spoke, that it seemed as though he could scarcely believe he had escaped from the great danger that had threatened him.

Dick, perceiving his agitation, proffered the bottle of brandy, which was gladly accepted; then, after a draught, he concluded his story.

"It was early this evening," he said, "as I was walking near St. Paul's Cathedral I saw a small crowd of people assembled.

"Everything unusual I had come to consider concerned me, so, quickening my steps, I hastened to see what was the matter.

"Arriving, I found that the cause of the assemblage was a young and beautiful girl, whose countenance looked innocence.

"She was singing in a voice which, for sweetness, I have never known to be equalled. I formed one of the crowd—indeed, the crowd gradually dispersed, though others continually came up.

"But at last this young girl ceased her song.

"Something, I know not what, attracted me towards her; perhaps it was her beauty perhaps the sweetness of her voice, or some mysterious influence beyond my own knowledge. Certainly I remained, and those who had been listening, fearing, I suppose, that the girl was about to solicit a few pence for her song, hastily moving off, I was left alone with her.

"She looked up in my face with a pleasant smile, and, in broken English, made some remark to me, but what the exact words were I cannot recollect.

"I replied by producing my purse, and giving her a piece of silver.

"She was profuse in her thanks upon receiving this gift, and then, placing her hand in a half-familiar, half-timid manner on my arm, requested me to accompany her.

"For a moment I hesitated, and then there came before my mind what I call 'the purpose of my life;' the recollection of it banished my hesitation, and I consented.

"The reason I did so was because I knew full well my friend's impressionable nature, and I thought that had he, upon his arrival in London, met with anyone like this young girl, he would without hesitation have consented to accompany her wherever she went, for he knew no fear.

"In a moment we turned out of the main thoroughfare. I quickly found myself led through a number of narrow passages, the existence of which I was scarcely aware of, although I had travelled London so much.

"I know, however, that these streets, or, rather, passages, exist between St. Paul's Cathedral and the prison of Newgate.

'Coming at length to a house having by no means a prepossessing aspect, I was invited to enter.

"Determined to prosecute the adventure to the uttermost, and hoping to find some trace of my lost friend, I again consented, and soon found myself seated in a room that was furnished strangely at variance with the exterior appearance of the house.

"All this I noted carefully, though my heart beat strangely, for I believed I was on the right track at last.

"Then this young girl poured out for me a glass of wine, and handed it to me. She poured out also one for herself, and I observed that the liquid came from the same decanter.

"The police had often cautioned me against partaking of any drink, lest it should be drugged.

"But this proceeding threw me partially off my guard. However, I raised the wine-glass to my lips, and uttered some silly compliment; but I did not drain the glass—I simply sipped it, perhaps swallowing a tea-spoonful, and I was immediately aware of a strangeness in its taste.

"Just then the girl, having drained her glass, turned half aside to place it on a small table, and at that instant, quick as thought, I inverted my glass.

"The wine that remained fell upon the carpet, the colour of which was dark, and the material soft and woolly; it was absorbed in a moment and no stain was left behind.

"Some more time elapsed, and I was conducted to an upper chamber.

"I had determined to keep all my wits about me, yet to refuse nothing.

"Having entered, the door was closed behind me, and I found myself alone.

"Something in the atmosphere of that room seemed to chill and oppress me, and I gasped painfully for breath.

"Then it occurred to me this was the effects of the drug I had partaken of, and I congratulated myself that

[THE HIGHWAYMEN SEEK SHELTER IN THE SECRET PASSAGE.]

I had not swallowed the whole, although the girl was evidently under the impression that I had done so.

"There was a strange cloudiness in my brain to which I had never been accustomed, which might be attributed either to the strength of the drug or else to the fact that it is rarely indeed that I partake of any intoxicating liquor, as the effects produced make this apparent.

"Rejoiced at this opportunity of finding myself alone, I determined to make a thorough search of the chamber, hoping I should make some discovery worth my while.

"On the table opposite to me I saw trinkets of various kinds, the appearance of some of which struck me as singular, and I advanced with the intention of examining them.

"All at once, however, as I passed over one portion of the flooring near the hearthstone, it suddenly gave way beneath my feet.

"The drug then was exerting its utmost power. I was dizzy and confused, yet, finding myself falling, I had the presence of mind to endeavour to drop upon my hands and feet.

"Whether I succeeded or not I cannot tell you, for from that moment, until the time when I opened my eyes and saw you bending over me, I remember nothing whatever."

"That, then," said Dick, drawing a long breath, for no words can describe the amount of interest with which he listened to this narrative—"is all?"

"Yes," was the reply—"all. And now I have to ask you, in return, who you are and where I now am?"

"I will answer your last question first," said Dick. "No doubt you will be taken greatly by surprise."

"Where am I, then?"

"In Newgate."

"Newgate?"

"You speak incredulously, and I don't wonder at it.

It is a fact, nevertheless. Not in the new, modern prison, but among the vaults remaining of the ancient edifice."

The stranger's countenance at first expressed great disbelief, but then he ejaculated:

"Yes, extraordinary as this may seem, I cannot doubt it. The position of the house—these strong, damp walls, all confirm your statement."

"Well may you be taken by surprise," said Dick, "for I believe the very existence of this place is guessed at and known by very few."

"I never heard of such a thing," he murmured.

"No," said Dick, sinking his voice and pointing upwards; "but those above evidently know all about it."

The young man shuddered; but then, his thoughts reverting to his fresh companion, he looked upon him with undisguised amazement as he said:

"But if this is a portion of old Newgate, how comes it that you are an inhabitant of it?"

"You can scarcely call me such," said Dick. "I am here for refuge. As for myself, I don't care to speak much. I am here. I have offended against the laws, and I am looking for some means of escape."

"Then," continued the young man, still gazing upon him, "am I right in conjecturing that you have escaped from the modern portion of the prison into this?"

"You can surmise what you please," was Turpin's answer. "But it will please me better if you will look upon me as one ready to do all in his power to serve you. Believe me, I am anxious to stand your friend. The adventure you have recounted deeply interests me. I should be glad indeed to bring it to a solution."

"The brandy," said the young man at this moment—"pass me the brandy! I feel once more sick and faint!"

"Very likely," said Turpin, as he complied with his demand. "Drink a little—not too much, and you will soon experience the benefits of it."

"I feel to have new life," answered the stranger. "And now tell me—what do you propose shall be our next proceeding?"

"That's a difficulty," returned Turpin. "It seems to me, however, tolerably clear that you are at last on the right track."

"Do you mean for discovering the fate of my friend?"

"Yes."

"It may be so—it may be so! How easily he would have fallen into such a trap as was laid for me! He would be totally unsuspecting—I was on my guard."

"It's a miracle to me," said Turpin, "how you could have escaped with such slight injuries."

"It is wonderful," returned the young man—"wonderful indeed!"

There was a silence, for Dick just then was thinking of the locket he had found, and was wondering whether by any chance it might belong to the young sailor of whom his companion spoke; if so, the coincidence would be remarkable in the extreme.

"You are silent," said the young man, at length. "Am I right in supposing that you are considering in your own mind which will be the best step for us to take next?"

"Scarcely that," said Dick; "and yet, to go back to a consideration of what you have related, it seems tolerably certain that the young girl who so interested you is regularly sent out in order to decoy people to this place."

The stranger nodded.

"Then, having arrived, they are drugged, and, falling through the treacherous trap-door on to the ground beneath, are killed."

"That's it—evidently it."

"And you," pursued Dick—"rery upon it, you are not the first who has fallen a victim to this snare. I may tell you that I found a spot of blood upon the ground, which looked as though it had fallen there recently."

The young man shuddered.

"I can't bear to reflect upon what would have been my fate!"

"Such a place as this," Dick went on, glancing around him, "would afford every facility for concealing the dead bodies of their victims. They would be plundered of every article of value about their persons, then flung into some of these cells."

This was a very probable supposition indeed, and the stranger felt it to be so.

He could tell, also, by Dick's manner what was uppermost in his thoughts.

"Suppose," said Turpin, "that we satisfy ourselves upon this point, and not remain contented by surmise. It will be easy to ascertain whether in any of these cells are such traces as we seek."

The stranger's face blanched as he said:

"If it is so—and I cannot doubt it—what an awful sight the opening of one of these doors will disclose!"

"Awful indeed," returned Dick Turpin, "yet I consider we ought to satisfy ourselves by one hasty glance."

"Be it so, then," returned the stranger. "I am content to leave that point for your decision."

CHAPTER DCCCXCIII.

IN WHICH THE YOUNG STRANGER DISCOVERS THE FATE OF HIS FRIEND.

Dick rose, and, taking the lamp in his hand, went towards the doorway nearest to him.

The fastenings were all upon the side on which he stood, and he could perceive no difficulty in removing them.

He lifted down the bar, drew back the bolts, and yet he hesitated to push the door open upon its hinges.

Fixing his gaze earnestly upon the young man, who was either too much injured by his fall or else lacked the courage to look into that disused cell, for he remained in the position he had all along occupied, Turpin said, earnestly—nay, with solemnity in his tones:

"Do you think you are prepared to receive the worst confirmation of your fears?"

"I am—I am! Something comes over my mind at this moment that tells me my friend was lured into that house of death, and that he met the fate designed for me!"

Dick bent his head, and then, in lower tones, responded:

"That, too, is my impression. And now, pardon me a moment if I ask you a question about your friend's affianced wife—Lucy, I think you said her name was Are you well acquainted with her features?"

"As well as with my own!"

"Would you recognise her, then?"

"Most certainly!"

In his anxiety, the stranger slowly rose to his feet, and stood looking at Dick wonderingly.

Dick said no more, but at once pushed the door open.

It was fortunate he stood aside, for such an overpowering effluvia came forth that, had he not done so, he would inevitably have been suffocated.

Sickening with horror, he waited a few moments; then, raising the lamp, went to the threshold of the cell.

"Come," he said, addressing his companion, "look in also. I don't wish a second glimpse."

Tremblingly, the young man obeyed.

The sight presented to their gaze was indeed a truly fearful one.

Lying in this cell, which was one of considerable extent were many human bodies—all dead, all bearing marks of great personal violence upon them; some looking as though they had only just been cast into that strange sepulchre, while of others nothing but glistening bones remained.

The appearance of the light caused a tremendous scuffling in the cell.

Dick knew well enough what it was

His friend, however, seemed much alarmed.

"It's the rats," he said. "No doubt they swarm in this place by myriads. Look—look! Over yonder in the gloom you can see their eyes shining like so many bright points. They are dangerous creatures," he added, "and may not hesitate to attack us. Have you seen enough?"

The stranger turned away, and, deeming that a sufficient answer, Dick, with very great satisfaction, closed the door and bolted it.

Turning round once more to his companion, who now was as pale as ashes, he said:

"How long, say you, is it since your friend reached London and mysteriously disappeared?"

"Twelve months."

"Indeed? so long? Then it is in vain to search among these poor relics of humanity hoping to discover something of him; by this time he must be unrecognisable."

"Yes," returned the young man, "and I am glad it is so."

"Glad?" repeated Turpin, in surprise

"Yes, because now I can still entertain myself with a doubt that he may not have perished in this foul manner. I have yet no confirmation of it, nor do I see what evidence is to be obtained."

"No," said Dick. "Yet, would it not be best to know the worst at once, and so resign yourself to it? If something was found clearly pointing to his presence in this place, would you not accept that as sufficient testimony that he has perished?"

"Yes," said the stranger, gloomily, "if that could be I should indeed give over my long search."

"And your dangerous one," said Dick, "for every day you are perilling your life. Think what a narrow escape you have had on this occasion."

"I do think of it: but I think more of the manner in which you speak; I could almost believe that you possess some such evidence as that you speak of."

"And if I do," said Dick, "would it not be best for me to produce it?"

"Perhaps so—perhaps so."

"Well, then, I confess, without further hesitation, that by chance I found upon the floor, close here to where we stand, a small trinket. It puzzled me beyond all measure to account for its presence in so strange a spot; now, however, I have the key to all."

"What kind of trinket?" asked the stranger.

"A locket."

"Let me see it—let me see it! Pray let me look upon it!"

"I will; but prepare yourself for confirmation of your friend's untimely fate, In the locket is the portrait of a girl, young and beautiful."

"Yes—yes! Lucy—Lucy!"

"Lucy no doubt; but satisfy yourself by a glance. It is there."

While he spoke, Dick dropped the locket into the young man's extended hand.

No sooner did his eyes fall upon it than he uttered a deep groan.

Some moments elapsed before he could recover himself sufficiently to gaze upon it a second time.

"Yes—yes!" he said, at length, in a broken voice. "I can doubt no longer. Well do I remember seeing this locket? The chain is broken now; but it is of gold, and was of rare workmanship. Before he went to sea, Lucy placed it round his neck with her own hands, and entreated him to wear it always for her sake."

"No doubt he did so," answered Turpin, "and his murderers in their haste let it fall upon the ground."

"That's it—that's it!"

Dick could see that the young man the more he thought about his friend's fate was the more overcome, and he endeavoured to change the subject of his thoughts.

"Bear with me a moment," replied the stranger. "I shall be better soon. Oh, Lucy! how will you withstand this awful blow? What will be your feelings when you hear the awful tale? Who could have thought that this gift of yours would prove the means of clearing up the mystery of his death?"

At that moment a peculiar rumbling noise attracted their attention.

Dick held up his hand for silence.

At the same time he placed the lamp as much out of sight as he could.

The rumbling continued, and, pressing his companion's arm, Dick stepped forward noiselessly.

The young man followed.

When near the end of the passage, Dick stopped, and looked upwards.

The trap-door in the ceiling was now thrown open, and in the edge of it was a lantern.

The light from this shone upon the top portion of a ladder which had been lowered into the abyss.

It was this ladder, then, which had produced the strange rumbling noise.

Voices were heard speaking in suppressed accents.

Then a man's head appeared above the edge of the trap-door.

He looked down for some time intently.

"I don't see him," he muttered—"I don't see him! Yet he must be there—of course he's there! Curse it! What makes me feel so nervous and terrified to-night—I feel half afraid to go down!"

"Afraid?" said another voice. "That's a good joke Here—take a drop of this; it will give you courage."

"And will you come down too mate?"

"Of course I will."

"Then here goes."

The man, having thus spoken, placed his foot upon the ladder and began to descend.

He took the lantern from the floor, and carried it in his hand.

"Now, mate," he cried to the other, "come along; we'll both descend the ladder together."

The other man obeyed, and, keeping as close together as they could, the two villains went slowly down, step by step.

Dick and the young man gazed upon them with the utmost abhorrence.

As for Turpin himself, he felt that it would be wrong to treat them as he would any other adversaries.

Clearly he was justified in taking them by surprise, and overpowering them without allowing them an opportunity to retaliate.

Accordingly, with a swift, noiseless footstep, he made his way to the centre of this circular apartment, if so we may term it.

The men were now about half-way down.

Dick stood close to the foot of the ladder.

He had already made up his mind what to do, and so with a sudden exertion of his whole strength, he seized hold of two of the bottom rounds in the ladder and pulled with all his might.

The effort succeeded.

With an awful crash the ladder fell, carrying the two men with it.

The lantern rolled far away into a corner, and was extinguished.

The men were so taken by surprise as to be thoroughly frightened.

An attack in that quarter surely could not be made by human beings—they had at last been encountered by the inhabitants of another world.

Dick hurried forward, calling out to his companion at the same time to bring the lamp.

He was obeyed.

The two villains, hearing his voice, recovered some of their composure.

Their greatest fear now was over—they had to encounter mortals, not beings of another world.

Accordingly, despite the fearful injuries they must have sustained in falling from so far so awkwardly, they struggled to their feet and commenced an immediate attack.

Dick, however, was prepared for them, and had every advantage, although he was unprovided with any weapons.

With his clenched fist he struck one such a violent blow that it put his rising again altogether out of the question—at least, for some time to come.

The other shared a similar fate, and by the time the young man arrived with the lamp, the two wretches were lying insensible on the ground.

At the sight of them the stranger could scarcely restrain his fury.

Insensible as they then were, he felt impelled to attack them with the utmost rage.

"Now," said Dick, "it strikes me we have the way before us to get out. Help me to raise the ladder once more."

With considerable difficulty the ladder was lifted up and placed in its original position, and no sooner was this done than Dick and his companion mounted.

On reaching the top, Turpin found himself in a bedchamber such as the young man had described

It was untenanted by anyone.

Looking at the trap-door, they saw it was so constructed that the least weight pressing on one end of it would cause it to give way, allowing the object, whatever it might be, to fall through.

As soon as this was accomplished, the spring at the other end restored the trap-door to its original appearance

"Have you a mind to linger here and make a further examination," asked Turpin, "or will you seek the way into the street with all speed?"

"I leave the conduct of affairs entirely to you," was the response—"it seems to me that you are better able to judge which is best."

"Then I advise that we gain the street with all speed. Who can tell how many accomplices those miscreants may have? And if we stay we may find ourselves opposed to a superior force, and so have to pay the penalty of our rashness with our lives."

"As you will," answered the young man; "the very air in this place seems to choke me."

There was indeed, either in fancy or reality, a sickening odour pervading that apartment.

Gladly enough, then, Turpin left it.

The door opened upon a large square landing-place.

Here he paused in order to look around him before he took any fresh step.

The staircase was broad, with massive, old-fashioned balusters.

It ascended to the upper floors, and descended into the hall, commanding a view of the front door of the house.

CHAPTER DCCCXCIV.

DICK TURPIN MAKES HIS WAY TO THE THREE SPIDERS INN AT EALING.

DICK TURPIN, having attracted the attention of his companion, raised one arm and pointed down the staircase.

"There," he said—"there is the way to escape; that's the front door which you see before you, and surely we shall have but little difficulty in descending the stairs and passing out of it unseen."

"Very little, I should think," replied the young man. "Let us try it without more delay."

Dick was glad enough to find that this young man was willing to leave the house.

As for himself, the reader need not be told he was anxious to depart.

Maud and his comrades would all be wondering what had become of him, and anxiously expecting his return.

Gently descending the staircase, then, for about half a dozen steps, they paused.

Some faint, sweet notes of music struck upon their ears.

After listening for a moment they felt sure they proceeded from a harpsichord.

The air was indeed a delightful one, and whoever it might be who was then playing was most certainly a perfect master of the instrument.

Merely raising his finger in token of silence, Dick continued the descent.

On gaining the foot of the stairs, however, his companion stopped, and, touching Dick upon the arm, he said, in a faint whisper:

"That is the door leading into the room where I drank the drugged wine; that's the room from which the music proceeds, for I remember seeing a harpsichord standing in one corner."

Dick nodded, and would have passed on, considering that had nothing to do with him.

But other thoughts were evidently in the mind of the stranger, for, in the same cautious whisper, he continued:

"Perhaps by this time some other victim may have been picked up, and that music is played in order to soothe him into a kind of repose, when he will fall all the more unsuspectingly into the snare."

Dick started and wondered how it was that this thought had not occurred to him at first.

"Closer," he whispered—"let us get closer, then we may overhear something."

The next moment they were standing on the threshold of this room, and then, for the first time, they noticed that the door was not properly closed—it was ajar, but only very slightly.

This indeed accounted for the fact of their having heard the low, sweet strains of the musical instrument.

All at once the music ceased, and then the two listeners distinctly heard a voice say, in thick, guttural accents:

"Very pretty, my love—very pretty; but I have had enough music—of this room too, for that matter. Come my way above the way."

"In a moment," said a female voice. "Excuse me just a moment, I will soon return, but I am not certain whether all is ready."

"All is ready?" repeated the other voice. "What do you mean by that?"

"Oh, nothing—don't trouble yourself about matters that do not concern you. There's wine on the table—don't spare it."

There was a rustling sound, and Dick whispered to the young stranger:

"Seize her when she comes forth—hold her fast."

He had scarcely time to pronounce the words before the door opened.

The girl—for the stranger recognised her instantly—was quitting the room precipitately, and was made a fast prisoner before she was aware of it.

Feeling herself firmly held, and seeing, too, the pallid countenance of one she had so recently betrayed, she uttered a piercing shriek and became insensible.

These strange occurrences had the effect of arousing the inmate of the room, and now, with a staggering and unsteady step, he came towards the door.

"Hullo!" he cried. "What the deuce does it all mean? What is it—what is it? Why, curse me, I feel quite drunk and stupid, and yet I've had nothing—only a glass or two of wine!"

"You have been drugged," shouted Dick, "and but for our accidental presence you would in a few more minutes have been murdered."

Certainly, if any words whatever would be calculated to enable a person to cast off the influences of a drug, such as those just uttered by Dick would have that effect.

He was a tall, stout man, expensively dressed, and with many ornaments of great value glittering about his person.

By his countenance, his guttural articulation, and his general appearance, it could be told at a glance he was a foreigner. Probably he had only just arrived in London.

Hearing these words spoken, and comprehending their purport, he clasped his hands over his forehead, doubtless with the endeavour to stop the swimming of his brain.

"Get into the open air," said Dick, "and raise what outcry you can, and return thanks that you have had so narrow an escape."

Like one in a dream, the foreigner found his way to the front door.

With difficulty he undid the fastenings and sallied forth.

While he was thus engaged, Dick spoke rapidly to his companion.

"From what you know," he said, "I cannot take any part in bringing the inmates of this house to justice. I myself should be immediately taken prisoner. I can, however, leave all to you. My immediate object now is to make my escape. That girl is now incapable of doing any mischief. Raise what alarm you can, and relate the whole to the police."

"I will—I will," replied the young stranger, with a slightly bewildered air. "And since we are to part, accept my thanks for the very valuable services you have rendered me."

"Not a word on that point—not a word. Farewell! Most likely we shall never meet again."

With these words on his lips, Dick turned round and quickly darted from the house.

The last he saw of the foreigner was as he stood near the front door endeavouring to save himself from falling.

It would have been no slight satisfaction to Dick could he have remained and witnessed the clearing up of this transaction, but regard for his own safety made him aware this was impossible.

Keeping a keen look-out on all sides of him, Dick hastily made his way through the streets of London in the direction of the Three Spiders Inn at Ealing.

The clocks gave forth the hour of eleven.

He was surprised, for he imagined it was much later. In the perpetual darkness, however, which prevailed in old Newgate, it was difficult indeed to keep any accurate note of the flight of time.

So far as he could tell, no police officers had observed his departure.

Either they had given up keeping such vigilant guard around the prison, or else it had never occurred to them to place a watch anywhere near the house from which Dick had emerged.

Although the hour was early, yet he felt no inclination for the long walk before him.

He was impatient in the highest degree to assure Maud of his safety, and also to ascertain what were the movements of his comrades.

He had no horse, however, and to attempt to hire one would be running a very considerable risk—a much greater risk than he felt himself justified in running.

At a rapid pace, then, he walked on towards his destination, for above all things he was anxious to leave London behind.

On his way he revolved in his mind what means he could adopt of performing his journey quickly.

His meditations were at length broken in upon by the sharp rattle of some vehicle that was being drawn with great rapidity along the high-road.

Dick drew aside, and looked back.

Then, through the darkness, he managed to make out that a light spring cart, drawn by one horse, was approaching him.

In it was seated a man, who, by various strands smacks of his whip, compelled the animal to keep up its speed.

"I'll ask him for a lift," muttered Dick. "There's a little danger in it, but not much; and, after all, he may refuse."

Just then the cart was within a yard or two of where he stood.

Raising his voice, he cried:

"Hoi—hoi!—stop! I am travelling your way, and would give something worth while for a ride!"

The man checked his horse somewhat abruptly, and, placing his hand before his eyes, strove to make out by whom he had been accosted.

"It's only a slight favour that I ask of you," said Dick. "But this road is terribly lonely, and I have a long journey before me."

"It ain't very safe to pick up acquaintances on the road," said the man. "But, though I can't see your face, yet I like the sound of your voice. Jump up, and, if you like to pay for something when we reach the Truss of Hay, I shall be glad of your company."

"Agreed!" said Dick. "I am much obliged to you!"

He scrambled up into the cart while he spoke, and the man, scarcely allowing him time to seat himself, cracked his whip, and set the horse in motion.

It was a great satisfaction to Dick upon thus finding himself unexpectedly carried so swiftly towards his destination.

But he found that his present position, advantageous as it seemed, had some drawbacks, for the man was of a most inquisitive disposition, and it was with difficulty that he replied to his many questions.

The great topic of the time was, of course, Dick Turpin's marvellous escape from Newgate.

He found his new companion had plenty to say upon it.

Dick professed to be ignorant of the particulars, and thereupon was favoured with a narrative of a most exaggerated description.

Sinking his voice as he concluded, he said:

"It's my firm belief, sir, that there's but one way of coming to a solution of this matter."

"Indeed!" said Dick. "And what may that be?"

"Why, we all know what a villanous wretch this Dick Turpin is—— But, bless me! what's the matter?"

Dick had started upon hearing this epithet applied to him, but he recovered himself most marvellously.

"Oh, it's nothing," he said—"nothing at all!"

"Then what was it made you give such a jump?"

"I don't know—it is not worth while to trouble about it. I am full of curiosity to know what you were going to say."

"Well, then, my belief is that Dick Turpin was such a wretch that the devil would not wait for him to be put out of the world in an ordinary manner, but has carried him off bodily. Rely upon it, we shall never see him again."

"Perhaps not," replied Dick. "But what are you pulling up for?"

"Why, this is the Truss of Hay—the inn of which I spoke. Recollect you have to pay for the refreshment."

"All right," said Dick—"order anything you like!"

The cart having stopped, the man jumped out, and requested Dick to follow his example.

At first he refused, but, being pressed by his new companion, and having no good reason to give why he should prefer remaining where he was, he at length reluctantly got down.

"Come in!" he said. "They keep the best of refreshments here, as you will say. They do a roaring trade, for there are plenty, like me, who make a regular point of calling."

He pushed open the inn door as he spoke.

Dick had no resource but to follow him, though he was exceedingly reluctant to do so.

He had no means of disguising himself further than by pulling his hat low down over his brows.

A couple of flaring oil-lamps depending from the ceiling lighted up the passage leading from the front to the back of the inn, and from rooms on each side came forth the sounds of boisterous merriment.

Dick's companion walked up to the bar window, and, after a brief hesitation, called for a tankard of old ale.

"I will share it with you," said Dick, "for I am in no humour for drinking to-night."

"Very good," was the reply. "I shall not stay more than a moment. I am very late to-night, and I have twenty miles further to go."

Dick did not reply to this, but, throwing down the only coin he possessed to pay for the ale, he drank a small quantity himself, and his companion quickly emptied the tankard.

But just as they were taking their departure, one of the doors leading into the passage opened, and a man's face appeared at it.

Behind him were several others, who, it seemed, were likewise just about to quit the inn.

The door being narrow, he stopped with the door in his hand to allow Dick and his companion to pass by.

The latter walked carelessly enough, but Dick, affecting to be seized with a sudden cough, placed his hand before his mouth, which served to conceal a great portion of his features.

Apparently no notice was taken of either of them, and in another moment they were mounted, as before, in the light cart, and rolling rapidly along the high-road.

The tankard of ale loosened the man's tongue considerably, and he ran on at a great length upon various subjects.

But Dick had too many things pressing on his mind to pay much attention to what he said.

Arriving at last pretty near to the Three Spiders Inn, he requested the man to allow him to alight.

"This is your journey's end, then?" he said.

"Well, nearly. I have a little further to go across the fields, but no distance to speak of. Many thanks to you for your civility. Good night!"

"Good night!" answered the man, smacking his whip.

Dick stood in the roadway a minute or so till the cart was almost out of sight, then, turning round abruptly, he made his way in a straight line for the inn.

He reached it without meeting with any accident, only once he thought he heard a footstep on the road behind him, and, glancing back at the same instant, he fancied he perceived a dark figure dart into the shadow of the hedge.

Of this he was by no means certain, but, occupied only with his anxiety to see his friends, he hurried on with redoubled speed, nor paused until the door was reached.

He knocked several times gently without receiving any answer, and, his patience being by no means great, he raised his foot and kicked with might and main upon the lower portion of the door.

CHAPTER DCCCXCV.

THE HIGHWAYMEN'S JOY AND SATISFACTION PROVE TO BE OF SHORT DURATION.

THE reader will now be at no loss to understand the meaning of the tremendous knocking that had struck such terror into the hearts of Tom Davis and the highwaymen.

It was Dick who was thus clamouring for admission, not the officers, as they supposed.

After the words last spoken by Tom Davis, a scene of considerable confusion ensued.

There could be no doubt, however, that the right course to pursue was to avail themselves instantly of the hiding-place they had been at so much trouble to construct.

Seizing a lamp, Tom King cried:

"Follow me, all of you—follow me quickly, yet quietly! There is no cause for immediate alarm."

Maud, however, was so terrified that she could scarcely move.

Knowing perfectly well, however, that not only her own safety but the safety of those she held so dear, depended upon her summoning up sufficient resolution to accompany them to their hiding-place, she tried her best to shake off the dreadful feelings which oppressed her.

Passing hastily through the bar, Tom opened the door at the top of the steps leading into the cellar, and quickly descended.

Claude came last, and shut the door.

In the meanwhile, the knocking was continued with great fury.

Tom Davis, thinking that the highwaymen were now safe, and not wishing to give rise to fresh suspicion by keeping the officers waiting at the door, slowly walked along the passage, and presently cried out:

"Who is it?—who's there?"

"Open the door, Davis," cried Dick—"open the door! Why on earth have you kept me here waiting in this manner?"

Tom Davis recognised the tones of the voice instantly.

So great was his surprise—so sudden the revolution of feeling which took place in his breast upon finding the captain was without, and not Jack Marshall and his officers, that he was suddenly bereft of all motion.

Leaning against the wall, he could only gasp out the words:

"The captain—the captain!"

Ellen had heard Dick's voice, and uttered a shriek.

When that was over her surprise was over too, and accordingly, hastening past Tom Davis, she, with nimble fingers, removed the fastenings.

Dick pushed open the door hastily, and as hastily closed it behind him.

"What on earth," he said, "is the matter with you all? Why have you kept me hammering at the door in this fashion?"

Tom Davis did not reply, but recollecting all of a sudden that the highwaymen had gone done into the cellars, and were doubtless in the act of entering the secret passage, he turned round and ran into the bar.

Opening the door at the top of the steps, he cried out:

"Tom — Tom! Come back! It's all right! The captain's here!"

There was an immediate commotion down below after he had pronounced these words.

The fact was, so expeditious had the highwaymen been that the secret passage had been opened, and they were just about to close it after them.

Tom Davis's words arrested their purpose, and, with mingled joy and doubt, they rushed pell-mell towards the steps.

Dick could not for the life of him understand the extraordinary behaviour of Tom Davis; but Ellen, in a few words, explained the exact position of affairs.

Over the glad meeting which now took place we must pass in silence, since it was a scene no pen could possibly describe.

The most extravagant joy was, of course, the feeling uppermost in every breast.

No sooner, however, were their surprise and satisfaction over than a whole string of questions were poured forth.

Nothing would do but Dick must give an account of all his proceedings, for there was not one who could even guess at them.

Willingly enough, Dick complied, and amid a profound, breathless silence, he related to his friends those facts which are already in possession of the reader.

He concluded his narrative by stating that he fancied he had heard a footstep behind him in the lane, and that he had seen for a moment a dark figure resembling a human form.

"We cannot be too careful," said Tom Davis—"it is impossible that we can be. I will go now and see that all the fastenings are perfectly secure."

"And Black Bess," said Dick—"I must see her."

"She's all safe and sound, captain. But if you suspect any person is lurking near, don't run the risk of venturing forth just at present—wait for another opportunity."

This advice was warmly seconded by the highwaymen, and Dick gave way before their wishes, although his anxiety to see Black Bess was great indeed.

Tom Davis was not absent long, and when he came back he brought with him the satisfactory intelligence that the inn was firmly secured at all points—that it would be impossible to effect a sudden entrance.

It was now Dick's turn to question his comrades, for he was quite in the dark as to their proceedings, and was not a little anxious to receive from Tom King the account of his adventures at Windsor.

His request was complied with, and surely, to all appearances, a happier, more comfortable party than was assembled in the inn kitchen at that moment could scarcely have been found in England.

Had a stranger looked in upon them, the very last idea that would have suggested itself would have been that they were all in peril of their lives.

A feeling of remarkable ease and contentment pervaded every breast, and such a sensation of security came over all that they never remembered to have felt before.

These feelings, however, were very quickly put an end to by what next occurred.

In the midst of their laughing conversation there suddenly came a pause—such a pause as not unfrequently takes place in similar circumstances.

They glanced from one to another, and each waited for some one to speak first.

In the midst of this singular silence came the sound of three distinct heavy blows struck deliberately upon the front door.

This startled all into life.

Tom Davis turned perfectly white as he said:

"There's no mistake now—officers they are, and no one else—it cannot turn out to be any friend of ours this time! Be quick!" he added. "Seek the secret passage without delay!"

"Nay," cried Dick, "let us know first that there is reason for doing so."

The words had scarcely passed his lips when the knocking was renewed.

Then some words pronounced in a loud voice reached their ears.

What the words were they could not exactly make out, but Tom Davis exclaimed:

"Now are you satisfied? Did you hear them utter their usual summons for admission? Captain, your fancy did not mislead you, you have indeed been watched and followed to this house. What is to be done?"

"Enter the secret passage," was Dick's immediate answer. "I fear it is only too true that I have been followed. However, it strikes me if they should enter they will be unable to find anything of us."

The knocking was repeated for the third time, and the words again pronounced.

Tom Davis had crept a little closer to the front door.

Turning round, he said in a whisper:

"Did you hear them demand admittance in the King's name? If the door is not opened instantly they will break it down."

His words were prophetic, for just at that very instant a terrific blow was dealt upon the stout panels of the door

Had it not been so well secured, most certainly that blow was sufficient to have forced it from its hinges.

No longer now could the imminence of their danger be doubted.

Again snatching up the lamp, Tom King hastened to the bar.

He was followed by Dick, who had to half carry Maud with him.

Claude and Sixteen-String Jack brought up the rear.

Once more the steps were descended, the cellars crossed, and the entrance to the secret passage reached.

It turned out now that their false alarm had really done them good service.

The coverings over the passage had now been removed, and nothing remained for the highwaymen to do but to enter hastily and replace them.

This, by an admirable, yet simple contrivance that had nevertheless cost them many hours' thought, was quickly done.

"Forward," said Dick—"it will be useless to linger here! Let us take up such a position that, if necessary, we may make an immediate retreat."

"Good!" cried Tom King. "I was about to propose the self-same thing. Follow me with what speed you may."

As he spoke he walked hurriedly along the passage.

CHAPTER DCCCXCVI.

DESCRIBES THE ENERGETIC PROCEEDINGS OF JACK MARSHALL AND HIS OFFICERS.

It will be necessary now to go back a little in order to account for the events which next occurred.

It will be recollected that on the night when Dick Turpin so strangely made his escape from Newgate, his three comrades left the White Horse Inn in Drury Lane.

As they had correctly feared, the deaf and dumb boy whom Matthew had so befriended was a traitor.

He had recognised the highwaymen, and no sooner had he started upon his errand than he betrayed them to a police officer.

His scheme no doubt would have succeeded, and the highwaymen beyond all doubt have been captured, had not his long absence been too much for their impatience.

The simple fact of going to the stable instead of waiting at the corner of White Horse Yard unquestionably saved their lives.

With what followed the reader is already aware.

With more than usual ease, Tom and his comrades managed to out-distance the police officers.

Still, although the highwaymen had got out of sight and hearing, they were by no means inclined to abandon the chase, especially as, after going a short distance, they were met by a troop of their companions headed by Jack Marshall himself.

A few words served to explain matters to him, and no sooner had he comprehended all, than for about five minutes he did nothing but curse the officers in every conceivable way.

"They went westward, did they?" he cried. "Well, we'll go westward too. Come on, it's strange indeed if we don't see or hear something of them."

Accordingly, the two parties forming one, set their steeds in motion and galloped at a very furious rate along the western road.

From time to time they paused to make inquiries as to whether any persons resembling those of whom they were in search had passed that way.

But on every occasion they were replied to in the negative.

At last, reaching a roadside inn, Jack Marshall determined to pause.

He had been actively engaged for a long time and was so weary that he could scarcely sit in the saddle.

Moreover, most of the horses were completely blown, and, if pushed, might fail them altogether.

It so happened that this inn was no other than the Truss of Hay, at which, as fate would have it, Dick Turpin made a halt.

Having stayed long enough, as they believed, to rest their horses, the police officers were just about to depart when Dick and his companion passed down the passage in the manner we have previously related.

The officer standing at the door did not recognise Dick, yet he fancied that he was no other than the highwayman he beheld.

Had he seen him under any other circumstances than the present, probably he would have had no doubt whatever.

The very idea that Dick Turpin should quietly walk into the inn where they were staying, and walk out again, was really too preposterous to be entertained.

Still, he looked vacant, hesitating and confused

Perceiving it, Jack Marshall bawled out:

"What the devil are you standing shilly-shallying there like that for, Roberts? What's the matter with you? Are you moon-struck?"

"No, no, Mr. Marshall—no, no. I beg your pardon, sir."

"Well, what is it? You look as if you had seen a ghost."

"Well, sir, I'm afraid you will laugh at me, or think me drunk, or mad, or something of that sort, but I really do believe—and yet how can it be possible?"

"Go on!" roared the chief police officer. "What do you believe?"

"Why, that when I opened this door I saw Dick Turpin walk down the passage."

Jack Marshall leaped up from his chair with a yell.

He seized hold of Roberts, the police officer, and shook him violently.

"Fool!—dolt!—idiot!" he screamed. "If you had any doubt of that kind in your mind why did you not speak, and not stand there looking like a fool? Bah! Get out of the way!"

He flung the officer aside with great violence, then made his way to the bar window.

"Landlord," he cried, "who was it passed down the passage a minute or two ago—did you notice 'em?"

"Were there two of them, sir?"

"How the devil do I know?"

"Well, I only ventured to inquire," said the landlord, offended at Jack Marshall's manner.

"Well, supposing there were two, what were they like?"

"Why, one I know very well—he's an old friend of mine, and calls regularly here every time he passes."

"Yah!—bah! it can't be him then!"

"But," continued the landlord, "now you mention it, he had a stranger with him, and rather a strange-looking stranger, if I may be allowed to make that remark."

Jack Marshall pricked up his ears once more.

"Describe him," he cried, fiercely and excitedly—"describe him!"

"Well, sir, to tell you the truth, I can't very well, for he very carefully kept as much out of sight as he could; he had his hat drawn down on his face, and altogether I saw but little of him."

"Was that the man you meant?" roared Marshall, addressing himself to Roberts, who had ventured to emerge into the passage.

"Yes—yes!" he replied, nodding violently—"that's him!"

"Then, no doubt you are right. What a chance we've lost! But quick—quick, all of you! The horses are ready, no doubt! Mount at once!"

Probably never before had Jack Marshall been in such a state of tremendous excitement.

He dashed out of the inn more like a madman than a sane being.

In the same haste, he mounted his steed, and then plunged his spurs into its flanks.

"Come on," he roared—"come on, I say! Do you mean to be all night?"

As well as they could, the officers scrambled into the saddles, and followed their leader in a desultory throng.

Now, had the officers galloped straight off to the Three Spiders Inn they must inevitably have arrived there before Dick.

But such was fated not to be the case.

Jack Marshall, indeed, was very forcibly reminded of the truth of the old proverb which declares "more haste less speed."

Altogether letting passion get the better of prudence, he paid less attention to his horse than he should have done.

Consequently, the tired beast, making a false step, stumbled.

His rider was not ready to save him by checking at the bit, so down he went, and Jack Marshall involuntarily performed a very creditable somersault over his horse's head.

He reached the ground with great violence, and just as he fell, so did he lie, bereft apparently alike of life and motion.

The officers pulled up their horses as quickly as they could, and narrowly escaped riding over their chief.

The struggling horse was assisted to rise, and others bent over their leader.

"Mr. Marshall," said one—"Mr. Marshall! Speak! Are you very much hurt, sir—very much hurt?"

There was no response.

"He's stunned, if not dead!" said another.

"Is he?" cried Roberts, pushing his way forwards. "Then, d—n him, let him take that! I feel better now. Perhaps when he feels that slight pain in his side he'll think twice before he tries to throttle me again!"

Roberts was still smarting with rage at being treated in such a summary manner by his chief.

All the way along the road he had been cursing and swearing to himself, longing for some opportunity of revenging himself, and wishing that his tongue had dropped out before he had said a word about Dick Turpin at all.

Seeing his powerful foe helpless on the ground, he could not resist the opportunity of gratifying his vengeance, so while he spoke, and before any of the others could prevent him, he dealt Jack Marshall a furious kick in the ribs—so furious a one that it is a wonder it did not recover the police officer from his state of unconsciousness.

A consultation now ensued among the officers as to what they should do.

Would it be best for them to wait and endeavour to restore their leader to consciousness, or should a portion ride on in pursuit?

This matter was well argued, for the police officers were about equally divided on the point.

The discussion soon grew so warm that it was a thousand wonders they did not come to blows.

As it was, the confusion was something terrific, and in the midst of it Jack Marshall was altogether disregarded.

But what the furious kick could not do, Nature accomplished for herself.

Gradually the chief police officer came to himself.

As may be guessed, his intellects were at first in a state of utter confusion.

But by degrees he realised that he was lying on his back in a very dirty road, that every time he drew his breath he had an acute pain in his side as though some one was stabbing him, and that his men were all standing around, disputing at the top of their voices.

At least five minutes elapsed, however, before he could recollect just what had occurred.

No sooner did remembrance return to him than he uttered a yell.

Its effects were peculiar.

The police officers ceased their discussion at once, and became suddenly as silent as though they had been struck dumb.

Certainly the circumstances were well calculated to exasperate anyone, and so we cannot wonder that the first thing Jack Marshall did after giving vent to that yell was to pour out a whole string of curses directed at all things in general, and at his own men in particular.

"Help me up," he said—"help me up at once!"

The officers came officiously towards him.

On attempting to gain his feet, however, Jack Marshall suffered such intolerable pain that he alternately cursed, groaned and screamed.

Rage certainly had the better of him on that occasion.

Comprehending that it was his horse's fault that he had been thrown, he made a rush at the dumb, unconscious brute, and commenced a furious attack upon it—an attack that was in the highest degree ridiculous.

But Mr. Marshall was soon exhausted, and fell back again into the roadway.

"Take me back to the inn," he said—"oh, take me back to the inn!"

With great difficulty this command was obeyed, but, as the inn was only a few hundred yards in the rear, it was quickly gained.

A plentiful external application of cold water and some deep draughts of brandy went far towards restoring Jack Marshall to his former self.

So absorbed had he been by his own injuries that, up till that moment, he had forgotten all about his purpose.

Just then, recollecting Dick Turpin, he angrily demanded to know why the officers had not continued the pursuit.

This involved a long explanation, to which he would not listen.

"Hold your jaw!" he cried. "I've had enough of it! Another drop of brandy! There, I shall do now! Come on, will you! I will once more lead the way!"

By the joint exertions of about half a dozen officers, Jack Marshall was lifted into the saddle.

He suffered more from the pain in his side than aught else.

To draw a long breath was agony.

"Gently," he said—"we must do it gently, or I shall fall off! But there's time enough—time enough, for it's odd to me if I don't know where to find them all!"

CHAPTER DCCCXCVII.

JACK MARSHALL AND HIS OFFICERS SUCCEED IN EFFECTING AN ENTRANCE INTO THE THREE SPIDERS INN, AND MAKE THREE PRISONERS.

Although Jack Marshall may be said to have used the utmost expedition, yet, after all, a considerable delay took place in consequence of the unforeseen accident which befel him.

Indeed, before the officers started for the second time from the Truss of Hay, Dick Turpin had got comfortably back to the inn.

At every step the horse took Jack Marshall suffered extreme pain, but he bore all like a martyr.

He was encouraged to do so by the hope that on this occasion he should succeed in capturing the whole of the highwaymen.

He had an unusually large force, and, from the direction that Dick was taking, he had scarcely any doubt in his own mind that he was making direct for Ealing.

As fast as he possibly could, Jack Marshall followed in his footsteps, until, at length reaching the disused lane leading up to the inn, he paused.

"Jackson should be somewhere here," he muttered. "I wonder whether the rascal is at his post!"

While speaking, he took from his pocket a small whistle, which he placed to his lips.

A shrill, trilling sound was produced—not very loud, but yet such as would be carried to a great distance.

No sooner had the sound died away than hasty footsteps were heard, and then a man, attired as a police officer, made his appearance.

"Oh," he said, speaking with great excitement, "is that you, Mr. Marshall?"

"Yes, it is! What news, Jackson?"

"Oh, most important news. I've been cudgelling my brains to think of some means by which I could let you know, and here you are just in the nick of time!"

Jack Marshall smiled, and forgot the pain he was enduring.

"I've seen him," continued Jackson, sinking his voice—"I've seen him, and I was a good mind to put a bullet into him, and chance it."

"Seen who—seen who?" asked Marshall, impatiently.

"Why, Dick Turpin himself—I am quite sure of it. I would swear to him! He passed me."

"Why did you not seize him?"

"Because I was alone," was the reply, "and he was so close to his friends. Had they heard the least noise they would have come forth, and I should have been no better than mincemeat."

Marshall thought so too.

"Perhaps it is best as it is," he answered. "How fortunate it is I left you here."

"Very fortunate indeed, sir."

"You dogged his footsteps, of course?"

"Oh, yes."

"Where did he go, then?"

"To the inn."

Jack Marshall nodded.

"I thought as much."

Then, speaking to himself, he added:

"Oh, I have you on the hip now, Mr. Landlord. I knew that this day would come sooner or later."

[TOM DAVIS REFUSES TO BETRAY THE HIGHWAYMEN.]

Having made this reflection, he turned round and addressed his men.

"Follow me, all of you," he said, "as slowly and as silently as you can."

He was obeyed, and, making no sound that could be heard above the roaring of the wind, the police-officers crept like so many ghosts towards the Three Spiders Inn.

They reached the front of the building without having given the least alarm.

In a whisper Jack Marshall ordered his men to dismount.

Short as the time had been, yet it had sufficed for him to make up his mind as to the exact course of action he should adopt.

He placed his men like so many sentinels round the inn, and so closely together that they could communicate by whispers.

With the bulk of his men and the horses he remained close to the front door.

"Now the worst of it is," he said, addressing his men, "that we must go through a little legal form; but pay attention to what I say."

The men were all attention.

"It is quite certain," he began, "that Dick Turpin is within that building. You know what sort of a reward we shall get for him, and that's enough to make us try our best. And then I am almost equally certain that his comrades are with him, therefore understand this."

The men were profoundly attentive.

"We dare not break suddenly into the house and seize them, though that's what I should wish to do; we must call upon them three times to open in the King's name."

The men nodded, for they knew perfectly well.

"Provide yourselves, then, with a stout piece of wood and deal a couple of hard blows upon the door with the end of it. I will then call upon them to surrender in the usual form. Directly the words have left my mouth strike the door again. I will repeat the summons, and, having done so, try to demolish the door at one blow. This will give them no opportunity of concealing themselves—they will not have time. If we make one grand rush we shall carry all before us."

The men fully comprehended all that he said to them, and were moreover highly pleased with the arrangement: it suited them exactly.

"To conclude," added Jack Marshall, "so anxious am I that you should make this capture that I will give up my share of the reward entirely, and the whole sum shall be divided equally among you all."

Certainly if anything could have urged the police officers to do their best this announcement on the part of their leader ought to have had the effect.

Had it been prudent they would have expressed their satisfaction by a cheer.

Such a proceeding as that was quite out of the question; they had everything to gain by silence.

Without much trouble, a piece of wood that exactly suited their purpose was found.

It was the trunk of a young tree that had been cut down recently, and the branches of which had been lopped off.

About half a dozen officers seized hold of this piece of wood, which thus became instantly a formidable battering-ram.

Retreating to a little distance, they ran at full speed towards the door.

The blow was a tremendous one.

It was followed by another, and then Jack Marshall, repeating the usual formula, called upon the inmates to open the door in the King's name.

Without waiting to see whether any attention would be paid to this demand, he stood aside to allow his men to renew their attack, which they did with a vigour that delighted him.

Again he called, and again the door was battered upon.

But it was stout, and strong, and well secured within, and calculated to stand a great deal of battering before it would give way.

Yet Jack Marshall fancied that it already shook upon its hinges.

The summons was given for the third time, and Jack Marshall said:

"Now, my lads, one blow! Give it with all your might, and the door is down."

The officers ran forward with a will.

This time they fully expected to carry the door before them, and so went at it with terrific force.

But they were deceived.

The stout oak withstood them, and so great was the shock, that they could not possibly recover themselves from it.

Their hold upon the trunk of the tree gave way, and the whole of them fell sprawling to the ground.

"Up again," cried Marshall—"up again! To it—to it! The door cannot hold against many blows like that!"

Hastily and angrily the officers scrambled to their feet.

The block of wood was again raised and once more battered against the door.

This time, however, they were careful for their own sakes to strike more gently.

"Harder — harder," cried Jack Marshall—"harder: There ought not to have been a quarter of this delay! You are giving them every opportunity for concealment."

Just as he spoke, one of the upper windows in the inn was flung open, and Tom Davis, with a huge, conical nightcap on his head, made his appearance.

This advent was greeted by a general yell, and there was an immediate suspension of hostilities.

"Oh, murder," he cried—"murder! Thieves—thieves! What shall I do all alone by myself? Thieves!"

"You blockhead!" roared Jack Marshall. "We are no thieves, as you are full well aware—we are his Majesty's officers."

Some of the men had provided themselves with links, and, having lighted them, they came closer beneath the window at which Tom Davis stood.

The ruddy light shed around by these torches revealed plainly enough the peculiar dress of the officers, and it was impossible to remain longer in any doubt concerning them.

"Why, is it you, Mr. Marshall?" cried Tom Davis, affecting the utmost astonishment.

"Yes, of course it is. Come down and open the door this second, or I'll break it from its hinges!"

"I'm coming, Mr. Marshall—I'm coming," said Davis, who had made his appearance in this manner solely with the view of gaining time.

"Make haste, then!" roared Jack Marshall. "None of your tricks! We know you!"

Tom Davis grinned, and pretended to be attiring himself with great speed.

About two minutes elapsed, but the patience of the police could extend no longer than that.

"You refuse, then!" cried Jack Marshall. "Now, my lads, to it again—we'll soon have the door down!"

Another blow was struck, and this time the stout oaken panels were split from top to bottom.

The men uttered a cheer at their success.

"Stop—stop!" roared Tom Davis. "Consider how you are destroying my property! I'm coming—indeed I am coming!"

He retreated from the window as he spoke, but Jack Marshall, resolved to wait no longer, gave the signal for a fresh attack.

This last blow effectually did the business.

With a tremendous crash the door parted in the centre, and the police poured in in a body.

Before they had gone half a dozen paces down the passage they met Tom Davis.

"Seize him," roared Jack Marshall—"seize him—make him your prisoner—bind him securely, and take care that he does not escape!"

Tom Davis protested vigorously, but to no purpose. He was seized by a dozen powerful hands, and, before he was aware of it, securely handcuffed.

Two men remained in charge of him.

"Now, my lads," said Jack Marshall, "don't be afraid! We have them—depend upon it we have them; no one could leave these premises unseen; and at the least attempt to do so, the sentinels will raise the alarm. The men we want may be hidden somewhere; but if so, we can take our time and search till we find them. Come on, this will be the best night's work you have ever done."

He dashed into the kitchen as he spoke, and here, in genuine terror, were Mrs. Davis and Ellen.

"Seize them both," roared Jack Marshall—"seize them—make them prisoners! I have sufficient evidence that they are all accomplices! Keep them secure, and if we don't quickly find out the highwaymen, we'll make them confess which is their hiding-place."

His commands were carried out with unnecessary roughness.

Mrs. Davis and Ellen were both prisoners and securely bound.

With great speed the police officers then spread themselves over the ground floor of the inn, but in none of the rooms did they find any trace of the highwaymen.

By no means discouraged at this, Jack Marshall sent a portion of his force upstairs to search the upper rooms, while with the remainder he proceeded to the cellars.

CHAPTER DCCCXCVIII.

JACK MARSHALL AND HIS OFFICERS DISCOVER THE DOOR IN THE STABLE.

As soon as ever the highwaymen had descended the cellar steps, Ellen, acting upon the instructions given her by Tom Davis, had locked the door and taken out the key, which, also by his directions, she threw into the fire.

The object for this proceeding is obvious enough. It was merely to delay the officers and so give the highwaymen more time to make their exit by the secret passage.

Jack Marshall knew his way to the cellars perfectly well; but when he arrived at the door, to his great anger and disgust, he discovered it was fast and the key gone.

The Three Spiders Inn was an old place, and every part of it was built in the most substantial manner.

Even this door, although only seeming to communicate with the cellars, looked as strong as though intended for a prison.

It was perfectly possible to force it, but, from his experience at the front door, the chief officer felt sure it would take a considerable time.

Furious with rage, he returned to the kitchen, in which some of the officers remained on guard over the three prisoners.

Marching direct up to Tom Davis, Jack Marshall clenched his fist and shook it threateningly in his face.

"You rascal!" he said—"you villain! I have long had my suspicions of you, and now they are verified! Deliver up the key of the cellar door. I command you to do so in the name of the King."

"And I solemnly declare that the key is not in my possession, nor do I know where you will find it."

"This subterfuge will not avail you in the least!" roared the officer. "I ask you once, calmly, whether you will deliver up that key? You can refuse or not, just as you like, but if you do, I will take care that it is mentioned at the time of your trial, and you will find it will help to go against you."

"I cannot do so," said Tom Davis, affecting a contrite air. "If I could it would be a different matter, but I can't."

Jack Marshall uttered a curse.

He saw there was no hope for it—the door must be broken down.

As he turned away once more with the intention of returning to the bar, one of his men stepped up to him, and, after a preliminary cough, ventured to touch him gently on the arm.

"Mr. Marshall, sir," he said—"Mr. Marshall."

"Well, Saunders, what is it?"

"Would you mind, Mr. Marshall, if I made you just one suggestion? An idea has come into my head—really, sir, quite an idea."

"You don't mean it," said Marshall.

"I do indeed, sir."

"Well, then, what is it?"

"Why, sir, I think we have forgotten the stables. We ought to have gone there almost in the first instance, and taken possession of the horses; that would have cut off all hopes of their escape."

Jack Marshall gave quite a start.

This was really a fresh thought to him, though when it was suggested to him he wondered how on earth it was he had overlooked anything so obvious and important.

Far from his intention, however, was it to allow his subordinate to indulge in the belief that he had made so grave an omission.

Accordingly, turning to him, he said:

"It's quite a good thought of yours, Saunders, but you must not imagine for a moment that I had forgotten such a palpable thing as that."

"Oh no, sir, not for the world," returned Saunders, with a smirk and a bow.

"Indeed," continued Marshall, "when you spoke I was wondering whether we should go to the stable before we broke open this door or afterwards."

Saunders was silent.

"We'll go there at once," said Marshall, after a momentary pause.

Assembling his men round him, he instructed two to use their best efforts to break down the door.

With the remainder he sallied out into the yard at the back of the inn.

Although well aware it would have been the wisest and most prudent course to secure the horses in the stable first of all, yet Jack Marshall did not feel uneasy on this score, simply because he believed himself yet in good time.

His men had kept the closest possible watch all round the premises, and, had anyone attempted to leave, an alarm would have been given.

His first act upon gaining the yard was to accost an officer who was standing there.

"Is all well?" he asked. "Have you seen or heard anything?

"Nothing at all, Mr. Marshall—all's well."

"Then just pass the word round, will you, for all to keep an extra good look-out? We shall unearth them presently."

Scarcely raising his voice above the pitch in which this conversation had been carried on, this sentinel spoke.

His words were heard by two men standing on either side of him, and from mouth to mouth the orders flew, and in a moment of time the intelligence had made a complete circuit of the inn.

The lighted torches carried by some of the officers enabled them to see all around them, and this was fortunate, for the night was one of unusual gloom.

On arriving at the stable door all was found to be perfectly quiet.

The door was closed and securely padlocked.

If Jack Marshall had had any apprehensions—which he had not—they would have vanished then.

How could the highwaymen have entered the stable and locked the padlock on the outside?

That was manifestly an impossibility.

So his omission was of no importance at all.

In his own mind he felt certain he should not have committed so great an oversight but for the confusion of his faculties, caused partly by his heavy fall from his horse and partly by the excitement he felt at being in so fair a way to capture Dick Turpin.

One smashing blow with a heavy stone served to demolish the padlock at once.

The stable door flew open.

"Lights!" cried Marshall—"lights, I say! Be quick!"

The officers carrying the links pressed forward, and directly afterwards the whole interior of the stable was well lighted up.

The first thing Jack Marshall did was to utter a most fearful yell.

His men thought for a moment that he must have met with some sudden, severe accident.

"Done!" he said—"we're done—we're too late, after all!"

While he spoke, he glanced despairingly around him.

But the stable was empty.

Not a horse stood in one of the stalls, except the one kept by Tom Davis, though, by the signs of confusion around, it was evident the place had been very lately visited.

"Look about you," were the next words Jack Marshall spoke—"look about you! The scent is warm yet—they can't have got far away!"

At the same moment, recollecting the little door at the back of the stable, the existence of which he had on a former occasion discovered, he hastened towards it.

It was bolted on the inner side, but, regardless of that incontestable proof that the highwaymen had not passed that way, he opened the door, and immediately found himself confronted by one of his men.

"Have you seen them?" roared the chief officer at the top of his voice—"have they passed this way?"

"No, Mr. Marshall, that they certainly have not."

"Are you quite sure?—has not one left the stable?"

"I am positive of it—at least, not from this part. I am quite certain."

"Well, have you heard anything?"

"Nothing particular. I heard the horses kicking and prancing about, and I heard one neigh; but I thought nothing of that."

Upon hearing this, Jack Marshall poured out a torrent of imprecations—he seemed somewhat eased by this process; and, having settled it in his own mind that the blame was all attributable to this one man, he turned back with the view of discovering, if possible, by what mysterious means the highwaymen had got their horses out of the stable unseen.

With regard to this point, he was as much in the dark as ever.

Among his men the universal opinion was that the highwaymen had entered and left the stable by some secret, unknown door, and accordingly they set about looking for it, which was something particularly in their line.

For some moments they were baffled, but all at once, as they were scraping the loose straw from the flooring, one man uttered a loud shout.

"A trap-door!" he said—"a trap door! Look here now, who would have thought of that?"

The men all pressed eagerly around him, and then they saw by what means the trap-door had been discovered.

It was through a pure accident, but for which they might have remained in entire ignorance of it.

Evidently, however, the trap-door had been closed in haste, and care had not been taken to clear away the straw close around the edges, consequently, when it was let down, a portion of the straw was wedged in between the trap-door and its frame.

Jack Marshall saw it, and gnashed his teeth.

"I might have guessed it—I might have guessed it! They have been here all along, as I suspected, though I never could arrive at any proof. They have had plenty of time to construct secret passages and suchlike, in anticipation of the coming of a day like this. They did not calculate upon that, however," he concluded, pointing to the trap-door.

The men saw the gesture, though they did not exactly catch the import of the words he spoke.

They concluded, however, that his desire was the trap-door should be raised, and accordingly they bent all their energies to this task.

With much greater ease than they had dared to anticipate, the trap-door was raised. It was thrown back quite flat upon its hinges; then, to their astonishment and admiration, they saw a gently-sloping pathway, leading downwards into the earth—a pathway perfectly practicable for horses' feet; and indeed all doubt was set at rest as to the highwaymen having gone that way, for the ground of which the pathway was composed was damp and soft, and left very clearly the impression of the horses' footprints.

At this moment, however, a loud cry was simultaneously set up by the officers who formed the cordon round the inn.

This cry, coming suddenly upon the ears of those in the stabling, arrested their steps.

The noise becoming louder still, Jack Marshall dashed out of the stable into the yard again, being fully under the impression that the highwaymen had been seen while attempting to quit the premises.

In this he found himself deceived; but a great surprise was in store for him.

At the first glance, he saw that nearly the whole of the inn was one mass of flames.

How it had caught fire no one knew, and the flames had spread with such rapidity and so universally that the first alarm given to the officers was the whole simultaneously bursting out into a blaze.

The fact was, the inn had been built chiefly of wood, and this, through age, had become excessively dry—indeed, it was scarcely possible to find anything more inflammable.

The officers in the inn, keeping guard over the prisoners, were almost the last to know what had happened.

When, however, they came out into the yard, the roaring of the flames was something terrific.

It was scarcely possible for even an astute officer like Jack Marshall to remain altogether unmoved and unbewildered at so extraordinary an occurrence.

There is to all people a fascination in a fire on a grand scale.

For several moments, then, he, in common with his men, could do nothing but gaze upon the grand and awful sight before them.

Every moment the flames increased in volume and brilliancy, while showers of sparks flew about in every direction.

It was not until the roof of the old inn fell, with a tremendous crash, almost smothering the fire, that Jack Marshall recovered proper possession of his faculties, and remembered what ought to be done.

Raising his voice so that it was heard distinctly above the roaring of the flames, he cried:

"Keep an extra look-out, all of you—keep a good look-out! I am confident they are not far away!"

These orders were quickly transmitted from one to another, until all were made acquainted with them.

And now the fire, recovering from the effects on the fallen roof, broke out afresh with additional vigour.

Tom Davis, his wife, and Ellen gazed upon the destruction of their home with saddened feelings.

They felt there was an end to the careless, happy life they had led so long.

Short as had been their residence there, they had grown to like the place, and it would ever be endeared to them by its associations.

In a few hours from that moment nothing would be left of it save a heap of smouldering ruins.

They wondered also when they should gaze upon that spot again, more especially Tom Davis, for he better comprehended the dangers of the position in which he stood than of the rest.

Neither his wife nor Ellen had an exact idea of the peril of their position; but Tom himself knew that the punishment of aiding and abetting felons was most severe, and in his case he was well aware that the full rigour of the law would be enforced.

After particularly bidding his men to look sharply after their prisoners, and take care that they did not by any sudden movement escape, Jack Marshall, collecting his men around him, once more bade them follow him into the stable.

When he returned to it, he felt annoyed at the interruption that had ensued.

Most certainly it would have the effect of allowing the highwaymen to get further away, not that this gave any very great uneasiness, for the idea he had formed in his own mind was that the highwaymen had cleverly constructed some subterranean retreat to which they could betake themselves, and remain in security till all danger was over.

The discovery of the trap-door, he felt, was a thing they had not calculated upon, so, bidding his men to be as silent as possible, he commanded them to follow him.

Several carried lighted links, and by the aid of these the nature of the place they were in was disclosed.

In spite of his anger, and vexation, and hurry, Jack Marshall could not forbear from giving expression to the admiration he felt at what he saw.

CHAPTER DCCCXCIX.

RETURNS TO THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN.

We now return to the highwaymen and Maud, who, it will be remembered, we left in the secret passage.

Without any delay or accident, they reached the inclined plane leading up to the door of the stable.

As Tom King carried the light, he now stood aside and allowed Claude and Jack to pass him.

With nimble fingers, they undid the fastenings, and raised the trap-door.

"Courage—courage, dear Maud!" said Dick to his trembling companion. "Be of good heart, for while you are with me you are safe! Depend upon it, long before the officers can search the inn we shall be far away."

Maud was slightly reassured by these words, for she had too often been in situations of danger with Dick not to place some confidence in his powers.

Moreover, she saw that his comrades, though rapid in their movements, appeared by no means discomposed.

Dick pressed on eagerly, for he was anxious once more to place himself beside Black Bess.

A long time had elapsed since he had seen her last, and he had gone through many vicissitudes.

As soon, therefore, as the stable was gained, he released Maud's hand, then hurried to the stall where Black Bess was standing.

The intelligent animal recognised her master at once, as was evidenced by her actions.

She neighed and pawed the ground.

A keen sensation of pleasure shot through Dick Turpin's heart when he perceived this manifestation of pleasure and recognition.

"Woa, lass!" he cried. "Quietly—quietly! Then you managed to get home safely after all? Well—well, I suppose you are right by this time, and in readiness for a long gallop?"

Not forgetful of the injury his gallant mare had received, Dick now raised her mane in order to inspect it.

He was highly gratified to find that it had entirely healed, and there was little to fear in the future of the consequences arising from it.

In the meanwhile, the highwaymen had been busy caparisoning their steeds.

Dick, reminded of the flight of time and the necessity for immediate action, now followed their example.

The saddle and bridle were quickly placed on.

"Are you ready Dick?" said Tom King, in a suppressed voice.

"Yes, quite ready."

"Then come on, for the sooner we leave this stable the better."

Dick advanced, leading Maud by one hand and Black Bess by the other.

Tom King followed, leading his own horse and Claude's.

Sixteen-String Jack carried the light and led his own steed, Claude Duval being left to replace the trap-door.

This he did with every imaginable amount of caution.

He was anxious to leave the top of the trap-door covered with straw, and, as he believed, he had not left any sticking in the crevices in such a way as to betray them.

It is certain, however, that he must have done so.

All felt greatly relieved when this much was over.

The distance to the opening of the passage was still considerable, yet they did not apprehend any interruption to their progress, and they believed that, upon emerging from it, they would not be seen or molested by anyone.

Without waiting another moment, they pushed forward.

As they proceeded, they could not avoid casting glances of admiration upon their own work.

The difficulties in the way of excavation had been great, and, in order to keep the roof and sides of the passage from falling in, they had been obliged, with great care and labour, to prop them up by means of beams and planks of wood.

When close to the opening from the passage, and at a spot where, from the looseness of the soil, they had been compelled to put up more supports than elsewhere, Tom King suddenly cried:

"Halt! It is just possible," he said—"indeed, it is very likely that the officers will be clever enough to find out the entrance to this secret passage. Who can tell what has taken place since our departure?"

"Well, well, Tom," said Dick Turpin, "what of that?—why do you pause?"

"Because," he said, "I have an idea."

"Well, then, speak quickly."

"If the officers should find out this passage, and make their way along it, they will be very quickly indeed upon our track. It would be a good thing to put a stop to their progress, and that can be done by——"

Tom did not say any more, but explained what he meant by a gesture.

"You would let the passage fall in?"

He nodded.

"It might be worth our while," said Dick. "Who can say? But, then, we may involve ourselves in great danger by making the attempt."

"I think not," said Tom. "But you must decide quickly—shall it be done?"

"I will leave it with you to decide," returned Turpin.

Tom found that Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack heartily approved of the scheme.

Having constructed the place, of course they knew the best and easiest way for demolishing it.

Accordingly, certain of the posts were loosened, and planks removed.

The earth began to fall in very fast.

"If we had such a thing as a rope handy," said Tom King, "we could do it easily. One pull at the post, and then down the whole must come."

"Try it without, Tom," said his companions. "Give a smart pull, and then run back."

Despite the imminent danger of being crushed by some of the falling earth, Tom did not hesitate to adopt this course.

Before he had completed his purpose, however, he was warned of danger by a cry from his companions.

He turned, and hastily retreated.

Well was it for him that he was so hasty in his movements.

With a strange rushing, crashing sound, the roof of the passage fell in.

Tons upon tons of earth came down, and effectually stopped up the passage.

"There," cried Tom, rubbing his hands with great satisfaction, "I rather think the officers will find it difficult to follow us now! We shall be able to get a good start."

This little matter being over, they pushed on at increased speed, in order to make up for the time they had lost.

By the fresh, cool air that blew upon their faces, they could tell how near they were to the mouth of the passage.

In a few moments more it was reached, and, as there was no longer the necessity for a light, it was extinguished.

Slowly and cautiously they made their way out among the trees.

As soon as they had all assembled, they looked up, and were astonished to perceive that the sky was tinted with a brilliant red.

Clouds of smoke, too, could be seen rising up above the tree-tops.

For some moments this spectacle was gazed on in silence.

Dick Turpin was the first to speak.

"They have burnt our house down," he said. "It is perfectly certain that the inn is on fire. There's no other building hereabouts."

"I wish we could tell exactly what has happened since our departure," returned Tom King. "But no matter. Doubtless we shall have enough to do in looking after our own safety."

"Depend upon it we shall," said Turpin. "My own escape from Newgate—the fact of my being tracked to this place, as no doubt I have been, will create a tremendous commotion everywhere, and great efforts will be made to capture us."

"It appears to me," said Claude Duval, "that before we go any further it will be necessary for us to hold a kind of council of war and decide upon the nature of the proceedings we should next take."

"Exactly," returned Dick. "I was about to make the same remark myself. Suppose we all give our views upon the subject, and then decide? I don't think we are in much danger of molestation here."

"Nor I," returned Sixteen-String Jack, "though very likely as soon as we attempt to quit the cover of these trees we shall be seen. It is a desperate, well-organised attack that they have made. All their preparations are doubtless very complete."

"For my own part," said Tom King, after a short silence, "I am in favour of a separation—of course, a temporary one."

"And I—and I," cried Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack both together, so that it was evident the same idea had occurred to them

"There are many good reasons for adopting such a course," said Dick Turpin, to whom they all now looked for a decision; "but then, for my own part, I am sorry that we should separate. One would think that we should gain strength by union."

"No doubt we should," said Tom King, "but then, how much that would increase the chances of being seen. Here are five of us—quite a large party I may say—and wherever we go we must attract a good deal of notice."

"Certainly more than when alone," said Dick Turpin. "But how is it you intend to separate?"

Tom King questioned his two companions, and found that they, like himself, had decided upon going singly.

"It will be best, Dick," Tom continued—"much the best, for one can get out of the way and escape when two or a greater number could not possibly do so."

"You shall decide among yourselves," answered Turpin; "I will not attempt to control you in such a matter; I don't wish it. If you think our separation will conduce to our safety, let us part."

"But not until we have arranged for some meeting-place," said Tom King, quickly. "We must name a certain place and time, and we must be there by some means or other."

But where?

This was the point that set them all thinking.

It was hard to decide which place would be best suited for such a purpose, and where they would be least likely to meet with an interruption.

It was at last resolved that the meeting-place should be on Hampstead Heath, near a tree in a lonely, desolate part of it, which was well known to all of them.

This had the advantage of being at no great distance from the metropolis, and yet it was lonely, for in those days, when the Heath was in the open country and more than double the size it is at present, few people ventured to turn aside from the badly-kept roads which intersected it.

"The hour," said Dick, "may as well be midnight; it is easily remembered, and by that time all will be quiet."

"Agreed. And now when shall the meeting be?"

"I should advise," replied Dick, "that we all seek out some place of concealment and endeavour to lie hidden until this disturbance blows over. Being thus apart, we shall probably be able to accomplish this very important object—what say you?"

"The advice is good—it could not possibly be better. How long shall we remain separated?"

"Let us say nine days," answered Turpin—"that's the time given for the endurance of a wonder; by then, very likely, the officers will have abated their vigilance; at any rate, it would be safe to meet then, and our future proceedings would be decided upon."

All this while Maud remained perfectly silent, listening attentively to all that was said, and gazing alternately into the countenances of the highwaymen as well as the obscurity of the place would permit.

Now, however, with considerable timidity she spoke.

"If you would take a suggestion from me," she said—"if you would listen to what I have to propose——"

All were silent.

"It is," she said, still more hesitatingly, "that you all endeavour to leave England. In another land you would be in safety."

"It is worth consideration," replied Dick; "but at present it is impracticable."

"Indeed!" said Maud, with a deeply-disappointed air. "Why impracticable?"

"Are you so selfish as to forget the danger in which Tom Davis and Ellen are now in? In their disappointment, who can say what the officers may do? I cannot think of leaving them to their fate. We must ascertain their condition, and do what we can to assist them."

This proposal met with universal assent.

"It would be base indeed," said Tom King, "to abandon them after having done so much for us."

"I did not think of their danger," said Maud—"it did not occur to me they would be in any. Do not imagine," she continued, earnestly, "that I would wish you to forsake such true and tried friends."

"Right," said Dick—"quite right! And now, my friends, are we all agreed? If so, the sooner we separate the better."

"Quite agreed," murmured the other three; for they were unable to think of any further arrangements.

Still they lingered for several moments.

After being for so long in company, the idea of parting was a most unpleasant one.

"As I was the first to speak," said Tom King, "let me be the first to go through the disagreeable ceremony. Farewell!"

"Farewell!" returned the others. "Don't forget the time and place of meeting."

"Depend upon it," said Tom King, "I shall not. If I am alive and uncaptured, you will see me there."

Taking his horse by the bridle, he walked slowly off among the trees.

The others gazed after him until he vanished from their sight.

Claude went next, taking an opposite direction.

Then Sixteen-String Jack started also by another route, and Dick Turpin and Maud were left alone.

From this it will be seen that the highwaymen would leave the plantation at four different points, which would make it all the more difficult for the police officers to observe them, or prevent their departure.

We must content ourselves with following their movements one at a time, and it seems only right to give the precedence to Dick Turpin himself.

He drew a long breath—which could almost be called a sigh—when the last of his comrades had left him; then suddenly remembering the danger in which he stood, he turned to Maud.

"It will not be possible to mount at present, because of the low-lying branches of the trees, but I will lead Black Bess out by the shortest path I know of; then, once more in her life she must carry a double burden."

"As you like," returned Maud. "While I am with you I am content. I ask no more. The danger seems diminished more than one half when I share it with you."

Dick did not reply, but at once set forward, for he was anxious to get upon the back of Black Bess.

He regarded her arching neck and proud, impatient step with feelings of the greatest admiration.

"She will carry us bravely!" he ejaculated, in a triumphant voice. "When once in the saddle I shall not fear all the officers in the kingdom."

He pushed on through the trees as quickly as the nature of the ground would permit, until, at length, by the thinness of the vegetation, he was warned that he was near the edge of the plantation.

"We cannot be too cautious," he said. "Remain here, Maud, and hold Black Bess by the bridle, so. That will do nicely. Now I will creep forward with what stealthfulness I am capable, and ascertain whether any officers are near. It may be that this wood is watched; at any rate, it is important that the point should be decided."

He waved his hand while he spoke, and glided swiftly and noiselessly over the soft turf between the trees.

CHAPTER CM.

DICK TURPIN AND MAUD MAKE A HALT AT THE WOOD PIGEON INN.

THEY were anxious moments for Maud that elapsed while Dick was absent on this, as it seemed to her, most perilous errand.

Glad enough was she when she caught the sound of his returning footstep and perceived his form.

"All is well, Maud," he said. "I have looked around cautiously and can see no signs of the officers. Come, I think we may venture to mount now."

So saying, he vaulted into the saddle, and, stooping down, lifted Maud on to the back of Black Bess in front of him.

"Gently," he cried—"gently—gently, Bess!"

It was difficult, however, to curb the impatience of Black Bess at this time—she was full of fire and spirit.

With cautious steps, however, the wood was left, and the open country gained.

Firmly convinced now that all was well, and knowing that he was out of danger, Dick uttered a faint cheer.

No sooner did the sound reach the ears of Black Bess than she gave a bound forward that almost unseated Maud.

Then, at a long, swinging gallop, she took her course across the open country.

Soon the red tint in the sky, proceeding from the blazing inn, disappeared from view.

Still Dick did not offer to check the speed of Black Bess, though, by keeping the reins firmly in his hand, he prevented her from increasing it.

In this manner, they continued to gallop over the country until a tolerably wide cross-road was reached.

From its appearance, it did not seem as though it was much frequented, for in some places it was thickly overgrown with grass.

Believing himself perfectly safe and free from pursuit, Dick diminished his mare's speed to a walk.

He had long ago learned the necessity of restraining her, so that when the moment of danger came she would be able to put forth all her energies.

Taking advantage of this opportunity for conversation, Maud asked Dick what his intentions were.

"To tell the truth," he said, "I scarcely know. I have not made up my mind, but shall be guided by the chapter of events."

"But will it not be better to seek out some place of refuge?"

"It would be better if some place could be found where we could remain in quiet; the difficulty is the discovery of it."

Maud sighed.

"You are weary, no doubt," cried Turpin, overhearing it, "and, to speak the truth, so am I. I should be glad enough of a few days' quiet and peacefulness with you. Let us hope we may meet with such a place ere long."

Maud uttered the same hope with great fervency.

The silence that prevailed around them, and the utter solitude in which they seemed to be, gave them an assurance of safety which was perhaps more imaginary than real.

But the night was fast wearing away.

In the east, indications of the coming day could plainly be perceived, and before long daylight would be shed around them.

Dick still maintained his course along the cross-country road, for it continued to present the same signs of only being slightly used.

This, then, of all others, was the route for him to take.

He was especially desirous to avoid meeting with anyone, since a horse carrying a double burden could not fail to attract universal notice.

All at once, however, upon turning round a bend in the road, Dick came in sight of a small roadside public-house.

A little further on he could see where two other roads branched off, one running at right angles to the direction he was taking.

Now he paused altogether, and both Maud and himself looked with considerable curiosity and interest at the old-fashioned building before them.

In the faint, grey morning light it looked particularly pleasing, and around it and in its whole appearance there was an air of tranquillity and peace that especially recommended it to the fugitives.

At last, in a faint voice, Maud ventured to speak.

"Sure!" she said, "in this place we shall find the refuge of which you spoke. We are far away from Ealing, and who is there that could trace us here, and in so lonely and retired a spot?"

"No one, I should think," returned Dick, musingly, for even he felt the charm of this delightful spot.

"Well, then, let us stay now—I am fatigued, and should be glad to rest."

"We will, Maud, for although we have travelled thus far unseen, we cannot hope to go much further by broad daylight without meeting or overtaking somebody. Yes—yes, we will stay here."

He walked Black Bess slowly towards the inn as he spoke, and on drawing close enough to make out what was written on the swinging signboard, he saw that the house was called the Wood Pigeon, and was kept by Stephen Marshall.

"How strange!" he ejaculated, as his eye fell upon the name "We have only just escaped from Marshall, and here's Marshall again."

"But not the same."

"No, surely not the same," returned Dick; "but the coincidence is singular."

He felt half inclined to turn back even then, for he had grown to dislike the name.

But it was a common one, and it was scarcely likely that the keeper of this little roadside inn could be known to or by the chief police officer.

While thus engaged in thought, the front door of the inn was opened, and a burly, good-tempered-looking man made his appearance on the threshold.

"Morning," he said—"morning, sir. Would you like to stay here for a time—I have every accommodation?"

"I think so," said Dick, "for we have come some distance, and are weary."

"Then let me recommend you to stay here, for it is more than six miles to the next inn, where, although I say it, you will find the accommodation very inferior to what you will have here."

While speaking, the landlord, reading assent in the eyes of the travellers, came forward and assisted Maud to alight.

Dick sprang nimbly to the ground.

"You have a capital nag there, sir," said the landlord, looking at Black Bess with admiring eyes.

"Yes, very fair," said Dick, hastily. "Is the ostler about?"

"He is very likely not awake yet," said the landlord. "If you don't mind, I will take the lady into the house, and in the meanwhile you can go round to the stable; you will find him somewhere about; I will be with you in a minute or so."

"All right," said Dick, and, taking Black Bess by the bridle, he led her off in the direction that had been pointed out to him.

After much shouting and pulling at the handle of a cracked bell, he managed to arouse the attention of the ostler, who, by his appearance, had evidently been sleeping on the straw.

It was a rare thing for anyone to bring a horse to be put up at the Wood Pigeon, and so this lad was prepared to treat Dick with all imaginable deference.

The gift of half a crown, too, made a wonderful impression upon him.

He felt convinced that Dick must be a nobleman at the very least

Before he had finished giving his instructions about Black Bess, and before she had been thoroughly rubbed down, the landlord appeared.

"I think I will stay here all day," Dick said.

"Very good, sir; your good lady does seem tired, and I am sure you will have no fault to find with the accommodation; all that we have is of the very best quality."

Having seen to Black Bess, Dick returned with the landlord across the yard.

Entering the inn, the landlord led him to the room in which Maud was seated.

But before he could accost her the profound stillness which prevailed at that early morning hour was broken in upon by the hasty trampling of horses' feet and the rattle of rapidly-revolving wheels.

Dick reached the little projecting window at one stride

Scarcely had he done so than a post-chaise, drawn by four horses, drew up in front of the inn, with a suddenness that seemed as though it would overturn it.

The horses looked excessively fatigued, and their flanks were dripping with perspiration.

The postilion, too, took off his cap and wiped his forehead on the sleeve of his coat, while he vociferated loudly for the ostler.

The landlord was in a state of great confusion immediately.

Never before in all his long residence at the Wood Pigeon had he known a post-chaise to pass the house, let alone stop at his door.

In the midst of his confusion, he recollected his own duty, and so hastened to the front of the inn.

By the time he reached it, the door of the post-chaise was opened from within, and a young man of strikingly handsome appearance alighted.

Holding up his hands, he next assisted a lady to alight.

She was richly attired, and seemed to be in an early stage of girlhood.

Great traces of agitation could be seen upon her countenance, of which, however, Maud and Dick obtained only a momentary glimpse, for the young man half-led, half-carried her into the inn.

He spoke loudly, so that Dick could not avoid hearing what he said, though, to speak truth, the highwayman was so much interested with this young couple, and had so grown to consider it was necessary for him to make himself acquainted with all things that came under his notice, that he would without scruple have listened intently at the door.

At present there was no necessity for this course.

"A bottle of your best wine, landlord—and quickly!" he cried, in rich, full tones, "and a little cake, or something of that kind—whatever you can get most quickly!"

Then, by the sound of steps without, Dick could tell that the young man had led his companion into a room on the opposite side of the passage, which ran completely from the front to the back of the inn.

"An elopement," said Dick, to Maud, with a smile—"a runaway match, or something of that kind. Well, if they are fond of each other they ought to be happy, and I consider no one should interfere."

In the meanwhile, the postilion was busily engaged in rubbing down his horses, and supplying them with hay and water.

"We sha'n't stay many minutes," Dick heard him say, in a confidential voice, to the ostler. "The fact is, that girl's father is close behind us in pursuit. We should not have stopped here," he added, "only the young lady was near to fainting from fatigue."

CHAPTER CMI.

DICK TURPIN FINDS DANGER EVEN IN THE WOOD PIGEON INN.

A FEW minutes elapsed, and the postilion, having finished attending to the horses, withdrew himself into the interior of the inn in order to refresh his inner man.

While he was thus engaged, a party, consisting of four mounted men, suddenly appeared in front of the inn.

At first it looked like a mystery for them to appear so suddenly and silently.

But the fact is they had made their way along the grass-grown country road, and consequently the hoofs of the horses had not made sufficient noise to attract notice.

No sooner did the first horseman catch sight of the post-chaise than he uttered an indignant cry, and flung himself off his horse in what appeared to be a very dangerous manner.

He was a stout, well-dressed, stern-looking man, apparently about forty years of age—perhaps he was younger.

A piercing shriek coming from the room in which the young couple were seated was next heard, and testified that she had witnessed this fresh arrival.

The other three horsemen appeared to be the servants of the stern-looking man, who, beyond a doubt, was the young girl's father.

With the same reckless precipitation which had characterised his descent from his horse, he dashed into the inn, and broke open the door communicating with the apartment in which his daughter sat.

Shouting aloud, the stern-looking man cried:

"Draw, wretch!—villain!—scoundrel, that you are!—draw, I say, and defend yourself, or I will cut you down as you stand!"

"No, no, father!" cried the young girl. "Spare him—spare him! Your resentment now comes too late—he is my husband."

A fearful oath escaped the father's lips.

Then came a stifled cry, followed quickly by a dull sound.

Dick could tell, as well as if he had been there to see, that the angry father had spurned his daughter from him, and that she had fallen insensible to the floor.

At present, however, he could not see any reason to interfere; yet he drew his sword, and crept closer to the door of the room.

The young man uttered an angry shout when he witnessed this cruel act on the part of the bride's father.

Under the impulse of that anger, he must have drawn his sword, for the clash of steel was heard.

Directly afterwards the door of Dick's room was thrown open, and the landlord, as white as a ghost, and trembling from head to foot, made his appearance.

"Oh, sir—sir," he said, "you wear a sword! Put a stop to that dreadful conflict in the other room! I shall have murder done in my house, and then I am a ruined man!"

Dick only needed some excuse for interference, and, unheeding a remonstrance from Maud, he hurriedly left the room.

But the three servants who had arrived with the stranger guarded the door of the room.

Dick did not hesitate in making the attempt to force his way past them.

Before, however, he had time to accomplish his purpose, he saw the young man's sword suddenly struck aside by that of his more skilful opponent.

With his face more like a demon's than a man's, the angry father shortened his arm and gave a sudden and fearful lunge.

The young man's weapon was not in readiness to parry the blow.

The point of the glittering rapier entered his left breast, and such was the violence of the blow that the progress of the weapon was not stopped until the hilt struck audibly against his breast.

Quick as thought, the weapon was withdrawn, and again passed through the young man's body, who now staggered backwards, dropped his sword, clasped his hands over his wound, made an effort to stand, and then fell lifeless to the floor.

"At last, villain!" said the stranger, flinging down his blood-stained sword.

Then, pointing to his daughter, and addressing his attendants, he said:

"Quick! Raise her and carry her away—the sooner the better!"

At the first touch of these men, however, the young girl recovered her consciousness.

She sprang to her feet with a wild, confused look in her eyes; then her glance fell upon the form of her newly-made husband lying still in death upon the floor, with the blood yet welling from his wounds.

The cry that then escaped her lips would surely have pierced a heart of stone.

Releasing herself suddenly from the grasp of the servants, she sprang forward, and, before she could be prevented, flung herself at full length upon the young man's body.

Her tears and cries were then something fearful to witness.

She tried a dozen different methods of recalling the beloved one to life, but, failing in them all, she started up again with a wild, hysterical cry, that ended in a deal of loud, prolonged, unmirthful laughter.

All who heard it were dismayed.

The father uttered a groan of anguish.

There could be no mistaking that fearful laugh or the strange glitter of the eyes—both proclaimed insanity.

"Seize her!" cried the young girl's father, addressing his servants—"seize her, or she will do herself a mischief! Make her secure and carry her to the post-chaise!"

The poor girl echoed the last words, and then again broke out into a peal of frenzied laughter.

The servants proceeded to carry out the instructions given them, but as soon as they touched the bride she uttered shriek upon shriek, calling all the while upon her husband to protect and save her, who, alas! no longer heard that voice which had ever been like music in his ears.

Without more force than was absolutely required, the young girl was carried out of the inn and placed in the post-chaise.

Her father regarded her with a stern, unpitying look. One would have thought that this terrible event would have caused him to relent and to repent, but so far from it, his anger was increased.

The landlord, whose dismay it is impossible to describe, hastened after him, and seized him by the coat.

"Sir—sir," he cried, "I am a ruined man—yes, a ruined man! And it is you who have wrought the evil! Murder is in my house! What is to be done?"

The stranger shook him off roughly.

"Do what you like," he said—"I care not. It is no business of mine."

He was about to step into the post-chaise, but Dick Turpin advanced.

What he would have said or done under the circumstances is hard to say, for just at that moment the landlord cried:

"If my brother was only here now I should be in a different position. He is the chief police officer in London, and will be here to-day. I can describe you to him. You shall, at any rate, reap the consequences of this deed!"

These words made Dick stagger back, and well they might.

His own safety rose instantly paramount to every other consideration.

Could it really be possible that he had journeyed so far, and had in the end taken up his quarters in a place where Jack Marshall would be most likely to find him?

The moment of irresolution and confusion sufficed to allow the stranger to escape.

One of his own servants sprang upon the back of one of the horses belonging to the post-chaise, and urged the whole onward at full gallop.

The others followed on the steeds upon which they had arrived.

In less than a couple of moments the whole party was out of sight, leaving the landlord dumbfoundered, perplexed, confused, scarcely able to believe what had just taken place.

The postboy, too, witnessed with rage and fear the violent seizure of his vehicle. But one of the horses belonging to the stranger still remained, so, with a fierce shout, he sprang on to his back, and galloped off in pursuit.

"Did you not say that your brother is the chief police officer in London?"

"Yes—to be sure he is, and how thankful I am I have some one so powerful to aid me. Let me see? Why, is it possible? He promised, if he possibly could, to call upon me here to-day. Perhaps I may see him in the course of a few moments."

During the occurrence of these last events, Maud had left the inn and made her way to Turpin's side.

This last speech of the landlord, however, forced a scream of dismay from her lips, which had the immediate effect of attracting general attention towards her.

The result might have been awkward, but just then a diversion happened which told greatly in her favour.

The landlady had not risen when the post-chaise arrived—in fact, she did not make her appearance downstairs until after the newly-made bride was carried off by her father.

The first thing she did was to rush into the room where the encounter had taken place, and, having done so, her eyes were horrified by the frightful spectacle presented to them.

The young man was lying there cold and immovable in death, just in the same position as he had fallen, while the blood that had flowed from his wounds formed quite a pool around him.

Upon seeing this, the landlady threw up her arms and gurgled hysterically, and then fell down in a swoon, to all outward appearances as lifeless as the young stranger.

It was that which took place just after Maud had screamed, and the landlord, being made acquainted with it, rushed into the inn.

"Hush—hush!" said Dick, speaking to her as reassuringly as he could—"don't be alarmed! We know our danger in good time, and all will be well. Do you hear—do you understand? I tell you to be calm."

"Yes—yes."

"We are in no danger yet—most certainly in no danger. And now pay particular attention to my instructions."

She looked up into his face attentively.

"It will never do for us to remain here any longer," he continued, speaking in a hurried tone of voice; "we cannot tell one moment from another when Jack Marshall and his officers will arrive. I am resolved to depart at once. I will take advantage of this confusion that is reigning around, and hasten to the stables. In the meanwhile, you enter the inn and, without attracting any more notice than you can help, leave it by the back door; you will see me there, and after that Black Bess will do the rest."

Hastily as these instructions were given her, and great as was the confusion of her mind, Maud perfectly understood them.

Dick left her, hastily darting round the corner of the inn at full speed, for just then no one happened to be about.

He had no difficulty in entering the stables.

Black Bess was there, and according to his request all her trappings had been hung up on the stall in which she stood.

With nimble fingers he placed them upon her back, and he had her already for the road in a space of time so short that it would have made the ostler of the Wood Pigeon ready to die of vexation.

Rapid as all his movements had been, yet by the time he gained the door of the stable Maud had entered the yard.

She hastened towards him, and Dick without more ado mounted.

Swinging her into the saddle before him in the same way as before, he rode with rather dangerous swiftness to the front of the inn.

CHAPTER CMII.

DICK TURPIN LEAVES THE WOOD PIGEON INN, AND HAS AN ADVENTURE ON THE ROAD.

Either the ostler had been observing Dick's motions, or else the clatter of Black Bess's hoofs had attracted attention, for the landlord and all his household hastily made their appearance at the front door.

"Hi, hi!—stop!" he roared—"stop—stop! What does it all mean? Is everybody mad, or am I?"

The landlord might well ask this question, for the events that had so recently occurred in such rapid succession were quite calculated to disturb the equilibrium of one who had led such an even life as himself.

Dick made no reply, but he slackened his mare's speed somewhat.

Then, plunging his hand into his pocket, he drew forth a guinea.

"Here," he said, as he threw it among the group, "that will do for the reckoning."

No sooner had the words passed his lips than he again gave Black Bess the impulse forward.

As he did so, a loud, peculiar shout from the rear became audible, and he turned quickly to ascertain the cause.

To his extreme annoyance, for he hoped to leave the inn unseen, he perceived a throng of police officers approaching.

They were at too great a distance for their countenances to be distinguished, yet Dick fancied, from the general appearance of the one who rode a little in advance of the rest, that he was no other than his pertinacious foe, Jack Marshall.

Black Bess had had but a brief rest, yet that had sufficed to recruit her energies wonderfully.

Besides, although they had travelled so many miles, Dick had carefully husbanded her strength.

He had now the best of all reasons for congratulating himself upon having adopted so prudent a course.

He did not hesitate to urge her to put forth her utmost powers of speed.

As if by magic, then, the troop of police officers were left behind.

They tried indeed to keep up a pursuit, but found it impossible—their horses were thoroughly exhausted.

Dick continued his headlong course until he felt that he had gone far enough to be perfectly secure from all danger of pursuit.

Then, by slow degrees, he tightened the rein.

Maud was anxious and alarmed.

She looked apprehensively behind her, being scarcely able to believe that they were out of danger.

"I am vexed," Dick said, "and for more reasons than one. I fully intended that you should have plenty of rest before we journeyed further; as it is, we are in the open daylight without knowing where to look for shelter."

"Don't let that trouble you," said Maud—"it is not worth your consideration. You should remember your own life is at stake, and that you should do everything in your power to preserve it."

"Well, Maud, we will do our best. I should like to get some distance further from the officers than I am now; I am sorry, too, to put Black Bess to another gallop, yet it must be done."

He suited the action to the word, and for some time not another word was exchanged—in fact, it was not until the sun had attained a considerable altitude, and until the business of the day had fairly commenced, that Dick again drew rein.

He then found himself in a most beautiful and picturesque portion of the country—a place in which he would have been glad enough to linger for a time.

Not even the least observant person could have looked around without perceiving the many rare natural beauties of the place.

In the bright morning sunlight, too, all objects had a particularly fresh and pleasant appearance.

Indeed, it was scarcely possible to look upon that scene under a more favourable aspect.

Far away before them the road could be traced, stretching itself like a broad strip of white ribbon, and Dick's keen eye presently descried, at a great distance, the form of a mounted man, who was riding towards them.

Evidently the sight reminded him of something, for he brought Black Bess completely to a halt, and plunged his hands in quick succession into his different pockets.

"Maud," he said, at last, in answer to the inquiring look she gave while he was thus engaged, "it is as I fear."

"What?" she asked, with an expression of alarm.

"I have no money. That was the last guinea I flung to the landlord as he was standing at his door. We cannot go on thus; we must have money before we can proceed further."

"But," asked Maud, trembling with dread, "tell me where you can obtain it?"

Dick raised his arm and pointed over the low hedgerows.

"Do you see?" he asked.

The figure of the horseman was now much more distinctly visible than it had been before, for the simple reason that he had come much closer.

"I see that horseman," said Maud, more agitated than before; "but surely you do not mean——"

"Yes, Maud, I do. The only means by which I can obtain money is by taking it on the road. I will commit no act of violence, and, from the appearance of the stranger, I should fancy that the loss of such a trifle as I shall take from him will not inconvenience him much."

"But you forget."

"Forget what?"

"Your own danger."

Dick laughed lightly.

"But consider," persisted Maud, with great earnestness—"consider that the officers are close behind you, and that it is broad daylight. This act cannot fail to bring the officers upon your track."

"They will trace me easily enough as it is," was Turpin's rejoinder. "No—no, Maud, I see no reason to hold back; fortune has thrown this chance into my way, and I should be unwise in the extreme not to avail myself of it."

"For once," said Maud—"only for once let me request you to allow him to pass unmolested."

"Do not entreat that favour," replied Dick, "for it is one I cannot grant, though it pains me to refuse you. There's little or no danger, and, as I said before, money is more necessary to our safety than anything else."

Maud burst into tears, but Dick affected to take no notice of her emotion.

"Come, dear Maud," he said, "let me assist you to the ground. There, that will do nicely. Do not be in the least frightened. Sit down on that little grassy embankment, and remain there; in a few minutes I shall return. Do not be afraid; the adventure is a trifling one after all."

These words, however, did not reassure Maud in the least, for she wept bitterly.

She had learned from experience, however, that when Dick had once made up his mind to pursue any particular course it was quite vain to attempt to dissuade him from it."

At such times there was only one thing she could do, and that was to submit.

This course she adopted on the present occasion, but dreading the encounter that was about to ensue, she shut out the sight of everything around her by clasping her hands closely over her face.

In the meanwhile, with the easiest air imaginable, Dick Turpin trotted forward, and to have glanced at him, no one in the world would have believed that his position was really so perilous as it was.

But this little adventure, coming upon him so unexpectedly, seemed to have quite a reviving effect upon his spirits—indeed, as he walked Black Bess slowly forwards he lightly hummed a tune.

When hastily leaving the Three Spiders, he had only just time to buckle on a sword.

He was altogether unprovided with firearms or ammunition.

To all appearances, however, this circumstance did not trouble him in the least.

The stranger came on at rather a smart trot, and every step his horse took produced a jingling sound.

He was wrapped in a cloak, for the morning air was chill; but every now and then the wind would blow it partially aside and disclose his apparel, which was that of an officer of the guards in an undress uniform.

Apparently he took but little notice of Dick as he walked Black Bess deliberately along the road.

Nor did Dick seem particularly attentive, although his eyes were keenly fixed upon every movement the stranger made.

At length, when close enough for his purpose, Dick stopped Black Bess just in the centre of the road, and the stranger, perceiving it, had to check his steed somewhat abruptly to prevent a collision.

Dick took advantage of this event by taking off his hat and making a low bow.

The officer, who was evidently also a gentleman, with great politeness and grace returned the salutation.

He would have passed on, though, had not Dick's voice arrested his progress.

"One moment, sir," he said. "Excuse me if I interrupt you on your journey—one moment, if you please."

The officer looked at Dick closely, thinking perhaps that he might be some forgotten acquaintance.

Failing to recognise him, however, he said:

"I am at your commands, sir. What is your pleasure?"

"I can scarcely say," said Dick, with a laugh, "but just at the present moment I happen to be in a little difficulty, and I am sure you will rejoice when I tell you that, above all others, you are the very man who will get me out of it."

"Indeed!" said the stranger, with some show of surprise and interest, for Dick's manner of accosting him was such that he never for one moment guessed at his intention.

CHAPTER CIIII.

THE CONCLUSION OF DICK TURPIN'S ADVENTURE WITH THE OFFICER.

"INDEED and in fact," returned Dick, very gravely.

"I am at a loss to understand you," ejaculated the stranger

"No doubt you are," said Dick; "but I shall quickly make myself clear. It would be a shame to keep you in a state of ignorance upon such a point. The fact is, the difficulty I am in is the want of money."

The stranger repeated the words half unconsciously, and backed his horse several paces.

"Yes," said Dick, speaking now in a bolder and more determined tone of voice, "my last guinea is gone, and I look to you, sir, to replenish my purse."

"Well, d—n your impudence!" said the stranger. "Curse me if ever I heard of such a thing in my life! Be off with you!"

"Stay!" cried Dick, in a loud voice, as by one bound he caused Black Bess to plant herself exactly in front of the officer's steed—"stay! I intend to stand no nonsense! At the same time, I would gladly avoid violence; therefore, let me advise you to hand over your money quietly, without making the least fuss—indeed, it would not be becoming of you as a gentleman to do so."

"Wouldn't it? Then I beg leave to differ with you upon that point—to differ with you entirely! And now I tell you plainly, Mr. Highwayman, that no money of mine shall you have!"

"You will alter your mind," said Dick—"I feel sure you will alter your mind! How very unwise it would be of you to risk your valuable life for a trifling sum of money!"

"Well, I must say you are the coolest customer that ever I met with or heard of in the whole course of my life," said the stranger, forced against his will into admiration. "Do you always take these matters in so equable a manner?"

"Ahem!" said Dick, "it depends. But when I am with a gentleman like yourself, I endeavour to treat him as a gentleman."

The stranger laughed at this compliment.

"I don't intend to risk my life for what money I have about me," he said, "because it is a mere trifle. Still less, however, do I feel inclined to give it up without any show of resistance. You shall have my purse upon one condition."

"Name it."

"It is, then, that you draw your sword, alight, and cross blades with me, just in a friendly way. And if you can succeed in giving me three distinct hits before I have touched you twice, the purse is yours; on the other hand, if you fail, I retain my money."

"Agreed!" said Dick, as he sprang lightly from the saddle. "Nothing could be more congenial to my temper!"

"Nor to mine," said the stranger, "for I have a chance of keeping what I have, with the additional satisfaction that no one can taunt me with having tamely submitted to being robbed on the highway."

The stranger alighted also, and secured his horse to the branch of a tree.

Then, drawing a tolerably well-filled purse from his pocket, he threw it into the middle of the road.

"There," he said, "there's the money. The victor takes it!"

With the same nimbleness that had characterised all his movements, the stranger now pulled off his coat and rolled up his shirt-sleeves, disclosing an arm that, though slender, was evidently very muscular.

But Dick did not think it worth while to disapparel himself.

Perceiving that he advanced with his coat on, the stranger said:

"I don't want to take you at an unfair advantage—it is not in my nature to do so. I believe that without vanity I can say I am a good swordsman. I should like you to stand on equal ground with myself. Most certainly your coat will impede your movements."

"No matter," said Dick, in the same easy, careless manner in which he had all along spoken. "I am used to fighting with my coat on; and besides, we shall save time."

The stranger did not say another word, but immediately crossed his blade over Dick's.

His attitude and the manner in which he fixed his eyes made the highwayman aware that he was pitted against an antagonist of no ordinary description

The next moment this singular conflict began.

The blades of the swords rattled together as the two combatants held themselves prepared for attack or defence.

The stranger was the first to make a thrust, and it was given so suddenly—so straightforwardly—that it seemed as though it must inevitably reach home.

But Dick parried it at once, then, quick as lightning changing the direction of his sword, struck the officer lightly on the shoulder.

"One!" he said, with a laugh.

The officer's face flushed, and it was perfectly certain that he had made up his mind he should obtain an easy victory over the highwayman, and the thrust that had been parried so skilfully was his favourite means of attack, and never before had he known it to fail him.

Yet, considering all things, he preserved his calmness admirably, and he again crossed his sword over that of Dick Turpin.

The stranger now waited to be attacked, and Dick did not leave him long in suspense.

Watching his opportunity, he suddenly lunged forward, and struck his adversary on the arm just above the elbow; at the same time, he felt a slight touch himself.

"Two and one!" he said. "Then the next stroke must decide it."

Some traces of excitement now began to manifest themselves in the stranger's manner.

Never before had he encountered an opponent so skilful as Dick Turpin.

He felt that his credit as a swordsman was now at stake, and this feeling went very far indeed towards unnerving him.

As for Dick himself, he was to all outward appearances as indifferent as ever; but that might have arisen from his consciousness of his own superior powers as a swordsman.

Again the weapons clanged together.

Rapid thrusts were interchanged and parried.

Then, by mutual consent, they paused.

At this moment a shriek came upon their ears.

It issued from Maud's lips.

From the distance she had witnessed this conflict, and, of course, she was unable to tell that it was one of a friendly character.

Thinking only of Dick's danger, she came hurrying on.

"That is some one with you?" said the stranger, interrogatively.

"It is," said Dick, "and this must be settled before she comes up. Now, then, to it again!"

There was more of earnestness in Dick's manner than there had been hitherto, and the stranger felt it.

Scarcely had the swords been crossed than Dick, with a rapid movement, disengaged his own sword, and tapped the officer lightly on the breast.

"Three!" he said. "Just in time!"

With another cry, Maud bounded forward, and reached his side.

She clasped her arms around him, and could scarcely believe at first that he was unhurt and safe.

"All's well, Maud," he said—"all's well! This gentleman and myself have had a friendly bout together—nothing more."

With an evident sense of chagrin the stranger sheathed his sword, drew down his shirt-sleeves, and resumed his coat; and Dick sheathed his own weapon likewise, and, with a careless, almost indifferent, step, walked to the spot where the purse was lying, and picked it up.

"Farewell," he said, perceiving that the stranger had already gained the saddle, and was about to gallop off—"farewell, sir! And should you ever hear Dick Turpin's name mentioned, you at least will be able to bear testimony that he did not behave himself like a common footpad!"

The officer bestowed a stare of intense and undisguised astonishment upon Dick, then, muttering:

"I might have guessed it," plunged his spurs into his horse's flanks and galloped away, for this disclosure of his adversary's name did not in the least degree reconcile him to his defeat.

"Are you sure you are unhurt," said Maud—"are you quite certain of it?"

"Quite; and was in no danger except from you. Yes, had that shriek of yours come upon my ears at a critical moment the consequences would have been serious; but no matter, I have gained my end; here is a purse, and if the stranger is satisfied I am."

He consigned it to his pocket as he spoke.

Then once more both resumed their places upon the back of Black Bess.

"I am not afraid that he will betray me," Dick said, in answer to a question from Maud, "nor do I think he would give the officers any information. However, I feel that to journey any further along this road by daylight would be unwise, so at the second turning we come to we will leave it."

"Why not the first?"

"Simply because the officers might take it into their heads to ride down it; it would be much safer to ride on to the second."

Maud felt that this reason was a good one, and said no more.

Dick again put Black Bess to the gallop, as he was anxious to leave the road he was now on, from the simple fact that a long, uninterrupted view could be obtained of it.

He did not reach a second turning, however, until he had gone considerably more than a mile.

At length he stopped suddenly.

"There's a lane," he said; "but we have passed it; the entrance is so dark and narrow that I could scarcely make out what it was at first."

Maud looked around her in some surprise, for although she had been on the look-out she had seen nothing of the lane Dick spoke of.

Black Bess's head was now turned round, and after they had retraced their steps for a short distance they found themselves opposite to the entrance of one of those narrow, winding, leafy lanes that are to be found in almost every part of England.

CHAPTER CMIV.

DICK TURPIN MEETS WITH ANOTHER SINGULAR ADVENTURE.

On either side trees had been planted very closely together, and they were of great antiquity, as was evidenced by the immense thickness of their trunks.

These trees were indeed so closely in contact that it would have been hard to squeeze any bulky object between them, and their branches shot out in such profusion above that they completely covered the lane, forming a kind of arched canopy to it.

Dick without hesitation made his way along it, and as soon as ever they had got beneath the shadow of the old trees, such an air of peacefulness and quiet came over all things that they felt themselves to be in perfect safety.

"We are not likely to meet with anyone here, Maud," said Dick, "so we can journey on without much fear. Still you are weary, and should any shelter present itself, rely upon it I shall not hesitate to avail myself of it."

"If it will be safe to do so," said Maud.

"Oh, it will be safe enough, never fear; leave all consideration of danger to me."

So great was the silence around, and such an impression did it produce upon Dick, that he could not prevail upon himself to disturb it.

The fact was he was terribly fatigued, though his constitution was so strong that he was only made sensible of it by a longing desire for repose.

It was therefore at a pace scarcely exceeding a walk that he allowed Black Bess to make her way along this lane.

Another reason which induced him to adopt this course was out of consideration for his steed.

Black Bess had been upon her legs for many hours, and had travelled many miles.

Comparatively speaking, it was rest for Dick to sit in the saddle while his mare was going so gently.

But although his bodily powers enjoyed this repose his mental ones did not.

He was very uneasy, not only on account of his comrades, but particularly on behalf of Tom Davis and Ellen, who he feared would find themselves in a very difficult, unpleasant position.

Maud glanced up at his face and saw by the expression of it that something was troubling him.

In a moment she asked what it was.

"I will tell you," he said. "It is as you may say a matter of no very great moment, yet for the life of me I can't think it so. It concerns a promise that I made—a promise that I cannot see reasonable hopes of being able to perform."

"What promise was it?" asked Maud, wonderingly.

"The one I made to Mr. Bradbury, the Governor of Newgate. I told him that if he went within a week to Hampstead Heath he would find buried at the foot of a certain tree that I described to him, some recompense for what he did on my behalf."

"And is it not there?"

"No, certainly not; I only represented to him that there was, thinking I should have no difficulty whatever in riding there and concealing such a sum as I considered an adequate reward for all that he had done; but now how am I to hope to achieve it?"

Maud shook her head.

"I am afraid," she said, "that the Governor will meet with a disappointment."

"I should be vexed for such a thing as that to occur," said Dick. "I place great value on a promise, and I should not like the Governor of Newgate or anyone else to be able to say that Dick Turpin had gone from his word. No—no, Maud, that would never do; somehow or other, and in spite of all risks, the money must be put there before the week has expired."

"But under present circumstances," said Maud, "is it not a total impossibility? You have no money except what you carry with you, and how could you possibly venture on to Hampstead Heath for the purpose of burying it."

"The latter part would be easy enough," said Dick; "the worst of it is I have not enough; I should not like to insult the Governor by offering him such a trifling sum as this purse contains. I must set my wits to work, and doubtless ere long I shall see some means or other of fulfilling my project."

After speaking these words Dick relapsed into silence.

He was turning the matter over in his mind in every possible way.

Thus plunged in deep thought he rode on, he scarcely knew for how long a period.

The progress Black Bess made was very slow, for she found she was allowed to go just at her own pace.

All at once both Maud and Dick were startled by an unexpected but by no means alarming sound, yet it was one that made Black Bess prick up her ears and project them forwards.

The sound was repeated.

"That's a laugh," said Dick, in some amazement. "Who can it be in such a lonely, out-of-the-way place as this, giving way to laughter?"

Maud clung to him full of terror.

"Be not alarmed," he said; "surely we ought not to be terrified at hearing the sound of laughter."

"But who is it?"

"That we shall know in a very short time," said Dick, "for the sound came from somewhere very close at hand. We will look first if possible without revealing ourselves, then we can perfectly satisfy ourselves that there is no danger."

Creeping close under the shadow of the trees, Dick made his way along the lane to a point where it turned off at rather a sharp angle.

Reaching this spot, he paused and reconnoitred.

At a little distance off he perceived a sight that was at once picturesque and amusing.

A little way further on the character of the lane changed—in fact, it seemed as though it emerged upon a wild kind of common or heath.

Near the edge of the lane Dick saw a cart piled up with a miscellaneous assemblage of articles, and a yellow caravan.

Beside on the ground were in all about half a dozen persons, nearly all of whom were laughing heartily.

Dick looked in order to ascertain the cause of their laughter and soon found it to be the antics of a boy certainly not more than seven or eight years of age, who was executing some difficult feats of tumbling.

Maud looked upon this scene with great surprise and curiosity.

"They are strolling players," said Dick, in answer to an inquiring glance that she bent upon him. "Good, harmless people no doubt, who have sat down here to rest."

Certainly the utmost good feeling seemed to exist among the whole group; there was not one sorrowful, dejected-looking countenance.

"Shall we avoid them?" asked Maud.

"I think not," said Dick. "I feel sure that such wanderers as these would gladly extend a friendly hand to us. They are more comfortable than one would imagine at a first glance, and unless you have some strong objection I should recommend that we go to them and ask them for rest and shelter."

"If you think it would be safe to do so," said Maud, "I should be glad indeed, for I am utterly weary."

"So am I," said Dick, "so is Black Bess, and this sweet grass that grows hereabout will make for once an excellent substitute for a feed of corn."

Dick's resolution being thus taken he ventured to show himself.

Slightly increasing his speed, he rode towards the merry group.

The sound of a horse's hoofs attracted universal attention, and they all fixed their eyes curiously upon Maud and Dick.

The boy whose antics had amused the rest no sooner perceived the new-comers than he ran towards them, made a grotesque bow, then, turning a succession of somersaults along the road, stopped suddenly upon his feet.

He bowed again, and held out his hand to solicit a donation.

Dick stopped and threw him a piece of silver.

"Ask your friends," he said, "whether they will allow us to join them for a short time? We are hungry and weary?"

Astonished at the gift of so large a sum of money, the boy cut a fantastic caper and hurried off.

He quickly communicated his message.

In the meanwhile Dick continued to ride slowly towards them.

A man now rose from the grass on which he had been sitting, and advanced towards Dick half respectfully, half confidently.

"You are quite welcome to stop," he said, "and to share everything we have. You won't find us close hearted, though we are poor and cannot afford to be very generous."

"I will pay liberally for everything," said Dick. "Don't think I want to trespass upon you in that respect."

"Then you are heartily welcome," said the man, "and we will make you as comfortable as our rough means will permit."

Dick looked at this man with more than common interest.

In spite of the poor, ragged clothes he wore, there was an indefinable something in his manner that showed at once that he had occupied a tolerable position in life—indeed, his mode of speech at once displayed this fact.

Maud was assisted to alight.

Dick followed quickly, and removed the trappings from Black Bess with his own hands.

"I am known as Herr Smithini," said the man, addressing Maud, "and if you will come with me I will introduce you to my wife, who will do her best to make you comfortable."

The remainder of the troop looked somewhat surprised when Dick removed the bridle from Black Bess, thus allowing her perfect freedom; but then they were not aware that the highwayman could call his steed at any moment to his side by uttering that peculiar chirping signal whistle.

CHAPTER CMV.

DICK TURPIN BELIEVES THAT HE HAS FOUND A FIRM, TRUE FRIEND.

THE troop of strolling players, for such they were, consisted of Smithini, two other men, two females, and the boy.

The men, though clad in loose, ill-fitting garments, were evidently tumblers, as was shown by the flexibility of all their joints whenever they moved.

Without exception, they made Dick very welcome, inviting him to a share of their provisions.

Dick consented willingly enough, and renewed his offers of reward.

These men were all to a certain extent outcasts from society, like himself, and therefore very likely to befriend him—at any rate, he resolved to run the risk of placing confidence in them, if only for Maud's sake.

"We make ourselves as happy as we can," said Smithini, when Dick alluded to the laughter which his presence had interrupted, "but I can assure you, sir, we have little cause for mirth at the present time, having met with a great misfortune."

"Indeed! What is it?"

"The loss of our best horse—one that we had taught, with what trouble and patience you could not comprehend, to perform many tricks. What caused the creature's death we cannot guess; it may have been cold, exposure—I know not what. Certain it is that the most attractive feature in our exhibition is gone."

"Then your entertainment is a circus?"

The man nodded.

"Yes," he said. "And here you see my company, or rather the remains of it," he added, rather sadly, "for there was a time when my position was very different from what it is now. It is useless to repine—we must do the best we can, and hope for better times."

Dick would very willingly have questioned this man respecting his past life; he felt quite sure that he should obtain from him many details of a strange and interesting nature.

But after the rude meal was partaken of, such a feeling of drowsiness and heaviness came over him as he had never before experienced.

He tried in vain to struggle with it.

"I know not whether it is your intention to stay here long," he said, rousing himself with some difficulty, "but if you would let me sleep somewhere until sunset I would take it as the greatest favour you can grant."

"It shall be so. We are tired, and our horses also. Make yourself content."

By the directions of the leader of the troop, some canvas was pulled out of the waggon and fixed upon poles, so that a rude kind of tent was formed.

Here Dick threw himself down, and quickly fell asleep.

Maud was in the yellow caravan, also wrapped in slumber, for she was quite worn out with the anxieties and fatigues of the last few days.

Before retiring to rest, however, Dick had entreated Smithini to give him immediate warning if he perceived the approach of any police officers.

Nothing but extreme physical exhaustion would have made it possible for Dick to sleep under such circumstances as these.

But he did sleep, and soundly.

When he at length opened his eyes, it seemed as though not more than a moment had elapsed since he had closed them.

Looking around, however, he saw that it was fast growing dark.

For some time he remained perfectly still.

He was thinking over his position, and endeavouring to decide what should be his next step.

Among these friendly strollers there was no doubt he would be able to find a refuge, and Maud as well.

But then he recollected the promise he had made to the Governor of Newgate.

By what means he could possibly obtain the sum of money needed, and bury it in time at the foot of the tree on Hampstead Heath, seemed an absolute mystery

Suddenly, in the midst of his perplexities, he was struck by a bright thought.

He was all exultation in a moment.

Almost any other person, however, would have shrunk back in dismay at the bare idea of what Dick contemplated.

"Yes," he said to himself, "that's the course; it is simple and straightforward. I will go to Drury Lane; Matthew will willingly lend me the money I require; there will be no obstacle in that quarter, and, at the same time, I shall be able to learn intelligence of Tom Davis. Why, that alone would be worth the risk. Yes, my mind is made up; I'll go!"

This seemed, however, little short of madness; it was virtually courting danger for danger's sake.

Although he had arrived at this decision, Dick found many difficulties in the way of carrying it out

First and foremost came Maud.

What was he to do with her in the meanwhile, for it was impossible for her to accompany him to the White Horse?

"I must speak to her," he said—"I must persuade her to let me go. These players will doubtless take her under their charge; she will be safe with them, and if they keep faith with me, why, this man shall be so well rewarded that he will step at once into his lost position. All my difficulties are clearing themselves away. Now my course is clear and straightforward I must follow it."

With these words, Dick rose and emerged from the tent.

Close at hand, he saw the figure of Smithini.

"You have slept long," he said—"you must have been fatigued."

"I was."

"Come this way, then. You see they have made a fire yonder; we will, if you like, have one more meal together, and then I suppose we must part."

"Yes—I suppose so; but before I leave I have an offer to make to you."

Just as he spoke these words, the fire was reached, round which the whole party had assembled.

Maud was there, and Dick hastened to place himself by her side.

The scene was one that recommended itself to Dick from its very novelty, and he heartily joined in good-fellowship with these strangers among whom he had been so suddenly cast.

When the meal was over, he led Maud away to a little distance to speak to her.

"Black Bess is safe, you say?"

"Yes—quite safe, or was, only a short time back."

Dick whistled, then waited a moment.

The quick beat of hoofs over the heath was heard, and the next moment Black Bess was by her master's side caressing him.

"Yes, all's well," he said. "And now, Maud, I have something to propose to you which will be for the good of all. It will entail some sacrifice on your part, but you must not hesitate to make it."

She looked at him strangely, wondering what would come next.

In a few words, then, he announced his decision.

Maud recoiled with horror at the bare idea.

It needed all Dick's rhetoric only to partially reassure her; but at length he succeeded.

He hit upon the right course for inducing her to consent to allow him to visit the White Horse.

It was by representing how selfish his conduct and hers would appear if they left Tom Davis and Ellen to their fate.

The consent of Smithini to the arrangement alone was wanting, and Dick now hastened to seek him out.

"I would rather not tell you who I am," he said, bluntly, as soon as they had met; "but, as you may guess, I am an offender against the laws. The officers of justice are in pursuit of me. They are no friends of yours unless I make a great mistake."

"They are certainly not friends," said Smithini, with some bitterness. "Often and often, by a needless interference, they have deprived me of much money."

"I don't doubt it; but to return to what I was saying. You were telling me that your position was once very different."

"It was," answered the man. "I had a large stud of horses, and the best troup of equestrians and tumblers in the kingdom. Now you see to what I am reduced. I expect the next thing will be, we shall have to part with the waggon and tents for a subsistence, by picking up a few coppers by performing in the roadway."

"Not so," said Dick, laying his hand on his shoulder. "If you only consent to what I propose, you will have no need to take this gloomy view of things. I require a service at your hands; if you grant it, the recompense shall be such a reward as will enable you to resume your former position."

Smithini looked at Turpin incredulously for a moment.

"You speak fair," he said, "and there is a truthful ring in your voice; but such good fortune is hard to believe. If you are in earnest, however, give me your hand."

"I am in earnest," said Dick, as he complied with his demand.

Smithini grasped his hand warmly, and then, with great solemnity, said:

"If you make good your promise, I swear there is no service in the power of man to perform that I would not render you. Now, then, let me hear it."

Dick was more pleased than ever with this man's manner.

He told him that he should wish to leave Maud with him for a day or two, during which time he was to take the greatest care of her—to shield her from all danger, and if, on his return, he found her safe, his promise should be kept.

"It seems a trifling service to perform for so great a reward. I scarcely like to accept your terms."

"I like you none the worse for that," said Dick, "and, in proof of it, I will take you entirely into my confidence, for you don't look like the man to betray the trust placed in you by another."

CHAPTER CMVI.

DICK TURPIN ASSUMES HIS DISGUISE AND SETS OUT FOR LONDON.

A LOOK of surprise came over Smithini's face as Dick thus spoke.

"You can trust me," he said. "Never fear that I will betray you."

"I don't fear," said Dick, sinking his voice to a lower tone, and glancing cautiously around, so as to make sure they were out of hearing of everybody, "and for that reason I shall tell you, without reserve, who I am. You must have heard of me in some way or other. I am known by the name of Dick Turpin."

"The highwayman?"

"The same."

The stroller held out his hand.

"I have heard much concerning you," he said, "and what's more, I like what I have heard, and will do my best to befriend you—indeed, almost from the first I guessed at your identity, but I waited to see whether you would disclose yourself."

"I have done so," said Dick. "That is my wife that I wish to leave in your care. She is sought for by the officers, as well as myself, and therefore it is necessary that she should keep herself in strict concealment."

The man nodded.

"As for myself, business of an urgent and of a dangerous nature compels me to make my way to London."

Smithini gave a start of surprise.

"To London?" he replied.

Dick nodded.

"Let me advise you not to go."

"Why?"

"Because, if you do go, capture is certain."

Dick laughed his old, quiet laugh.

"You must leave me to take care of myself," he said, "and to act as I may judge best. I thank you for your caution, but it is needless."

"No offence, I hope?"

"None in the least, and now, since all this is arranged, I will seek my wife, and let her know the result of this interview."

"Very good. There is only one thing, and that you appear to have forgotten."

"What is it?"

"To make some arrangement as to meeting again."

"Can you not remain hereabout?"

"It would interfere seriously with my plans, were I to do so," said the man, after a pause, though, of course, you can command me. For my own part, however, I think the safest and most prudent course would be to continue my movements just as though I had never seen you. Your wife will travel with us, and there will then be no ground for suspicion."

"You are quite right," said Dick. "Let it be so. Tell me to what place you thought of going next?"

"My next halt," said the stroller, "will be about a dozen miles from here, a small town called S——field. I may stay there a day, perhaps only a few hours. If I am not there when you arrive, push on to the next village. You will hear tidings of us all along on our route."

"It will be easy to trace you," said Dick, "and so I know quite sufficient."

With these words he turned away, and made Maud acquainted with the arrangements that had been agreed to by himself and Smithini.

To them she did not venture to offer any opposition. She knew how perfectly useless it would be to attempt to dissuade Dick from setting out upon this expedition, and she had sufficient good sense to know that the arrangement made was the very best possible under the circumstances.

Although matters had been settled so far, there was one point upon which Dick was seriously troubled.

He could not make up his mind as to the precise means he should take to reach London.

The question was, should he go with Black Bess or not?

Much was to be said on both sides.

If he took her it would double the chance of his discovery, for she would be more likely to be recognised than himself.

On the other hand, should he leave her behind, he would be cutting off his own escape.

While in this state of indecision, Dick's eyes rested mechanically on one of the vehicles belonging to the strollers.

It was a clumsey-looking covered cart, in which odds and ends of various descriptions had been stowed away.

While looking at it, Dick was reminded of an adventure he once had, which had met with a most successful termination.

It was when, upon the Guildford Road, he had assumed the disguise of a waggoner, and had played the part to such great perfection.

This recollection suggested to him the idea that, among his new friends, he would have plenty of opportunities of disguising himself, and he began to wonder whether it would not be possible to drive to London in absolute safety.

The more he thought upon this project the more he approved of it—especially, as he was unable to think of anything else.

At last he resolved that this should be his mode of action, and all that remained was to arrange with Smithini to have the horse and cart, and to leave Black Bess behind.

There was little difficulty about this—indeed, the stroller's eyes sparkled when the proposition to leave Black Bess in his charge was made to him.

"She's a beautiful-looking creature," he said, "and well known, so that it may prove not a little dangerous to travel with her; but if you make up your mind to leave her in my charge I will disguise her so effectually that even you would be in doubt as to her identity—at least, at first sight."

"Indeed?" said Dick, curiously. "How?"

"I will show you."

He hastened to the yellow caravan, and presently returned with a stone bottle, and brush.

"Catch her," he said, "and I will show you now."

"She wants little catching," answered Dick, and as soon as he spoke he gave the signal whistle.

There was a beat of hoofs, and in a moment Black Bess was by his side.

"There are few horses capable of learning such a trick as that," said the stroller—"very few, and I have had some experience in it. Why, she could be made to do anything."

"I believe it."

"Keep her quiet then, and you will see what an alteration can be made in the course of a few moments."

Dick possessed absolute control over his mare, so he had no difficulty in keeping her quiet while the stroller began his preparations.

Dick quickly guessed at his intention, and requested him to go on without stopping until the operation was completed.

The stone bottle contained a preparation they made use of to keep the coat of a horse perfectly and dazzingly white.

He began with the head first and foremost.

With considerable skill he made a white star upon Black Bess's forehead just between her eyes which alone altered her appearance greatly.

So well too was this done, that it would have required a very close examination indeed to have discovered the deception.

More white was placed around the lower part of the head in such a manner as to look perfectly natural.

Then each of her feet was painted white likewise.

"There," said the stroller, as he drew back, "that's an alteration, is it not? and it will stand everything except a good wetting; but you see how simple the operation is, and how quickly it can be renewed."

Dick was delighted, and so much was his mare disguised that he felt half inclined to make his journey upon her back.

In this, however, he was overruled, for the stroller assured him that she should be perfectly safe.

The cart was now quite ready, and Dick, having taken a last look at his bonny mare, hastened to the spot where Maud was standing in order to bid her farewell.

At the prospect of parting and remaining for some time in the company of people who were perfect strangers to her, Maud could not restrain her tears.

She wept and sobbed as though her heart would break.

She clung to Dick tightly, convulsively, for she had in her heart the presentiment that he would again fall into the hands of his enemies.

But Dick endeavoured to make light of the whole matter, and finally managed to tear himself away.

An old fustian suit of clothes was brought forward by the stroller, and these were large enough to allow Dick to place them on over his ordinary apparel.

The effect of all this was to give him a much more bulky appearance than he usually wore.

A dirty-white felt hat with a large flapping brim was placed upon his head, and it served in no trifling degree to conceal his features.

Then round his neck he wore one of those huge woollen mufflers so frequently seen wrapped around the mouths of carters and waggoners.

Indeed, after a little trouble in disguising himself, Dick looked the character wonderfully, and when he cracked his whip and assumed a lounging, awkward gait, the impersonation was perfect.

"Do not fear for me," said Dick; "I feel quite assured all will be well; in such a disguise as this the cleverest police officer in London would fail to recognise me—even old Matthew himself will not know me. Depend upon it, Maud, I will be careful, and if possible I will be with you by daybreak in the morning, but if I don't come you must not infer from my absence that I am in any danger."

"Do come," said Maud, weeping still—"do come, for I shall suffer a thousand anxieties until I witness your return."

Dick laughed at her fears, then, scrambling up into the cart, he seated himself in front of it, wrapping himself up well in several old sacks and pieces of canvas, and when he had thus prepared himself in readiness to start, Maud could not help admitting that he looked as unlike himself as he possibly could do—indeed, the transformation was so complete that she could scarcely believe in it.

CHAPTER CMVII.

DICK TURPIN'S DISGUISE IS PUT TO A VERY SEVERE TEST.

Dick Turpin was not long in finding that the horse harnessed to the covered cart was of very indifferent quality indeed, and required no small amount of whipping to urge beyond a jog trot of about four miles an hour.

It was clear that he would have to rely altogether upon the excellence of his disguise and the unlikelihood that he should be suspected of playing such a part.

Should flight even become necessary it was quite out of the question.

As he rode on, however, a consideration presented itself to him, which, in the hurry and confusion of events, he had overlooked.

This was that, as he was journeying towards London, he would run a very great risk of meeting either with Jack Marshall or some of his officers.

They might allow him to ride by them unquestioned, but then again they might not, and Dick by no means relished the prospect of putting the existence of his disguise to so severe a proof.

Had the horse been capable of making a little better speed, Dick would certainly have made his way to London by a very circuitous route.

But time was of great importance, and he felt constrained to take the nearest and most direct road.

While jogging on thus and making these reflections, he suddenly perceived, upon looking up, a troop of officers at no great distance on the road before him.

At the first sight he thought they were advancing, but quickly found that this was an error.

For some reason or other they had come to a halt, and had collected into a dense throng.

What reason they could have for adopting this proceeding, Dick, of course, had no idea.

Yet he soon found by their gestures that a very animated discussion was going on among them.

It must be confessed that Dick by no means relished thus riding direct among his foes, yet how was he to avoid it?

In all probability his approach had been noticed, and if he slackened his speed or turned back, suspicion would be aroused.

Clearly he had no resource but to drive on, putting trust in the hope that they would allow him to pass through their midst unquestioned.

Dick felt uneasy, and to conceal his uneasiness he began to sing a song that he had learnt in his boyhood, and certainly the fact of his doing this was calculated to lead to the impression that he was quite at his ease.

He next perceived that the spot where the officers had assembled was just where two roads crossed each other.

Although he kept singing, Dick strained his ears in the hope of being able to catch some word or other uttered by his foes.

But in this he was unsuccessful.

At length, when very near to them, the whole body of officers, numbering altogether about thirteen, faced round and looked at him.

"Hullo you there!" said a voice, which he recognised immediately as being that of Jack Marshall. "Stop your confounded row a moment, and just pay attention to me!"

"Murder!" said Dick, as he abruptly reined in his horse.

The animal readily enough came to a standstill.

"How far have you come along this road?" asked Jack Marshall, in blustering tones.

"Be that your business now?" asked Dick.

"It is my business!" said Jack Marshall. "Do you see that?"

As he spoke he drew from his pocket a small constable's staff with a gilt crown on the top of it.

"Yes, I see it," said Dick, whose voice was as perfectly disguised as any voice could be, so that it is no wonder whatever that Jack Marshall should fail to recognise it.

"Well, then, you will understand that we are officers, and representatives of his Majesty the King. We are in pursuit of a highwayman."

"Oh, murder!"

"Hold your row, will you, and just tell me how far you have travelled?"

"Well, sir," said Dick, touching his hat, and suddenly assuming a very respectful demeanour, "may be a matter of thirty miles or thereabout."

"Thirty miles, eh? And I suppose you have not let anyone pass you on the road without just having a look at them, eh?"

"Well, I can't say that I have."

"Then just pay particular attention to what I am going to say, and, mind you, I give you this caution, that if you speak untruthfully you will be liable to arrest and imprisonment at any moment."

Dick pretended to be desperately frightened.

"Now, then, once more pay attention: Have you seen a man mounted on a black horse, carrying a female before him in the saddle?"

[DICK TURPIN'S DISGUISE IS PUT TO A SEVERE TEST.]

"Mounted on a black horse?" repeated Dick, as though endeavouring to tax his memory, but in reality he was debating within himself whether he should return an affirmative or negative reply.

If he said yes, the officers would doubtless ride along the road he had just traversed, and if so, would come up with the strollers, and so bring Maud into danger; whereas, if he said no, he might be troubled with them still further.

Yet this was the course which, in a brief and scarcely noticeable hesitation, he resolved to adopt.

"No, sir," he said. "I have been thinking carefully. I haven't seen nobody on a black horse."

"You are quite sure?"

"Quite."

"I said so, Mr. Marshall," interrupted an officer at this moment—"I said so. I feel quite convinced that he must have taken this turning to the left!"

"And I say he must have gone to the right," exclaimed another voice, "since that would take him quickest into the open country—he would have no town and villages in his way!"

"Hold your row, all of you," roared Jack Marshall, "and leave me to manage matters myself!"

Then turning to Dick, he said:

"I believe you are deceiving me."

"Me deceive you, sir?" said Dick. "Not on no account—I wouldn't be guilty of such a thing. There's nobody like what you have described passed me since I started."

There was no good reason for doubting Dick's word, and most certainly there was nothing in his manner in the least degree suspicious.

Perhaps, had it been day instead of night, he would not so easily have avoided recognition.

But darkness was greatly in his favour.

No. 187 will be Published next Monday.

Yet Jack Marshall was not satisfied, and for the simple reason that he had got the idea firmly fixed in his mind that Dick had taken the straightforward road.

He had maintained this very vigorously in spite of the general voice of his men, who were all inclined to think that the highwayman had turned either to the left or the right.

This, in fact, was the subject of discussion when Dick first caught sight of them.

It was mortifying, then, in the extreme for Mr. Marshall thus to find himself in the wrong.

"What have you in your cart?" he asked, at length.

"Nothing at all, sir—just nothing at all. I am going now to London to fetch my load."

Jack Marshall determined to have a peep at the interior of the vehicle, being moved to do so by the thought that if he found the waggoner speaking the truth in this instance it would be only fair to presume that the information he had just given was correct.

Accordingly, riding to the back of the cart, Jack Marshall lifted up the canvas, and, one of his men producing a light, took a peep at the interior.

The cart was evidently empty, save and except a very small quantity of dirty straw that was littered on the bottom of it.

Jack Marshall let go of the canvas with a feeling of disappointment.

He did not know why it was, but somehow there seemed to come over his mind a species of reluctance to part company with the supposed carter.

But he had no pretext for detaining him, and so, gruffly and angrily, bade him drive on. Dick gladly enough complied with the mandate, and left the officers to make up their minds whether to turn to the left or the right.

He drew a long breath when he found that he had fairly escaped from this danger, for once or twice he had felt particularly uneasy, especially when Jack Marshall had called for a light.

Now that all had passed off so well, he was able to find ample grounds for congratulation.

His disguise had successfully withstood a very severe test, and certainly this incident encouraged him not a little in the hope that he should carry out his mission successfully.

It must not be thought, however, that it had the effect of in any way abating his caution.

Suddenly, however, the sharp clatter of a horse's hoofs going at a furious gallop smote upon his ears.

There was a bend in the road, so that he was not able to see for any great distance before him.

But the clattering sound increased, and then, with great suddenness, the single horseman, going at the utmost speed of which his horse was capable, appeared in sight.

Despite the suddenness of the whole affair—for when Dick first caught sight of the rider he was only a few yards in advance of him—he recognised him.

It was his old, faithful, well-tried comrade, Tom King.

Beyond all doubt, he was being hotly pursued by police officers, though at present the clatter of their horses' feet could not be heard.

Involuntarily a shout came from Dick Turpin's lips.

It caused the flying horseman to turn his head, and if Dick had had up to that moment any doubt as to the identity of this horseman, all his doubt would have been set at rest, for Tom King's countenance was fully exposed to view.

In the excitement of the moment, Dick forgot he was disguised, and wondered how it was his comrade did not recognise him.

All Tom did, however, was to apply his spur more vigorously to his horse's already-bleeding flanks, and the next moment he was far away down the road.

The beat of his horse's feet soon became inaudible, and scarcely had this happened than Dick distinctly heard the approach of a large body of mounted men.

The speed they were coming at was something alarming.

"Confound it!" Dick muttered. "I am doomed to be unfortunate to-night! Ten to one I shall have to encounter this second troop of officers, and it's rather too much to expect that my disguise will stand a scrutiny a second time."

His resolve was, however, quickly taken.

He would push on at the best speed the miserable horse was capable of making, and he trusted, by keeping close to one side of the way, to be out of the way of the horsemen, who would thus gallop past without any obstruction.

To this end, then, he pulled the left rein rather sharply, for up to the present moment he had kept in the middle of the highway.

The horse, not expecting such a movement, or making a false step, or crossing its legs from some other cause, stumbled, and before Dick could save it, fell down upon its side, where it lay without making the slightest effort to rise again.

CHAPTER CMVIII.

DICK TURPIN RUNS A RISK TO RENDER HIS COMRADE, TOM KING, A SERVICE.

Dick's vexation and anger now reached their climax.

By the merest chance in the world, he had saved himself from being hurled from his seat when the horse suddenly fell down.

Descending carefully, he went to the creature's help, and endeavoured to force it to rise.

Before he had time to do anything further than this the troop of officers came in sight.

The cart was now drawn most awkwardly across the road, occupying nearly the whole of it.

The police officers evidently caught sight of the obstruction, for a loud shout came upon Dick's ears.

His position now was about as awkward and perilous as could well be imagined.

Should he be recognised, nothing in the world could save him either from capture or death—no other alternative would be offered to him.

That presence of mind and coolness which had on so many occasions stood him in such good stead did not desert him on the present occasion, and almost mechanically he made up his mind as to what would be the best thing to do. It was thoroughly to assume the character he had taken up, and to bend all his energies towards assisting his horse to regain his feet.

This could only be done by removing a portion of the harness.

While he was engaged in unfastening the traces, the officers, who had slackened pace when they first caught sight of the horse lying across their path, now came up with him, and, as he half expected, stopped.

"Hullo, fellow!" said a voice.

Dick placed his knee upon his horse's head and looked up.

"Have you travelled far along this road?" was the first question.

"Yes, a good way. But don't bother—don't you see my horse is down!"

"You had better be civil," said the same voice. "We are officers. You must have seen a man gallop past at full speed a few minutes ago. Now, tell me truly, which way did he go?"

Dick had expected this answer, and had wondered whether he should really do his comrade a service by sending the officers on a wrong track.

It could scarcely make Tom's position worse than it was, but then, should the officers discover they had been trifled with, most unquestionably they would take him into custody the next time they encountered him.

But Dick was not likely to hesitate long between considering his own safety and the safety of a companion, so without the least hesitation whatever he answered the officer's question by saying:

"Yes, I seed him sure enough, and a fine rate he was going at for sartain."

"But which way did he go—straight on?" cried the officer, impatiently.

"No—no," said Dick, "he didn't go straight on, leastways, he did too, but not straight along the road."

"You mean he took to the fields?"

"Yes, that's what I mean," said Dick, with a grin and while he spoke he raised his arm and pointed across the meadows. "He jumped his horse clear over that hedge."

he said. "I never saw such a leap in my life, and then down went the Captain, and that's all about it."

"Down went the Captain?" said the officer. "What do you mean by that?"

Dick grinned again so as to show all his teeth, then pointed to his horse.

The officer uttered an impatient exclamation, then, turning round he addressed himself to his companions, and said:

"No doubt this fellow here speaks the truth; he would be sure to leave the highway at the first opportunity; he would suspect that another party was a little in advance."

"He has, ten to one, got under cover of that wood," said another officer, who had been standing up in his stirrups and looking around at the face of the country as well as the darkness would permit.

"No doubt. Ride on a little way; before going far we must come to a gate which we can pass through, and that would be much better than risking a leap."

The officers were unanimous on this point, and set their horses in motion.

Dick bawled after them.

"Here—here," he said—"stop a minute."

They stopped of course.

"I've done what you wanted," he said, "and one good turn—I've heard say—always deserves another, so perhaps some of you will help me to get Captain up, for I can't do it myself."

The officer uttered an oath, which was the only reply he condescended to make to Dick's request.

Like his followers, he was quite indignant at the idea of such a thing.

Dick smiled quietly to himself, and soon had the satisfaction of seeing the officers push open a gate and pass through it into the meadows.

"I hope it will do Tom a good turn," he said—"I do with all my heart! I hope too that he has left the high-road and taken to the fields, otherwise he will stand a good chance of falling foul with Jack Marshall and his troop."

Indeed, Dick was more uneasy on this point than he cared to confess even to himself.

He did not for a moment believe that Tom would be likely to continue galloping along the high-road, and there was a strong probability that upon coming to the spot where Dick had met with Jack Marshall he would turn either to the right or the left.

When a choice is to be made between a right road and a wrong, the latter is almost sure to be chosen, and it was this that made Dick uneasy.

"I can't help him any further," he said, as he applied the whip vigorously to his horse; "he must do as I am doing—shift for himself in the best way he can."

At length, after bestowing many lashes, the unwilling beast struggled to his feet.

Dick harnessed him as rapidly as he could, then, remounting to his seat, continued his interrupted journey.

"If things are to go on at this rate," he muttered, "it will be daybreak before I reach Drury Lane. At the best I shall have a good deal of trouble in leaving London before the day has fairly begun."

This seemed very probable, for the night was growing much advanced, and even if he was so lucky as to meet with no other interruption, a long time must necessarily elapse before he could reach Drury Lane.

At length Dick managed to whip his horse into a shambling, cantering kind of gallop, which, although it threatened every moment to break some portion of the harness, and made the cart jolt most fearfully, yet got over the ground in something like tolerable style.

It was a speed, however, that could not be maintained.

Gradually the animal's pace became slower and slower, until the highwayman was seriously afraid that he would come to a dead stop.

It was just at this crisis that he perceived before him in the distance a faint, twinkling light, and as soon as he perceived it he began to wonder whereabouts he was.

"That surely must be the Boar's Head Inn. Yes," he continued, as he glanced quickly around him, "that's evidently it. Well, I trust no one will be staying there, in which case I will run the risk of making a halt myself."

With this determination he pushed on, but the horse was fearfully exhausted, and he trembled at every step, and could scarcely put one foot before another.

About ten minutes later the front of the roadside inn was reached.

The light he had seen came from a candle fixed in one of the windows, and this was the only sign of inhabitability that the house displayed.

The stoppage of the clumsy vehicle, however, attracted the attention of those within, for the landlord came bustling out and immediately began bawling for the ostler at the very top of his voice.

CHAPTER CMIX.

DICK TURPIN FINDS HIMSELF BESET BY DIFFICULTIES AT THE WHITE HORSE.

These cries at length had the effect of causing a dwarfed, ill-shapen man to make his appearance.

He came hobbling forward, and grumbling in no measured terms at having been disturbed, especially by a man of Dick Turpin's appearance.

The landlord contented himself with turning back into the inn, for he knew that, as a rule, drivers of covered carts were not very profitable customers, and it certainly was a waste of time to bestow any extra civility upon them.

Dick dismounted with great agility, and, going close up to the ostler, he said:

"Just do as I want you, and say nothing, and it will be a good job for you."

The only reply Dick received was a stare of wonderment.

"Fetch me first," he said, "a quarter of a peck of oats in a bucket, and half a gallon of new ale—be quick."

The ostler hurried off to obey this command.

It may have been that he guessed something good for himself was about to result.

At length, appearing with the articles ordered, Dick took the bucket containing the corn from him, and then, very much to the ostler's amazement, emptied the whole of the ale into it, and stirred the oats well up with his hand.

The corn was then put before the horse, who at once made a vigorous attack upon it.

"Well," ejaculated the ostler, "that's a rum trick for you to be up to, any way."

"Very likely," said Dick; "but you need say nothing about it, need you?"

"Oh no, I can keep my mouth shut as well as anybody else."

"I thought so. Then just go into the house and fetch another half gallon of ale."

"Another half gallon?"

"Yes, I've said it; there's the money to pay for what I've had."

Dick placed half a guinea in the man's palm.

He soon returned, and Dick took one draught from the foaming tankard, then, giving it back to the ostler, he said:

"You can drink the rest and keep the change for yourself."

The ostler nodded, and winked, and grinned, and went through several strange antics, by all of which he intended to imply that he should maintain an inviolable secrecy.

The horse devoured the oats eagerly, yet some time elapsed before he had finished his meal.

A draught of water was next given him, and Dick prepared to resume his journey.

The effects produced by this stimulating food were really wonderful.

The horse no longer seemed like the same animal.

No sooner did Dick apply the whip to him for the first time than he started off at a rate that must have astonished himself.

The rest of the journey was accomplished without the occurrence of any other incident worthy of record.

Towards the last the horse got terribly knocked up, but then Dick knew he could be well attended to at the White Horse.

More from mere bravado than aught else, Dick made his way to Drury Lane by driving up Long Acre, and ing down Bow Street.

This course took him directly past the principal police station in the metropolis.

At that late hour, however, the place looked dismal and quiet enough.

A miserable oil lamp was flickering over the door, and in front an officer was pacing up and down.

Upon Dick he did not bestow a second glance, and the highwayman, taking the next turning to the left, drove straight up to old Matthew's door, where he paused.

Descending from his seat in as clumsy a manner as he possibly could, and endeavouring to keep up the character he had assumed in the minutest details, he pushed open the door and entered the inn.

The house was almost empty, though from one room came sounds as though some dispute or other were going on.

Taking no notice of this, Dick walked straight up to the bar.

At first he saw no one, but after knocking sharply on the counter the little Jewish boy that old Matthew had taken under his protection made his appearance.

From the description given by his three comrades, Dick was able to recognise this boy easily enough.

His vexation at seeing him was great, and he was sorry that Matthew, generally so acute, should in this instance permit himself to be so grossly imposed upon.

Before he left, Dick determined that the landlord should be no longer in ignorance of the traitor he had got under his roof.

For the moment Dick forgot that this boy was both deaf and dumb, so he called out for brandy-and-water.

The sign which the boy made was so expressive that even had he known nothing about it previously it would have sufficed to let Dick know that he was deficient of the faculties of hearing and speaking.

As is often the case, what this boy lacked in one sense he made up for in another.

He was uncommonly acute, and could tell pretty accurately by the mere movement of the lips what was said to him, especially when any kind of liquor was called for.

Therefore, as soon as Dick spoke he placed his hand upon a small barrel on which the word "Brandy" was painted.

Dick nodded, and the boy immediately proceeded to serve him.

The brandy-and-water was put down on the counter and paid for.

Dick thought the boy looked keenly at him, but he took no notice of that, for by this time he had grown to feel quite confident in his disguise.

He sipped at his brandy-and-water, and the boy retired to the inner room.

Dick now found himself in a position of unexpected difficulty.

In his calculations he had altogether omitted the present contingency.

How to gain access to old Matthew was a mystery.

Had the girl been there as usual the matter would have been easy enough, but with this traitorous boy the case was altogether different.

Reflectively, then, Dick continued to sip at his brandy-and-water, and while he was so engaged he heard the door in front of the inn pushed open and slammed shut.

He turned round at once and saw a man approach whose appearance seemed strangely familiar to him, yet, though he tried his best, Dick could not remember when and where he had seen him before.

This man, with a peculiar gait, lounged up to the bar, and, placing his arms upon the counter, looked closely in Dick's face.

Turpin stood the scrutiny bravely, and he felt pretty certain that this man had not penetrated his disguise.

Dick, however, had recognised him.

When his countenance was revealed by the light in the bar he knew it at once, and remembered where he had seen it before.

He was the man who on a former occasion crept into the inn and concealed himself in the cupboard underneath the counter.

The full particulars of the manner in which this spy had been scalded by old Matthew had of course been related to Dick, and the man had also been pointed out to him.

Apparently he was no longer a member of the police force, for he was dressed in shabby, ragged garments.

The fact was, he had been dismissed some time before for a gross breach of duty, and since that time had led a precarious life in the streets.

The boy again came forward, for he had witnessed this new arrival.

He recognised the man also, and Dick fancied that a significant glance of recognition was exchanged between them.

The man did not speak, but put down some coppers on the counter.

The boy knew what he wanted, for he produced a small glass of neat gin.

"Going far to-night, governor?" he said, addressing Dick.

"Yes," was the reply, "I have a considerable journey to make."

The man drank his gin very slowly, but continued all the while to gaze into Dick's countenance in a manner that made the highwayman begin to grow uneasy.

Difficulties were increasing around him, nor could he for his life see a clear way out of them.

His glass being by this time finished, he pushed it forward for replenishment, and exactly at this moment a footstep was heard upon the stairs, the foot of which was close to the bar window.

The footstep was a heavy one, and this man no sooner heard it than he tilted up his glass and made a precipitate retreat.

Directly afterwards a door was opened, and old Matthew made his appearance.

"What's the meaning of that confounded row?" he said—"who is it quarrelling there?"

He turned up the passage towards the door of the room from which the angry sounds proceeded.

Dick left the bar counter, and, stepping quickly after the landlord, touched him on the arm and whispered in his ear:

"It is I, Matthew—Dick. Don't be frightened, or speak, or recognise me—that deaf and dumb boy is a traitor and will betray me."

Old Matthew tried to answer, but could not.

He staggered back several paces, nor did he stop until his back, coming in contact with the wall of the passage, brought him to a sudden halt.

His eyes rolled fearfully, and his mouth opened to its fullest extent, while over his whole countenance was spread an expression of utter incredulity.

Dick then did on the spur of the moment the very best thing he possibly could, even had he determined to do so after spending several hours in reflection upon it.

He turned abruptly round, and retraced his steps to the bar counter, where, taking up his glass, he began again to sip his brandy-and-water.

CHAPTER CMX.

DICK TURPIN MAKES HIMSELF KNOWN TO OLD MATTHEW, AND GIVES HIM A CAUTION.

THUS left to himself, old Matthew recovered from his astonishment more rapidly than he would have done under any other circumstances.

Dick now felt perfectly secure.

He had the utmost faith in old Matthew's resources.

He had learned by experience how fertile he was in expedients of every kind, and therefore did not doubt that he would devise the best means of obtaining an interview without drawing down any suspicion by so doing.

Matthew gave a great start and then became calm, though a close observer could have detected the great amount of agitation under which he laboured.

Carrying out his original intention, he entered the room from which the sounds of quarrel continued to come.

He bestirred himself vigorously, and soon quelled the disturbance.

Having done so, he returned to the bar.

He took no notice whatever of Dick, but, having passed through the door, closed it behind him.

From a shelf he took down a book and carried it into the little parlour beyond where the deaf and dumb boy was sitting.

By signs he instructed him to copy out some accounts of money owing, as entered in the book, and having thus secured an employment for the young Judas, he returned to the bar.

"Speak to me in a whisper," he said, leaning forward over the counter. "Be careful not to raise your voice."

"All right, Matthew; but don't look so scared."

"Scared?"

"Yes. One would think, to look at you that you had just seen a ghost."

"Worse and worse!"

"How worse?"

"I have seen you!"

Dick laughed lightly.

"Never mind me," he said, "I can look after myself. I don't wish to bring you into any trouble either, so, as soon as I have carried out my intentions, I will depart."

"But, oh! captain," said Matthew, "what could have induced you to be so thoughtless—so insane as to venture here to-night?"

"Pshaw! It's nothing! Am I not well disguised?"

"You are, indeed!"

"Should you have recognised me?"

"I think not. I never knew a change to be so complete."

"Then," said Dick, "I may think myself tolerably safe, I presume?"

"Well—well," cried Matthew, "since you are here, speak quickly, and tell me all you can."

"I intend to do so."

"I don't ask you to come in," said the landlord, "simply because I think you will be safer standing where you are. You need not feel afraid that the police officers will recognise you, and we can carry on a conversation undisturbed."

"I quite approve of the notion," said Dick. "In the first place, then, I have bad news to communicate. Our pleasant life at Ealing has come to an end."

"I knew that," said Matthew, sharply.

"You knew it—how?"

"Why, simply because Ellen, Tom Davis, and his wife were brought prisoners to Bow Street late last night, or rather early this morning."

"Yes, yes—of course. What has been done with them?"

"They were carried before the magistrate, of course."

"Well—well, and the result?"

"What result could you expect? The whole case was made perfectly clear and straightforward. The magistrate said he had never known such an outrageous case in his life."

"Were you present at the trial, then?"

"Of course I was; though it was not exactly a trial, but an examination."

"Well—well, it's much the same thing. You know what I mean."

"I do, and, as you might expect, the magistrate has committed them all three to take their trial next week at the assizes."

"Will their case come on so soon?"

"It will, indeed. Not that I expect it will be on the first day; but perhaps towards the end of the session. At the most they will be brought to trial in eight or nine days."

"Something must be done for them," said Dick, "that's quite clear."

"What can you do?" asked Matthew.

"That I don't know, my friend; but I shall think it over, and, rely upon it, we shall make an effort."

"But, good Heavens!" said Matthew, "if you were so fortunate as to make your escape from the Three Spiders in the way you did, why did you tempt your fate by returning here to-night?"

"Simply because it was a necessity. I have come, Matthew, on purpose to ask you to grant me a favour."

"Name it, and you shall have it."

"Well, then," said Dick, "it will be necessary for me to enter into some kind of explanation."

"Go on; you are perfectly secure. The only thing is, you are in an uncomfortable position to carry on a conversation. I should like you in the parlour yonder, and to pass a comfortable hour; but that is out of the question."

"So I suppose. Well, this will do for me, so listen."

Dick then, as rapidly as he possibly could, gave old Matthew a brief outline of all the strange adventures that had befallen him in Newgate.

To every syllable Matthew listened with the utmost intentness.

He concluded by saying:

"Well, now, you see, Matthew, I feel, and I think you will feel with me, that the Governor of Newgate, having so far befriended me, deserves some kind of reward for it, and that's why I mentioned about the money buried beneath the tree."

"And you have no money?"

"No, Matthew—not a fraction, and for that reason I asked him not to attempt to visit the place until a week had expired."

"I see. And you want me to let you have such a sum of money as you require?"

"That's it, Matthew. I am sorry to trouble you, but it will be all right in the end. You see, but for this unfortunate attack being made so suddenly upon the inn, I should have been able to carry out my intention with the greatest of ease."

"Of course you would! But what a pity, captain, for you to run the risk of your life upon such a trifling matter as that!"

Dick shrugged his shoulders.

"How could I help it?" he said. "Would you have me break my word?"

"You might have sent a messenger."

"Where do you think I could obtain one? No—no, my friend, I consider that I have managed things very well indeed. I am quite contented with all that I have done so far."

"Well, perhaps you ought to be," said Matthew, reflectively, "for with so sharp a look-out as to my certain knowledge is kept for you, it seems marvellous that you should have reached here unseen."

"Stop a minute," said Dick, "and I will tell you something that will give you still more confidence in my disguise. It is a capital joke, too."

Matthew prepared to listen, and Dick accordingly favoured him with an account of his adventures on the road.

Old Matthew listened to the recital with the most uncomfortable feelings.

But Dick tried to make as light of all the incidents as he possibly could.

"But it's running too great a risk," he said—"it's carrying matters too far. For your own sake and for others you ought to be more careful."

"But what better result could I hope for or obtain?" said Dick. "Careful or not, here I am, you see, in safety."

"Yes, so you are—I can't deny that: but still, don't be too bold—don't boast of what you have done. The sooner you start from here, the better; so I will fetch you the money you want at once."

"Don't be in too much hurry, Matthew. I have one or two important things to talk over before I can take my departure."

"Well—well, but be quick."

"I will. In the first place, you must contrive by some means or other to get rid of that rascally boy of yours."

"Yes," said Matthew, with a sudden start, and glancing towards the inner room. "You said something about his betraying you."

"Yes, and he will do it. When Tom, Claude, and Jack were here last, if you remember, you sent him for their horses. He put the officers upon the scent, and, had not my three comrades started off themselves, their capture must have been certain, and it would have happened, too, at your very door."

"Is this really true?" exclaimed Matthew, scarcely able to believe what he heard.

"Perfectly true," said Dick; "and therefore I say don't hesitate any longer about getting rid of him. If you keep him, he will some day or other bring about your destruction."

"He shall go, captain—he shall go at once. I will have no traitors beneath my roof! I confess there are many things which I have discovered which I have not liked, yet I have looked upon all his delinquencies with a lenient eye, for, Dick, I knew his father. He was one of my best friends, and a truer, better man never breathed."

"Then it's a pity he is so unworthy a son."

"He is dead now, Dick, and his mother too. She was a Jewess, and it is from her no doubt, that he inherits his treacherous disposition."

There was a tone of deep regret perceptible in old Matthew's voice as he thus spoke, and it was quite certain that it would cost him a pang thus to get rid of the son of his old friend.

CHAPTER CMXI.

AFFAIRS AT THE WHITE HORSE INN ASSUME A CRITICAL ASPECT.

"Say no more upon the point, Dick," were the landlord's next words. "You have nothing more to fear of him; I will take effectual means to get rid of him."

"And now, then, before you go, tell me in a few words about Maud. And the rest—where are they?"

Dick complied, and then added:

"Tom King was in great peril I know; how he has fared, of course I can tell no better than yourself; and as for Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval, I have not seen them since we parted."

"Well, well, and I suppose you hope to meet all together some time before Tom Davis is brought to trial?"

"Yes, I hope so."

"But, then, if you do, in what way are you to help him?"

"I am not prepared to say, Matthew; but between now and then you can think it over as well as myself, and no doubt something will suggest itself."

"I will try," said Matthew, "for after all that he has done, it would be a world of pities for Tom Davis to be sentenced to transportation for life, and you may depend that is the lightest penalty they will inflict upon him."

"It must not be—it shall not be!" said Dick, vehemently, and bringing his hand down with great force upon the counter.

"Hush—hush!" said Matthew. "Be careful; you forget your caution."

"I did for the moment; but Tom Davis must be saved or rescued, no matter at what sacrifice. If you have means of communicating with him, don't fail to let him know what I have said."

"I shall be able to communicate with him, no doubt; but now, Dick, whether you have anything more to say or not, let me entreat you to depart. I will go upstairs and fetch the money you require; I will not be a moment longer than I can help."

Dick assented, and the landlord at once hastened upstairs.

No sooner had old Matthew departed than the treacherous boy issued from the inner room.

He glanced stealthily and quickly around him for a second, then, with an assumption of boldness, walked towards the door, opened it, and passed into the passage.

Under the circumstances, Dick wondered how far he should be justified in interfering with the movements of this lad.

It might be that his deafness was only simulated, and if so, he could easily have overheard sufficient of the conversation to let him know that it was only a seeming carter who stood at the bar.

In this case he would, beyond a doubt, communicate with those outside.

Should he run the risk of allowing him to pass by?

That was the question uppermost in Dick's mind, and he had very little time to make up his mind concerning it.

The boy marched on, pretending to look very indifferent indeed, but only partially succeeding.

He had to pass quite close to where Dick was standing, and just as he reached this spot the highwayman suddenly stepped out his foot.

The boy did not see it, or, at any rate, it was until too late, for he was tripped up as cleverly as it was possible for anyone to be.

He fell with a tremendous crash on his face in the passage, and lay for a moment as though half stunned.

Then, springing rapidly to his feet, he plunged one hand into the breast of his coat, as though he had a weapon concealed there.

His whole face then looked like a demon's.

His eyes flashed, and his teeth were closely clenched together.

Blood was streaming from his face, but Dick pitied him not in the least—indeed, he was glad to think the opportunity had been afforded him of giving the rascal a taste of what he deserved.

If his first intention had been to draw any concealed weapon, a second thought made him change his mind.

Stamping and scowling with rage, he continued his course along the passage.

Just then, however, old Matthew could be heard descending the staircase, and immediately afterwards the door at the foot of the stairs was flung open.

The boy saw him, and stopped irresolutely.

Dick said, in a suppressed voice:

"Look, Matthew, there he goes! I stopped him a little, but he wants to give the alarm!"

Old Matthew deposited a heavy bag of money on the counter with a dab, and then, with a rapidity of movement that no one could have expected from a man of his years and bulk, he darted along the passage, and seized the boy by the back of the neck.

"You rascal!" he said—"you infernal scamp! But I will pay you out for this! Oh, confound it," he added, "I forgot he can't hear a word I say!"

"Secure him somewhere," said Dick.

"Never fear," answered old Matthew. "Look to yourself—leave him to me. There's the money."

"All right, I have it."

"Then now depart."

"No, no—not so hurriedly! Place that boy securely somewhere, and then come to me."

Reluctantly Matthew consented.

The boy kicked, and plunged, and struggled, but all was in vain.

In Matthew's hands he was powerless to do anything at all in the shape of resistance that was worthy of the name.

As soon as he had dragged him into the inner room, old Matthew flung the boy into the large easy-chair beside the fire.

At the same moment, with great dexterity, he whipped off his huge apron, and twisted it up like a rope.

This he passed under the boy's chin, and round the back of the chair, where he tied it so tightly that the boy was obliged to cease struggling at once, otherwise he would have been in imminent danger of strangulation.

To fasten his hands was now an easy task, and as he was dumb the necessity for gagging him was done away with.

"He is all right now," Matthew said, as he came out of the parlour and quietly shut the door behind him. "I could never have believed that he was such a little villain."

"He is a dangerous creature indeed," said Dick, "and I should advise you to be very careful how you deal with him. His disposition is malicious—nay, even fiendish, and he would not care to what length he went in order to obtain his revenge."

"I don't fear him," said Matthew, "and just at the present moment you will admit that we have something more important to talk about."

"We have."

"Well, then, captain, as you have got the money safe, let me once more entreat you to depart. Don't think I am anxious to get rid of you. I am only concerned for your safety."

"I know that, old friend. Don't think I misunderstand your notions."

"Consider for a moment," continued the landlord, "how awkward a fix you would be in should you unfortunately be recognised. You have no Black Bess now to carry you clear of your pursuers, only that miserable horse at the door."

"Have you seen it?"

"Yes. I peeped at it through one of the windows upstairs."

"It is a miserable wretch; but then I think I am tolerably safe."

"Well, will you go?"

"I will, Matthew, and many thanks to you for the favour you have done me to-night."

"Pooh—pooh! Don't mention it"

"I shall not forget it, rest assured of that. And now I must ask you to lay me under one more obligation."

"And what is that?"

"Just go to the door, and have a look up and down the street. Tell me whether you see anyone hanging about who looks suspicious—in a word, see whether the coast is clear."

"I will, Dick. That is well thought of."

The landlord hastily made his way to the front of the inn.

He was absent about five minutes; then he returned with a very serious look upon his face.

"What's the matter?" asked Dick, eagerly.

"Why, the coast is not clear."

"Indeed! Who's about?"

"Why, a man who owes me a bitter grudge. He has sworn over and over again to have his revenge. You remember, I daresay, that an officer concealed himself in this cupboard here, and I scalded him well with a kettleful of boiling water?"

"Yes, I remember. He was at the bar, drinking, a moment before you came downstairs."

"To-night?"

"Yes—most certainly to-night—a little while ago."

Old Matthew gave a long, low whistle.

"That's awkward," he said—"very awkward!"

"And what's more," continued Dick, "it's very odd to me if a secret sign or glance of intelligence did not pass between him and that nice little boy of yours."

Old Matthew gave a low groan.

"If that's it, captain, depend upon it it's all's over! You're nabbed—nabbed as sure as you are a living man!"

"How so, Matthew?" said Turpin, feeling fearfully uneasy. "What do you mean?"

"Why, I must tell you that this man was sometime ago dismissed from the police force; but ever since then he has acted as a spy for the rest. His old companions give him a trifle now and then, and he sniffs out information for them."

"A regular spy, in fact?"

"Yes, nothing less, and in consequence of that little trick I served him, he cherishes the most violent hatred against me. I have been told he has frequently declared he will never rest until he has brought about my ruin, and for that reason he is always hanging about in the street."

"You make me very uncomfortable, Matthew," said Dick Turpin. "I hope things are not quite so bad as you make out. He looked keenly at me as I stood beside him at the counter; but I feel pretty sure there was no recognition on his part."

"Well, there may not be," said old Matthew, seeming rather relieved upon receiving this assurance.

"But," continued Dick, "if I had not stopped that boy as I did, you may depend he would not have been in ignorance of my identity by this time."

CHAPTER CMXII.

DICK TURPIN HAS HIS REVENGE UPON THE SPY.

Old Matthew rubbed his head most vigorously, as was his habit when anything occurred of a troublesome nature.

"I wish I knew how to solve the point," he ejaculated, after a brief pause, "but how on earth to discover whether any police officers are lurking outside I know not."

"Is it not possible," said Dick, "that you magnify the danger?"

"In what manner?"

"May it not be that this man is only skulking about outside in his usual fashion?"

"There is a possibility of it."

"You have not seen anything else suspicious, have you?"

"No, nothing more, I saw no trace of officers, and yet, whenever I see him I think they are never far distant."

"And what was he doing?" asked Dick.

"Why, when I first went to the door, I saw nothing, but I stood perfectly still looking about me, then I fancied I heard a slight movement in the cart, and so drew back into the shadow of the doorway as well as I could."

"A noise in the cart?"

"Yes, and immediately afterwards that fellow lowered himself out of it."

"That's very strange," said Dick.

"So I think," returned Matthew. "He must have had some suspicions, or why should he have adopted such a proceeding as that?"

"Curse him!" said Dick, clenching his fists. "I wish I could lay hold of him somehow; I'd put an end to his speaking for some time to come. But for him, no doubt I could have driven off quietly, without anyone being the wiser."

"Very likely indeed," said Matthew; "but I am afraid there's little chance of it now, though I don't wish to say anything to discourage you."

Dick drew a long breath.

"How had I better act, Matthew?" he said, at length.

The landlord shrugged his shoulders.

"I wish I could advise you," he said; "but this is a matter that baffles me altogether. You see, he may have told the officers that he suspected you were only an assumed carter, and if so, they would arrest you on bare suspicion."

"And I suppose," continued Dick, "they would take care not to show themselves until I emerged into the street."

"Decidedly not; and, for aught I know, a dozen of them may be hidden somewhere."

"It bothers me," said Dick—"it bothers me entirely."

Old Matthew began to think.

"Look here," he said, at length, "this is the best thing I can think of."

"Out with it, then."

"I will put on my hat and go outside, take hold of the horse's head, and lead him round the corner, into Clare Market."

"And what good would that do?" said Dick, in some amazement.

"Why, this much: I should have my eyes about me, and if any police officers were concealed I should at once become aware of it, for, don't you see, they would either attempt to prevent me from moving the cart, or else I should see them quit their place of concealment and follow it."

"So you would, Matthew—so you would; that didn't occur to me. But what shall I do in the meanwhile?"

"I will tell you; there will be no difficulty about it."

"I am glad to hear it."

"As soon as I go to the front of the house, listen. If you hear no contention or disturbance—if, in fact, you do not hear me raise my voice—conclude all is well, and just hasten down the passage, and through that door. You will then be in that little yard that is well known to you. Open the other door, and you will find yourself in White Horse Yard. Make your way along it into Clare Market, and look about for me. If you see me, and all is well, I shall be patting the neck of the horse, and stroking it; but if I am not doing so do not show you self, but clear off in the best way you are able."

Dick Turpin was highly delighted with this plan, and congratulated old Matthew upon his ingenuity.

"I can't stop to listen to anything of that sort," he said, as he took his broad-brimmed hat down from a peg. "I will be off, and be sure you listen whether there is a noise outside."

The next moment old Matthew passed through the front door, and Dick listened eagerly.

But the silence was not broken by old Matthew's voice, and almost immediately he heard the wheels begin to revolve.

"All right," he muttered. "What a capital old chap Matthew is, to be sure! That's one thing more that I owe him."

While he was speaking he secured the bag of gold about his person, then, following the instructions he had received, he entered the yard and hastened towards Clare Market as quickly as his legs would carry him.

He felt rather nervous when he first stepped out into White Horse Yard, but that feeling immediately vanished when he found no notice was taken of his appearance.

From this it was only fair to assume that no officers were concealed in that quarter, for if so they would unquestionably pounced upon him.

Feeling much more easy in his mind, he continued on his way, and having reached a dark, obscure corner, paused to look about him.

A moment or two elapsed before he could catch sight of old Matthew. But at length he perceived him, and to his great joy he saw he was patting the horse upon the neck.

"All right," ejaculated Dick, with a sigh of great relief—"all's going well—I have nothing to fear."

With these words on his lips he hastened to the spot where the horse was standing.

"Look out for the spy," said Matthew, as soon as Dick was close to the vehicle; "there's no one besides him about; he has followed me so far at a distance, and I should not be surprised at his following you."

"Shouldn't you?" said Dick. "Then I should. Where is he—can you see him?"

"Yes, there he is, on the other side of the way, standing near that shop; he is pretending to look at the things in the window."

Old Matthew pointed, and Dick immediately perceived the spy standing at no great distance.

"He won't follow me, I'll warrant!" he exclaimed. "Just bring the horse quietly after me, and see how I will dispose of him."

"Captain—captain," said Matthew, "don't be rash—pray don't be rash! Go quietly away, and leave him to me."

But Dick was quite deaf to these words.

He strode rapidly along the street, then crossed directly over to the shop at the window of which the spy was standing.

Late as was the hour, the shops in the neighbourhood were for the most part unclosed, though apparently little business was being done in any of them.

The spy was evidently taken by surprise by these movements on the part of Dick Turpin.

He was conscious of the highwayman's approach, yet knew not exactly whether to stand still or to fly.

He hesitated until it was too late to make a retreat.

Dick clapped his hand upon his shoulder.

The man faced round at once.

"Don't be so fond of prying into my business," said Dick, in a menacing voice, "or it will be the worse for you, and, just to prove that this is no idle threat, I will give you a taste of what you may expect."

It so happened that the shop before which this man was standing was one belonging to a general dealer in provisions.

Not only in the shop and in the window were his articles exposed for sale, but out upon the pavement as well.

Among other things, cheese was piled up, and there was also an enormous box filled to the brim with eggs, beside which one of the shopmen was standing observing the movements of Dick and the spy with great attention.

No sooner were the last words out of Dick Turpin's mouth than, quick as thought, he seized the spy by the nape of his neck and the seat of his breeches.

With an exertion of his utmost strength, Dick lifted him fairly from the ground, and flung him with full force into the box of eggs.

There was a loud cry, an oath, and a fearful crash.

Then the body of the spy almost completely disappeared, for the eggs gave way immediately beneath his weight.

Dick did not stop to see any more—he knew the sooner he beat a retreat the better.

By this time Matthew had brought the horse close to the shop, and Dick, with extraordinary speed, ascended to his seat and set the horse in motion.

The shopman, who had witnessed the whole transaction, ran forward with the intention of stopping the cart, but old Matthew placed himself full before him.

"Ten pounds," he said—"ten pounds, Tom, if you keep quiet! You know me. Just make it as hot for the fellow as you can—I owe him a grudge."

The man thus addressed looked rather amazed for a moment, but he knew old Matthew perfectly well, and felt certain he would be as good as his word.

Accordingly, he turned round, and, addressing the poor wretch who was struggling vainly in the box to release himself, said:

"You rascal! What do you mean by this? You shall suffer for it! Here—here! police—police!"

A crowd immediately assembled, though where the people came from so suddenly seemed a mystery.

Just as the cart turned round the corner of the street, Dick looked back, and then he had the satisfaction of beholding the spy still kicking and struggling in his efforts to liberate himself from his unpleasant position.

CHAPTER CM:XIII

IN WHICH THE SPY ACQUAINTS THE POLICE OFFICERS WITH HIS SUSPICIONS.

Old Matthew, perceiving how ready the shopman was to take the hint that had been given him, drew aside.

He wished most particularly to watch the ensuing proceedings, yet he did not desire to appear to be mixed up in any of them.

A hundred voices began to ask at once what was the matter, but no one seemed in a position to reply.

Rattles were sprung, watchmen came hurrying forward, and lusty throats bawled out for the police.

"Pull me out," roared the man in the box—"pull me out, I say! Won't one of you lend me a hand?"

"Let him alone," said the shopman, as several hastened forward in answer to the appeal—"let him alone, can't you? He's safe prisoner where he is, that's one comfort."

The crowd drew back, and so the spy was thrown upon his own resources.

His furious struggles, however, only served to break more of the eggs, and the consequence was, that instead of getting out of the box at all, he kept gradually sinking lower and lower down into it.

At last, when the confusion had reached its height, a couple of police officers came hastily round the corner.

The people made way for them, and no sooner did they pause in front of the shop than they immediately recognised the spy.

"Seize him," cried the shopman—"seize him! He's a desperate character! Don't let go of him on any account!"

"Why," said one police officer, stopping suddenly short, and gazing with surprise into the countenance of his companion—"why, it's Jackson!"

"Yes, d—n it, it is Jackson, sure enough!" roared the spy. "Help me out, can't you? Don't stand there like a couple of idiots!"

"Come—come, you had better not be abusive. What does it all mean?"

"Pull me out, and I'll tell you pretty quickly."

The officers thought fit to comply with this demand, and by their joint exertions the spy was released from his uncomfortable position.

"Now, then," cried one of the officers, addressing the shopman, "what's this all about? Just explain it!"

"Bah!" said the spy. "Don't be a fool, Brown—don't be a fool!"

"What do you mean?"

"Why, I speak plain enough! Here, come closer—I want to whisper something. There—there, what do you think of that?"

The spy whispered something in the ear of Brown, the police officer, which caused that worthy emissary of the law fairly to stagger back.

Then a loud shout of laughter came from the crowd as they perceived the plight Jackson was in.

He had truly taken a most uncomfortable bath, and as the eggs exposed for sale were none of the freshest, a by no means pleasant odour exhaled from him.

"What did he say, Brown?" gasped the other police officer.

"Why, he says that a few minutes ago either Dick Turpin or one of his comrades was here disguised as a carter, and it was in consequence of his recognition that he was pushed back into the egg-chest as we found him."

[DICK TURPIN HURLS THE SPY INTO THE EGG-CHEST.]

Nothing would content the shopman but having Jackson hauled off to the police station, and there charged with doing wilful damage to his property.

The officers in vain protested that it was all nonsense; the shopman was obstinate, and so they accordingly went.

The matter was hurried over as quickly as possible, and then the spy was questioned more closely as to the intelligence he had given.

When he set forth the details, he was met with general disbelief; and when asked pointedly by what means he had recognised Dick Turpin he was forced to admit that he was not quite confident, but he merely suspected that the carter was the highwayman in disguise, and for this suspicion he could give no other reason than that he had seen him in conversation with old Matthew, the landlord of the White Horse.

Still, that was deemed sufficiently important to warrant them in setting out in pursuit of the driver of the cart, and arresting him, if only on the charge of committing an assault upon Jackson.

By the time they had arrived at this resolution, however, a considerable period had elapsed.

The cart had vanished, and no one was in a position to say which way it had gone.

To look for it in any of the myriad streets of London seemed an idle task.

And so the officers felt, although they set about it.

But let it be clearly understood that, if they had known for certain that the carter really was Dick in disguise, their measures would have been of a much more energetic character, and it is quite possible that by making close inquiries and sending out in all directions they might have got upon his track.

This was not done, however.

Only one party of officers went out in pursuit, and these made little progress, for although they inquired in every direction, they were unable to meet with a single person who could recollect seeing a cart such as they described.

The fact was, Dick, with a boldness to which he certainly owed his safety, had gone straight in the direction of Bow Street, which carried him past the front of old Drury Lane Theatre.

Here the scene was one of tremendous commotion.

The King had gone that night to see the play, and the house was consequently crowded by a highly-fashionable audience.

The street was literally choked up with vehicles.

Amid the general confusion and excitement, Dick was unnoticed as he steadily wound his way in and out through the throng until he got into a clearer street.

Then, lashing his horse, he made him put forth his utmost rate of speed.

Now, if Dick had obeyed the very natural impulse to turn down any one of the quiet streets in the neighbourhood the officers would, in all probability, have got upon his track, as the passage of the vehicle through any one of them must have been seen by some person or other.

He made his way directly westward, but while he journeyed on his thoughts were busy.

He had more causes than one for gratification.

Maud and Black Bess he knew to be in perfect safety, he had performed his errand without accident, and had in his possession a sufficient sum of money to satisfy the Governor of Newgate.

He had also made old Matthew aware of the fact that he had a traitor beneath his roof.

Another consideration, however, now presented itself to Dick's mind, and while he reflected upon it he allowed his horse to proceed very slowly.

Morning, he saw, was yet some hours distant, and the question occurred to him whether he should not avail himself of the present opportunity and secure the bag of gold.

He had fully intended to hasten back to Maud; but then, on his return journey, he might meet with danger, and the bag of money might be lost.

Now he was at no great distance from Hampstead Heath, and by turning off to the right he could reach there in little more than half an hour.

To bury the gold would be the work of a few moments only; then from that point he would be able to make his way to Somefield, where he had appointed to overtake Maud.

"Yes," he said, at length, "that shall be it. My mind is made up. Who can tell how long a time may elapse before I have so good a chance of burying this money as I have now?"

While he spoke the words, he turned abruptly down a dark narrow lane with which he was not very well acquainted, but which, nevertheless, he believed would take him near the point he wished to reach.

This lane was quite deserted, and no wonder, for its condition was disgraceful.

So deep was the mire that the tired horse could hardly struggle through it.

In consequence of this the journey to Hampstead Heath occupied a much longer period than Dick had calculated upon.

At length he paused upon the verge of the vast open space.

It was now necessary to take an observation before proceeding further.

The heath itself appeared to stretch for miles before him in the darkness, and although he turned his eyes in every direction he failed to perceive the glimmering of a single light.

Having formed a tolerably correct idea of his position, Dick turned to the right, and when he paused again it was close to the tree he had described so particularly to the Governor.

And, indeed, the appearance of this tree was so singular that it could not fail to be recognised by anyone who took the trouble to look for it.

Through a low opaque portion of the cloud which covered the sky, the moon sent forth a subdued, misty light, which Dick hailed with pleasure, as it would be of great assistance to him in carrying out his proceedings.

First of all, he stood for several moments in a listening attitude.

The silence was profound, and, without any great stretch of imagination, he could have believed that he was thousands of miles away from any of his fellow-creatures.

The horse seemed quite content to stop, for, bending down his head, he commenced eating with great voraciousness the grass that was growing everywhere around.

CHAPTER CMXIV.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN RECEIVES SOME DISINTERESTED ADVICE.

Finding all around him so very still, Dick Turpin determined not to lose any more time, but to commence digging a hole in the ground forthwith.

He was but ill provided with tools for this purpose; yet, by using his hands and a knife, he managed in a short space of time to scrape out a considerable quantity of earth.

This being done, he carefully placed the bag in the hole, filled it up with dirt, and carefully pressed down the surface so as to restore it to its original condition.

Once, when he paused in the midst of his labours, he fancied he heard a slight sound close at hand.

He listened immediately; but as it was not repeated he concluded his fancy had misled him.

At last, when all was finished, he rose from his knees, and, as he did so, he felt certain that he caught sight of a dim, shadowy figure in the distance.

A cry of vexation and anger escaped his lips.

There could be no doubt all his proceedings had been watched by some one, and that some one, whoever he might be, would beyond doubt take the first opportunity, after Dick's departure, to try and ascertain what had been buried so carefully among the roots of the old tree.

For a wonder, Dick was at a loss what to do on the spur of the moment, and this hesitation, brief as it was, deprived him of the chance he had of rushing forward and suddenly seizing the intruder.

Now, when he looked all around, nothing but the broad expanse of heath met his view.

"Confound it!" he said to himself. "What shall I do now? To attempt to find him would be perfectly idle. He could dodge me till daybreak. I must think a little while."

By way of assisting himself in this operation, he took hold of the reins, and forced his horse to quit his meal, and while he was doing so a bright idea entered his brain.

"I will drive off," he muttered, "and pretend to take no notice, and when I have gone a little way I will descend from the cart, and creep stealthily here on foot. Then, no doubt, he will be thrown off his guard, and I shall be able to seize him."

This resolve was no sooner made than it was carried out, though, at present, Dick had no very clear idea of what he was to do after he had succeeded in capturing the man who, he imagined, had watched his movements.

Despite the danger of such a course, Dick drove across the heath, preferring to do so to trusting to any of the bad roads that intercepted it.

On the soft turf the progress of the cart made scarcely a sound—at any rate, he felt certain that no one could hear it at a distance of a few yards.

Having gone far enough as he imagined to answer his purpose, he stopped the horse and descended.

He was not afraid that the animal would stray far—it would be only too glad of the opportunity to renew its feast.

Shrinking low down to the ground, Dick then swiftly, yet noiselessly, made his way back again to the old tree.

As he neared it his speed abated, and his caution increased.

When only a few yards distant, he stopped altogether, and, placing his hands up to his eyes in order to see more distinctly, he strove to pierce the gloom.

Then he saw, or fancied he saw, close to the trunk of the old tree, the figure of a man kneeling down as he had knelt, and busily engaged in digging up the earth.

The longer he gazed the more confident he felt that he had not made any mistake, so, creeping still closer, and watching for a favourable opportunity, he made a sudden bound upon the stranger, who little suspected his return.

A yell of fear broke the silence that had for so long reigned around the spot.

The man, finding himself in the grasp of some one, trembled from head to foot, and would have fallen to the ground had not Dick held him up.

"Who are you?" he roared. "Let me see your face? Why are you here?"

"Oh, mercy!" said a voice, in humble tones. "Do have mercy upon me—pray do!"

"I know that voice," said Dick, peering intently into the stranger's face, "and yet surely it must be a mistake."

"No, no—not any mistake," was the reply, "for I knew your voice now, captain. It's all right. Mr. Bradbury, at your service."

Dick released his hold instantly.

"You have cause to be thankful that you have escaped so well. I am generally hasty in my movements, and not very particular as to what I do. However, I'm glad it's all right."

The Governor grunted and rubbed himself very vigorously with both his hands at the back of his neck, for Dick's grasp had been by no means a tender one.

"Oh!" he said, "you gave me a dreadful fright—an awful fright!"

"Indeed! How so?"

"I will tell you. I don't mind confessing that this tree has haunted my imagination ever since you spoke to me about it, and it has only been by the exercise of great self-command that I have kept myself from paying a visit to this spot for so long, but to-night I felt impelled to make my way here. I could not resist the temptation."

"And you saw me digging here, I suppose?" said Dick.

"I fancied so," said the Governor, "but could not make sure. I didn't know whether to advance and make myself known, or remain in concealment, and while I was debating this point in my mind you got up into the cart and drove away."

"Well, and then?"

"Why, I thought the best thing I could do was to possess myself of the treasure, and make haste back to London, so I began to dig, as you see."

"And did you not guess that I had returned?"

"No," said the Governor—"not for a moment. I believed some other person had been watching, and, having seen all that had been done, had come forward with the intention of appropriating the money himself."

"I see, and hence your alarm. Well, you have good cause for gratification. The money you will find perfectly safe, tied up in a leather bag, and I hope the amount will satisfy your expectations."

"You have just placed it there, of course?" said the Governor, inquiringly.

"You had better not trouble yourself to make any inquiries upon that point," said Dick. "Let it suffice that you find the money where I told you you would. I may have come to-night merely to make sure that the money was safe, you understand."

The Governor said "Yes," but it is questionable whether he really understood what Dick meant or not

"Well, captain," he added, after a short pause, "there's been a tremendous commotion in Newgate, I can assure you!"

"No doubt."

"I confess that I have been in a perpetual state of fever ever since your departure. I have trembled for your safety."

Dick smiled.

"I am all right, you see, and well able to take care of myself. I was by Bow Street police station a little while ago, but things seemed quiet enough there."

The Governor repeated the words in a tone of incredulous amazement.

"It's quite true," said Dick, carelessly, "and I daresay you will hear something of it when you get back to London."

"You are too rash," said the Governor—"much too rash! You tempt your fate. I am much obliged to you for your behaviour to me, for a little extra money will be of the greatest utility to me at the present moment. I like you, captain—indeed I do!"

"I am glad to hear it."

"And in proof of it," added the Governor, coming a step closer, "I will give you a word of advice, and I only hope you will have sufficient good sense to act in accordance with it."

"Well," said Dick, "I am prepared to listen to any suggestion you like to make, but I cannot pledge myself to act in accordance with it."

"Well, then, my advice is not only to you, but to all your companions, to take the very first opportunity you can find of leaving England. It is truly too hot to hold you, and so you will find to your cost."

Dick uttered a half-impatient exclamation.

"You receive my advice with disdain," said the Governor, with a slightly-mortified air. "But, then, I know very well good advice is generally thrown away. This is good advice, as anyone would tell you who had considered your position. If you were only a little careful, you could manage to get down somewhere on the south coast, and there engage a fisherman at some quiet spot or other to take you across the channel. He could run you ashore on some lonely part of the coast of France, and there you would be perfectly safe."

"Well—well," said Dick, thoughtfully, "I am ready to admit that the advice you have given is well worthy of consideration, and rest assured that when I meet my comrades the next time I will suggest it to them. For the present we must say farewell, and I hope, without meaning any offence to you, that we shall never meet again."

"Farewell, captain!" said the Governor. "I do not echo your wish, for, as I said before, I rather like you; but if we do meet, I really hope it will be in some place where you are in safety."

"Thanks for the wish," said Dick. "And now again good-bye! Dig a little deeper, and you will find the reward I promised you. In spite of obstacles from which most men would have shrunk back with alarm, Dick Turpin has been as good as his word."

He turned abruptly upon his heel as he spoke, and vanished almost immediately from the sight of the Governor, who, without further delay, dropped down upon his knees again, and resumed his task of digging beneath the tree.

CHAPTER CMXV.

DESCRIBES THE STRANGE ADVENTURE THAT DICK MET WITH ON HIS WAY TO SOMEFIELD.

Dick had some little difficulty in finding the cart, but not much; and, having succeeded, he once more climbed into his seat, and set the horse in motion.

The night had been an unusually dark one, and now, strangely enough, although daybreak was approaching, it positively grew darker, so that Dick had to make his way with the greatest caution—in fact, he trusted more to the instinct of his horse to keep him clear of any obstructions in the path than he did to his own eyesight. Consequently the heath was crossed in safety, and when once he emerged upon the road, Dick felt in a position to resume the command.

Applying the whip unsparingly, he induced the wretched animal to make something like tolerable progress along the road.

It was still necessary to keep a sharp look-out, although Dick was perfectly familiar with every object around—in fact, there were few parts round London that he was better acquainted with than with this.

In order to reach Somefield, it was necessary to travel by the Oxford Road, without a considerable circuit was made.

Now Dick felt by no means inclined to adopt this course.

There was danger, to be sure, in venturing along such a well-frequented high-road; but then, on the other hand, the hour was one when few people were likely to be travelling, and he hoped, by making an effort, to get so far by daybreak as to be able to make the rest of his way through the narrow, winding lanes.

This, then, was the course he adopted, and, as he had correctly anticipated, he journeyed on and on for miles without so much as catching a glimpse of a human being.

When the Oxford Road was fairly reached, his rate of progress became much accelerated, for the ground was firm and smooth beneath the horse's feet.

In this manner he continued without meeting with the slightest interruption until day began to dawn.

Huge masses of white mist hung over all the meadows, and so obstructed the view that it was not possible to see for any great distance.

By degrees the morning broke clearer and brighter.

Dick plied the whip with renewed energy, for he had not got so far upon his journey by this time as he hoped.

The sun rose, and found him descending into a hollow, very disagreeable piece of roadway, and one that was detested by every traveller.

The road was formed down the declivious sides of two long, high hills, which formed indeed a most delightful valley.

Owing to the deep shadows cast by the trees that grew luxuriantly near the foot of these hills, the bottom or lowest part of the road was almost plunged in gloom, and it was here that many an ambush had been laid for passing travellers.

Now the valley was almost filled with the white, fleecy mist of which we have spoken.

But the sun, rising higher and higher, gradually dispelled it.

It rolled away in huge, undulating masses, until at length the sun, appearing above the summit of the hill, poured down a full flood of golden light.

The scene then was one of real beauty, and there were few indeed who could look upon it without sensations of admiration.

Dick was not one of them, and as, after reaching the bottom of the descent, he commenced to urge his horse up the precipitous hill before him, he looked around him with feelings of real delight.

By chance, when about three-parts up this hill, he glanced upwards, and then beheld a sight which filled him with the greatest astonishment—so much so that he unconsciously pulled the rein, and the horse, feeling the check, stopped at once.

Of this circumstance he also remained in ignorance, for all his faculties were bound up in watching what he saw on the brow of the hill above.

First he saw, with extraordinary distinctness, the figure of a man on horseback.

It needed not a second glance to enable Dick to recognise this horseman; it was his old comrade, Sixteen-String Jack.

Suddenly another horseman appeared in sight, and a greeting of the warmest description then took place between them.

This other horseman was Claude Duval; Dick recognised him perfectly.

He sat where he was like a man in a dream.

Dick saw Claude raise his riding-whip and point in a certain direction.

Sixteen-String Jack turned his head to look, and some laughing remark appeared to be exchanged.

But what filled Dick with the greatest surprise was that there seemed a kind of mistiness and unreality about the figures which he thus beheld.

He thought it strange that, being on the brow of the hill as they were then, and with their horses' heads turned towards him, that they did not observe his presence.

Dick resolved to make himself known, and shouted.

His voice, clear and loud, rang out with great distinctness in the valley, and most certainly the sound must have reached the ears of any persons above.

To Dick's amazement, however, not the slightest notice was taken by Claude and Jack.

He shouted again and again, but with no better effect than before.

Wondering at so strange a circumstance, and feeling a kind of awe in his breast, he gazed again in silence, in order to make sure that his senses were not deceiving him.

No, there could be no mistake—Claude and Jack were surely there.

Having come to this conclusion, he once more raised his whip and started his horse.

At a clumsy half-canter, half-gallop, the tired beast struggled up the remainder of the hill.

When within about a hundred yards or more of the top, Dick shouted again, and at the precise moment when the sound escaped his lips the two figures instantly vanished, so suddenly that it was impossible to say in what direction they had gone.

They seemed to be annihilated in the twinkling of an eye.

More puzzled still, Dick continued his course upward.

"They have gone down the hill on the other side," he said—"yes, that must be it. But how suddenly they went—they seemed to dissolve into the air; and their horses' heads were turned in this direction. It's very strange!"

The more Dick thought about it the more uncomfortable he felt.

A kind of nameless fear came creeping slowly over him, until it obtained entire possession of his faculties.

It was then that he reached the summit of the hill.

A glorious sight indeed lay before him.

For miles and miles a most beautiful landscape could be beheld—a landscape only dotted here and there with trees, and for the most part composed of meadows, which displayed every shade of green.

But this prospect, although so magnificent, was unheeded by the highwayman, upon whose countenance an expression of amazement—not to say horror—gradually settled.

And no wonder, for neither down the broad high-road which he could see extending far below the bottom of the hill, nor in the meadows on either side of it, could he perceive the least trace of his comrades.

He rubbed his eyes, and began to wonder whether he was really in his right senses.

But, so far as he could judge, everything around bore an accustomed and natural aspect.

Where, then, had his comrades gone?

Most certainly not down the high-road. Upon that point there could not possibly be two opinions, for such was its length that they had not had sufficient time to reach the bottom even if they had urged their horses to the utmost gallop, which was an unlikely thing for them to do, in consequence of the precipitous character of the descent.

Neither had they leaped over any of the hedges, for the smooth meadows offered no concealment whatever, and had they done so Dick must infallibly have perceived them.

The longer he stood on the brow of the hill, and the more he comprehended all these circumstances, the more did his wonder increase.

He was not more certain of his own existence than he was that he had seen Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack only a few fleeting moments ago occupying the very space of ground on which he now stood.

Now the keenest and most piercing eye would altogether have failed in descrying them anywhere.

There were no hiding-places anywhere near.

The smooth, velvet-like pasture-land was not broken anywhere by so much as a furrow.

They were not concealed behind any hedgerow, for these were all unusually low and bare of leaves, so that it was easy to see completely through them.

As the mystery of his friends' disappearance increased, a cold, uncomfortable feeling spread itself all over Dick's frame, and he felt as though some icy object had been placed in contact with his heart.

There was only one conclusion that he could adopt that offered anything approaching to a solution of this mysterious affair, and that conclusion Dick was most reluctant to adopt, though, in a manner of speaking, he was driven to it.

The beings he had seen upon the summit of the hill were not of this earth, they were not living creatures at flesh and blood like himself, but unsubstantial phantoms.

Had they not been, how could they possibly have so completely disappeared in such a brief space of time?

CHAPTER CMXVI.

IN WHICH DICK FINDS HIS PERILS AND PERPLEXITIES INCREASING.

DICK TURPIN pulled off his hat and wiped away the cold, death-like drops of perspiration that had gathered there upon his brow.

He looked around him, but he saw nothing but what served to make him feel more conclusively than ever that he had met with a supernatural adventure.

And what could so strange, so unparalleled an event portend?

Was it the precursor of danger to himself, or of peril to his comrades?

He doubted not there was some good reason why he had thus so suddenly and strangely been brought face to face with two of his companions.

But what the reason was baffled him entirely.

If he had chosen to interpret it as the harbinger of peril to himself he would have appeared to be correct, for now, as his eyes wandered along the broad level highroad, he caught sight of a body of police officers, who evidently were riding forward at the best speed they could make.

Dick quitted his exposed situation at once, and with all his faculties aroused by this fresh danger he debated within himself which would be the best course for him now to adopt.

In the space of a few minutes the officers would arrive at the top of the hill. What, then, should he do in the meantime?

Flight was out of the question; he felt that so conclusively that he abandoned the idea almost as soon as it was formed.

With such a miserable horse as he now possessed, the police officers would have no trouble in overtaking him, nor would he have the least chance if he trusted to his own fleetness of foot.

He could think of no other course that offered the slightest chance of safety save that of endeavouring to assume with what perfection he could the character he had undertaken to play.

Accordingly, carefully placing his hat once more upon his head, he took his seat in front of the cart.

Then he urged his horse onward, hoping that he might pass through the ranks of the officers without danger.

This, however, was a hope scarcely to be indulged in.

The disguise had already served him well on many occasions, but then that was during the night, and many things which pass muster in an artificial light would be instantly detected by day.

The question was, then, would the officers look so particularly at him or take so much notice of him as he drove quietly past as to penetrate his disguise.

He could only trust not, and drive quietly on.

This course he carried out, hanging his head down upon his breast and appearing as if half asleep.

Furtively, however, from time to time he glanced at the officers, who were now very close at hand indeed, but not so close as he had anticipated, for they had reduced their speed.

They were permitting their exhausted horses to ascend the hill at a walking pace.

The officers were talking. Dick could hear their voices floating distinctly on the still, calm morning air.

Another moment and he was able to tell the precise words they made use of.

"As I live," said one of them, "it's the same rascal! I'll swear to him and his brute on four legs at any minute."

"And I'll swear to the cart," said another.

"Curse his impudence," added a third. "I firmly believe he sent us out of our way on purpose. If I only felt sure of it he should pay dearly for the act."

"Rely upon it it was done on purpose," said another. "Tom King would very likely throw him a guinea and bid him be silent—at any rate, let us take him in custody."

"Agreed—seize him at once—we'll have a prisoner of some sort. I am determined not to have all my night's work for nothing!"

It was the police officer in command who spoke these last words

Can anyone form a remote idea of the state of Dick Turpin's mind as he overheard this conversation?

There was no time left for him to act or even to think; the officers were now close upon him, and several of them, spurring their horses, dashed forward, and in a moment surrounded the cart.

One and all drew their pistols, presenting them full at Dick's head, while another saved him the trouble of stopping the horse by seizing hold of its bridle.

The cart came to a standstill.

Dick looked up in well-affected amazement.

It was a bold thing for him to do, but he did it, for he had a reason.

The officers saw his face, but they failed to recognise him.

"Surrender," they cried—"you are our prisoner!"

"P—p—p—prisoner?" said Dick, stammeringly, and pretending to tremble with fright.

"Yes; and now surrender! If you resist, you are a dead man!"

Resistance indeed was vain, and Dick did not attempt it; but with a wonderful coolness and presence of mind he continued to act in accordance with his assumed character.

"B—but, gentlemen," he said, touching his hat at every word—"gentlemen all, what have I done? I haven't been stealing."

"No, you have not been stealing," was the answer; "but you recollect us, don't you—you remember when you saw us before?"

"Yes—yes; Captain was down."

"Yes; and you gave us false information as to the road the highwayman took. That's felony, and you shall be punished for it! Come down off your perch; we'll have the darbies on you in a jiffey!"

Dick hesitated, and pretended to do so from fright; but it was in order to decide upon his next actions.

Clearly he could not better his situation by remaining where he was; and therefore, slowly and reluctantly, and with many expressions of terror and shakes of the head, he clumsily got up, and as clumsily began to descend from his vehicle.

But the officers were impatient, and seizing him rudely, pulled him down into the road. Then, with great expertness, one of them clapped the handcuffs over his wrists.

So suddenly was this done, that even Dick was taken at unawares.

He had not quite made up his mind whether he should submit to being handcuffed or not.

Now it was too late; his wrists were fast.

The officer evidently thought he had performed a very clever, dexterous feat, for he laughed exultingly as he said:

"There, now, my fine fellow, what do you think of that? How do you feel now?"

Dick pretended to cry.

"Let me off," he said—"oh, do let me off, and I will do anything you like! I did tell you wrong, I know I did; but, then, I was afraid I should have my braine blown out!"

"Eh? What?" said the chief officer, at this moment. "Why were you afraid of that?"

"Why—why, sir, if you please," said Dick, "if you will only let me off, I will tell you the whole truth."

"Well, well, tell it."

"But will you let me off afterwards?"

"Silence!" said the officer who stood next to him, accompanying the words with such a thump, that Dick felt as though all the breath was suddenly jerked out of his body—"silence! What do you mean by speaking like that? Mind your manners."

Dick pretended to be still more humble and contrite.

"I am very sorry, sir," he said—"very sorry, but I was mortally frightened!"

"Who by? Why don't you tell all, as you promised?"

"Well, so I will, your worship. You must understand when that fellow came galloping along, he saw me in the cart, and he pulled up all of a sudden like."

"Yes, yes."

"Then he swore an awful oath, and he said that the grabs was behind, and swore again that if I so much as opened my mouth to say which way he had gone, he would certainly find it out, and blow my brains out, if it was a year to come. He looked at me, and said he should know me again."

"And so, on those grounds, you gave us false information, eh?" said the police officer.

"Yes, yes, I have."

"Well, then, my fine fellow, you have been clever enough to admit your guilt; and let me tell you all you have just said will be used against you in evidence. You heard me give the caution, of course?"

"Oh, yes, yes," said the officers, in chorus, though not a word in the shape of caution had been spoken.

"But won't you let me off?" said Dick, more ruefully than ever. "I have told you the truth. Why don't you let me off?"

"We'll let you off this far," said the officer, with a wink: "We'll carry you straight before Squire Bartlett, who lives near at hand, and he will take charge of you. We would take you with us to London, only we have more important matters on hand."

Dick Turpin put in a wild, incoherent, terrified appeal.

It produced no effect whatever upon the officers.

They were, indeed, without exception, quite rejoiced to think that they had succeeded in making a prisoner of some sort or other. It consoled them, in a very great measure, for the disappointment they had experienced throughout the night.

CHAPTER CMXVII.

DICK TURPIN IS CARRIED BEFORE SQUIRE BARTLETT, AND COMMITTED.

Even in such a perilous and trying position as this, Dick was able to find some slight amount of consolation, although it was so slight that probably anyone else would have passed it over altogether.

But he had heard the officers express their intention of not taking him to London, but simply of conducting him before some country justice of the peace.

He was very careful, however, not to allow any signs of the satisfaction this afforded him to appear in his countenance, lest this should arouse the now dormant suspicions of his captors.

Indeed, he was not a little amazed himself to discover that his disguise stood such close scrutiny.

He had not dared to hope that the result would prove so favourable. On the contrary, he had made up his mind that his detection would follow as a matter of course.

The chief reason, however, why he was not recognised consisted in the fact that the officers' minds were fully impressed with the idea that he was a carter and nothing else.

They had seen him on a preceding occasion going towards London, and now they met him returning, and to all appearance quite unconcerned.

That this could be Dick Turpin was an idea so monstrous and extravagant that it never for one moment crossed their minds; indeed, it may be safely said it would be the very last thing they would think of.

And so, as it never occurred to them to suspect that the carter was not what he professed to be, Dick stood in slight danger of discovery now.

The only thing that would betray him would be any forgetfulness or oversight on his part.

If for one moment he spoke in his own natural voice, detection would follow.

In a matter of this kind, however, Dick was not likely to be careless; and, moreover, the character he was playing was the one of all others which he could sustain with the best ability, for during his early life he had lived far in the country, and had had daily opportunities of noting the peculiarities of the labouring man.

Accordingly, although the eyes of so many of his enemies were directed upon him, Dick Turpin was unknown.

The residence of the squire they had mentioned was very close at hand—indeed, almost in sight of where they stood, and towards it they now made their way.

The horse and cart were also valiantly taken prisoners and led along towards the justice's.

Many were the jokes made and laughs raised at Dick's expense, but he showed no signs of merriment or resentment on his countenance.

He kept up a perpetual appeal to be let off, alleging various reasons for not being brought before the squire.

To all of these the officers turned a deaf ear, though they served them as materials for sport.

At length, breasting the hill, Dick looked around, and perceived a large, substantially-built white mansion, situated very pleasantly upon the declivity of the hill.

This he doubted not was the residence of Squire Bartlett, and he shortly after found that his conjecture was quite correct.

Although the hour was such an early one, thin wreaths of smoke could be seen curling from some of the chimneys, and the officers noted this with great satisfaction.

As the distance was not great, and all the way downhill, it was soon performed.

They clamoured loudly at the lodge gates, and were admitted.

While the little procession made its way up the winding avenue leading to the house, Dick's reflections were by no means of a pleasant character.

He was as yet not very far from London, and it was quite possible that this country justice might by his inquiries find out that he was only disguised, or he might be clever enough to recognise him.

At any rate, Dick felt that he had an ordeal of no trifling kind to pass through.

But he endeavoured to nerve himself for it as best he could.

The officers made their way round to the back of the house, and, after much knocking, were admitted into a kind of court-yard.

Here they alighted from their steeds, and a few servants, who were up at that early hour, issued from various doors, all filled with curiosity to know the meaning of this strange arrival.

"Is his worship here?" asked the officer in command.

"Yes," replied the servant he addressed.

"Then tell him he's wanted immediately."

"I can't."

"Why not?"

"He's in bed."

"Well, wake him."

"It's more than my head's worth, or yours either."

"Pooh, pooh—nonsense—nothing of the kind!" said the officer. "We have a prisoner of great importance, and it is necessary that he should be examined without delay, so call his worship up at once! Say I am here—Davis, the police officer from London."

At this moment one of the upper windows was thrown open with great violence, and a nightcapped head appeared.

"Oh, law!" exclaimed the servant—"there's his worship! Now there'll be a row!"

"Hallo—hallo!" said the justice, in very gruff, choleric tones—"what's the meaning of this infernal row at this hour in the morning? I'll have you all committed to prison! Be off—be off at once!"

"Your worship," said the officer in command, taking off his hat, and speaking with great respect, "I am very sorry to disturb you, but I have a prisoner here of very great importance indeed, and I want you to order him into safe custody."

"Can't, then! You must wait till twelve o'clock!"

"But it's impossible, your worship!" said the police officer. "We are in pursuit of Tom King, and we charge this man here with being his accomplice, for he gave us false information during the night."

"Tom King, did you say?" said the justice.

"Yes, the notorious highwayman!"

"Catch him, then—catch him! I'll add fifty pounds to the reward myself! O—n the fellow's impudence—he robbed a sister of mine in a stage-coach some time ago! Wait a minute, and I will be with you. Go into the justicing-room."

The squire, now all afire, withdrew himself from the window, and the servants, having heard his words, no longer scrupled to show the officers the way to the justicing-room.

This was a large empty apartment on the ground floor of the mansion, that had about as cheerless a look as any room well could.

A rude table was placed on a raised platform at one end, and above that was a large arm-chair.

Some little delay took place; but by the time the officers had settled themselves in this apartment, the magistrate, with his nightcap on, and wrapped up in a dressing-gown of an alarming pattern, stalked in, and took his seat in the arm-chair already mentioned.

"Where is this fellow?" he said. "Oh, there he is! Why, I can see what he's capable of with half an eye. Where's my clerk? Not here, of course. I'll discharge him. Mr. Officer!"

"Yes, your worship."

"I'll commit him—I'll commit him at once. I'll write out the committal now, and you can have him locked up in the cage and kept safe."

"But—but," said Dick, playing his part still with admiration—"but—but, your worship, I told him the truth, all about it, and he said——"

"Silence, you ruffian!" bawled the justice. "How dare you interrupt the proceedings in the court? What's your villanous name? Speak the truth, now!"

"What's your name?" said the officer who stood nearest to Dick, and who, while he spoke, gave him a tremendous smack on his back. "Why don't you speak when his worship speaks to you?"

Dick's fingers instinctively curled up, and he felt the greatest disposition in the world to knock the officer down.

But with a great effort he controlled this impulse, and after much stammering and stuttering, said:

"John."

"John—John," said the magistrate—"of course his name's John, and Smith's his other name, or if it isn't it'd do as well as any. There you are. Lock him up; d—n him, it's like his impudence to fetch a justice out of bed at this hour in the morning, when there are no fires alight, and disturbing his rest. But wait till the rascal comes before me again—I'll let him know what's what!"

And with this vague threat the magistrate put a paper into the officer's hand, upon which was scrawled some words that would have puzzled a lawyer to decipher, and having done so, he made his retreat in a very hasty and undignified manner.

Dick was perfectly amazed at the manner in which the proceedings were carried on, and wondered whether that was the way in which the squire generally meted out justice.

He was not allowed much opportunity for speculating on this or any other topic, for the officers proceeded to hustle him off.

"What are you going to do? Where are you going to take me? Didn't I promise to tell you the truth, and haven't I done so?"

"Oh, stop your row!" said the chief officer—"we have wasted too much time already. Come on—you will soon know what we intend to do with you."

CHAPTER CMXVIII.

DICK TURPIN IS HANDED OVER TO THE CUSTODY OF THE PARISH CONSTABLE AND HIS ASSISTANT.

With these words, the police officer very unceremoniously bundled Dick out of the justicing-room, and, after traversing several other apartments and a corridor, reached at length the yard, where the horses were waiting.

By the directions of their chief, the officers mounted—all save two, who placed themselves on each side of the prisoner.

In this manner they commenced their march, Dick wondering to what sort of a place of confinement they would consign him.

He was not kept very long in doubt, for, going down a narrow, winding lane that skirted a large and dense preserve, they came all at once upon a sleepy-looking little village that was entirely shut in from observation on one side by the sloping hill, and on the other by the preserve just mentioned.

On that clear, sunshiny morning, however, almost every place looked beautiful, and in particular this little village looked charming.

Early as was the hour, the inhabitants were or the most part astir, and the unusual fact of the approach of a body of horsemen quickly became known, so that by the time the first house in the village was reached quite a large crowd had assembled to greet them.

All looked inquiringly upon the officers and their prisoner, but did not venture to make any remark.

The chief officer, however, in a loud voice called out for the parish constable, and as soon as the words were pronounced a little fat man came bustling through the crowd, and rummaging with his hand in one of his coat pockets as he did so.

The reason for this quickly became apparent, for, withdrawing his hand, he produced a little black staff about eight inches in length, with a gilt crown on the top of it, which was the badge of his authority and office.

"Here I am," he said—"here I am, at your service."

"We have a prisoner here," said the chief officer, "who has been duly committed by the squire, and he must be looked after with particular care and attention. We give him into your charge."

"All right," said the constable, with a pompous air—"all right! I will take care of him, never fear. But what a desperate-looking character he is!"

"Yes—you had better be careful. Shall you take him single-handed?"

"No, no—not if I know it!" cried the constable, and, as he spoke, he faced round and continued: "Simon—Simon, you rascal, where have you got to this blessed morning? Simon, I say! Curse you, you are always out of the way when you're wanted!"

These words caused a rather singular-looking individual to thrust himself prominently forward.

It was no other than the parish constable's factotum and general assistant—a tall, loose-jointed fellow, neither a man nor a boy, with a vacant, silly expression on his face, and a tremendous shock of uncombed hair.

But although his appearance did not give him credit for it, yet he was, nevertheless, possessed of a very unusual amount of strength, and therefore the parish constable was always anxious to have him at hand when it was necessary to make any capture.

Dick was now pushed forward by the police officers, and given into the charge of the constable and Simon.

Little did they think, as they performed this act, how great a prize they were allowing to slip out of their fingers.

"Now," said the one in command, "Mr. Constable, bear in mind that we have delivered him to you safe and sound, and you will be answerable for his re-appearance at the proper moment. Forward, my lads!" he added—"we are not yet too late to continue our pursuit."

With these words, the officers departed, in order to continue their search for Tom King, leaving a much more valuable prize behind, and, as one might almost say, unguarded.

Dick watched the departure of the police officers with anxious eyes.

He could scarcely bring himself to believe in the occurrences of the last hour.

Indeed, from the time when he had seen his two comrades so suddenly and mysteriously appear upon the summit of the hill, he had appeared to be in a dream.

"Now then, you low-lived, ill-brought-up-looking wretch," said the constable, addressing his prisoner "what are you staring for like that? Come along, can't you? Oh, you won't? Then take that!"

Now, it must not be understood, from any portion of this speech, that Dick in any way refused to comply with the constable's injunctions; but that functionary wished to make some display of his power; so, when he bade Dick take that, he struck him a sharp blow with the crown of his staff.

Dick felt the greatest inclination to knock the fellow down, but it was not his policy to maintain too aggressive an attitude against this man, for already the highwayman had decided upon the course of action he should adopt.

But he could not resist suddenly snatching the little staff out of the constable's hand and throwing it to some distance, although the feat was rendered difficult from the fact that the handcuffs were still about his wrists.

The constable stood white and shaking with rage at the commission of so dreadful an act.

To his mind, it was little short of sacrilege.

The staff, after describing many eccentric curves in the air, fell at last in the middle of a huge, slime-covered pond, and was immediately lost to view.

"Murder!" gasped the constable. "Seize him, Simon! Hold him—hold him tight! The world is coming to an end! He has insulted the King through me, his Majesty's unworthy representative!"

"Yes, decidedly unworthy," said Dick, at which words there was a general laugh among the villagers assembled.

"Bring him along, Simon!" roared the constable, as soon as he could make himself heard—"bring him along—I will not dally another moment!"

"Now, look here, Simon," said Dick—"just say which way you want me to go, and I will obey; but don't you try to haul me along, or you will find you have an ugly customer to deal with."

Simon fully appreciated the force of these remarks, so he made a sign for Dick to follow.

The trio then marched along up the village street, the people following and pressing round, and the constable giving vent to such vague threats as—

"I'll make it hot for you, my fine fellow—I'll let you know the consequences of insulting me! The institutions of this country are not to be overturned by a scoundrel like you! But you shall suffer for it; you shall know what it is to be a day and a night in my charge!"

To these speeches Dick paid not the least attention.

He heard them, it is true, but his mind was busy with other matters.

Chiefly he was curious to know where his captors were going to lead him, and he looked piercingly in advance, hoping to catch an early sight of his destination.

From the constable and the other people of the village Dick felt he had little to fear in the way of recognition, although he made up his mind not to relax his caution to too great an extent.

To his surprise, the long, straggling street of the village was quite passed through; and as he looked along the road before him, he could perceive only one building, and that looked more like a huge summer-house than aught else.

About a hundred yards or so beyond this was a toll-bar.

It quickly became apparent that this summer-house-looking building was the destination of the constable; and on drawing closer to it, Dick perceived it was the village cage, or round-house, where offenders against the laws were temporarily confined.

Dick's lips curled in derision when he found he was about to be committed to such a place.

Although handcuffed, he felt there would be little difficulty in forcing his way out of it.

By the instructions of the constable, Simon drew forth a huge bunch of keys, and, selecting one key larger than the rest, he opened the door of the round-house.

"The blunderbuss," he said—"bring out the blunderbuss!"

At these words there was a general retrogressive movement on the part of the crowd.

Simon entered the little building, and quickly appeared with the weapon in question.

It was a huge, clumsy looking affair, and seemed as though it had been manufactured ages ago by some inmate of the village.

The barrel was, as usual, of brass, but the bore was suggestive of that of a cannon, while the bell-shaped mouth was as large as an ordinary basin.

Dick looked with alarm at this instrument of destruction—not that he feared much from being fired at with it, but from his idea of the awful consequences that must ensue to the person who was foolhardy enough to pull the trigger.

"Is it loaded, Simon?" said the constable.

"Yes, sir, it is loaded. I loaded it yesterday."

"Well, then, just put these in additional, will you?"

And as he spoke, the constable pulled out of his pocket a handful of nails, which he poured at once into the capacious mouth of the blunderbuss.

They were then rammed tightly down, and the constable, continuing his instructions, said:

"Push him inside, Simon, and shut the door. Then sit down here on the edge of the stocks, and keep watch. If he attempts to escape—mark you, if he only attempts—don't wait for orders to blaze away!"

CHAPTER CMXIX.

DICK TURPIN IS SECURELY LODGED IN THE VILLAGE CAGE, AND SIMON KEEPS GOOD GUARD WITH THE BLUNDERBUSS.

SIMON handled the blunderbuss very carefully, and before venturing to carry into execution that portion of the constable's command which related to pushing the prisoner into the round-house and locking the door, he lodged the clumsy, awe-inspiring firearm against one of the upright posts of the stocks which were placed facing the road and a little on one side of the cage.

"Understand," said Dick again, when Simon came towards him, "I will not suffer myself to be handled by anyone! If you want me to go inside, just say so."

Simon stood aside, and waved his hand.

"In with him," shouted the constable—"in with him! Why don't you bundle him in, you lazy varlet? Do you think I want to stand here all the morning?"

"I am going, Mr. Constable," said Dick—"I am going. But surely you are not in earnest in telling Simon to fire off that blunderbuss?"

"In earnest?" repeated the constable. "Of course I'm in earnest! What else should I be, let me ask you?"

"Well, then, if Simon has any respect for his life he won't do it. I'd lay a wager that the moment the trigger is pulled it will burst, and be blown into a thousand pieces."

"Pooh, pooh—that's no business of yours! In with him, Simon—in with him, I say!"

Dick walked quietly to the door of the round-house, for he did not want to draw down upon himself any more of the public attention than he could possibly avoid.

It was plain, however, to see that his words had produced some impression upon Simon, for that individual eyed the blunderbuss apparently with anything but comfortable feelings.

No sooner had Dick crossed the threshold than the door was slammed shut and the key turned in the lock.

At first he could scarcely make out what kind of place he was in, owing to the semi-darkness.

But his nose was assailed by a most powerful and disagreeable odour, showing that the constable and his assistant were by no means careful to keep the cage as clean as it might be.

Indeed Dick's whole attention when he first entered this place was occupied in listening to what was said outside.

"Don't you mind what that fellow says about the blunderbuss," cried the constable; "it's all right. He only said that to frighten you. He's a desperate character. There's only half an ounce of powder in it, and a quarter of a pound of duck shot. And, mark you, if he tries to get out, you pull the trigger, and never mind the consequences; but if he does escape, I'll have you taken up before his worship, and you shall be transported."

This threat appeared to produce a considerable effect upon Simon.

There were some chinks in the woodwork of which the cage was composed, and Dick had found one of them, to which he applied his eye.

He could obtain a partial view of what was going on outside.

He saw Simon walk slowly towards the stocks, with something of the air of a man who is walking to his execution.

Then he beheld him pick up the blunderbuss, seat himself on a portion of the wooden frame, and there remain on guard.

"Don't you move," said the constable—"don't you move, on any account, until I come back to you and give you leave."

[DICK TURPIN LOOKS SIMON AND THE BEADLE IN THE CAGE.]

Simon did not make any verbal reply, but sat still, looking very stupid and foolish.

"Do you hear what I say?" roared the constable, for his temper had been greatly tried that morning.

"Yes, I can hear right enough."

"Well, then, why don't you say so?"

Simon was again silent.

"Understand distinctly," continued the constable, purposely raising his voice that it might reach the ears of the prisoner within the cage, "if he so much as show the tip of his nose in the attempt to escape, shoot him down like you would a crow."

"But—but——" said Simon, hesitatingly.

"But what?"

"Suppose I killed him?"

"Well, then he will be a good riddance—that's all I can say."

"But sha'n't I be had up for it?"

"No—certainly not. You have my authority. He's been duly warned of the consequences, and if he attempts to escape, why, the consequences will be on his own head. I'm off now," the constable added; "and mind that you keep a good guard during my absence."

With these words, the constable turned round and marched away.

Several of the villagers accompanied him, of course anxious to draw him into conversation respecting the events of the morning.

Others less anxious in this respect, but more so in another, lingered around the cage, looking at Simon with admiring eyes, but keeping a safe distance from the blunderbuss, the effects of an explosion of which they justly dreaded.

At last, however, these villagers, one by one, dispersed; there did not seem to be one thorough idler among the group—all had their work to do.

No. 189 will be Published next Monday.

And so in a short time they took their departure, and Simon was left alone.

He watched the last until he had disappeared from sight; then, with an audible sigh, h placed the blunderbuss carefully against the upright post of the stocks, and assumed a very hopeless, dejected attitude.

It was clear that he was by no means pleased with his duty; but he had no means of escape from it.

Dick continued to watch him through the crevice for several moments, and then, turning round, he gazed about him, anxious to make himself acquainted with his prison.

The interior of the round-house was now much more clearly discernible than when he first entered it, for his eyes had accustomed themselves to the very small amount of light which crept in.

Nothing more cheerless, desolate, and disgusting could be imagined.

The village pound was not in a worse condition, and that was saying a good deal.

There was no seat in the place, and nothing that would serve as one.

The walls, though not very stout and strong, were, nevertheless, smooth.

The top was formed merely of thatch, so that, but for the presence of Simon and the blunderbuss outside, it would have been no difficult matter to escape.

This last word was continually before his mind, and, having made himself as familiar as he wished to be with the inside of the round-house, he turned his back to the wall. Selecting the cleanest place he could find, and leaning against it, he supported himself by driving his heels into the thick clayey mud which formed the flooring.

Here he gave himself up to thought, wondering which would b the best means of achieving his freedom.

After all, he thought Simon was not a man to be particularly dreaded.

There would be a risk in attempting to break forth, but et Dick Turpin thought it might be run successfully. Ten to one if the fellow would have the courage or presence of mind to discharge the blunderbuss at the right moment, or, if he did, it would be without an aim.

But another consideration suggested itself, which made Dick quite unwilling to run this risk.

The blunderbuss would certainly be fired, and if he should be so fortunate as to escape any injury from the various missiles it contained, the explosion, nevertheless, would resound far and wide through the still, quiet air, and spread an immediate alarm.

Before he should be able to get to any great distance there was a strong probability of his being overtaken and recaptured.

"No," said Dick, after debating the subject at great length—"no, I will not run the risk just at present. I will wait. Perhaps fortune will favour me — who knows?"

Dick's resolution was to stay till nightfall, which certainly would afford him a better chance of making his escape, though there was the fear that he might not be allowed to remain so long in his present quarters.

That was a chance, and a chance he resolved it should remain.

And now, in the silence and solitude of this place, he began for the first time to give himself up to a little calm reflection.

Instantaneously his thoughts travelled back to the time when that singular incident had befallen him at the summit of the hill.

The more he pondered upon this, the more at a loss he felt to comprehend it.

The most reasonable conclusion he could come to was what he had seen was a delusion of the senses merely; but, then, the forms of his two comrades looked so palpable and plain that he could scarcely reconcile himself to this belief.

And so, with his mind in a state of great uneasiness and alarm, Dick slowly passed the day.

About noon the constable made his appearance, bringing with him some dinner for Simon.

Then Dick learned that Squire Bartlett was unable to attend to his magisterial functions that day, in consequence of a hunting appointment he had with several gentlemen in the neighbourhood

Dick heard this intelligence with the greatest satisfaction.

"Are you sure he's all right?" asked the constable.

"Well, I think he is," said Simon. "But since the door was closed, I have not heard him move."

"That's only his artfulness," said the constable. "I've had some experience with men of his stamp, and know how to deal with them. He wants taming a little, and I calculate hunger will do it."

After a few more words, the constable took his departure, and Simon was once more left alone.

Dick had now decided upon the pursuit of a definite course of action, which he hoped would result in his perfect freedom.

Whether it would do so or not depended upon various contingencies; but he had great hopes.

His first task was to rid himself of the handcuffs, which galled and chafed him exceedingly.

He had made many and continual efforts to accomplish this, but to no purpose.

Now, however, with stern, angry determination, he set about it, resolved to endure any amount of pain in order to get his hands at liberty.

Squeezing his left hand, which was rather less than his right, into the smallest possible dimensions, he began to tug with might and main in order to get it through the strong steel hoop.

In the effort, the skin was torn from the back of his hand in long strips.

The pain was intense; but, clenching his teeth together, he persevered, for he felt each time his hand was drawn further and further through the rigg.

At last he was free, so far as ridding his left hand of the handcuff was concerned.

He had not time to liberate his right, for he knew that for a time the manacle hooped about it would offer him but slight inconvenience.

Now that he had done so much towards the accomplishment of his design, he became exceedingly impatient for night to close in.

It was some comfort for him to think that it was that season of the year when darkness sets in early.

By slow degrees, the interior of his prison could be less and less distinctly perceived; but when darkness fairly settled around, Dick made no immediate attempt at liberation.

He was waiting for the chance to present itself of leav the round-house quietly and speedily.

It required a great effort of self-control to remain thus idle when he might be taking steps to quit the cage.

But his long and weary waiting was rewarded at last.

The sound of a voice from the distance, and then the heavy tread of some one approaching, roused all his faculties.

Again applying his eyes to the crevice in the woodwork, he looked forth, and saw, at some distance, a small, flickering light.

It grew brighter and clearer, for it was coming closer.

Then he perceived the bulky figure of the constable approaching.

He was carrying a lantern in his hand, and it was from this the light proceeded.

Simon gave utterance to a responsive shout.

He was glad enough to see his master approaching, for the solitude in which he had so long remained had become almost insupportable.

"All's well, Simon, eh?" said the constable, when he got a little nearer.

"Yes, all's well," was the answer, very sulkily given—"at least, I suppose all's well."

"Why suppose?"

"Because I've not heard a single sound since I saw you last, and I can hardly bring myself to believe that he is in the cage at all."

"Why—why—what you don't mean to say that—that——"

"That what?"

"That he's escaped?"

"No, no—I don't believe he has," said Simon. "I have never took my eyes off the building for a blessed minute."

The account given by his factotum by no means pleased or reassured the constable.

He was very anxious to make certain that his prisoner was safe.

He had received a message from the squire, bidding him bring the prisoner before him and two other magistrates at noon on the morrow, and he had heard quite enough to be aware that the magistrate had a personal feeling in the matter.

In these parts the squire was absolute, and knowing his power made the constable exceedingly anxious that all should go well with the prisoner, of whom, it need scarcely be stated, he stood in great dread.

Some time elapsed, during which he remained in deep reflection.

Dick's breath came short and fast.

He wondered whether the chance he had hoped for and calculated upon was really about to present itself.

"Ain't you going to let me go home?" said Simon, at last, breaking in upon his superior's meditation. "I am cold through to the bone, and if I stop here much longer I shall go to sleep!"

"You had better not!" said the constable. "But I'll tell you what you shall do. You shall take my lantern, and I will take the blunderbuss, and you shall open the door of the cage, and peep in to see whether the prisoner is all right."

But Simon did not relish this proposal.

"And where shall you be?" he ventured to ask.

"Why, keeping guard outside here, you idiot!" was the reply. "If he attempts to escape, why, pop! and down he goes!"

"I don't like to go in by myself in the dark," said Simon. "I am frightened."

"It won't be in the dark."

"Yes it will!"

"How can it be, if you take the lantern with you?"

"Well, that makes no difference. And I'll tell you what it is," said Simon, with sudden boldness, "I ain't going in by myself, and that's a fact!"

The constable seemed about to break forth into some ebullition of rage; but, if so, he controlled the impulse.

"Don't be a fool, Simon," he said—"don't be a fool! You have nothing whatever to fear. Take the lantern, and walk in boldly."

"Not first," said Simon, more doggedly than before—"not first. After you, if you please."

CHAPTER CMXX.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN, THE PARISH CONSTABLE, AND SIMON CHANGE PLACES.

The constable hesitated a moment or two, and it was about an even chance whether the door of the cage would be opened at all that night or not.

The desire to ascertain whether his prisoner was safe, however, overcame every other consideration in his breast, especially when he remembered how serious the consequences would be to him should an escape take place.

Sinking his voice, he continued:

"I really think he is a dangerous fellow, Simon; but two of us needn't be afraid of him. Look here, we'll both go together, and take one peep to ascertain that he is all safe, and then we'll lock the door again."

"That's more reasonable," said Simon—"a good deal more reasonable, and I don't mind it."

The matter being thus arranged, the constable took up the blunderbuss, and Simon took the lantern.

The pair of them, advancing a few steps, stopped before the door.

The key was thrust into the lock, and turned.

At this moment a faint, smothered cry, sounding like a groan, came to their ears.

It made both of them start with affright.

The constable trembled from head to foot, and even his very lips turned white as he ejaculated:

"Why, what was that, Simon—what was that?"

"Blest if I know! Have you got the blunderbuss?"

"Yes—yes."

"On full cock?"

"Yes—yes."

"Mercy!" said a faint voice. "Have pity upon me! If you have any feelings of compassion, don't allow me to perish here in this manner!"

"Why—why, Simon——"

"Yes, master?"

"It sounds as if he was uncommonly bad—don't it?"

"Oh, very!"

"Just push the door open a little further, and poke the lantern in. Don't be frightened. I'll stand behind you with the blunderbuss. I'll keep him back, I'll warrant!"

Simon was rather curious to know what was the matter with the prisoner, and his curiosity enabled him to some extent to overget his fears.

Thrusting in the lantern as he had been directed, he bent forward and glanced around the interior of the cage.

"Well—well," said the constable, anxiously, vainly endeavouring, by standing on tip-toe, to peep over his factotum's shoulder, "can you see him?"

"Yes, master. I can see him plain enough."

"Where is he?"

"He do seem uncommonly bad, to be sure."

"But where is he, I say?"

"Lying on his blessed back, master—flat on his back, and he looks to me as if he was about to kick the bucket."

"But he mustn't," said the constable—"but he mustn't!"

"Have pity," said Dick, again, in a weak voice—"do have pity upon me! Help me, or I shall surely die!"

"But you mustn't!" roared the constable.

Dick responded with a groan.

"I wonder what's the matter with him, master?" asked Simon.

"I don't know. What's to be done?"

Simon scratched his head, but did not reply.

"He's handcuffed—yes, he's handcuffed, and there are two of us, and we've got the blunderbuss," pursued the constable, with more determination in his voice and manner. "We oughtn't to be afraid, eh, Simon?"

"No—no"

"We ought to be a match for him. The only thing I wish is, that it was a little lighter—I don't like the dark."

At this moment, Dick renewed his appeal for assistance, and, judging by the tone of his voice and the manner in which he was lying on the ground, it would appear that he was very bad indeed.

The motionless manner in which he continued to remain served to inspire the constable and Simon with courage.

They began to think there would surely not be so much danger after all in venturing into the round-house in order to see what really was the matter with the prisoner.

Accordingly, after much hesitation, and taking their steps in such a manner that they seemed half inclined to turn round and run away again, they approached the spot where Dick was lying.

"What's the matter?" said the constable, more boldly, and grasping the blunderbuss while he spoke—"what's the matter? What do you want?"

"Oh dear—oh dear!"

"Don't speak and look like that. Why don't you say what's the matter?"

Dick groaned.

"Oh!" he said—"oh, if I could only get up just a very little! I fancy I should be better then!"

"And why don't you get up?"

"I—I can't; but I will try."

Apparently with great pain and difficulty, Dick slowly raised himself from the ground.

Simon, holding the lantern in his hand, looked on with the deepest interest, and the constable—who, prudently or otherwise, had got behind Simon—peeped furtively first from one side, then from the other.

All at once, however, with the suddenness of a lightning's flash, Dick started up.

No movement could possibly have been made more rapid; but the fact was, he had been careful to get in such a position first that he could spring to his feet without difficulty.

In doing so, he gave Simon a tremendous push, which he could scarcely have withstood even had he been on his guard and prepared for it.

But, taking him unawares as it did, he went back as though shot.

The constable was behind him, and was, if possible, still more taken by surprise—in fact, before he knew what had happened, or how it had come to pass, he found himself lying on his back on the muddy floor of the cage, with Simon struggling on the top of him.

Neither did he know how or by what means the trigger of the blunderbuss was pulled; certainly the weapon exploded with tremendous violence, lighting up for a moment the whole interior of the cage with a vivid glare, and then, with a crashing sound, the various missiles with which it had been loaded went hurtling through the thatch-covered roof.

After that there was silence and darkness.

With the same quick movement, Dick, finding his ruse so successful, had darted to the door, which the constable had left ajar.

The key was sticking in the lock.

Quick as thought, he closed the door and turned the key.

The tables were then turned; he was no longer the prisoner, but the jailer.

The noise made by the report of the blunderbuss could not fail, he felt sure, to reach the ears of the inmates of the village, and set them all on the alert.

It was necessary, then, for him to make his escape with all speed.

Yet, though aware of this, Dick could not resist the temptation of waiting to ascertain what had been the effects of the explosion of the blunderbuss.

Accordingly he tapped sharply with his knuckles upon the door of the round-house as he cried:

"Mr. Constable—Mr. Constable! Simon—Simon!"

Hateful groans alone responded to him.

'Speak—speak!" said Dick. "Has the old thing burst? If so, don't blame me—I gave you a caution."

There was no reply, and just then Dick, glancing towards the village, saw lights moving about in all directions, while simultaneously the shouting of voices and trampling of footsteps came upon his ears.

"It would be madness to stay longer," he muttered—"perfect madness; so I must leave the matter in doubt. Where shall I find the horse and cart, I wonder? I suppose I must not trouble my head about them. Well, well, it doesn't matter."

As he spoke, he made his way with great rapidity from the cage, striking right across the country in the direction of his destination.

Before going far, however, he paused, for he found himself on the verge of a large sheet of water.

He had made up his mind what to do.

As quickly as possible he tore off his disguise, which, it will be remembered, he had put on over his ordinary apparel.

He rolled it up into the smallest compass he possibly could, making it into a bundle, in the centre of which he placed a large, heavy stone.

Then, with all his might, he flung the parcel away from him, and it fell with a loud splash into the water, and was immediately lost to sight.

Dick shook himself, and then gave a long-drawn sigh of relief.

"Ah!" he said, "I must not despise my disguise, but yet I feel now far more comfortable and like myself. They will be puzzled to track me now, that's certain, and the sooner I get to Somefield the better."

As he spoke, he again set himself in motion, and as he walked rapidly along there was one subject upon which he did not fail to congratulate himself most heartily.

This was, that he had decided when he did to part with the gold he had received from old Matthew, otherwise, when taken prisoner by the police, this money would have been found about him, and consequently have awakened all their suspicions.

Indeed, when he looked back upon what he had gone through, he could not avoid a slight shivering feeling, which increased when his thoughts reverted to the strange manner in which he had witnessed Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack vanish from the summit of the hill.

CHAPTER CMXXI.

DICK MEETS WITH ANOTHER ADVENTURE ON HIS WAY TO SOMEFIELD

No amount of reflection, however, could make his ideas any clearer on this point.

The whole affair was a complete mystery, unless he chose to ascribe it to supernatural agency, and this Dick was loath indeed to do.

Vainly, however, as he strode hastily along, did he endeavour to come to some reasonable conjecture until, at length, he was obliged to give up in utter despair.

By this time he had once more reached the high-road.

Before he ventured to set his foot upon it he paused, and reconnoitred carefully around him.

On all sides was an intense and perfect silence, and at length, reassured by this, he ventured to spring over the low hedgerow that alone divided him from the highway.

The night was cold, with the moon shining at times with great brilliancy in the sky, but a brisk wind from the south-west drove innumerable clouds across the face of the firmament, so that at intervals all was darkness and obscurity.

But when the moon broke forth, her light seemed all the more vivid and silvery by the contrast.

All at once Dick became aware, in spite of the profound silence, he was not alone on the high-road.

On one occasion, when the moon peeped forth, he saw before him, but only for an instant, a faint, flitting figure.

He fancied it was a female; but the glimpse he had was too momentary for him to feel certain on this point.

He walked on at a slightly reduced rate, for he wished to have no spy upon any of his movements.

A more profound darkness than usual now overspread the scene.

When at length the moon once more broke forth, Dick saw, at no great distance before him, a rude, clumsily-constructed wooden bridge.

Beneath this, water was running with considerable velocity, for he could hear it where he then stood.

The moonlight, too, enabled him to trace its course in a long, irregular line.

His attention was diverted from a contemplation of this by again catching sight of the fleeting figure.

It was now near the centre of the bridge, where it paused and looked upward.

Then Dick saw clearly, and beyond doubt, that it was a female, by her form and general appearance certainly young, and most likely beautiful.

Dick wondered what could have brought her at so late an hour to so desolate a spot, and while half hesitating whether to stay and watch her further movements, or to advance, he uttered a cry of horror.

To his great surprise the young girl, after remaining motionless a moment, sprang suddenly on to the low parapet of the bridge, and from thence dashed herself headforemost into the river below.

A faint, smothered kind of shriek and then a splash were the next sounds that reached Dick's ears.

Not for one moment did he hesitate as to the course he should adopt.

At full speed he ran along until he reached the banks of the river, close to the rude archway of the bridge.

Then, placing his hands before his eyes, he looked keenly and scrutinisingly over the surface of the water.

To his vexation, another cloud at this moment swept over the moon's disc, yet not before he fancied he saw something white floating in the water close to where he stood.

To plunge into the rushing, foaming tide was his next act.

Dick was an excellent swimmer, and struck out boldly for the object he wished to reach.

The force of the current was so great that it carried him a long way down the stream in the course of a few seconds.

But he was inspired to make every exertion to accelerate his progress, for, despite the obscurity, he perceived the form of the young girl before him.

At last, with a glad cry, he seized hold of a portion of her apparel, and, having done so, turned his face without delay towards the land.

The shore was quickly and easily reached; and, kneeling down, he supported the head of the young girl, and tried to re-awaken her to consciousness.

To all appearances, however, life was gone.

Her face was ashy pale, and as cold as death itself.

Dick had no means at hand for restoring her, and so, anxiously, he rose to his feet and looked around, trusting to find some place of shelter to which he could take her.

In doing so, his keen eye detected a faint, twinkling light.

But it was on the other side of the river, and to reach it it would be necessary to cross over the bridge.

But Dick did not hesitate to pick the young girl up in his arms.

She was a burden light to carry, for she was thin even to emaciation.

And now, as the moon broke forth again more clearly, and Dick looked down into the young girl's countenance, he saw, despite the reposeful expression upon it, that there were many traces of grief and sorrow visible.

Forgetting all his own danger in the concern he felt for this young girl, Dick hurried on.

The bridge was quickly crossed and the light neared.

It was not long before he discovered that it proceeded from a roadside inn, the inmates of which had caused a bright light to be placed in one of the windows.

The door was closed when Dick reached the building, but by one sudden blow with his foot he dashed it open and hurried at full speed along a passage and into a large kitchen, in which a bright fire was briskly burning, and where many people were assembled.

His sudden and strange appearance caused a universal start of dismay.

"Help her!" said Dick. "I believe life is not yet extinct. I have saved her from the river."
